After the taking of Assochis, Ptolemy went and Attaqu'd Sepphoris, a Place a little way-off; where he was Repulsed with a Considerable Loss, and from thence Marched directly away to Try a Battle with Alexander, whom he found about [a] Asophus near the River Jordan, and Encamped just over against the Enemy. Alexander had in his Van Eight Thousand of those they call Hecatontomachi, Armed with Brazen Bucklers, and Ptolemy's Men in the Front had the same sort of Shields; but the Generality of his People not being so well Armed as their Adversaries, were not over-Eager of Engaging, till one Philostephanus, an Excellent Officer that had the Ordering of them, and understood his Trade perfectly well, led them-on and Encourag'd them. The First Word of Command was to Pass the River that parted the Two Armies; which Alexander did not pretend to Oppose, in Confidence of getting the Day, if he could but Engage the Enemy with the River behind them to Cut-off their Retreat. When it came to the Shock, the Fortune of the Battle was a while Doubtful, and it was fought with Great Loss on Both sides; till [upon the Shrinking of a Division of Ptolemy's,] the Victory seemed to Incline to Alexander: But Philostephanus coming-up to their Relief with a Seasonable Enforcement, that Wing of the Jews was overlaid by Numbers, and Broken; and no Succour appearing, they were forced to Shift for themselves, and the Whole Field Scatter'd presently into a Rout, after their Example: Ptolemy's Men pressing so Hard upon the Fugitives that their Arms were Tir'd, and their Swords Blunted with the Execution. They speak of Thirty Thousand Men Slain in that Battle. Timagenes in his History makes them to be Fifty; the rest either taken Prisoners, or saving themselves by Flight.

Ptolemy attaques Sepphoris, and is beaten-off. The Hecatontomachi. Philostephanus engages them. Alexander put to the Rout, with the Loss of 30000 Men.

After the Pursuit of this Bloudy Victory as far as Mercyless Rage and Day-light could carry it, Ptolemy, in the Evening, went into some of the Jews Villages and Habitations; and finding them Well Stock'd and Crouded with Women and Children, order'd his Soldiers to cut their Throats, one with another, Promiscuously, and then Hack them into Goblets and Quarters, and so into Pots and Kettles with them over the Fire, for a Terror to those that Scap'd from the Battle, when they should find themselves fallen into the Hands of an Enemy that liv'd upon Humane Flesh. Strabo and Nicolaus make mention of this Barbarous Cruelty. The same People took Ptolemais also by Assault, as we have said Elsewhere.

A Barbarous Butchery of Ptolemy. Ptolemais taken by Force.

Cleopatra was so Sensible of the overgrown Greatness of her Son, Gaza Reduc'd, and the Land of Judæa laid Wast, that she thought it now High Time to put a Stop to his Ambition; especially being come to the Gates of Ægypt it self, with a Design upon the Kingdom too. Upon this Precaution, she Muster'd without any Delay, all the Strength she was able to make, both at Sea and Land; Constituting Chelcias and Ananias, Two Jews, for Generals. She sent the Greatest part of her Treasure with her Grandchildren, and her Last Will, and Testament, into the Isle of Coas; and Order'd her Son Alexander with a Powerful Navy into Phœnicia, to keep that Province in Obedience, while she her self went to Ptolemais; and being refused Admittance, she Order'd an Assault upon the Town. Ptolemy, upon this, quitted Syria, and Hasten'd away into Ægypt; Flattering himself, that coming so Unexpectedly, and in the Queen's Absence too, he should find the Country Unguarded, but he was much Mistaken in his Surmise. Cleopatra had the Fortune at this time to lose Chelcias, one of her Generals, as he was in the Pursuit of Ptolemy in Cœle-Syria.

Cleopatra levies an Army against Ptolemy, and makes Chelcias and Ananias her Generals. Ptolemy quits Syria and Marches away into Ægypt. Chelcias Slain. Ptolemy forced quite away out of Ægypt.

Upon Ptolemy's Miscarriage in this Attempt upon Ægypt, the Queen sent a Strong Detachment after him, that drove him quite out of his Country, now a Second Time, and forced him to take-up his Winter-Quarters in Gaza: She her ſelf, in the mean time, taking the City and Garriſon of Ptolemais by Aſſault, where ſhe was highly Preſented by Alexander, and the Preſenter alſo received with a Dignity becoming ſo Great and Generous a Queen, to an Unfortunate Prince under the Perſecution and Oppreſſion of a Common Enemy, and that had no other Sanctuary to Repair to. Some were for going quite another Way to Work, and for the Queen's making the Beſt of her Opportunity, by ſeizing Alexander and his Kingdom both at once; Suggeſting what Pity it would be to leave ſo many Good People of the Jews at the Mercy of one Single Man: But Ananias cry'd-out againſt the Propoſition, as an Affront to all the Tyes and Duties of Hoſpitality, and Common Faith; eſpecially to a Friend and a Kinſman, under ſo Sacred a Truſt: Beſide, that one ſuch Act of Injuſtice would turn againſt her the Hearts of all the Honeſt Jews upon the Face of the Earth. The Queen was ſo mightily pleaſed with this Plain-dealing Simplicity of Ananias, that ſhe did not only forbear Preſſing any thing that was Hard upon him, but renew'd a League of Friendſhip with him, at Scythopolis a City of Cœle-Syria.

Cleopatra takes Ptolemais by Aſſault, and treats Alexander with Great Reſpect:

and renews a League of Amity with him at Scythopolis.

No ſooner did Alexander find himſelf out of the Power and Fear of Ptolemy, but away he went upon an Expedition into Cœle-Syria; where, after a Ten-Months Siege, he took Gadara, and after that, Amathus the Strongeſt Fort incomparably upon the River Jordan, and the Place where Theodotus the Son of Zeno, in an Outrage of Revenge, fell upon the Jews by Surprize, cut-off Ten Thouſand of their Men, and took Alexander's Baggage: But this unexpected Diſaſter did not yet Divert the King from his Deſign upon Raphia, a Sea-Coaſt Town, and Anthedon, which was afterward by Herod called Agrippiades; Both which he reduced by Force. Ptolemy had by this time left Gaza, and betaken himſelf again to Cyprus, his Mother Cleopatra alſo being gone back to Ægypt: So that Alexander took this Occaſion of Revenging himſelf upon the People of Gaza for calling-in Ptolemy to their Succour againſt him; laid Siege to the Town, and at the ſame time Haraſs'd their Country. While Alexander was before the Place, Apollodotus their Commander made a Stout Sally one Night with Two Thouſand Mercenaries, and Ten Thouſand of the Citizens Well-Armed, upon the Camp of the Jews; and ſo long as it was Dark, the Beſieged had the Better of it, upon an Apprehenſion of Ptolemy's being come-up with Relief: But ſo ſoon as ever they had Day-light to ſhew them the Truth of the Matter, the Jews Rally'd, and made ſo Furious a Charge upon the Garriſon, that they Deſtroy'd a Thouſand of their Men: But the Courage of theſe People was Proof ſtill againſt all the Difficulties of Number, Force, nay and Famine it ſelf; being Reſolved among themſelves rather to abide all Extremities, then to Shrink, or Yield to an Enemy. And for a further Encouragement to this Obſtinacy, they were held in hand by Aretas an Arabian King, with the Promiſe of a timely Succour. But all came to nothing; for before any Supply could be brought, Apollodotus was Kill'd, and the Town taken. This Apollodotus was Murder'd by the Hand of Lyſimachus, his own Brother, out of meer Spite and Envy, for the Reputation he had gained among the People. After the Fact committed, he got a Party together, and ſo deliver'd-up the City to Alexander. This Prince, upon his Firſt Entrance, behaved himſelf as if he meant them nothing but Moderation, Good Will and Fair Quarter: But this Peaceable Humour did not laſt long, for he turn'd his Soldiers looſe among them immediately after, with a Commiſſion at large to Kill, Burn, and Deſtroy at Pleaſure. This Licence they Extended to a Direct Maſſacre, though it coſt them Dear enough too; for there dy'd as many of the Jews, as of the Townſmen. Some, in ſhort, ſet Fire to their own Houſes, that the Enemy might not be the better for them; Others laid violent Hands upon their very Wives and Children; chuſing rather to have them Die Free, then Live Slaves. The Magiſtracy of the Town happen'd to be in Counſel when theſe Barbarous Troups came into the City, and the Senators, to the Number of Five Hundred, betook themſelves preſently to the Temple of Apollo for Sanctuary; but they were all Slaughter'd to a Man; the Town Sack'd, and Levell'd; and Alexander, after a Year ſpent before it, returned to Jeruſalem.

Much about This time it was that Antiochus, otherwiſe called Grypus, was kill'd by the Treachery of Heracleon in the Year of his Life Forty Five, and the Nine and Twentieth of his Reign. His Son Seleucus ſucceeded him, who waged War with his Uncle Antiochus, call'd Cyzicenus, whom he Worſted and took Priſoner in a Battle, and put him to Death. Antiochus, the Son of Cyzicenus, whoſe Surname was Euſebes, came a while after to Arad, where he was Crown'd; and making War after this, upon Seleucus, he beat him at one Battle out of all Syria, whence he fled for Safety to Cilicia: and in requital for the Protection he receiv'd among the Mopſeates, he laid Heavy Taxes and Impoſitions upon them, which they took in ſuch Indignation, that they put Fire to his Palace, and Burnt Maſter and Servants altogether Alive.

While

While Antiochus Cyzicenus was in Poſſeſſion of the Government of Syria, there was Another Antiochus, the Brother of Seleucus, that brought in a War upon him, wherein he loſt his Life and his Army: after which, his Brother Philip took the Crown to himſelf, and Govern'd part of Syria. Ptolomy Lathur, upon this, ſent for his Fourth Brother Demetrius Eucærus to Gnidus, whom he Conſtituted King of Damaſcus. Antiochus bare-up very Stoutly againſt his Brothers for the Time he Liv'd; but being call'd upon ſoon after to the Aſſiſtance of Laodice, the Queen of the Galadenes, that was then in War with the Parthians, he was [a] ſlain in the Field with his Sword in his Hand, behaving himſelf like a Man of Honour and Reſolution: And after his Death, the Government of Syria deſcended to his Two Brothers Philip and Demetrius, as hath been ſaid heretofore.

There was about this time a moſt Seditious Affront put upon Alexander by his Own People. It was a Cuſtomary Thing among the Jews to March with Boughs of Citron or Palm-Trees in their Hands upon the Celebration of the Feaſt of Tabernacles, and as Alexander was upon his Preparation to Sacrifice, and aſſiſt at the Solemnity, the Multitude fell to Pelting him with Citrons, and with ſuch provoking Language of Slave, and the like, that in a Rage he cauſed a Matter of Six Thouſand of them to be put to death, and was forced to ſet-up a Partition of Wood about the Temple and the Altar, to the very Place where only the Prieſts were admitted, to keep-off the Croud. He made uſe of Piſidians, and Cilicians for his Mercenaries; but for the Syrians, he did not Love them, and durſt not truſt them. He got the Better, in fine, of the Arabians; laid the Moabites, and Galaadites under Contribution, and deſtroy'd Amathus without any the leaſt Oppoſition from Theodorus. He made War alſo upon Obed the King of Arabia; but falling into an Ambuſh near Gadara in Galilee, he was forced by a Preſs of Camels into the Mouth of a Narrow, Craggy Paſſage; from whence, with Infinite Difficulty, he made a Shift to Clear himſelf, and ſo got ſafe to Jeruſalem. This Diſaſter of Alexander's was follow'd with a Six Years Rebellion, which coſt the Jews no leſs then Fifty Thouſand Lives. The King was weary of the Broil, and would fain have been at Quiet; but the more he ſought for a Reconciliation, the further were they from it: inſomuch, that asking them at laſt what it was poſſible for him to do to Content them, they bad him with one Voice cut his own Throat; and thereupon Invited Demetrius Eucærus to their Aid.

DEmetrius Eucærus, in Conjunction with thoſe that called him-in, Marched to their Aſſiſtance with an Army of Three Thouſand Horſe and Forty Thouſand Foot, and Encamped near Sichem; where Alexander, with about Six Thouſand Foreign Mercenaries, and ſome Twenty Thouſand of his own Faction, went out to meet him. The Armies being now drawn-up, it came to a Tryal of Skill upon the Point of Stratagem and Addreſs, betwixt the Two Parties, whether Demetrius ſhould Debauch more of Alexander's Foreigners to him; (being all Greeks) or Alexander, on the other Hand, gain over more of Demtrius's Jews to himſelf. They ſtood tricking of it thus a while; but finding that there was no Good to be done on either Hand that way, they brought it to a Battle, and Demetrius got the Day: Alexander's Auxiliaries doing as much however as it was Poſſible for Brave Men to do; for they dy'd every Creature of them upon the Spot with Sword in Hand: and the Loſs on the other ſide was alſo very Conſiderable. Alexander upon this Defeat, was forced to fly to the Mountains for Refuge; where, by a ſtrange Turn of Compaſſion for his Misfortune, a matter of Six Thouſand Jews came up to him, and Joyn'd him. Demetrius took ſuch an Apprehenſion at this Enforcement, and the Inclinations of the People, that he preſently Quitted and Retir'd. But the Jews, after all this, ſtood their Ground ſtill, nevertheleſs, and carry'd-on the War againſt Alexander upon the Stock of their Own Reſolution and Credit: Notwithſtanding that they were perpetually Baffled and

As he was Feaſting himſelf, and his Concubines one time, in a Turret that had the Advantage of a large Proſpect, he made it part of his Entertainment, to treat his Company with the Spectacle of the Gibbetting of Eight Hundred Jews, with their Wives and Children, and the Cutting of their Throats in the Sight of one another yet Living. It was a Terrible Provocation, 'tis true, for Subjects not only to Rebel, but to Joyn alſo with Strangers againſt their Lawful Prince, to the Extreme Hazzard of his Life and Dignity, as this was the Caſe; and then to Reduce him at laſt to the Neceſſity of giving-up again to the King of Arabia, what he had taken from the Moabites and Galaadites, as a Compoſition not to Aſſiſt his Revolted Subjects againſt him: To ſay nothing of other Outrages Innumerable of the ſame kind; This is all Abominably Ill, but not ſufficient yet to Warrant ſo Unnatural an Inhumanity. The Rigour, in ſhort, was ſo Deteſtable, that the Jews gave Alexander the Name of [a] Thracidas for it. There were ſome Eight Thouſand of the Army however that made a Shift to get away by Night; and ſpent their Days afterward in a kind of Baniſhment, ſo long as Alexander liv'd; but this Tumult once over, he had a Peaceable Reign of it ever after.

Demetrius went from Judæa to Beræa where his Brother Philip was, and with an Army of Ten Thouſand Foot and a Thouſand Horſe, laid Siege to the Town. Straton the Prince of the Place, and a Friend of Philip's, called-in to his Aſſiſtance, Zizus an Arabian Prince, and Mithridates Sinaces the Parthian General, who with a Powerful Army Attaqu'd Demetrius, and preſs'd him ſo hard both with Darts and Arrows, and with Drought for want of Water, that Demetrius with his People were forced to Render; Himſelf being taken Priſoner, and ſent for a Preſent to Mithridates a Parthian King. What Antiochians were found in the Tents, were left at Liberty to go back to Antioch. The King of Parthia treated Demetrius with Great Honour and Reſpect; but he Sicken'd ſoon after and Dy'd: Philip, after this Encounter, Repairing preſently to Antioch, and Entring into the Government of the whole Kingdom of Syria.

Mileſius gets Poſſeſſion of the Place, and preſerves it for Antiochus.

Antiochus, otherwiſe call'd Dionyſius, and the Brother of Philip, took the Opportunity of his Brother's being then Engaged with his Army in an Expedition againſt the Parthians; and having an Eye upon Damaſcus, got Poſſeſſion of the Place, and himſelf Declared King there. The Tidings of this Adventure brought his Brother Philip immediately in all haſte to Damaſcus, where, by a Secret Intelligence with Mileſius, the Governour of the Fort, he was quietly received into the Town: But to Diſguiſe the Matter, he gave the Officer no Reward for fear he ſhould be thought to come-in rather by Treachery, then by the Force of his Authority, and Credit; but Mileſius was even with him for it afterward; for Philip being abroad once at the Circus for his Exerciſe and Diverſion, Mileſius ſhut the Gates upon him, and Reſerved the City for Antiochus; who, upon the Firſt News of it, Poſted inſtantly back again out of Arabia, and with an Army of Eight Thouſand Foot, and Eight Hundred Horſe, Marched directly into Judæa. Alexander, upon This Incurſion, drew a Large, and Deep Ditch from Caparſaba, now called Antipatris, up to the very Sea of Joppa, which was the only Acceſſible way to the Town, He Erected a Wall alſo with Intervals of ſeveral Wooden Towers, which he carry'd-on for a Hundred and Fifty Furlongs in length; ength; and there he waited for Antiochus, who, without more ado, ſet Fire to theſe Wooden Contrivances, and ſo paſs'd his Army into Arabia, where the Enemy gave way upon the Firſt Encounter; but Advancing afterward with a Body of Ten Thouſand Horſe, Antiochus charging-in directly upon them, it came to a Bloudy Diſpute: But preſſing-in over Eagerly to the Relief of one his Wings that he found overpower'd, it was his Fortune to be Kill'd, when he was as Good as ſure of the Victory. The whole Army loſt their Hearts with their General, and Inſtantly upon his Fall, fled in a Rout to Cana, where the Greater part of them Periſh'd for want of Bread.

A Bloudy Battle betwixt Antiochus and Alexander. Antiochus Kill'd, and his Army Routed.

Aretas came next to the Government of Cœle-Syria, upon the Call and Choice of the People of Damaſcus, out of a Pure Spite and Oppoſition to Ptolomy the Son of Mennæus. He Enter'd Judæa with an Army; overthrew Alexander near Addida; and then, upon Conditions betwixt them Two, went his way back again.

Aretas ſucceeds to the Government of Cœle-Syria;

Alexander went-on, and took Dion by Aſſault; Marching thence to Eſſa, where Zeno's Treaſure lay and all he had that was Rich and Precious. He ran firſt Three Walls about it, and then made himſelf Maſter of it by Storm; as he did afterwards of Gaulana, and Seleucia, the Vale of Antiochus, and the Fortreſs of Gamala. And in regard that there were many Grievous Miſdemeanours laid to the Charge of Demetrius, formerly the Maſter of theſe Places, he Diveſted him of his Royal Authority. When he had ſpent ſome Three Years in this Courſe of Action, he carry'd his Army back again, to the Great Satisfaction of the Jews, in regard that they ſaw every thing Succeeded ſo well in his Hands.

Alexander takes Dion, Eſſa, and afterwards Gaulana, Seleucia, the Vale of Antiochus, and Gamala. Demetrius depos'd from his Government.

The Jews were at that time in Poſſeſſion of Syria, Idumæa, and Phœnicia; the Tower of Straton upon the Sea, Apollonia, Joppa, Iamnia, Azotus, Gaza, Anthedon, Raphia, Rhinocura; and in the Midland, of Idumæa, of Adora, and Mariſſa; all Samaria, and the Mountains of Carmel and Itabyr. Alexander deliver'd-up himſelf toward the End of his Reign, to Intemperance, and Debauch, and Drank himſelf into a Quartan Ague, that held him for full Three Years; but yet at the ſame time he attended the Affairs both of his Army and Government, which betwixt the Diſtemper of his Wine, and the Fatigue of his Cares, brought him quickly to his End. He dy'd upon the Frontiers of the Geraſens, at the Siege of the Caſtle of Ragaba on the further Side of the River Jordan.

Alexander, betwixt Debauch and Fatigue, dyes of a Quartan Ague, before Ragaba.

When the Queen Alexandra found him reduced to the Laſt Extremity, and out of all Hope of Recovery, ſhe fell into a Paſſionate Tranſport of Weeping; Beating her Breaſts and Lamenting the Miſerable Condition of her ſelf and her Children, in Terms to this Effect; Alas, my Dear, ſays ſhe, what will become of your Poor Helpleſs Wife and Children now, without ſo much as one Friend in the World to truſt to, and left in the Hands too of your Mortal Enemies. Well! ſays Alexander, if you would be Safe and Happy when I am Dead and Gone, and You and Your Children quietly Succeed to the Government, Mind what I ſay now, and be ſure to follow my Counſel. In the Firſt Place, keep my Death Conceal'd from the Soldiers till the Caſtle is Taken, and then do you go Triumphant to Jeruſalem with the News of it, and make your Firſt Court to the Phariſees, as the only way to make your ſelf Popular; for your Character Riſes or Falls according to Their Opinion of you; and no ſuch Friends, where they Love, or Enemies, where they Hate: For whether they ſpeak True or Falſe, Good or Evil, 'tis all a Caſe to the Multitude that believes them all alike, whatever they ſay. I ſpeak this upon Experience; for it has been my Croſſneſs to this Sect, and nothing Elſe, that has turn'd the Hearts of the whole Nation againſt me: Therefore, ſays he, when you come to Jeruſalem, ſend for ſome of the Leading Men of That Party; lay the Corps before them, and tell them in Words as near the Truth as the Matter will bear, ſomewhat to this Purpoſe: That is to ſay; that out of the Reverence you have for their Generoſity, Piety and Juſtice, you do now deliver-up the Body to be diſpoſed of as they in their Wiſdom ſhall judge Meet, whether for Scorn and Infamy, without the Rites of Burial, or by any other way of Exemplary Juſtice upon it for paſt Indignities, or Otherwiſe, at their Pleaſure: Aſſuring them that you ſhall ever Reſign your ſelf to their Authority and Prudence; not only in This, but in all other Matters of a Publique Nature. Go but this way to Work, and depend upon it there will be Care taken for the Decencies of an Honourable, and a Magnificent Funeral, and for the Settling of your ſelf, and your Children in the Exerciſe of your Rightful Power. Let but them have the Ruling of you, and it will be their Buſ'neſs to Eſtabliſh you in a Peaceable Rule over Others. This was the End of his Speech and of his Life, in the 49th Year of his Age, and the 27th of his Reign.

Alexandra Commits all to the Phariſees.

SO ſoon as the Caſtle was taken, Alexandra apply'd her ſelf immediately to the Phariſees, according to her Husband's Direction, leaving the whole Affair of the Body, and of the Government, to their Menage. Upon this Inſinuation, the Phariſees, of the Greateſt Enemies ſhe had in the World, became her Greateſt Friends; addreſſing themſelves preſently in an Harangue to the People upon the Glorious Exploits of Alexander; the Irreparable Loſs of ſo Juſt a Prince; and by theſe Rhetorical Flouriſhes of Condoling, rais'd the Paſſions of the Multitude to ſuch a Pitch of Comfortleſs Sorrow, that they thought him worthy of a Funeral Solemnity beyond all that ever went before him.

Alexander leaves 2 Sons, Hyrcanus and Ariſtobulus, and the Queen Regent.

This Prince left at his Death Two Sons, Hyrcanus and Ariſtobulus; but devolved the Regency by his laſt Teſtament, to his Wife Alexandra. Hyrcanus, the Elder Brother was a Lover of his Eaſe, and a Man not Qualify'd for the Cares and Intrigues of State. Ariſtobulus, on the contrary, was naturally Daring, and Induſtrious; but the Mother all this while was the Favourite of the People, for the Diſlike ſhe ſhew'd in her Husband's Life-time to his Male-Adminiſtration. By her Aſſiſtance and Advice, Hyrcanus was promoted to the Pontificat; not for Seniority or Parts, but for Incompetency, as the more Menageable Fool of the Two. Upon the whole Matter, the Queen did but Execute the Phariſees Orders; and at the ſame time when ſhe Sign'd and Seal'd, the other Govern'd: Nay and the Common People had it in Charge to pay them all Obedience. She appointed alſo the Revival of the Phariſees Ordinances, and Traditions, which her Father-in-law had Aboliſh'd; and at this rate every Thing was done in the Queen's Name by the Others Power: for at their Inſtance, Exiles were recall'd; Priſoners ſet at Liberty, and the like. In ſome Few Caſes, 'tis True, ſhe Acted by her own Proper Authority; that is to ſay, ſhe kept a Mercenary Army in Pay, and Augmented her Forces to ſuch a Degree, that her Neighbours ſtood in awe of her, as appear'd by the Security they gave her in Hoſtages for their Good Behaviour. Her Reign, in ſhort, would have been Quiet enough, but for the Troubleſome Importunities of the Phariſees, that would ſtill be putting her upon one Miſchief or Another. As when they preſs'd her for Juſtice upon thoſe that Adviſed the Death of the Eight Hundred Perſons before-mention'd, upon which Inſtigation, Diogenes was cut-off in the Firſt Place, and ſo one after Another; till at laſt ſeveral of the moſt Eminent Men concern'd, went directly in a Body to the Queen her ſelf, with Ariſtobulus in the Head of them, who ſhew'd in his Countenance, the Diſguſt he he had at the Proceeding, and that he wanted only Power, and Opportunity to bring his Mother to Reaſon. His Followers took this Occaſion of Remonſtrating to the Queen what Proofs they had given their late Maſter, of their Faith and Loyalty, through all Extremities and Hazzards; Acknowledging alſo the Generous Returns they had received in Honours and Rewards for their Services. And they were now in Hope, they ſaid, that all this ſhould not be turn'd to their Diſadvantage; and after 'ſcaping the Swords of their Enemies in an Open War, to be deliver'd-up for Sacrifices like Beaſts, to the Malice of Treacherous Enemies at Home in a Time of Peace, and there to Periſh without any manner of Redreſs. Nay they ſaid further, that if their Adverſaries would but ſtop there, and content themſelves with the Bloud they had ſpilt already, ſuch was the Reverence they had for their Superiours, that they would patiently ſit down without ſo much as Complaining of any thing that was paſt: But if they ſhould be allow'd ſtill to Perſiſt, they would only beg leave to withdraw; which without the Queen's Permiſſion, they durſt not Preſume to do, though they were ſure Otherwiſe to loſe their Lives, even in the Palace it ſelf. To ſay nothing how highly it would reflect upon her Majeſty's Honour, to Countenance the Sworn Ene-

Enemies of her Dead Husband, againſt his Try'd Friends: Or how Welcome a Hearing it would be to Aretas the Arabian, and other Enemy-Princes to find that Alexandra had Clear'd her Court of a ſort of People, whoſe very Names had been formerly a Terror to them. But ſaid they further to the Queen. If this be yet too much, and that you are abſolutely reſolv'd to Indulge the Pride and Ambition of the Phariſees, in preference to all Other Conſiderations, you may be pleaſed to diſpoſe of us only into Caſtles and Garriſons Elſewhere; for if this be the Fate that attends Alexander's Friends, we ſhall content our ſelves in any Condition to bear our part in the Honour of a Common Calamity.

Theſe Words and many more to the ſame purpoſe drew Tears from all that were there Preſent, partly out of Grief for thoſe that were Slain already, and partly out of an Apprehenſion for the reſt that were yet in Danger; calling-out, in general, upon the Ghoſt of Alexander. There was no Man ſpake ſo freely as Ariſtobulus, both upon the Main Cauſe, and in particular Reflexions upon his Mother. But all this was their Own Fault at laſt, in Gratifying the Impetuous Paſſion of a Malicious Woman againſt all Right and Reaſon, with the Temptation of the Empire: Eſpecially where there was no Danger of a Failure for want of a Succeſſor.

The Queen was ſo Hard put to't for an Anſwer to theſe Expoſtulatory Propoſals, that ſhe could not do bettter then to put the Malecontents into Strong Holds and Garriſons, upon Condition, that Hyrcania, Alexandrias, and Macherus, where ſhe depoſited her Jewels, Treaſure, and Rich Goods, might be None of them. She ſent her Son Ariſtobulus a litte while after this, with an Army toward Damaſcus againſt Ptolemy Surnamed Mennæus, a very Troubleſome Prince to his Neighbours; but he returned ſoon after from that Expedition without doing any thing of Moment.

Alexandra puts Ariſtobulus in poſſeſſion of ſeveral Strong Places; ſaving Caſtles to her ſelf.

While things were in this Poſture, came a Report that Tygranes the King of Armenia was fall'n into Syria with an Army of Five Hundred Thouſand Men, and with a Deſign to March ſuddenly into Judæa. Alexandra was ſo Surpriz'd at this Intelligence (as ſhe had Reaſon to be) that ſhe forthwith ſent Embaſſadors with a Compliment, and Preſents, to Tygranes, who was at that time before Ptolemais. The Queen Selene, otherwiſe called Cleopatra, who had then the Government of Syria, animating her Subjects to ſtand upon their Guard, and to Oppoſe Tygranes's Entrance into the Country. The Embaſſadors acquitted themſelves ſo well toward the King on the Behalf of Alexandra, and the Whole Nation of the Jews, that with Great Inſtances of Acknowledgment and Good Will, for the Honour and Reſpect of the Embaſſy, (and at ſuch a diſtance too) he gave them an Aſſurance of all good Offices in Return. In ſhort, he took Ptolemais, and was no ſooner Maſter of it, but word was brought him of the Rout of Mithridates by Lucullus; His Eſcape upon the Purſuit into Iberia; and that when Lucullus ſaw he could not Overtake him, he Strook-off into Armenia, where he was at that time Ravaging and Deſtroying the Country. Upon This Intelligence, Tygranes immediately Marched-off with his Army, and went his Wey Home again.

The Queen Alexandra fell ſome time after this, into a Dangerous Fit of Sickneſs, which gave Ariſtobulus as fair an Opportunity of playing his Own Game as his Heart could Wiſh. So that Slipping-out in the Night, and only one Servant with him, he went by Stealth to the Forts and Caſtles, where his Father's Friends were in Garriſon, as hath been ſaid already. Ariſtobulus had been a long time very much Unſatisfy'd with his Mother's way of Menage; but Conſidering her Preſent Indiſpoſition, and the Danger of the Whole Family's lying at the Mercy of the Phariſees, in caſe of her Death; Hyrcanus, the Next in Succeſſion, being their Property and Creature to all manner of Purpoſes, and utterly Unqualify'd for the Exerciſe of any Publique Charge, he found himſelf more Uneaſy under theſe Circumſtances then ever. No Mortal knew any thing of his Deſign but his Own Wife, whom he left behind him at Jeruſalem with his Children, and ſo went to Agada, where he was very Generouſly received by Galæſtes a Perſon of Eminent Quality there. Alexandra miſs'd him the very next day after his Departure, but not ſo much as Dreaming what he was about, till they came to Underſtand by One Meſſenger upon the Heel of Another, that this, and that, and T'other Fortreſs were gone over to him: And there was no more in it at laſt neither, then as One led the Way for the reſt to Follow. This turn put the Queen, and the People into a deſperate Confuſion; for they looked upon Ariſtobulus as a Perſon likely enough to ſet up for himſelf, and in as fair a Poſſibility of Carrying his Point: beſide the Diſmal Apprehenſion of being call'd to a Bloudy Account for the Outrageous Barbarities they had Committed upon ſeveral of his Particular Friends. In this Conſternation, they could think of no better Expedient then to Clap-up the Wife and Children of Ariſtobulus under a Guard in the Citadel, near the Temple. While this was in Agitation, the People came Flocking to him in ſuch Throngs, that there ſeemed seemed to be something in it, both of the Tumult, and of the Pomp of a Court. Briefly, in Fifteen Days, he made himself Master of Two and Twenty Castles: And when he had thus Secured himself, both of a Stand, and a Retreat, he quickly got an Army together from Mount Libanus, Trachonitis, and the Princes thereabouts, who were forward enough upon this Occasion to help the Stronger Side, in a prospect of the Advantages they might reasonably Expect for the Service of Raising a New King to the Throne. Upon this Pinch of Affairs, Hyrcanus, and the Elders of the Jews apply'd themselves to the Queen for Advice and Directions what to do. They told her that Aristobulus, by Virtue of the Places he had already Taken was as good as Master of all the rest; that they found her, to their Great Grief, in Extremity, but however so long as she liv'd they could do nothing without her, even though they saw themselves upon the very Brink of Ruine. The Queen's Reply was, that not being in Condition either of Body or Mind to Charge her self with the Publique, she had laid all those Cares aside, and remitted it wholly to themselves to Consult the Necessities of the Government. They had the Means of Defence, she told them, in their Own Hands; the Strength of the Nation Entire, and wanted neither Men, nor Mony. These were her Last Words; and soon after, she dy'd, in the Ninth Year of her Reign, and the Seventy Third of her Life.

The Death, and the Character of Alexandra.

This Princess was a Woman of a Character even above her Sex; Ambitious both of Honour and of Command, beyond Measure; but withal, Intent upon her Bus'ness, and highly Industrious; to the Reproach of the Ignorance and Male-Administration of but too many Masculine Governours. She made the Present the Greatest part of her Care, without wand'ring Unnecessarily into the Uncertainty of things to come. She kept her self strictly to Moderation, even in the very Stretch of her Power, and Continu'd Living and Dying in an Unteinted Reputation for her Integrity and Justice: But in her Family, she was yet so Unfortunate as to leave nothing of that Dignity and Power to her Posterity, that she had acquired with so much Difficulty and Hazzard; only in truth to gratify a more then Feminine Ambition. The thing, in short, that ruin'd all, was the taking of her Enemies for her Advisers; by which Miscarriage, the Government was left without a Head. But the Mistakes of her Reign appeared more Eminently in the Calamities that Ensu'd upon them to the Royal Family after her Death. This must be said however for her, that so long as she liv'd, she kept the People in Peace. And we are now come to the End of the Life of Queen Alexandra.

BOOK THE FOURTEENTH

[From the Year of the World 2898, to 3929.]

CHAP. I.

A Battle betwixt Hyrcanus, and Aristobulus, wherein the Former is Defeated. They come afterward to an Agreement: Aristobulus to Govern, and Hyrcanus to enjoy his Peace and Liberty in a Private State of Life.

THERE is enough said in the foregoing Book, of the Reign, Life, and Death of Alexandra. We shall now take the following Part of the History, in order as it lies before us; with all possible Care, as near as we can, neither to Suppress, nor to Omit any thing Material, for want of Recollection or Information. The Memorials of Antiquity are much in the Dark, and in many Cases Tiresom to the Reader, as well as Obscure: Wherefore whoever enters upon this Office, should do well to make the Work as Easy, and as Entertaining as he can, in the very Ornament of Style and Language: But with a Reverence to Truth in the First place, for fear of Abusing, and Misleading the World, under a Pretence of Informing them.

It was in the Third Year of the Olympiad One Hundred Seventy Seven; Q. Hortensius, and Q. Metellus Creticus, Consuls, that Hyrcanus took upon himself the Pontificat; and Aristobulus immediately made War upon him. They fought a Battle at Jericho, and a great many of Hyrcanus's Soldiers deserted and went over to his Brother: Himself being driven into the Citadel, where the Wife and Children of Aristobulus were kept Prisoners, by the Order and Direction of his Mother, as we have said before; and the Remainder of the Faction took Sanctuary for a while within the Verge of the Temple; but render'd themselves soon after. As Matters cool'd by little and little, the Brothers enter'd upon a Treaty of an Accommodation, and came in the Conclusion to this Agreemeent; that Aristobulus should be establish'd in the Possession of the Government, and Hyrcanus be allow'd to live at Ease and Liberty upon his own particular Fortune without any Molestation. This Contract was Sign'd and Ratify'd in the Temple it self, with all the Formalities of Joyning Hands; and Promises reciprocally Interchang'd for the Performance of Covenants; concluding with a mutual Embrace in the Sight of all the People, and so departing; the One to his Palace, the Other to his Private Apartment, under the Roof of Aristobulus.

CHAP. II.

Antipater makes an Interest for Hyrcanus against Aristobulus, and sets the People against him. Hyrcanus applies himself to Aretas for Assistance and Protection. Antipater agrees with Aretas about the Receiving of him, and settles the Matter with him at Petra in Hyrcanus's Favour.

NOW there was a certain Idumæan of Hyrcanus's Faction, a Wealthy, a Troublesome, and a Busy Man; his Name Antipater, and a deadly Enemy to Aristobulus. Nicolaus of Damascus makes him to be of the First Stock of Jews that came out of Babylon into Judæa, out of a Complement probably to his Son Herod; who had the Fortune afterward to be Advanced to the Throne; of which we shall speak further in its Proper Place. This Antipater was at first call'd by his Father's Name, Antipas, who, they ſay, was preferr'd by the Favour of King Alexander, and his Wife, to the Government of Idumæa; where, by the Force of Fair Words, and Large Preſents, he made a conſiderable Intereſt in the Arabians, Gazæans, and the People of Askalon: In truth, ſtanding in ſome Awe of Ariſtobulus, as well for his Power to do him Miſchief, as for a Grudge there was betwixt them. Young Antipater, finding that there was no Good to be done upon Ariſtobulus, but by leſſening him in his Reputation among the People, betook himſelf by the Secret ways of Calumny, and Detraction, to the making of Parties, and ſtirring-up Fears and Jealouſies againſt him: He would be ſaying now and then, How Unreaſonable a Thing it was for the Younger Brother to ſupplant the Elder; ſtrip him of his Birthright, and uſurp the Government to Himſelf: Nay, and how mean a Thing it was for ſo many noble Jews, of Power and Credit, to look on and ſuffer it. The very ſame Words ſerv'd him for Hyrcanus too; but adviſing him withall, to get out of the way in time; for the other Party had moſt certainly a Deſign upon his Life, being all agreed upon it, that Ariſtobulus could never be ſafe ſo long as Hyrcanus was in Being. Hyrcanus was an Open, Eaſy Man, and having no Guile in Himſelf, not apt to ſuſpect it in Others: So that this Diſcourſe did not Work upon him as it was expected it ſhould; but the Softneſs of his Nature, and the Love he had for Peace and Quietneſs, was Invidiouſly imputed to him as a want of Brains, and Common Senſe. His Brother Ariſtobulus being, on the contrary, as Fierce and Enterpriſing, in the other Extreme. Antipater ſaw well enough, that with all his Inſinuations, he had not yet gain'd his Point upon Hyrcanus; but this did not divert him however from plying him with Freſh Cautions, and Importunities, to have a Care of his Brother: Inſomuch that he prevail'd upon him at laſt to apply himſelf for Protection to the Arabian King Aretas, with the Offer of his Own Friendſhip and Service over and above; which Propoſals ſeem'd the more Plauſible, in regard that Arabia borders upon Judæa. The Reſolution being taken, Antipater goes his way immediately to Aretas to Treat with him about the Reception of Hyrcanus; and upon the Security both of his Oath and Honour, that he would not upon any Terms deliver him-up into the Hands of his Enemies, Antipater went back again to Hyrcanus with an Account of his Bus'neſs. When he had been ſome ſhort time at Jeruſalem, he took Hyrcanus with him one night out of the City, and conducted him by great Journeys to the City of Petra, where Aretas kept his Court: and here he employ'd his uttermoſt Credit with the King, (which was very great) in favour of Hyrcanus, and in Order to the eſtabliſhing of him in his Paternal Right. He follow'd him ſo cloſe, in fine, with preſſing Inſtances and Gifts, that at laſt he brought him over; Hyrcanus promiſing him at the ſame time, that if he ever came to be ſettled in his Kingdom by his Means, he would give him back again the Country and the Twelve Cities, which had been taken from the Arabians by his Father: That is to ſay; Medaba, Naballo, Livias, Tharabaſa, Agalla, Athone, Zoara, Oronæ, Mariſſa, Rydda, Luſa and Oryba.

CHAP. III.

Aretas gives Ariſtobulus Battle; Forces him into Jeruſalem, and Beſieges him in the Temple. The Paſchal Feaſt being at hand, the Jews withdraw into Ægypt. Onias ſton'd to Death by the Rabble for refuſing to Curſe Ariſtobulus. God's Judgment upon the People for their Perfidy and Murder.

UPon the Encouragement of theſe Promiſes, Aretas advanced againſt Ariſtobulus with an Army of Fifty Thouſand Horſe and Foot; Fought, and Overcame him: Inſomuch that finding himſelf abandon'd by his Soldiers going over to Hyrcanus, he was forc'd to fly for Refuge to Jeruſalem; where Aretas, with his whole Army, Attacqu'd him in the very Temple; the People unanimouſly joyning with Hyrcanus againſt Ariſtobulus, the Prieſts only excepted: Aretas, on the other hand, with his Jews, as well as Arabians, puſhing on the Aſſault with the uttermoſt Vigour. While This Action was a-foot, the Feaſt of Unleavened-Bread coming-on, (That which we call the Paſchal) the chief Men of the Jews withdrew themſelves out of the Country, and went into Ægypt: at which time, one Onias, a Holy, and a Righteous Man, upon the Apprehenſion of a Civil War at hand, went out of the Way, and hid himſelf. The Jews reflecting upon the Piety of this Man, and how he had obtained Rain from God in an Extremity of Drought, brought him out into the Camp, and there made it their Requeſt, that as he had formerly deliver'd them from the Judgment of a Famine; ſo he would now relieve them from a moſt Deſtructive War, by denouncing a Malediction upon Ariſtobulus, and his whole Faction. He oppos'd it a great while, till at laſt being over-rul'd by the Multitude, he ſtood-up in the Middle of them, and deliver'd liver'd an Ejaculatory Prayer to this Purpoſe. Lord! ſays he, Thou that art the King of Kings; ſince ſo it is, that both we that ſtand here before thee are thy People, and they that are Beſieged in the Temple, are thy Prieſts; I do humbly beſeech thee not to hear the Prayers of either of them one againſt the other. Upon which Words, ſome of the Execrable Rabble of the Jews that ſtood by, ſton'd him to Death. This Barbarity of theirs was follow'd immediately by a Divine Juſtice, and the Murder of Onias Avenged in Manner as follows. While Ariſtobulus with the Prieſts were thus beſet in the Temple, the Paſchal Feſtival came-on; at which Time, according to Cuſtom, the Jews offer'd-up a Great Number of Sacrifices; but the Beſieged, not having ſo many as they had Occaſion for, deſir'd their Brethren to ſupply them at their own Price; and ſo they agreed at One Thouſand Drachmas a Head, each Beaſt, and the Mony to be paid down. Ariſtobulus and the Prieſts agreed to the Price, and the Conditions, and ſo let down the Mony to them with a Rope and a Bag from the Temple-Wall. When the Beſiegers had the Mony, they refuſed to deliver the Victims; and ſuch was their Shameleſs Impiety, that they did not only break Faith with Men, but Sacrilegiouſly robbed God himſelf of a Service that was Dedicated to his Honour. The Prieſts, upon this Perfidy, impoſed upon them under the Countenance of a Contract, joyned in a Prayer to God, that this Iniquity might not ſcape Unpuniſh'd. Their Prayers were Heard, and the Judgment not Deferr'd; for there fell immediately a Violent Tempeſt that deſtroy'd all the Fruits of the Earth through the whole Province: So that one Meaſure of Wheat was ſold for Fifteen Drachmas.

Onias ſton'd to Death by the Multitude.

A Sacrilegious Treachery in the Beſiegers.

A Judgment from Heaven overtakes them.

CHAP. IV.

Pompey ſends Scaurus for Syria; who, upon the taking of Damaſcus by Metellus, and Lollius, poſts away toward Judæa. Hyrcanus, and Ariſtobulus, propoſe an Allyance with Scaurus, who cloſes with Ariſtobulus, and bids Aretas withdraw from the Siege of Jeruſalem at his Peril. Ariſtobulus falls upon Aretas and Hyrcanus, cuts-off Seven Thouſand of their Men, and Cæphalio the Brother of Antipater among the reſt.

POMPEY himſelf was at this time detained in Armenia, by the War he had there with Tigranes; but in this Interim, ſent Scaurus into Syria. When he came to Damaſcus, he found the City newly taken by Metellus, and Lollius; and ſo he poſted forward without any ſtop, toward Judæa. As he was upon the Way, there came Embaſſadors to him from Hyrcanus, and Ariſtobulus, and both upon the ſame Errand too: That is to ſay, to deſire an Allyance Offenſive and Defenſive. Ariſtobulus offer'd Four Hundred Talents, and Hyrcanus juſt as much. Scaurus inclin'd rather to Ariſtobulus, as the more Generous, and Solvent of the Two, beſide that the Terms he inſiſted upon were more Practicable and Eaſy; but he look'd upon the other to be Poor and Hard; his Conditions Higher then his Brother's, and himſelf at laſt not ſo Reſponſible: For it was a much harder Matter to carry ſo ſtrong and ſo well Fortify'd a City by Aſſault, then to beat a Vagabond Parcel of Nabathæans, and Fugitives; and the Rabble not ſo well vers'd neither in the Trade of that War. For theſe Reaſons, Scaurus agreed with Ariſtobulus; took his Mony, and Diſcharg'd the Siege: Ordering Aretas to withdraw, upon the Peril of being Accounted an Enemy to Rome in Caſe of Refuſal. Scaurus, after this, went back to Damaſcus, and Ariſtobulus advanced with a Mighty Army againſt Aretas and Hyrcanus; and engaging them in a Place called Papyron, he gave them an Overthrow with the Loſs of about Seven Thouſand of the Enemy, and Cæphalio the Brother of Antipater among the reſt.

UPon Pompey's coming to Damaſcus, and Cœlo-Syria a while after, there came Embaſſadors thronging to him from all Quarters: That is to ſay; from all Syria, Ægypt, and Judæa. Ariſtobulus, above all the reſt, ſent him a moſt Glorious Preſent. i. e. A Golden Vine of Five Hundred Talents; which Strabo, the Cappadocian, gives an Ac-

Application to Pompey from all Quarters, upon his Way into Syria.

A Rich Preſent from Ariſtobulus See Strabo.

Account of in these Words. There was a Present made to Pompey out of Ægypt, of a Crown that weigh'd Four Hundred Pieces of Gold; and another out of Judæa, of a Golden Vine, or Garden, to which they gave the Name of Τερπωλή, or Delight. These Presents were brought by Embassadors, and I my self saw the Vine at Rome in the Temple of Jupiter Capitolinus, with this Inscription; Alexander, King of the Jews. It was valued at Five Hundred Talents, and pass'd for the Present of Aristobulus the Prince of the Jews.

There came to Pompey not long after this, other Embassadors; Antipater, on the part of Hyrcanus, and Nicodemus for Aristobulus, who charged Gabinius and Scaurus with taking Sums of Mony, the Former Three Hundred Talants, and the Other, Four; (Disobliging them both.) Pompey took the Cognizance of the Cause into his own Hand, and appointed the Parties to attend him about it. The Spring coming-on, Pompey drew out of his Winter-Quarters, and Marched to Damascus, destroying the Fort of Apamia, a Fortification of Antiochus Cyzicenus by the way, having an Eye likewise upon the Country of Ptolemey Mennæus, a Wicked Man; and Worse, if possible, then his Kinsman Dionysius Tripolitanus; who lost his Head by the Hand of Justice. But this Man had the good Fortune to Redeem himself for a Thousand Talents, which Pompey divided among his Soldiers. He Rased the Fort of Lycias also, where Sylas the Jew had gotten Possession; and so passing from thence toward Heliopolis and Chalcis, he took the way of the Mountain that lies betwixt them, and so into Cœlo-Syria, and then from Bella to Damascus, where the Controversy betwixt the Jews and their Princes was brought to a Hearing: Hyrcanus and Aristobulus being at Odds one with another, and the Common People against them both. They were not to be govern'd by Kings, they said, but by God's Priests, according to the Laws and Constitutions of their Country. They did not deny the Sacerdotal Extraction of the Two Brothers; but they charged them with a Design of Enslaving the People, and subverting the Fundamentals of the Government.

Ptolemey compounds for his Head.

Pompey gives Hyrcanus and Aristobulus a Hearing at Damascus.

Hyrcanus insisted upon it, that he being the Elder Brother, Aristobulus had violently, and against all Law and Justice, Seiz'd upon his Hereditary Dignity and Estate; and depriving him of the Prerogative of his Birthright, reduced him to the Condition of a Pensioner at his Mercy and Allowance: Setting forth how Troublesome and Vexatious he was to his Neighbours both at Sea and Land, as a Man Born for Mischief; and that it was only the Turbulence of his Ambitious Humour, that Animated and Transported the People into this Revolt. You have here the Substance of his Plea, and he had at least a Thousand of the most Eminent Jews that Antipater had engaged in his Interest, to stand by him in it.

Hyrcanus's Plea.

Aristobulus pleaded, on the other hand, that Hyrcanus was not set aside with any Thought of Usurpation, or Encroachment, either upon his Title, or upon his Inheritance, but purely for Incapacity for the Necessary Offices of Government, being fall'n to such a Degree of Scorn and Contempt among the Common People, that I had no other Choice before me, says Aristobulus, but either to take the Administration into my own Hands, or venture the Translating of it into another Family: And for the Appellation of King, I only kept it as I found it, in the same Style of Dignity that my Father Alexander us'd before me. Now this I am ready to make Good, says he, by several Witnesses here; producing at the same time a Company of Huffing Gaudy Sparks, in the Vanity of their Dress and Trappings, such as all Men of Sobriety Hated and Despised, and fitter in Appearance for that we call a Masquerade, then to give Testimony in a Court of Justice.

Aristobulus's Defence.

Pompey, upon the Hearing of all Parties, was in his Judgment against the intemperate Proceeding of Aristobulus; but gave them however for the Present a Fair Dismission; with a Promise, that so soon as ever he should have reduc'd the Nabathæans into Order, he would come over to them, and do somewhat further in it: requiring them in the mean time to behave themselves Peaceably, and so discharg'd Aristobulus with Complement and Respect, for fear he might take Pet else, and Obstruct him in his Passage. But he was not to be wrought upon by Fair Words it seems, for he went away presently to Delion, and so to Judæa, without waiting any further upon what Pompey had promis'd him.

Pompey gives them a Fair Dismission for the Present; and puts-off the Tryal to another Time.

Aristobulus goes his way into Judæa, without waiting any longer upon Pompey.

Pompey finding himself affronted, sends a Summons to him in Alexandria, to come down, and speak with him. Pompey demands the Possession of all the Fortresses in his Power, and Aristobulus delivers them up; but presently withdraws to Jerusalem, and prepares for a War. While this was a doing, comes the News from Pontas of Mithridates being Poyson'd by his Son Pharnaces.

THE Mockery of this way of Proceeding provoked Pompey to such a degree, that he took the Army he had provided against the Nabathæans, and joyning them with the Auxiliary Troups that he had Rais'd up and down at Damascus, and the rest of Syria, together with the Roman Legions that he had under his Command, and marched with them directly toward Aristobulus, passing by Pella and Scythopolis, till he came to Coreæ upon the entrance into the very Heart of Judæa; where he found upon the Top of a Mountain, a strong and a famous Castle, which was call'd Alexandrion: and being told that Aristobulus had made Choice of that Place for his Retreat, he gave him a Summons to come down and speak with him; which he was prevail'd upon to do by the People he had about him, for fear of being engag'd in a War with the Romans. There pass'd some Discourse betwixt them, upon the Subject of the Dispute between the Two Brothers; and after that Formality was over, Aristobulus, with Pompey's leave, went fairly back again to the Castle; and this he did again and again, to keep fair with Pompey, in all reasonable Complyances, as the most likely way to Compass his End: but this did not hinder him yet from putting himself into a Posture of Defence in case of the Worst, out of a Fear and Jealousy he had of Pompey's declaring for his Brother. Pompey, after this, order'd him to deliver-up all the Castles that he was Master of, and to signify such his Will and Pleasure to the Governours under his own Hand, that there might be no place left for Scruple or Excuse. Aristobulus did as he was appointed; but took it so Heinously, that he went away forthwith to Jerusalem, to prepare, as he understood the Matter, for a certain War. It was not long before Pompey in the Head of his Army, Marching against him, was met upon the way with an Express from Pontas, giving him an Account of the Death of Mithridates by his Son Pharnaces.

Pompey, in an Indignation, marches against Aristobulus.

He finds him in Alexandrion, and Summons him down to speak with him.

After several Discourses, Aristobulus delivers up all the Castles in his Possession.

He goes away in a Disgust to Jerusalem. Pompey follows him.

Pompey Encamps at Jerico, and so Marches toward Jerusalem. Aristobulus offers him Mony, and the Possession of the Town. Pompey complies, and sends Gabinius to receive the Mony; but the Gates are shut against him. Aristobulus is made a close Prisoner upon it, and Pompey lays Siege to the City in Person.

POMPEY had the first Camp at Jerico, a Place famous for Palm-Trees and Balsam, which is the most Pretious of Gums, and only a Distillation from a little Shrub upon an Incision made with a sharp Stone. The next Morning he moved toward Jerusalem. Aristobulus, by this time repented himself of what he had done, and went out to meet him with a Complement of Offering him a Sum of Mony, and the Command of the Town; and whatever Satisfaction he should further desire for the preventing of a War. Pompey accepted of his Proposals, and sent Gabinius with a Body of Men into the City to receive the Mony: But he had only his Labour for his Pains; for the Gates were shut against him, and he came back Empty-handed as he went out: the Fault being laid upon the Soldiers that would not stand to the Agreement. Pompey had such an Indignation for this Affront, that he kept a stricter Guard upon Aristobulus, and went himself to Jerusalem, which was very strong by Situation, and well Fortify'd; only it lay a little exposed toward the North, where there was a Large and a Deep Valley about the Temple, and a Substantial Stone-Wall to Encompass it.

Pompey moves toward Jerusalem.

Jeruſalem divided; part for Pompey, part for Ariſtobulus. Pompey propoſes a Peace, and it is Rejected. The Situation of the Temple, and the taking of it by Aſſault. The Piety and Modeſty of the Conquerour. Jeruſalem made Tributary. Straton's Tower, or Cæſarea. The Faction of Hyrcanus and Ariſtobulus. Pompey carries Ariſtobulus a Priſoner to Rome.

Jeruſalem divided; part for Pompey, part for Ariſtobulus.

WHile Pompey was before the Town, the Citizens were mightily divided how to behave themſelves: Some for Yielding; Others for Holding-out, and preparing for a War; eſpecially conſidering that Ariſtobulus was kept a Priſoner. So that without more ado they Prepoſſeſs'd themſelves of the Temple, and brake down the Bridge betwixt that and the City; while the other Party not only gave Entrance to the Army, but deliver'd up both City and Palace into the Hands of Pompey; who preſently ſent away Piſo his Lieutenant with part of his Army to take charge of Both; which he did Effectually, by Fortifying the Houſes and Buildings of the Temple that were next at hand. When Things were come to this paſs, Pompey, in the firſt place, made them a Propoſal of Peace; but upon their Refuſal to Treat, he provided for an Aſſault; Hyrcanus ſupplying him very frankly with what he had Occaſion for. The North-ſide of the Temple being the weakeſt Quarter, Pompey propoſed to begin his Attaque there. It was encompaſſed with high Towers, and a forc'd Ditch, over and above the aforeſaid Valley. Upon the City-ſide, toward Pompey's Station, there was no Paſſing, now the Bridge was down, for Crags and Precipices; but the Romans, with Infinite Labour and Difficulty, made a hard ſhift yet to fill-up the Ditch with Timbers, and other Materials that they got together, and ſo to raiſe Platforms and Ramparts to ſuch a Prodigious Height, that with Engines of Battery which they brought from Tyre, they play'd Great Stones upon the Temple-Wall; and yet if it had not been for the Advantage they took of our Seven-days-Sabbath, the Romans would have had much ado to have gain'd their Point: for notwithſtanding that in Caſe of Aggreſſion, the Law allow'd us to defend our ſelves upon that Day, and to Repel Force by Force, we durſt not do any Work upon it however yet, though but to Croſs, and Hinder one Work with another. When the Romans came to underſtand this once, and to obſerve, that we made no Oppoſition to the Advancing of their Bulwarks, and the Fixing of their Machines upon that Feſtival; They Employ'd the Sabbath wholly upon Safe and Quiet Preparations for the Action of the next Day, without attempting any Manner of Violence upon us at preſent. This is enough to ſhew the Infinite Deference we have for the Religion and Laws of our Country, when the dread of Death it ſelf is not able to divert us from the very Rule and Method of our Devotions; for the Prieſts have their Solemn Sacrifices twice a-day, Morning and Afternoon, with all their Preſcript Forms of Worſhip, without any Diſpenſation or Excuſe, in what Extremity ſoever, for the Omiſſion. This Temple was taken upon a Faſting-Day, in the Third Month of the Siege, the Hundred and Seventy Ninth Olympiad; Caius Antonius, and Marcus Tullius Cicero, being Conſuls. Upon the Enemies forcing the Place, they put every Man to death before them: And all this Cruelty was not enough yet to deter thoſe Officiating at the Altar, from going-on with their Devotions; accounting it the leſs Evil of the Two, to fall into the Hands of an Unmerciful Enemy, then to Abandon their Holy Profeſſion, or fail in the leaſt Scruple of Obedience and Reſpect to their Country's Rites and Ceremonies. Now for the Authority of this Relation, and to ſhew that there is nothing in it of Fabulous, we have it atteſted by all the Authors of Note that pretend to give any Account of the Actions of Pompey, and among the reſt by [a] Strabo, Nicholaus of Damaſcus, and Titus Livius the famous Roman Hiſtorian. They fell to Work with their Engines upon the great Tower, till by the Dint of Repeated Batteries they Shook it to Pieces, and brought it down to the Ground, carrying away a great part of the next Wall along with it in the Ruines. This Breach was no ſooner made, but the Enemy preſs'd in Crouds to enter it. The Firſt that Mounted was Cornelius Fauſtus, the Son of Sylla, with his Company; and then upon another Quarter, the Centurion Furius, with his Men, and Fabius then betwixt them both with another ſtrong Party; the Place being all cover'd with Dead Bodies; ſome killed by the Romans, others by Conſent diſpatching one another; ſome again caſting themſelves down Head-long from the Walls, and others ſetting Fire to the Houſes over their Heads, rather then to be Spectators of the Barbarities that were Committed. There were Slain a Matter of Twelve Thouſand Jews, and not many Romans. Abſolom, the Uncle, and the Father-in-Law of Ariſtobulus, was made a Priſoner. Theſe Outrages were accompany'd alſo with ſeveral Indignities to the very Myſteries of our

Religion

Religion, by the Admittance of Prophane Persons into the Place, and to the Sight of those Privacies, which none but Priests had ever been Eye-Witnesses of before. Pompey and his Train were of the Number that came-in there, where they found a Golden Table, a Candlestick and Cupps of the same Metal; Varieties of Incense, and Perfumes in Abundance, beside a Matter of Two Thousand Talents in the Treasury: But he look'd upon all this Provision as Sacred; and out of a Veneration he had for Holy Things, he did not only forbear Touching, or Seizing any of it; but with a Generous Piety, Order'd the Officers of the Temple next day to Purge the Place, and to Offer Sacrifices according to their own Customs and Ordinances. He restored Hyrcanus to the High-Priesthood, partly for the Good Offices he had received from Him himself, and partly for the Service he had done him in Hindring the Jews from siding with Aristobulus. He cut-off the Heads then of the Incendiaries of the Faction that were the Promoters of the War, and took Care to see Faustus, and others that behaved themselves bravely upon the Assault, rewarded according to their Deserts. As for Jerusalem it self, he made it Tributary to the Romans, and reduced all the Places that he found the Jews Possess'd of in Cœlo-Syria, under their Allegeance; confining also that Populous, and Powerful Nation within the Compass of their Ancient Bounds. He caused Gadara, (lately destroy'd) in favour of his Freed-Man Demætrius that was born there, to be rebuilt; and as for Hippon, Scythopolis, Dion, Samaria, Mariſſa, Azotus, Jamnia, and Arethusa, being Inland-Places, he deliver'd them up into the Hands of their Former Inhabitants, together with other Places that were Ruin'd by the War; but for the Maritime Towns, as Gaza, Joppa, Dora, and Straton's Tower; Pompey made them all Free, and laid them to the Province. Now this Tower of Straton, when it came afterward to be Rebuilt by Herod, and Beautify'd with stately Ports and Temples, changed the Ancient Name for Cæsarea.

The Tower of Straton, afterwards Cæsarea.

From this Fewd betwixt Hyrcanus and Aristobulus, we may date the Ruine of Jerusalem, with the Loss of our Liberty to the Romans; we being forced to give all back to the Syrians, which we had taken in a Fair War; the Imposition of above Ten Thousand Talents, which it cost us in a short time to the Romans; and the Translation of the Sovereign Authority, which had ever till then Descended in the Priesthood, to the very Dreggs of the People. But we shall have Occasion to speak of all this in another Place.

Pompey, after this, committed the Government of Cœlo-Syria, as far as Euphrates, and the Borders of Ægypt, to Scaurus, with two Roman Legions, while he himself hasten'd to Rome by the way of Cilicia, carrying Aristobulus, along with him a Prisoner, with Two Sons, and as many of his Daughters; but Alexander, one of the Sons, made his Escape; and Antigonus, the Younger, with his Father, and his Sisters, went forward to Rome.

THE Passage to Petra, the Capital of Arabia, is very Craggy and Difficult; insomuch that Scaurus, upon his March thither with an Army, was forced to Ravage the Country thereabouts to provide Bread for his Soldiers. Antipater, by the Order of Hyrcanus furnish'd him with Corn and other Necessaries out of Judæa; and being well known to Aretas, Scaurus sent him upon an Embassy to him: and he acquitted himself so well in his Commission, that he prevailed upon him for a Composition of Three Hundred Talents, to save his Country from Ruine; which put an End to the War, even before it was begun, to the Great Satisfaction of Scaurus, as well as of Aretas.

ALEXANDER, the Son of Aristobulus, falling into, and Galling Judæa with Frequent Incursions some time after this, Gabinius was sent from Rome into Syria, with the Commission of General; and upon an Expedition against Alexander, where-wherein he performed many memorable Exploits. Hyrcanus the High-Priest was not now in any Condition to make Resistance, though he had it in his Thought to Repair and Re-edify the Walls of Jerusalem that Pompey had destroy'd; but the Romans would not suffer him to go forward with it. Alexander ranging up and down the Country, made a Shift in a short time to get a Body of Men together, Jews, and others promiscuously, of Ten Thousand Foot, and Fifteen Hundred Horse: He Stor'd and Fortify'd the Castle of Alexandrion near Coreæ, and Machærus on the Borders of Arabia. Gabinius advanced to Fight him, sending Marcus Antonius, with some other Officers, before; who being joyn'd with the Honest part of the Jews under the Command of Pitholaus and Malichus, taking also the Auxiliaries of Antipater, came-up to Alexander: Gabinius following with the rest of his Army. Alexander drew-off to be nearer Jerusalem, where they came to a Battle; in which; Alexander lost some Three Thousand Men, and as many Taken. Gabinius, after this, laid Siege to the Castle of Alexandrion; but with an Offer, and Promise of Pardon to the Defendants for all that was past, if they would render-up the Place. The Besieged kept a strong Out-Guard under the Walls of the Castle, which the Romans Attacqu'd, and cut-off a great many of them: Marcus Antonius behaving himself very bravely upon that Occasion. Gabinius was loth to lose time; so that leaving part of his Army behind to attend the Siege, he went Himself to take a View of the rest of the Country, and to give Order for the Rebuilding of what Cities had been destroy'd; as, Samaria, Azotus, Scythopolis, Anthedon, Raphia, Dora, Marissa, Gaza, and divers other Places. This was done by the Direction of Gabinius; and these Places came to be a very convenient, and safe Habitation, after they had been for a long time deserted. Gabinius, having put the Country into this Order, returned to Alexandrion in Prosecution of the Siege; where Alexander took the Opportunity of begging Pardon by his Embassadors, upon Condition of delivering up to him the Castles of Hyrcania, Machærus, and Alexandrion, which he accepted of, but rased them all Three to the Ground. After this, there came to him the Mother of Alexander, who was a Well-wisher to the Romans, her Husband and the rest of her Children being then Prisoners at Rome. Gabinius deny'd her nothing; and after the settling of Matters, Hyrcanus was brought to Jerusalem, and restored to the Office, and Exercise of his Priesthood. There were then Constituted Five Courts of Justice, and a Division made of the Whole Province into Five Equal Parts: So that some went for Law to Jerusalem; Others to Gadara, and others also to Amathus, Jericho, or Saphora, which is a City of Galilee. They came by this means to be deliver'd from the Tyranny they complain'd of, and so Returned to the Form of an Aristocracy again.

Alexander routed, and besieged in Alexandrion.

Gabinius offers an Amnesty:

And orders the repairing of what Cities he had damag'd.

CHAP. XI.

Aristobulus makes his Escape from Rome. Commissioners are sent after him. He is Routed by the Romans, and taken a second Time, a Prisoner. He defeats the Nabathæans: after which, he goes to Rome, and Crassus succeeds him.

UPon the Flight of Aristobulus from Rome to Judæa, with an Intent to Repair and Fortify Alexandrion a-fresh after the Late Ruins, Gabinius sent a Body of Men thither under the Command of Sisenna, Antonius, and Servilius, to maintain the Place, and to Endeavour the Securing of Aristobulus himself. Betwixt the Authority of so Great a Name, and a Popular Itch of Novelty, there came Great Numbers of the Jews Flocking over to him; and in particular, Pitholaus, the Governour of Jerusalem, with a Thousand Men well Armed: As for those that were not so, of which there were a Great Number, he Discharged them as Unserviceable, and Useless. He marched with a Body of Eight Thousand Men, to Attempt the taking of Machærus. The Romans following him upon the Heel, came up with him and Fought him; and after an Obstinate Resistance upon the First shock, gave him a Terrible Overthrow; Kill'd some Five Thousand upon the Place, while the rest did what they could to save themselves by Flight. Aristobulus, upon this Rout, with a matter of a Thousand Men, Fortify'd the Castle as well as he could, and kept-up his Heart still in the Extremity of his ill Fortunes; but in Two days the Castle was carry'd by Assault; Himself grievously wounded, and by a Capricious Fatality of ill Luck, carry'd away Prisoner with his Son Antigonus, his Companion in his Escape, and so brought to Gabinius; by whom he was now sent a Second time Prisoner to Rome; having been Three Years and a Half, both in the Possession of the Kingdom, and of the Pontificat, and Acquitting himself with Great Honour and Magnificence in both Charges: But the Senate set his Children at Liberty however, upon the Intimation of Gabinius, that he had promis'd promis'd the Mother as much, upon the Delivery of ſuch and ſuch Caſtles: ſo that they were ſent back again Free to Jeruſalem.

Gabinius was now enter'd upon an Expedition againſt the Parthians, and gotten over the River Euphrates, when upon Second Thoughts, he chang'd his Mind, and bent his Courſe toward Ægypt, for the Reſtoring of Ptolemy, as is ſaid Elſewhere. Gabinius propoſes the Reſtoring of Ptolemy.
[a] Antipater furniſh'd him for this Enterprize with Corn, Arms, and Money, and brought over a great many of the Jews about Peluſium into an Alliance with him; This Peluſium being the very Key to Ægypt.

At his Return, Gabinius found Syria all in an Uproar; for Alexander, the Son of Ariſtobulus, having made himſelf Maſter of the Kingdom, Harraſs'd the Country with a Powerful Army, and forced a great many of the Jews over to his Party, killing all the Romans he could come at in his Paſſage, and Beſieging the reſt upon the Mount of Garizin, that fled thither for Sanctury. Gabinius, finding the Syrians in this Diſorder, ſent Antipater, being a Man of known Prudence, and Integrity, to deal with them, and to try if he could bring them to their Wits again. He behaved himſelf in this Commiſſion ſo Effectually, that he brought off ſeveral of the Revolters; but Alexander himſelf he found was not to be mov'd. For having gotten together an Army of ſome Thirty Thouſand Jews; his Reſolution was to Puſh it to a Battle with Gabinius. They Fought, in ſhort, at the Mount Itabyr; and the Jews loſt Ten-Thouſand Men in that Encounter. Alexander makes terrible Havock in Syria. Gabinius gives him a notable Overthrow:

Matters being thus ſettled in Jeruſalem, the Victor, by the Advice of Antipater Marched away againſt the Nabathæans, and gave them a notable Overthrow, Diſcharging Two noble Parthians, Mithridates and Orſanes, that came over to him for Protection; giving it out that they were fled into their Own Country. Gabinius having now acquitted himſelf with Honour in all his Commiſſions, went back to Rome, and Craſſus ſucceeded him in his Command. The Atchievments of Pompey and Gabinius may be ſeen in the Hiſtories of Nicolaus Damaſcenus and Strabo the Cappadocian. And they write both to the ſame Purpoſe. and defeated the Nabathæans alſo. Gabinius goes back to Rome, and Craſſus ſucceeds him.

CHAP. XII.

Craſſus rifles the Temple, contrary to his Oath. Strabo, the Hiſtorian. Craſſus and his Army cut to pieces by the Parthians. He retreats into Syria. Taricheæ taken by Aſſault. Pytholaus taken and put to Death. The Character of Antipater.

CRASSUS, being now upon the Preparative for a War with the Parthians, came to Judæa, and ſeized, not only the Two Thouſand Talents that Ptolemy made a Conſcience of ſo much as Meddling with, but he Pillag'd the Temple of all the Treaſure he could lay his Hand on, to the value of Eight Thouſand Talents more. He carry'd away with him alſo a Wedge of Gold of Three Hundred Mina's, reckoning every Mina, according to the Jewiſh Computation, at Two Pound and a Half. Eleazar the Prieſt, that had the keeping of this Holy Treaſure, deliver'd it up to Craſſus; not out of ſpite, or ill will, for he was a Righteous, and a Juſt Man: But this Bar of Gold being lodged in a Wooden Beam that was made Hollow on purpoſe to receive and conceal it, and no Mortal Privy to the Secret but Himſelf, Eleazar had no other Thought, ſeeing Craſſus's Heart ſo wholly ſet upon the Money, but to deliver-up this Wedge as a Compoſition for all the reſt; for there were Hangings alſo of an Ineſtimable value faſten'd to this Timber, and other rich Ornaments for the Service of the Temple, which were all likewiſe in Eleazar's Cuſtody. And he did not deliver this Bar of Gold at laſt neither, but upon the Declaration of Craſſus, that he was abundantly ſatisfy'd with what he had already; and upon the Solemnity of an Oath, and Promiſe, that he would not meddle with any thing elſe. But this Oath would not ſerve the Turn it ſeems, for he Rifled the Temple from Top to Bottom, and ſtript it to the Bare Walls. Craſſus rifles the Temple againſt his Oath.

The Maſs of Money that was lodged in this Temple, how Prodigious ſoever it may appear, will not be found ſo great a Wonder, conſidering how long the Jews were a getting it together, and that it came from all Quarters of the World, wherever the Worſhip of the True God was known: Beſide that the Report of this Immenſe value is ſo far from Vanity and Oſtentation, that it is a Truth Atteſted and Confirm'd by the Authority of ſeveral Hiſtorians; as of Strabo the Cappadocian for one. Mithridates, ſays he, ſent to the Iſle of Coos for ſome Money of Cleopatra's, that ſhe had depoſited there; and for Eight Hundred Talents belonging to the Jews. Now we have no Publique Treaſure, but what is Sacred, and dedicated to God; and it is as Clear as Strabo the Hiſtorian.

[a] According to Biſhop Montague's correction it ſhould be, Hyrcanus and Antipater furniſh'd him, &c. See Appat. iv. ad Orig. Eccleſiaſt.

Day, that the Aſiatick Jews tranſmitted this Treaſure from thence to Coos, upon the Apprehenſion of a War with Mithridates. For it cannot be imagined that the Jews of Judæa, that had ſo much a Stronger, and a ſafer Place near hand; that is to ſay, the Temple and City of Jeruſalem, would ever have ſent their Money away for better Security to Coos: Neither can it be ſuppoſed, that it came from the Alexandrian Jews; for they were too far off to have any Apprehenſion of Mithridates.

Strabo has it in another Place; That Sylla paſſing through Greece to carry-on a War againſt Mithridates, ſent Lucullus to Cyrene, that was then torn to pieces with Feuds and Factions among the Jews; a People that had ſpread themſelves over the Face of the whole Earth. He ranges the Cyrenæans, in another place, into Four Diviſions; Burghers, Husbandmen, Strangers, and Jews. The laſt ſort of them are ſo Univerſally Diſpers'd, that there's hardly any Habitable Part where they have not got Footing, and a conſiderable Eſtabliſhment. As for Ægypt, and Cyrene, while they were under the Juriſdiction of the ſame Prince, and ſeveral other Countries alſo, they Embraced in many places the Jewiſh Laws, Rites and Cuſtoms; gave them the Liberty of Populous Congregations, and trained up their Children in a Conformity to the Jewiſh way of Diſcipline. In Ægypt, they had whole Colonies of them, beſide a Right of Propriety that they have by a Formality of Aſſignment in a conſiderable Part of the City of Alexandria; with Magiſtrates, Judges, and Courts of Juſtice of their own, and ways of Deciding Differences in Caſes of Propriety, Peculiar to Themſelves; and all in as good Method as if it were in a Form of Government. Now Ægypt agreed the better with this Nation, both for Extraction-ſake, and Neighbourhood; for the Jews came out of it, and they eaſily became one again: So that it was but making a Step to either, only as one Borderer does to another; and in this Manner, not only as Neighbours, but as formerly Members of the ſame Body. Thus far Strabo.

See Strabo again.

When Craſſus had done his pleaſure in Judæa, he Advanced againſt the Parthians, and gave them Battle, where he was cut-off Himſelf, and his whole Army, as we have it elſewhere: But Caſſius made his Retreat into Syria, where he gave a Stand to the Progreſs of the Parthians, that were now grown Inſolent upon their Succeſs. He went afterward to Tyre, and ſo to Judæa, where he took Taricheæ by Aſſault upon the Firſt Attacque and a Matter of Thirty Thouſand Priſoners; Pitholaus, Ariſtobulus's Friend among the reſt, whom he cauſed to be put to Death by the Advice of Antipater, who over and above the Power he had with him as a Friend, was a Perſon very conſiderable with the Idumæans, upon the Account of a Match with an Arabian Lady of a moſt Illuſtrious Extraction: Her Name was Cypron, and by Her he had Four Sons, Phaſael and Herod; (afterwards King) Joſeph and Pheroras; and an only Daughter Salome. This Antipater had ſo Generous, and Obliging a way with him, that all the Princes and Great Men about him had a High Eſteem for him; the King of Arabia eſpecially; to whoſe Charitable Goodneſs he recommended the Government of his Children, during the War with Ariſtobulus. Caſſius having by this time Recruited and Reinforced his Army, advanced to the River Euphrates to make Head againſt the Parthians, according to the Report of ſeveral Hiſtorians.

Peluſium taken by Mithridates: and Antipater, the Firſt Man that enter'd the Breach.

ANTIPATER was a Man of Great Authority in Judæa, and one that after the Overthrow and Death of Pompey, did Cæſar many conſiderable Services at the Inſtance of Hyrcanus in his War upon Ægypt; for Mithridates the Pergamænian being forced to ſtop once at Askalon, becauſe there was no paſſing for him by Peluſium with Succours that he had for Cæſar, Antipater joyn'd him with an Armed Body of Three Thouſand Jews, and brought in ſeveral of the Prime Men of Arabia, and effectually all Syria, to his Aſſiſtance: As there was Jamblicus a Prince of the Country, and his Son Ptolemey; and Tholomy of Libanus, the Son of Sohemus; with the Cities, almoſt all in general, who came in a kind of Emulation to ſerve him, and Happy was he could Preſent himſelf Firſt. Mithridates, being now in a Marching Condition, advanced out of Syria into Peluſium; where the Inhabitants refuſing him Entrance, he ſat down before the Place, Aſſaulted it, and Batter'd a Piece of the Wall down: Antipater was the Brave Man that Firſt enter'd the Breach, and ſo well Seconded in the Action, that the Town was taken upon it: But as Antipater and Mithridates were Haſt'ning away to Cæſar, the Ægyptian Jews, in the Country of Onias, as they call it, Oppoſed their Paſſage, till by the Power, and Intereſt of Antipater, as their Countrymen, but eſpecially upon the Sight of a Letter from Hyrcanus, the High-Prieſt, to them; they were prevailed upon to be Fair to Cæſar, and to ſupply them upon their March with whatſoever they might have Occaſion for: Upon the Credit, I ſay, of Antipater's Mediation and Advice, and upon that of the High-Prieſt's Letter, they chearfully comply'd. AT a Place called Delta, and upon a particular Spot of Ground known by the Name of The Jews Camp, Mithridates and Antipater came to a Battle with the Enemy; the Former Commanding the Right Wing, and the Other the Left. Mithridates was ſo hard Preſt, that his Men gave way, and the Diſorder was very near coming to a Total Rout: but Antipater, in the very nick of Time, came-up along the Bank of the River with an Enforcement to his Relief; Reſcu'd his Friends, and in one Word put a Victorious Enemy to Flight; drove them before him upon the Chace; made himſelf Maſter of their Camp, and call'd-in Mithridates, who was left a great way behind to take his part of the Booty, who loſt a Matter of Eight Hundred Men, and Antipater not above Fifty. Upon the Report of this Action, Mithridates gave Cæſar Frankly to underſtand, that he was Indebted both for the Preſervation of the Army, and for the Glory of that Day, to the Bravery of Antipater; which Cæſar was ſo ſenſible of, that throughout the whole Courſe of the War, he was ſure to be Employ'd upon a Poſt of Honour ever after; and he carried the Marks of it in the many Wounds he received in that Service.

Mithridates Worſted. Antipater reſcues him, and Wins the Battle.

So ſoon as this War was over, Cæſar went back by Sea into Syria, Treating both Hyrcanus, and Antipater, with a Singular Grace and Reſpect: The One he confirmed in the Pontificat; and the Other he made a Freeman of Rome, with all the Privileges of the City. Some will have it that Hyrcanus was perſonally in this War, and came Actually into Ægypt. Strabo the Cappadocian tells us as much out of Aſinius. Upon the coming of Mithridates into Ægypt, ſays he, Hyrcanus the High-Prieſt of the Jews came along with him. He ſays in another Place, upon the Credit of Hypſicrates, that Mithridates came firſt thither alone; and then ſent for Antipater the Governour of Judæa to Askalon, who brought him Three Thouſand Men: And that upon his Counſel, and Perſuaſion, divers of the Princes, and Great Men of the Country went over to him, and Hyrcanus the High-Prieſt among the reſt. Thus far goes Strabo.

About this time came Antigonus the Son of Ariſtobulus, with a Complaint to Cæſar, how his Father had been Poyſon'd by a Faction, for bearing Arms in his Service, and how a Brother of his had his Head Chopt-off at Scipio's Inſtigation: ſetting forth how he was Diſinherited and Ejected; and Preſented himſelf as an Object of his Compaſſion. He fell foul alſo upon Hyrcanus and Antipater, for uſurping upon the Liberties of the Nation, and particularly for Wrongs done to himſelf; but Antipater, being then Preſent, wiped off theſe Reproaches by expoſing the Turbulent, and Seditious Humour of Antigonus, and how buſy he was in all Factious Cabals to embroil the Publique Peace: not forgetting neither to mind Cæſar by a modeſt Inſinuation, of his own Merits, appealing only to himſelf upon the Proof he had given of his Diſpoſition, and Integrity in the late War. As for Ariſtobulus, he was always known to be a Profeſs'd, and an Implacable Enemy to Rome: ſo that the Romans, in keeping him a Priſoner, did no more then what Neceſſity of State, Common Prudence, the Law of Arms, and the Practice of Nations, obliges him to do. And then to the Point of Scipio's beheading his Brother, he was Convict of ſeveral Robberies, and it was no more then a Capital Puniſhment for a Capital Crime. Cæſar, in fine, upon a full Hearing of Antipater's Diſcourſe, Pronounced Hyrcanus to be High-Prieſt; gave Antipater his Choice of any Command he had a Mind to; and Conferring upon him the Lieutenancy of Judæa over and above.

a ſingular Affection and Eſteem, both for our Nation in General, and the Citizens of Athens in Particular, whereof we have received many Inſtances: And foraſmuch as we have received credible Information from Theodoſius the Son of Theodorus of Sunium, of the Virtue of the ſaid excellent Prince, and of his Friendly Diſpoſition to do us all the Good Offices in his Power; we have reſolved to Preſent him with the Honorary Acknowledgment of a Crown of Gold; and to erect a Brazen Statue to him in the Temple of the [a] People and the Graces, for the Fame of his Memory; and to have it notify'd by Proclamation at the exhibiting of any New Shew, in all Theatres, and Places of Publique Exerciſes, and Spectacles, in Honour of Bacchus, Minerva, Ceres, *&c. that we have Preſented him with this Crown out of a Veneration for his Virtue. ANTIPATER, under theſe Circumſtances, took an Occaſion, from the natural Heavineſs of Hyrcanus, to contrive a way for the Advancing of his own Family and Fortunes by putting his Two Eldeſt Sons, Phaſael and Herod, into Two Eminent Commands; the Former into that of Jeruſalem, with the Adjoyning Country, and Herod his Second Son, into the Government of Galilee, being at that time [b] Fifteen Years of Age; but of ſuch a Pregnancy of Wit, and ſo Enterprizing a Spirit, that his Youth did not at all hinder him from ſearching-out Honourable Occaſions for ſo Heroical a Diſpoſition to work upon. The Borders of Syria were in thoſe days very much Infeſted with Robbers; ſo that the Firſt Inſtance of his Proweſſe was upon that Vagabond Troup of High-way-Men; wherein he took Ezechias their Commander in Chief, Priſoner, with ſeveral of their Companions, and put them all to Death. This Action gave him ſo Mighty a Reputation among the People, that his Name was celebrated thorough all the Towns and Villages as their Deliverer, and the Author of their Security and Repoſe. By the Fame of this Exploit, he became alſo known to Sextus the Kinſman of Cæſar the Great; who had then the Adminiſtration of Syria: beſide that it Kindled an Emulation in Phaſael likewiſe, to do ſomewhat that was great too, after the Example of his Brother; Applying himſelf accordingly to the Arts of Popularity, as the moſt likely Way for the Compaſſing of his End. He was a Man of a Publique Spirit, and made for Bus'neſs; Affable in his Converſation, and ſo Temperate in the Exerciſe of his Power, that never any Good Man was the Worſe for it. By This Dextrous way of Addreſs, Antipater came to be Treated by the whole Nation, rather as an Abſolute Prince then as a Proxy; and with a Reverence alſo becoming the Dignity of ſo Great a Maſter. And he had this Virtue Peculiar to Himſelf from the reſt of the World, that Proſperity never altered him, but from firſt to laſt he ſtood firm to his Faith, and to his Friend.

Antipater's Reputation draws Envy upon him.

This Over-grown Greatneſs of Antipater, and the Elevation of his Family to ſuch a degree of Wealth, Credit, and Power, together with the eſteem the People had for Himſelf, and his Children, and his vaſt Revenue in Money from Hyrcanus, created ſo ſpiteful an Envy againſt him among the Great Men of the Jews, that they began to look upon him with an evil Eye; eſpecially when they came to find what an Intereſt he had made, not only among the People of Rome, but in the very Hearts and Good Opinion of the Emperours Themſelves. They told a Story of him, how he got Money from Hyrcanus for the uſe of the Romans, and then engroſs'd the Thanks for it to Himſelf, as if it had been a Preſent out of his own Coffers without ſo much as Naming the Other in the Caſe. This was invidiouſly hinted to Hyrcanus, who was ſo far from taking it ill, that he ſeem'd pleas'd with it. But the Thing of all the reſt that ſtuck moſt in their Stomachs, was the Violent, Daring, Ambitious Humour of Herod; inſomuch that in the Heat of this Indignation, they went Open-Mouth'd to Hyrcanus with a Complaint againſt Antipater. How long, ſaid they, ſhall every thing go to Wrack thus, and you take no notice of it? Do not you perceive all this while, how the Dignities, Profits, and Prerogatives of Royal Power are wholly ſhared betwixt Antipater, and his Two Sons; and that you your ſelf have only the Empty Name, and Title of a Prince? Have a Care of letting things go too far, and being Over-ſecure; for moſt certainly the Safety of your Perſon and Government lies equally at ſtake. You miſtake your ſelf, if you look upon theſe Sparks to be any longer your Deputies, for they are effectually your Maſters. What was Herod's Outrage upon Ezechias, and his Companions, but an Affront to Publique Juſtice? For it is no better then Direct Murder, by our Law, to put any Man to Death, let him be never ſo Great a Villain, without the Formality of a Tryal: But this Man had the Face to Exerciſe an Arbitrary Power, even without the leaſt Colour of any Power at all.

Calumnies rais'd againſt him.

Complaints of Antipater to Hyrcanus.

What with this Diſcourſe, and the Clamour of the Mothers in the Temple, that lay, day after day, there, calling out both to Prince and People for Juſtice upon Herod, for the Murther of their Children, Hyrcanus was at laſt prevail'd upon to appoint a day of Hearing, and try the Cauſe Indifferently betwixt Herod and his Accuſers, before a Bench of Judges. Herod appeared upon the Firſt Call; though not altogether as a Private Man, but, according to his Father's Precaution, with only ſuch a Train, as might ſecure the Priſoner, without Affronting the Court. Sextus Cæſar, having at that time the Command of Syria, wrote a Letter to Hyrcanus in Herod's Favour, and not without Menaces, if they did not Acquit him; which was no hard thing to Obtain; for Hyrcanus lov'd him as his own Fleſh and Bloud. When Herod with his People about him, had ſtood a long time Facing the Court, and not one Mouth open'd againſt him, it put the whole Congregation to their Wits End, what to think of that Profound Silence, till in the Concluſion, there ſtood-up one Sameas, a Man too Juſt to be Corrupted, and too Innocent to Fear any thing; and he deliver'd himſelf in Terms to this Purpoſe.

Herod appears.

With the Favour, ſays he, of your ſelf Sir, and of this Honourable Court, this is the Firſt time that ever I ſaw a Priſoner at the Bar, behaving himſelf in ſuch a Huff of Vanity and Confidence; and I am of Opinion that you will hardly Match this Man, all things conſider'd, in the whole Courſe of your Obſervation and Experience. It has been the Practice formerly of Perſons in his Condition, to demean themſelves in their Habits, Countenances, and Behaviour, with ſome Regard to the Sobriety, Severity and Reſignation that becomes Men in the Hands of the Law, and under the Awe of a Legal Animadverſion: But we have a Criminal here that values himſelf upon his Guards, his Ornaments, and his Purple, and ſtands in a Poſture to make Publique Juſtice more Dangerous to the Court then to the Malefactor. But I do not Blame him ſo much neither, for conſulting his own Safety, before that of the Law and the Government; as I do thoſe that ſuffer'd him to go-on in thoſe Liberties: That is to ſay; the King, and the Judges. Take notice however, (ſays he) turning to the Judges, of what I am about to tell you. God, is a God of Righteouſneſs and Power: and the Time will come, when this very Man that you are now ſtickling to bring off in Favour of Hyrcanus, ſhall be the Ruin of you, both King and Judges.

A bold Speech of Sameas.

And ſo it came to paſs not long after; for upon Herod's getting Poſſeſſion of the Government, he put the King himſelf to Death, and all the Judges ſave only Sameas; for whom he had a ſingular Honour, in regard, both of his Integrity, and Juſtice; and more Particularly, as the Perſon, that, after the Beſieging of the City by himſelf, and Soſius, was Inſtrumental to the admitting of him into the Place: with this Further Declaration, that it was a Judgment upon them for their Sins, and a Puniſhment not to be Avoided. But of this, elſewhere.

Herod pays Sameas a great Reſpect.

Hyr-

Hyrcanus, finding how the Judges ſtood affected; and that it was likely to go hard with Herod, he Adjourned the Court till the next Day, and gave him a Private Hint, by all means to get out of the Way, for he was a Loſt Man elſe. Herod, upon this, withdrew to Damaſcus, for fear of Hyrcanus, as he pretended; and upon ſome Diſcourſe with Sextus Cæſar, and the ſettling of his own Affairs, he Publiquely declar'd, that if ever they cited him again to that Court, he would Diſclaim their Juriſdiction. This Contempt put the Judges in a Rage; and they fell preſently to the Hammering of it into Hyrcanus's Head, that his Ruine was the very Bottom of the Deſign: But though the Thing was as Plain as Plain could be, and that he himſelf was Convinced of it, he had not the Heart or the Grace yet, to make any uſe of the Precaution to his Advantage. Herod was by this time Safe, and Eaſy under the Care and Protection of Sextus Cæſar, and ſettled alſo in a Purchaſe, for a Sum of Mony, of the Government of Cœlo-Syria. This was the firſt Thing that open'd Hyrcanus's Eyes, for fear of any Miſchief that way: And his Apprehenſion was not Idle neither; for Herod was ſo Exaſperated at the Indignity of being expos'd to a Tryal, that he Marched againſt him with an Army; and if it had not been for the Importunities, and the Interceſſions of his Father, and his Brother, he had moſt certainly fall'n upon Jeruſalem it ſelf: But upon their Inſtances and Entreaties, that he would content himſelf with the Fright he had put them in, and ſtop there, without offering any further Violence to the Author of his Dignity and Fortune, they Pacify'd, and Diverted him from his Purpoſe. 'Tis True, they ſaid, he had been Cited; but he was brought-off too, and lay under ſome Obligation for his Deliverance. They adviſed him likewiſe to conſider the Uncertain Chance of War, and how Providence gave Victories many times beyond and againſt Humane Expectation; and that he had little to hope for in this Cauſe from Divine Juſtice; conſidering that he fought not only againſt his Prince, but againſt his very Nouriſher, and Upholder; and one that had deſerv'd all Good from him, without doing him any Injury: Or if he took any thing amiſs from him at preſent, it was rather to be Imputed to the Malevolence of Evil Counſellors he had about him, that had tranſported Hyrcanus into an Evil Opinion of him. Herod was ſo wrought upon by this way of Advice and Reaſoning, that he contented himſelf with ſhewing the People what Power and Reputation he had, upon this Occaſion; and this was the State of Affairs with the Jews at that time.

Hyrcanus adjourns the Court.

Herod tranſported againſt Hyrcanus.

Cæſar being now return'd to Rome, was preparing for an Expedition into Africa, againſt Scipio and Cato, and ſaluted upon the Way by Embaſſadors from Hyrcanus to Sollicit the Renewing of a Former League of Friendſhip. It will be Proper enough in this Place to take notice of the Honours our People have from time to time received from the Roman Emperours, and the Allyances that have paſs'd betwixt us; to the End that the whole World may ſee what Opinion the Kings of Europe, as well as Aſia, have ever had for the Faith and Courage of the Jews.

The Hiſtories of the Perſians and Macedonians are not Publiquely known and diſpers'd, 'tis true; and the Authority of them may appear the leſs Authentique: ſo that, though we our ſelves have their Books; and they are to be had alſo elſewhere, and make honourable Mention of us upon many Occaſions, we ſhall rather Decline making any Advantage of it, and caſt the Credit of our Cauſe upon the Decrees and Proclamations of the Romans; the Monumental Inſcriptions in their Capitols, and upon Pillars of Braſs; which are all, Teſtimonies, and Evidences, beyond Contradiction; and ſo was that Memorable Inſcription of Julius Cæſar's, upon the Brazen Pillar in Alexandria, which ſerves as a Record to Perpetuate the Privilege of Free Citizens, which was allow'd the Jews as a Prerogative in that Famous Place. I ſhall now proſecute my Purpoſe with the Particular Inſtances of certain Orders, and Decrees of the Senate and of Julius Cæſar, to the Advantage of Hyrcanus and our whole Nation.

Proclamations in Honour of the Jews.

Caius Julius Cæſar, Emperour, Pontifex Maximus, and the ſecond time Dictator: to the Magiſtracy, Senate, and People of Sydon; Greeting.

I my ſelf, and my Army are in Health; and if you are Well, all is Well. I ſend you the Copy of a Letter of ours to Hyrcanus, the Son of Alexander, the Prince, and High-Prieſt of the Jews, to be Engraved upon a Braſs-Table; the Inſcription, in Latin and Greek; and to remain among your Regiſters for After-Times. The Letter it ſelf in Subſtance as Follows,

C. Julius Cæſar, Emperor; the Second time Dictator, and Pontifex Maximus; hath, with the Advice and Conſent of the Senate appointed the Publication of this Decree.

Foraſmuch as Hyrcanus, the Son of Alexander a Jew, hath in all Times, as well in War as in Peace, approved himſelf to be our Truſty Good Friend, and Allie, as appeareth by ſeveral Atteſtations of Unqueſtionable Credit, and particularly by the ſupply of Fifteen Hundred dred Choice Men, that he ſent to Mithridates, to my Aſſiſtance in the Late Alexandrian War: Theſe Services and Good Offices duly conſider'd, I do hereby Confirm, and Eſtabliſh unto Hyrcanus, and his Heirs, the Perpetual Government of the Jews, both as their Prince, and High-Prieſt, after the Manner and Method of their Own Laws: and from this time forward, Enroll them among my [a] Truſty and Well-beloved Friends, and Ratify an Affinity with them as my Aſſociates. And it is my Pleaſure likewiſe, that all the [b] Legal Pontifical Rights and Privileges be Devolved upon him, and his Sons for ever: and in caſe any Controverſy ſhall ariſe among the People concerning the Jewiſh Diſcipline, himſelf and his Family, in the Courſe of Succeſſion, to be the only Judges of it. It is moreover my Will and Pleaſure, that the Jews be Diſcharged the Burden of Winter-Quarters, and of all Publique Payments. We ſhall come now to ſome of his Particular Grants, Reſolutions and Decrees.

It is Ordered, Caius Cæſar being Conſul, that the Government of the Jews ſhall deſcend from Hyrcanus to his Heirs for ever, with all the Poſſeſſions, Grants and Emoluments, Belonging or Annexed to the Pontificate; the High-Prieſt to have the Judgment of all Cauſes. And it is likewiſe appointed that Embaſſadors be forthwith ſent to Hyrcanus the Son of Alexander, the High-Prieſt of the Jews, with Inſtructions to Treat about a Friendly Allyance with him: And that theſe Particulars be fairly Inſcrib'd upon Brazen Tables in Latin and Greek, to be ſet-up in the Capitol, at Tyre, Sydon, Askalon, and in the Temples; to the End that this our Pleaſure may be duly made known thorough all our Dominions, and that none may pretend Ignorance: and for the Honour of our Friends, and for a Recommendation of their Agents and Miniſters, to a Singular Reſpect and Eſteem in all Places where they ſhall come.

Caius Cæſar, Emperour, Dictator, and Conſul; taking into his Conſideration the Honour, the Friendſhip, and the [c] good Services of Hyrcanus, doth hereby, for the Benefit and Advantage of the Senate and People of Rome, Grant unto Hyrcanus, the Son of Alexander, and to his Sons after him, by an Hereditary Right of Succeſſion, the Authority and Office of Princes and Prieſts of Jeruſalem, and of the whole Nation of the Jews, to be by them Exerciſed and Enjoy'd, in ſuch Manner as their Anceſtors Enjoy'd and Exerciſed the ſaid Dignites before them.

Caius Cæſar, the Fifth time Conſul, hath Ordained and Appointed that the City of Jeruſalem ſhall be Repair'd and Fortify'd; and that Hyrcanus the Prince and High-Prieſt of the Jews, and the Son of Alexander, ſhall have the Adminiſtration of the Government, with an Abatement upon the Duty every Second Year, of a Part of their Taxes, and an Exemption from Carriages and Other Tributes.

Caius Cæſar, Emperour, hath likewiſe Ordained that the Inhabitants of Jeruſalem ſhall pay a Yearly Tribute for it ſelf and all its Dependencies, ſaving only the City of Joppa; with an Exemption of all Duty from the Seventh Year, which they call Sabatical, or the Year of Reſt; in which they neither Sow, Plant, nor Reap, either Fruit or Grain. And it is his Pleaſure alſo, that the Jews in Sydon pay a Tribute of the Fourth Part of their Fruits every Second Year for a Duty; beſide the Tenths to Hyrcanus and his Sons, as they have pay'd formerly to their Predeceſſors. And further, that no Governours, Military Officers, or Embaſſadors, preſume to raiſe any Soldiers, or Impoſe any Charges upon the Lands of the Jews; whether for Winter Quarters, or upon any other Pretext whatſoever; but that they may hold all their Purchaſes, and Acquiſitions, Peaceably, and Quietly, to themſelves, without any Lett, or Moleſtation whatſoever. It is alſo our Further Will and Pleaſure, that the City of Joppa, which the Jews were poſſeſs'd of at their firſt Entrance into an Allyance with the Romans, remain under the Government of Hyrcanus the Son of Alexander and his Family, with all the Revenues, and Advantages ariſing from it, whether upon Husbandry, Port-Duties, Taxes, Cuſtoms, Anchorage, Impoſitions upon Goods, and Exportations of Corn for Sydon, once in Two Years, ſaving only the Sabbatical Year, wherein (as is ſaid before) they neither Plough, Plant, Sow, Reap, nor Gather. As to the Villages that Hyrcanus, and his Anceſtors formerly Enjoy'd in the Great Plain, it is the Will of the Senate, that they continue to Hyrcanus and the Jews, in Manner as before, and that the ſame Laws and Cuſtoms be ſtill preſerved and exerciſed betwixt them and the Prieſts, and all Advantages made good that had been formerly granted to them by the Senate and the People of Rome; the ſame Privileges extending even to Lydda it ſelf. And whereas the Romans had formerly beſtow'd upon the Kings of Syria, and Cilicia, certain Lands and Eſtates in reſpect of an Allyance betwixt them, it is the Pleaſure of the Senate that they ſtill continue in the Poſſeſſion of Hyrcanus the Prince of the Jews. And further; that he himſelf, his Son, and his Embaſſadors, ſhall have Places Aſſigned them among the Senators, to ſee the Gladiators, and other Publique Spectacles: And that upon any Occaſi- on of Applying themselves to the Senate, the Dictator, or the Master of the Horse, shall Introduce them to their Audience; and an Answer to be returned them within Ten Days, if the Senate shall come to any Resolution upon the Matter.

Caius Julius, the Fourth time Emperour, the Fifth time Consul, and Perpetual Dictator, makes this mention of Hyrcanus the Son of Alexander, the Prince and the High-Priest of the Jews.

Whereas My Predecessors, as well in the Provinces, as in the Senate, have formerly born Witness to many Honourable Reports on the behalf of the High-Priest Hyrcanus, and the Generality of the Jews, who have thereupon received the Thanks of the Senate and People of Rome, in Acknowledgment of their Worth and Goodness: We look upon these Friendly Offices and Respects, as Obligations never to be Forgotten; and upon our selves, as bound in the Name of the Senate and People of Rome, to give Hyrcanus, his Family and Countrymen all possible Demonstrations of the Sense we have of their Amity and Esteem.

Caius Julius, Dictator and Consul, to the Magistracy, Senate and Body of the Parians, Greeting.

Whereas Application hath been made unto Us at Delos, by Great Numbers of the Jews, from several Quarters, Complaining against you in the Hearing, and Presence of your own Embassadors, for Barring the Jews the Liberty of their Country-Laws, and the Free Enjoyment of their Rites and Sacrifices; they having likewise shew'd us the Instrument of Interdiction it self: These are to let you understand, that we will not suffer any such Unreasonable Rigour to be Practiced toward our Friends and Allies; but our Pleasure is, on the Contrary, that they be let alone in the Free and Peaceable Enjoyment of their Customs, Festivals, and Sacrifices; being no more then the Allowance of a Privilege which they Enjoy in Rome it self: for in the Edict of Caius Cæsar, Consul, prohibiting all Publique Meetings, and Congregations in the City, the Jews Alone were permitted to Meet together; Feast and make Merry: And I my self, in another Case of Prohibition, Excepted the Jews likewise out of that Restraint, and left them to their own Ways and Manners. Wherefore if so it be, that you have pass'd any Order to the Prejudice of our Allies, in the Privileges that we have thought fit to allow them, it is but Just and Reasonable that you Revoke, and make void any such Decree out of a Respect to Us, and to them for our sakes, as they are our Friends and Associates.

After the Death of Cæsar, Marcus Antonius, and Publius Dolobella, being then Consuls, call'd a Senate, and gave an Audience to the Embassadors of Hyrcanus, upon the Subject-Matter of their Instructions and Desires: struck-up a New League with them, and came to a Resolution, at last, in favour of all their Demands. This Dolobella, having received Letters from Hyrcanus, took an Occasion from thence to send Dispatches all over Asia, and particularly to Ephesus, the Metropolis of that Province, in Terms much to this Effect.

(a) The Stile of Generals, in Those Days.

Whereas we are given to Understand by Alexander the Son of Theodorus, and Embassador of Hyrcanus the High-Priest and Prince of the Jews, in the Name of the said Hyrcanus, that the Jews, being ty'd-up by the Religion, Laws, and Constitutions of their Country, not to bear Arms, Travel, or so much as provide themselves Necessaries for Life, upon the Day of their Sabbaoth, are thereby render'd Incapable of attending the Duties and Services of the War: We do therefore Order and Appoint, according to what our Predecessors have done before us in the same Case, that the said Jews, be from this Time forward Exempted from all Military Charges, and Permitted the Liberty of Meeting, Worshipping, and Sacrificing, according to their own Rule and Way. And hereof you are to cause due Notice to be given thorough all the Cities of your Province.

We find these Privileges Granted to our People by Dolabella, at the Instance of Hyrcanus: and Lucius Lentulus the Consul pronouncing upon the Whole Matter, in Form, that the Citizen-Jews in Ephesus should be allow'd the Free Exercise of their Religion; with an Immunity from all Offices, and Impositions relating to the War.

Given in Court the 18th. Day of September.

We might produce several other Imperial Resolutions, and Decrees of Senate in Favour of Hyrcanus and the Jewish Nation, with Letters Recommendatory to the Governours of Cities and Provinces, upon the Subject of our Rights and Claims; for which we can shew Authorities not to be doubted of by any Equal and Impartial Judge, in Justification of what we have here deliver'd. The Proofs, in fine, of an Amicable Understanding of Ancient Date, betwixt us and the Romans, are so firm and Clear, that the Record of it is yet to be seen to this Day, upon Brazen Tables and Pillars in the Capitol, in perpetual Memory of that Allyance. It would be Time lost to be more Particular in a Case, where there are so many Undeniable Evidences Extant in Confirmation of the Matter here exhibited: so that I shall rather cast my self upon what I have said already for the Credit of what I could say further, then Tire-out the Reader with a Tedious Story for the clearing of a Thing that proves it self. Wherefore let this Suffice to shew the Friendly Correspondence that pass'd in former Times betwixt the Romans and the Jews.

There happen'd at or about this time a Desperate Sedition in Syria, and it was upon this Occasion. Cæcilius Bassus, a Pompejan, enter'd into a Plot upon the Life of Sextus Cæsar: He got him treacherously Murder'd, and immediately drew-out his Troups upon it, and took Possession of the Province. This Uproar was follow'd with a Bloudy War upon the Borders of Apamia. The Cæsareans march'd against Bassus with Horse and Foot; Antipater with his Sons joyning them, in Honour to the Memory of his Illustrious Benefactor: Accounting himself bound both in Honour and Justice to take his Revenge upon the Murderer of so Generous a Friend. While the War was drawing-out at length, [a] Marcus sets-up for Successor to Sextus; and in the mean time, Brutus and Cassius, with a Band of other Conspirators, Assassinated Cæsar in the Senate House. He had now been Three Years and a Half in his Government: As appears by the Whole Current of Historians.

The Death of Cæsar was follow'd by a Civil War. Cassius enters into a Faction, and joyns with Herod in horrible Oppressions. People as well as Places exposed to Sale. Marcus in a Plot against Antipater, and brings Himself-off by a false Oath.

The Death of Cæsar is follow'd with a Civil War. Cassius makes a Party, and draws Marcus and Bassus into't. Horrible Oppressions under Cassius and Herod.

UPon the Death of Cæsar, the Senators and the leading Men of Rome fell presently all to pieces, in Parties, and Factions; every Man shifting and setting-up for Himself, till the Confusion brake-out into a Civil War. Cassius got possession of the Army in Syria, which was then before Apamia; Raised the Siege, and brought over Marcus and Bassus into his Interest; took his Progress from Place to Place, picking-up Men, Money, and Arms more or less wherever he came, but Oppressing Judæa above all the rest, by an Imposition of betwixt Seven and Eight Hundred Talents of Silver. In the Hurry of this Broil and Distraction, Antipater committed the Care of Levying one part of this Money to his Two Sons, and the rest of it to Malichus, (one that had no Great Kindness for him) together with some Others. Herod, that was willing to Oblige the Romans at other People's Cost, began with the most Acceptable Presents to Cassius, of the Contribution of Galilee, as the First-Fruits of his Service; but for several Cities under other Governours, they were Exposed and sold as by an Outcry, People, Places and all, to Him that would give most; as particularly the Cities of Gophna, Emmaus, Lydda, and Thamna, where the Inhabitants, by Cassius's Order, were sold by Auction: And he was so exasperated against Malichus, upon This Occasion, that if Hyrcanus had not Pacify'd him with a Composition of a Hundred Talents out of his own Coffers, by the Hands of Antipater, it would have cost Malichus his Life. So soon as Cassius was gone off with his Treasure, Malichus enter'd into a Practice against the Person of Antipater, reckoning upon it, that if he were once out of the Way, Hyrcanus would find himself more Easy, and Secure, in his Government. Antipater had such an Apprehension however of this Design upon him, that for Prevention-sake, he forthwith pass'd the River Jordan, and put himself in the Head of as many Jews and Arabians as he could get into a Body; but Malichus who was a Bold and a Cunning Fellow, finding himself suspected, went to Antipater and his Sons, Barefac'd, and without more ado clear'd himself of the Jealousy by the Dint of Downright Perjury. Can any Body imagine, says he, that I should be so Arrant a Fool, as to Entertain so much as the least Thought of a Plot, or a Conspiracy, when at the same time, Phasael had the Command of Jerusalem, and Herod that of the Arms, and Magazines? So that by this Impudence, failing of his Main End, he made his Peace with Antipater. Marcus had at this time the Government of Syria; who coming afterward to hear of New Practices of Malichus in Judæa, had certainly put him to Death, if it had not been for the Intercession of Antipater on His Behalf.

People and Places all put to Sale.

CHAP. XIX.

Marcus and Caſſius give Herod the Command of the Lower-Syria. Malichus gets Antipater poiſon'd, but forſwears it. A bloudy Malice well diſſembled.

ANTIPATER's Good Nature in this Act of Tenderneſs, was more then his Diſcretion; for, as it fell out, he ſav'd Malichus only to Deſtroy Himſelf. When Marcus and Caſſius had gotten an Army together, they gave Herod the Command of it both by Sea and Land, and at the ſame time made him Governour of the Cœlo-Syria, with a Further Promiſe of the Kingdom of Judæa, ſo ſoon as the War ſhould be over with Anthony, and the Younger Cæſar, (afterward Auguſtus) which they were then Engaged in. This Promotion of Herod put Malichus into ſuch an Apprehenſion and Jealouſy of Antipater, that he got him Poyſon'd for a Sum of Money, by Hyrcanus's Butler one Day, at his Maſter's Table; and thereupon, with a Guard of Soldiers about him, took Poſſeſſion of the City. This was the End of Antipater; a Juſt, and a Good Man, and a True Lover of his Country. Herod and Phaſael Reſented this Barbarous Practice upon the Perſon of their Father, as they ought to do; but Malichus had the Confidence however to Forſwear all upon the Main, and ſtand upon his Juſtification. The Two Brothers were both agreed in the Determination of a Revenge; but the Queſtion was, in what Manner to bring it about. Herod was for doing of it at the Head of an Army; but Phaſael rather by Stratagem, and Surprize, for fear of Embroiling the People in a Civil War: So that he carry'd it fair to Malichus, without Diſcovering any Suſpicion he had of Him for the Murther; Employing himſelf at the ſame time upon the Erecting of an Illuſtrious Monument to the Honour of his Dead Father. Herod came about this time to Samaria, and finding every thing in Great Diſorder, he made it his Bus'neſs to ſet Matters to Rights again, and to Compoſe all Controverſies and Diſputes among the Inhabitants, by a Regular Courſe of Law and Juſtice. There came-on ſoon after this, a Solemn Feſtival at Jeruſalem; upon which Occaſion, Herod advanced with his Army toward the City; where Malichus in a Dread on the other hand, earneſtly preſs'd Hyrcanus not to give him admittance; who was accordingly prevail'd upon to Refuſe him Entrance, upon a Pretext, that it would be a Prophanation of the Holy Religion to Communicate in their Ceremonies and Worſhip with Strangers. But Herod made light of this Interdiction, and got into the Town by Night. This Surprize ſtartled Malichus; but he had the Wit yet to ſtick to his Diſguiſe of Tears and Exclamations for the loſs of his Dear Friend Antipater, and at the ſame time to provide a Guard underhand for the Security of his Perſon. Herod's Friends, under theſe Circumſtances, had no better Expedient then to Encounter his Pretence of Sorrow and Affliction on the One hand with an Artificial Semblance of Friendſhip and Confidence on the other.

CHAP. XX.

Caſſius and Herod joyn, to revenge Antipater's Murder. Malichus ſtabb'd, under a Colour of Friendſhip.

THE Character of Malichus was ſo well known to Caſſius, that he order'd Herod, immediately upon the News of Antipater's Death, to Revenge it upon the Head of the Murderer, privately Commanding the Troups alſo that were then-at Tyre to his Aſſiſtance. Upon the taking of Laodicea afterward by Caſſius, and the People thronging to him with Money and Preſents, Herod made no doubt of an Opportunity to Gain his Point upon that Occaſion: But as Malichus was upon the Way near Tyrus in Phœnicia, his Heart miſgave him, and that Apprehenſion put him upon other Meaſures. He had a Son at that time an Hoſtage in Tyre, and he thought with Himſelf that if he could but ſteal him away into Judæa, the Jews might be Tamper'd to a Revolt; and He Himſelf take his Advantage, while Caſſius was Engaged in a War with Anthony, to poſſeſs himſelf of the Government. The Project was Bold, and well enough contrived; if Herod's Wonderful Sagacity and Precaution had not Diſappointed it, by ſending out ſeveral Officers beforehand to meet Malichus and his Train upon the way, in their Arms, under a Pretext of Inviting them to a Collation; which they did accordingly, and falling upon him on the Sea-ſide of the Town, they there Diſpatch'd him with their Daggers. The Horror and Surprize of This Action ſtruck Hyrcanus ſpeechleſs; but upon coming a little to Himſelf, and enquiring into Particulars, Herod put a ſhort end to his Curioſity, by telling him that it was all done by the Command Caſſius joyns with Herod to revenge Antipater's Murder.

Malichus ſtabb'd upon the Way, under Colour of Friendſhip.

Command of Caſſius: whereupon, Hyrcanus ſeemed highly to approve the Juſtice of the Vengeance for the Murder of Antipater, upon ſo Lewd a Man, and ſo Treacherous an Enemy to his Country.

Upon the Departure of Caſſius out of Syria, there follow'd Great Troubles in Judæa. For Felix, with the Troups that were under his Command in Jeruſalem, made an Attaque upon Phaſael; and the People betook themſelves to their Arms in his Defence. Herod, upon this, apply'd himſelf to Fabius, the Governour of Damaſcus, with a Deſign to Aſſiſt his Brother; but was prevented for the Preſent by a Fit of Sickneſs, that put him out of Condition to ſerve him. Phaſael however had the Good Fortune to do his Bus'neſs without him, and to force Felix for Sanctuary into a Strong Hold, upon Terms: Phaſael reproaching Hyrcanus all this while with Ingratitude, to the Higheſt Degree, in ſiding with his Enemy after ſo many Obligations as he had laid upon him; for the Brother of Malicus had at that time gotten ſeveral Fortify'd Places into his Hand, and Maſada among the reſt, which was look'd upon as a Fort in a manner Impregnable; but Herod, upon his Recovery, took them all back again, and ſo Diſmiſs'd him upon Articles of Agreement betwixt them.

His next Bus'neſs was immediately to March-up to Antigonus, whom he Encounter'd, and Defeated upon his very Entrance into Judæa; and returning Triumphant from thence to Jeruſalem, he was received by Hyrcanus and the whole People, with all poſſible Inſtances of Honour and Eſteem: For being now upon the Point of a Match with the Daughter of Alexander, the Son of Ariſtobulus, and of Alexandra the Daughter of Hyrcanus, Herod was conſider'd as a Branch of the Family; and the Marriage being conſummated ſoon after, he had by this Wife Three Sons, and Two Daughters: having had a Former Wife of his own Country, whoſe Name was Dores, by whom he had his Eldeſt Son Antipater.

AFter the Defeat of Caſſius at Philippi, by Anthony and Auguſtus, Cæſar went his way into Gaul; and Anthony into Aſia, who was Complemented upon his March in Bithynia with Embaſſies and Applications from ſeveral Parts; and among Others, he was Encounter'd with Complaints and Accuſations againſt Phaſael and Herod, from many Eminent Perſons among the Jews; ſuggeſting, that Hyrcanus, though he had the Name of a Governour, was in Effect, but a Mock-Prince; for that the Two Brothers had uſurp'd the Authority, and Adminiſtration, to themſelves. Herod pleaded ſo well for himſelf, and ſeconded his Reaſons with ſuch a Sum of Mony, that his Adverſaries could not be ſo much as Heard againſt him. Upon Anthony's coming-up to Epheſus, Embaſſadors were ſent from Hyrcanus the High-Prieſt, and the whole Body of the Jews, with a Crown of Gold, Supplications, and Preſents; deſiring that their Countrymen that were carry'd away Priſoners by Caſſius contrary to the Rules of War, might be ſet at Liberty, and their Lands reſtored to them, that had been wrongfully taken away; deſiring Anthony's Letters to the Provinces in their Favour, to this Purpoſe. Their Requeſt was found to be ſo Reaſonable, Anthony preſently Granted their Petition, and wrote to Hyrcanus, and to the Jews, and likewiſe diſpatch'd an Edict to the Tyrians, to this following Effect.

Marcus

Marcus Antonius, Emperor, to Hyrcanus the High-Prieſt, and Prince of the Jews; Greeting, Joy and Health. Anthony, to the Magiſtrates of Tyre.

Whereas we have received from Lyſimacus the Son of Pauſanias, Joſeph the Son of Mennæus, and Alexander the Son of Theodorus, your Embaſſadors at Epheſus, Freſh Aſſurances of the Continuance of yours, and your People's Affection for us, according to what hath been formerly Exhibited to us at Rome: In which Commiſſion, they have Faithfully, and Worthily acquitted themſelves: And whereas we are abundantly ſatisfied in the Sincerity of your Intentions, and more from the Proof we have had of your Good Faith, Piety, and Virtue, then by the Force of Words, we do heartily agree to your Propoſals, and Embrace your Friendſhip. Now ſince ſo it is that the Enemies, both of our ſelf, and of the People of Rome, have laid Waſte and Ravag'd the whole Country of Aſia, without any Regard to Societies, Laws, or Holy Places, Oaths, Promiſes or Contracts, we have turned our Arms againſt theſe Violators of all Duties, Sacred and Civil; not for any Particular Intereſt of our own, but in Vindication of the Common Cauſe of Mankind. As in the Caſe of the Horrid Murder of Cæſar; a Villany ſo Black and Hideous, that the Sun it ſelf was Confounded at the Sight of it: The Execrable Aſſaſſins betook themſelves, ſome of them at leaſt, into Macedonia, as if it had been to Fight the Old Quarrel againſt the Gods over again there: ſuch was their Outrageous Malice at the Battle of Philippi; where having poſſeſſed themſelves of all the Faſtneſſes, and Strong Places, up to the very Sea, under the Cover of almoſt Impaſſable Mountains, they were ſo Poſted that there was only One Way Open to come at them: But theſe Difficulties notwithſtanding, Divine Juſtice gave us ſo Entire a Victory over the Sacrilegious Rebels, that we beat Brutus and Caſſius into the Town; where, finding themſelves Begirt, they both Periſhed together. So that having Inflicted a Juſt Vengeance upon the Heads of theſe Monſters, we are now in hope to ſee Peaceable Days again, and Aſia, that looks like a Body already recovering out of a Deſperate Diſtemper by the Benefit of this Relief, deliver'd finally from the Outrages of a Devouring War. And it ſhall be our Care likewiſe to provide that you and your People may come-in for an Ample ſhare in the Comfort of ſo great a Bleſſing. To this End we have already Diſpatch'd away our Mandates from Place to Place, for the immediate Diſcharge of all the Jews, as well Bond, as Free, that had been expoſed to Sale by Caſſius, or his Order: And it is our further Pleaſure, that you ſhall Quietly enjoy to your ſelves, and your Heirs, all the Graces, and Privileges unto you granted by my ſelf and Dolobella, with an Expreſs Inhibition to the Tyrians, that they give you no ſort of Moleſtation, and as Poſitively commanding them to make full Reſtitution of all the Goods and Eſtates that had been taken away from the Jews; declaring our Acceptance alſo of the Crown you were pleaſed to ſend.

Marcus Antonius, Emperor, to the Magiſtrates, Senate, and People of Tyre; Greeting.

Whereas we have been given to Underſtand at Epheſus, by the Embaſſadors of Hyrcanus, the High-Prieſt, and Prince of the Jews, that in the Time when our Enemies were in Poſſeſſion of this Province, you Enter'd upon the Lands of ſeveral of this People for your own Uſe: Be it now known unto you, that as we engaged in this War for the Good of the Empire, and for the Maintenance of Piety and Juſtice, againſt a Band of ungrateful Rebels: So we do hereby Will and Require you, not only to live in Peace and Amity with our Allies, but alſo to reſtore to the Former Proprietors whatever you have of theirs that was taken from them by the Hands of our Enemies; who, as they had no manner of Right thereunto themſelves, by any Commiſſion, or Authority from the Senate; ſo neither could they Convey any Right to others, upon whom they pretended to beſtow it; being only the Mercenary Inſtruments of their Violence and Uſurpation. And now having brought our Adverſaries to Condign Puniſhment, We find it Reaſonable to Re-eſtabliſh our Allies in the Full and Quiet Enjoyment of their Eſtates: Wherefore, if you have in your Hands at preſent any Lands or Eſtates formerly belonging to Hyrcanus the Prince of the Jews, which you came to be ſeized of in the time, or under the Countenance of Caſſius's Unrighteous Invaſion; it is our Will that they be forthwith deliver'd-up to the Perſons from whom they were taken, without any Oppoſition, or Delay; and in Caſe of any Doubt or Difficulty that may ariſe upon the Equity of the Matter, it ſhall be our Care when we come into thoſe Parts, to hear both ſides, and to do Indifferent Juſtice.

Mark Anthony, Emperor, to the Magiſtrates, Senate, and People of Tyre; Greeting.

I have ſent you my Mandate, which you are to ſee carefully Tranſcrib'd in Latin and Greek, and expoſed upon a Table among your Records, in a Publique Place where all People may take notice of it. And again.

Marcus

Marcus Antonius, Emperor, and Triumvir, &c. as follows.

Whereas Caius Caſſius, taking Advantage of our Troubles and Diſtractions, brake-in with a Body of Vagabond Troups upon a Province where he had nothing at all to do, and without the leaſt Colour of any Warrantable Title or Pretenſion; Ravaging and Deſtroying the Country, and the whole Nation of the Jews, though our Dear Friends and Allies; and continuing thoſe Outrages, till by our Arms we brought down the Pride and Inſolence of theſe Preſumptuous Uſurpers; it is our Expreſs Will and Command now for the Reparation of all theſe Indignities (ſo far as in us lies) to Ordain and Appoint, that Reſtitution or Satisfaction be forthwith made to our Allies the Jews, for whatſoever hath been forcibly taken from them, and the Perſons of all their Priſoners to be ſet at Liberty: And we do likewiſe require that this our Decree be Punctually Obſerved, upon pain of our utmoſt Diſpleaſure.

Anthony wrote to the ſame Purpoſe alſo to the People of Sydon, Antioch, and Arad, which we think reaſonable to give an Account of in this Place, to the End that Poſterity may know how Great an Honour and Reſpect our Nation has received time after time from the State of Rome.

Anthony adviſes with Hyrcanus.

ANTHONY, paſſing after this, into Syria, was Met and Complemented by Cleopatra upon the Way, in Cilicia, where he fell deſperately in Love with her. Application was alſo made to him by a Matter of a Hundred Eminent Perſons of the Firſt Quality of the Jews, with Complaints and Accuſations againſt Herod and Phaſael; bringing along with them a Select Choice of the beſt Speakers they had for their Advocates. Meſſala was of Counſel for the Two Brothers, being likewiſe Seconded by Hyrcanus, who was at this time by Marriage become Father-in-Law to Herod. The Cauſe was Try'd at Daphne; where, upon a Full Hearing of both ſides, Anthony put it to Hyrcanus, which of the Two was the beſt Qualify'd for the Office of a Governour; who made Anſwer, that he took Herod to be the more Competent Adminiſtrator of the Two. Anthony had ſo great a Tenderneſs and Reſpect for the Two Young Men, upon the Score of paſt Kindneſs received from their Father Antipater, who took him into his Protection when Gabinius made War upon Judæa, that he Conferr'd upon them both the Dignity of Tetrarchs, and committed Judæa to their Care. He wrote ſeveral Letters alſo in their Favour, and Impriſon'd Fifteen of the moſt Violent of their Proſecutors, with a Reſolution to have put them all to death, if Herod by his Mediation had not diverted the Execution: But this Generoſity of Herod's had no Effect at all upon the Implacable Malice of his Enemies; for they were no ſooner Diſmiſs'd from their Embaſſy, but they enter'd into New Practices againſt the Life of their Preſerver, immediately upon their Return; and drawing together to the Number of a Thouſand Perſons of the Faction, they Trouped away in a Body to Tyre to wait for Anthony's coming thither. But Herod and his Brother had already made ſo Powerful an Intereſt by the Force of Mony and Preſents, that Anthony ſent his Orders to the Magiſtracy of the Place, to Aſſiſt Herod in the Support of his Authority, and to do Juſtice upon the Jewiſh Embaſſadors, as a parcel of Seditious Innovators, that were in a Deſign to overturn the Government. But Herod gave yet a Second Inſtance of his Humanity and Good Nature, in repairing to the Deputies as they were Advancing up to the City, and adviſing them by all Means to withdraw themſelves in time: Hyrcanus joyning with Herod in the ſame Advice, and deſiring them to Retire, for fear of what Miſchief might befal them if they Perſiſted in that Appeal: but theſe People, in contempt of all Counſels and Dangers, kept on their way till they were ſet upon and Overborn by Multitudes of both Jews and Inhabitants; Great Numbers of them being Kill'd and Wounded, and the reſt Diſpers'd, which put a Final End to that Controverſy: not but that the Common People went on with Open-Mouth, exclaiming againſt Herod's Proceedings; which Irritated Anthony to that Degree, that he Commanded all the Priſoners to be put to Death.

The Defendants advance, and ſeveral of the Proſecutors put to Death.

In the Year following, Pacorus the Son of the King of Parthia, and Barzapharnes, a Prince of the Country, made themſelves Maſters of Syria; and Ptolemey Mennæus dying at the ſame time, his Son Lyſanias ſucceeded him, having contracted a Particular Friend-

Friendſhip with Antigonus the Son of Ariſtobulus, by the Means of Barzapharnes, who had very Great Credit with him.

ANTIGONUS contracted with the Parthians for a Thouſand Talents, and Five Hundred Women, upon the Depoſing of Hyrcanus, and receiving him for Governour in his Stead; and at the ſame time put Herod to Death, and all his Party. The Sum agreed upon was not Depoſited; but the Parthians however Enter'd upon the Undertaking, and Marched with an Army againſt Judæa; Pacorus, by the Way of the Coaſt, and Barzapharnes thorough the Inland. The Tyrians ſtood upon their Guard againſt Pacorus, and kept him out of the City; but the People of Sidon and Ptolemais open'd their Gates and receiv'd him. He Detached, upon this, a Party of Horſe upon the Scout, under the Command of the King's Cup-Bearer, whoſe Name alſo was Pacorus, to Diſcover the State of the Country, and to ſecond Antigonus, if there ſhould be Occaſion. The Jews of Mount Carmel ſided with Antigonus, who fancy'd that by their Aſſiſtance he might make himſelf Maſter of that part of the Country which they call Drymi, and he was perſwaded by others alſo that came over to him, to puſh forward, even to Jeruſalem it ſelf; which he did accordingly by the Help of ſeveral ſtrong Enforcements that joyn'd him with a Reſolution to Attacque Herod and Phaſael in the Royal Palace: but while this was in Agitation, the Two Brothers with a Conſiderable Body of their Friends and Party, fell upon them in the Market-Place; and Beating them from their Poſt, they fled into the Temple. Herod clapt a Guard of Soldiers into the Adjoyning Houſes, for the Better Security of the Place: But the Multitude breaking violently-in upon them before they could be Reliev'd, ſet Fire to the Buildings over their Heads, and burnt the Houſes to Aſhes, together with the Defendants. Soon after this Outrage, Herod had his Revenge, in a Defeat he gave them with a very Great Slaughter. They went Skirmiſhing on from Day to Day till toward the Feaſt of Pentecoſt, which, Antigonus, and His Party expected with Great Impatience, becauſe of the Mighty Confluence of People that Reſorted thither upon that Solemnity. The time being come, there were ſeveral Thouſands gather'd together about the Temple: Some with Arms; others, without; and the City as well as the Temple crouded with them, all but the Palace; which Herod, with a ſmall Party, Maintained; the charge of the Walls and Outworks being committed to Phaſael. The Enemy having Poſted themſelves in the Suburbs, Herod made a Brave and a Deſperate Sally upon them, wherein he did Great Execution; driving ſeveral Thouſands before him: ſome into the Temple; ſome into the City, and forcing Others to take Sanctuary behind a Rampart that was there at hand: Phaſael acquitting himſelf in this Action like a Man of Honour. Pacorus, in the mean time, at the Inſtance of Antigonus, with a ſmall Party, enter'd the City upon a Pretence to keep the People quiet, and put a Stop to the Tumult; but with a Deſign, in truth, to advance Antigonus to the Government. Phaſael, after This, Treated them with great Reſpect, both upon the way, and at his own Palace, and Pacorus requited the Civility with a Practice upon his Life, which was carry'd-on under Colour of an Embaſſy to Barzapharnes; which Phaſael, being a Credulous Man, was eaſily prevail'd upon to undertake, though ſo much againſt Herod's Opinion, that he was abſolutely for cutting-off Pacorus, and the Whole Crew that came along with him, to prevent a Worſe Miſchief; being too well acquainted with the Faithleſſneſs of the Barbarous People he had to do withal, to Truſt them. But ſo it was however, that Hyrcanus and Phaſael put themſelves upon their Journey with Pacorus to conduct them, leaving a Guard of Two Hundred Horſe with Herod, and Ten of thoſe People that they call Freemen. Upon their Arrival at Galilee, the Commanders of the Neighbouring Gariſons came out in their Arms to meet them, and none forwarder then Barzapharnes, with Fair Words and Preſents to bid them Welcome; though his Heart, upon the Whole Matter, was Falſe at the Bottom. Phaſael and his Train were Conducted to a Quarter upon the Sea-ſide; where being given to Underſtand that the Parthians were to have a Thouſand Talents, and Five Hundred Women, of Antigonus, for this piece of Service, he began to have an Apprehenſion of Foul play: over and above that that he had Notice given him of a Deſign upon him that very Night; and that there was a Guard of Soldiers in readineſs to ſeize upon his Perſon. And the Plot had certainly been put in Execution, if they had not waited for the Intelligence of Herod's being Secured at Jeruſalem by the Parthians, as it was concerted among themſelves; for if the other Two had been taken-up firſt, Herod might have had Time enough, they thought, to give them the ſlip, and ſhift for Himſelf. The Information of this Contrivance was quickly found to be True, by the coming-up of the Guards that were to do the Exploit. Upon this Diſcovery, ſeveral of Phaſael's People were at him immediately to take Horſe and away; Oſilius eſpecially, who, by the Means of Saramella, (one of the Greateſt Men for Eſtate in all Syria) had Detected the Conſpiracy; and living near the Sea, offer'd him the Convenience of Shipping to carry him off; but Phaſael was to Generous too Abandon his Friends in their Diſtreſs: So that he choſe rather to go directly to Barzapharnes, and charge him Point Blank with the Indignity of ſo Diſhonourable a Practice. If Money, ſays he, be your Bus'neſs, Phaſael methinks ſhould be better able to Gratify you that way then Antigonus; beſide the Scandalous Barbarity of ſo Horrid a Violence upon the Perſons of Embaſſadors, in Oppoſition to all the Laws of Good Faith, Hoſpitality and Nations. The Barbarian forſwore the whole Matter from one End to the Other. It was all but a Phancy, he ſaid, and ſo went his way to Pacorus.

Hyrcanus and Phaſael taken-up by the Parthians.

A Plot upon Herod.

*Barzapharnes had no ſooner turn'd his Back, but a Party of Soldiers took-up Hyrcanus and Phaſael with Exclamations in their Mouths againſt ſo Perjurious, and ſo Barbarous a Practice: An Eunuch being Diſpatch'd away at the ſame time alſo, for the Apprehenſion of Herod, if they could but inveigle him out of his Palace. But he had got ſuch an Inkling already of the Deſign they had upon him, and the Intercepting of his Correſpondence with his Brother, that away goes he preſently, to expoſtulate the matter with Pacorus, and the Leading Men of the Parthians; who gave him for Anſwer, that they knew nothing at all of the Bus'neſs, though in truth Privy to the whole Intrigue. They told him indeed, if he had any doubt of his Brother's Welfare, he could not do better then to go out of Town with them to meet his Letters upon the Way, for fear of their falling into Wrong Hands. But having heard ſo much of his Brother's ill Uſage, and being alſo confirm'd in his Suſpicion of the Parthians, by the Opinion of Alexandra, the Daughter of Hyrcanus, a Woman of Singular Prudence, and whoſe Daughter he was to Marry, Herod govern'd himſelf by her Caution and Advice, whatever the reſt ſaid to the Contrary. Upon this Occaſion, the Parthians laid their Heads together what courſe to take, and gave themſelves time till Next day to conſider of it; for they did not think fit to venture an Aſſault upon ſo Great a Man as Herod was, in the Face of the Sun; but Herod reflecting upon the Diſtraction they were in, with the Certain Knowledge he had of their Perfidious Violence they had committed upon his Brother; (though the Parthians told him it was all Falſe) and conſequently the Deſperate Hazzard of ſtaying any longer among thoſe People, he bethought himſelf of giving them the ſlip that very Night; and ſo taking the Opportunity of the Dusk of the Evening, he reſolved to Attempt his Eſcape. He took along with him all the Troups he had about him; provided Wagons, Horſes and other Beaſts of Carriage for the Women, and his Train, as his Mother, Siſter, and Mariamne, his contracted Miſtreſs, the Daughter of Alexander, and the Niece of Ariſtobulus; with his Spouſe's Mother, the Daughter of Hyrcanus, the youngeſt Brother, and the reſt of his Company and Family; Marching away all together toward Idumæa, and well advanced upon the Way before their Enemies took notice of it. It was a Spectacle to make the moſt Inſenſible Heart to Bleed; the Sight of the poor Women Hurrying away with ſucking Children at their Breaſts with Tears and Outcries, leaving their Country in Miſery, and their Friends in Bonds, and in an Hourly Expectation of falling under the ſame Fate themſelves.

Herod accuſes Pacorus.

Alexandra governs Herod.

Herod ſlips away with all his People.

But

But Herod ſtood as Firm as a Rock all this While, againſt the Uttermoſt Iniquities of a Croſs Fortune, and did all that was poſſible to do, both by his Example, and by his Counſels, to keep-up the Hearts of his Companions. He told them that there was no Poſſibility of Safety, or any Thoughgt of Life, but in Flight, encouraging them to Hope the Beſt, and not to Ruin themſelves by Fruitleſs Lamentations and Deſpairs; but rather bear-up, and aſſiſt toward their Own Deliverance. Upon theſe Words, they took up a Reſolution becoming the Occaſion. There fell out, juſt upon this, an unlucky Accident by the overturning of a Wagon, which put his Mother in Extreme Danger of her Life. This Diſaſter made ſuch an Impreſſion upon Herod, partly out of a Filial Tenderneſs for his Mother, and in part for fear of being overtaken by the Advantage of this Stop, that he had certainly caſt himſelf upon the Point of his Own Sword, if his Friends about him had not laid hold of him, and Prevented it. For this, they told him, would have been the Sacrificing of his Friends to the Fury of his Enemies; Neither was it the part of a brave Man to Indulge his own Particular to the Damage of the Publique. He was, in fine, betwixt Force and Shame, brought to better Reaſon; and thereupon, betook himſelf immediately to the Care of his Mother, by all Manner of Good Offices that the Place and the Time would bear, proſecuting his Journy to the Caſtle of Maſſada with all the ſpeed he could; the Parthians preſſing upon him in his Paſſage, with whom he had many Skirmiſhes, but ſtill got the Better of it. Nay the very Jews were upon the Purſuit of him too; and coming-up with him when he was gotten a matter of Threeſcore Furlongs in his Way from Jeruſalem, they formally Attacqu'd him, but were beaten back, and put to the Rout: and notwithſtanding this Hurry and Confuſion, the Fight was Manag'd on Herod's part with all Exactneſs of Order and Diſcipline. When he came afterward to be King of Judæa, he Erected a Famous Palace upon that ſpot of Ground where he obtain'd this Victory, and built a Village near the Place, which he called by the Name of Herodium. Coming afterwards to Reſa in Idumæa, he was met by his Brother Joſeph, and they two laid their Heads together, how they might Eaſe themſelves of that vaſt Multitude of Uſeleſs and Superfluous People that they had in their Train, over and above their Liſted Troups. The Caſtle of Maſſada that they Pitch'd upon for their Retreat, was too Little for the Whole Body: So that they Diſmiſs'd a Matter of Nine Thouſand of their People to provide the beſt they could for themſelves up and down in Idumæa, with a Viaticum for their Entertainment, till they could find ſome Quarter to ſettle in. As for thoſe that were fit for Action, and his Near Relations, Herod took Them along with him into the Caſtle, where he diſpos'd of the Women and their Families to the Number of about Eight Hundred Perſons; and ſo leaving them a Competent Proviſion of Meal, Water, and all other Neceſſaries, he Haſten'd away to Petra, the Capital City of Arabia.

Herod himſelf goes to Petra.

By Break of Day the Parthians made Spoil of all that Herod had left in Jeruſalem, as well in the City as the Palace, ſaving only Three Hundred Talents in Caſh, of Hyrcanus's, which they left behind them Untouch'd, and divers Conſiderable pieces of Herod's too, beſide What Goods and Treaſure he had Tranſported beforehand into Idumæa, to be out of Harms-way. And the Parthians were not Content neither with the Wealth and Plunder of the City, without Depopulating the Country alſo; beſide the laying of Mariſſa, a place of Great Riches and Strength, in Rubbiſh.

Jeruſalem Beſieged.

Mariſſa demoliſh'd.

Antigonus being now put into the Poſſeſſion of the Government by the King of Parthia, Hyrcanus and Phaſael were deliver'd-up to him in Bonds. But the 'ſcape of the Women was yet a Great Diſappointment to him; for the Parthians were by Contract to receive the Women with the Mony. Hyrcanus being at this time a Priſoner, Antigonus order'd both his Ears to be cut-off, deſigning by That Maim to put him into a Legal Incapacity for the Honour of the Pontificat: Not knowing but that a Popular Faction ſome time or other, in a Freak, might otherwiſe reſtore him to the Government.

Antigonus put in poſſeſſion of the Government.

Hyrcanus and Phaſael deliver'd-up to him in Bonds.

Hyrcanus's Ears cut-off by the Order of Antigonus.

But there was nothing Greater in this extraordinary Juncture, then the Generous Magnanimity of Phaſael; who, when he found that he was certainly to die, was not ſo much troubled at the Death it ſelf, as at the Reproachful Circumſtances of lying at the Will and Pleaſure of an Inſulting Enemy. Finding himſelf in this Extremity, and his Hands ſo Manacled, that there was no Execution to be done that way, he beat out his Brains againſt a Stone-Wall; accounting it much more Honourable to act that Violence upon himſelf, then to ſuffer the ſame thing by the Hand of another. Some will have it that the Contuſion was not Mortal, and that the Surgeons appointed by Antigonus, under pretence of Aſſiſting him, were in truth to Diſpatch him; and that they dreſs'd the Wound with Poyſons inſtead of Remedies. He liv'd long enough however, to underſtand that his Brother Herod was at that time Safe, and out of the Hands of his Adverſaries, which made his Death Welcome and Eaſy to him, in the Satisfaction of leaving one behind him, that would Avenge his Bloud upon the Heads of his Adversaries.

The Greatness of Herod's Mind.

Herod, after all this, was so far from sinking, either in his Courage, or in his Presence of Mind, though surrounded with almost Insuperable Misfortunes, that his Resolution, and his Sense of things, seemed rather the Stronger, and the Sharper, for the Difficulties he had to Encounter. His First Application was to Malchus the King of Arabia, to borrow a Sum of Mony of him now in his Distress, either upon Credit and Consideration, or else upon the Score of Humanity and Bounty; not doubting of a Fair and Friendly Return from a Prince that was already Indebted to him for many Signal Obligations. Now he had heard nothing as yet of the Death of his Brother; and his Present Bus'ness was to provide himself with Three Hundred Talents for his Immediate Ransom, taking a Son of Phasael's, of about Seven Years Old, along with him, as a Pawn to the Arabians for the Security of their Mony. Upon this point of Time, there came Messengers from Malchus with Orders to Herod to depart the Country, for the Parthians were absolutely against the Receiving of him. His Answer was, that he did not come to be either a Trouble, or a Charge to any Body, but only to Treat about some Important Affairs of his own. The Coursness of this Usage was look'd upon to be only a Trick of some of the Great Ones, to avoid the Payment of a Just Debt, and to Cozen Herod of the Treasure that Antipater had deposited in their Hands.

Herod applies himself to Malchus King of Arabia.

Herod Order'd to depart the Country.

Herod, upon bethinking himself, found it his Best Course to be gone, how unsatisfy'd soever with the Indignities they had put upon him: So away he went toward Ægypt, taking a certain Temple in his way, where he had left several of his Company. He was told next day at Rhynocura of the Death of his Brother. Malchus was by this time become sensible of his Ingratitude, and hasten'd all he could after Herod, to make him some amends, but could not overtake him; for he was gone a great way before toward Pelusium; and when he came thither, the Ship that was bound for Alexandria, would not take him-in: Whereupon he Discours'd the Magistrates of the Place, who, out of a Reverence to the Dignity of his Former Character, conducted him with Great Respect into the City, where he was generously Entertained by Cleopatra, and not without earnest Invitations to make a longer Stay there: but his Heart was so set upon going to Rome, that neither Cleopatra's Entreaties, nor the Difficulties of a Winter-Voyage, nor the general Talk of Troubles at that time in Italy, nor all this together, was sufficient to divert him from his Purpose.

Herod goes away for Ægypt.

Herod takes a Passage for Rome.

He went a-board, in fine, for Pamphylia, and after so Terrible a Tempest that the Mariners were forc'd to cast their Goods and Baggage over-board, to save their Vessel; with much ado at last he got safe to Rhodes, where he had the Good hap to meet with Sappinas and Ptolemey. He found the Town so Miserably Haras's'd by the War with Cassius, that he Contributed out of the small Remainder of his Fortune, more then in truth he could well spare, toward the Repair of the Ruins. Here he took Shipping, with his Friends for Italy, taking Brundusium in his way, and from thence to Rome; where he was no sooner Arriv'd, but he gave Anthony an Account of all his Adventures in Judæa; the Seizure, and the Murder of his Brother Phasael by the Parthians; Hyrcanus at that time a Prisoner, and a Contract of a Thousand Talents, and Five Hundred Women to be Pick'd and Chosen out of his own Family, to be made good to the Parthians upon the Advancing of Antigonus to the Government. As for the Women, says he to Anthony, I made a hard shift to get them away by Night out of all Danger for the present into a Place where they are since Besieged, and in hourly Expectation of falling into the Hands of the Enemy. This is the Truth of the Matter; and I have now broken thorough all Hardships and Hazzards, both at Sea and at Land, to lay the State of our Affairs before you, and to Implore your Assistance and Support.

Herod in Great Favour with Augustus and Anthony; chosen King of Judæa; and conducted by Anthony and Cæsar to the Capitol. Antigonus presses hard upon Massada. Ventidius squeezes Mony out of him.

THE sad Story of Herod's Adventures gave Anthony a Compassionate Tenderness for him; and not without Just Reflexions neither, how soon it might come to be his own Case, considering the Power and Unsteadiness of Fortune in Raising up, and Casting down. He call'd to mind also the Good Offices he had formerly received from Antipater, Herod's Father, and the Ancient Friendship that had pass'd betwixt them; them; not forgetting, at the ſame time, the Sum of Mony he was to have, upon his Advancing Herod to be King, as he had before made him a Tetrach. This was all in Herod's Favour; but the Thing that ſtruck the main ſtroke at laſt, was the Averſion he had for Antigonus, whom he look'd upon as a Buſy, Turbulent Spirit, and a Profeſs'd Enemy to Rome: So that even out of a Spite to Antigonus, he Reſolved to Befriend Herod all he could. Auguſtus went Hand in Hand alſo with Anthony in the Promoting of Herod's Pretenſion and Requeſt; partly upon the Score of Acknowledgment for Former Services, and partly for Old Acquaintance-ſake betwixt the Two Families; for his Father and Antipater had been Fellow-Soldiers in Ægypt together: over and above the Deſire he had to Gratify Anthony himſelf, in the Perſon of his Friend. The Matter was ſoon after brought before the Senate, where Meſſala and Atratenus preſented Herod with a ſingular Recommendation of him to their Kindneſs and Eſteem, upon the Account, both of his own, and of his Father's Services and Good Affections to the State of Rome; reproaching Antigonus on the other ſide, as a Publique Enemy, not only for paſt Miſdemeanours, but for his late Acceptance of the Government from the Hands of the Parthians, in Contempt of the Romans. When this Harangue had put the Senate in a Heat, Anthony laid hold of the Occaſion, and gave his Opinion, that conſidering the State of the Preſent War with the Parthians, they could not do better then to Conſtitute Herod King of Judæa; and the Motion paſs'd the Aſſembly, without any Oppoſition. The Honour was Illuſtrious in it ſelf; Herod's Obligation to Anthony in the Procuring of it, was much the more valuable for being Conferr'd upon him, not only beyond his Hope and Expectation, but likewiſe beſide the Method and Meaſure of ordinary Practice; for the Romans did not uſe to beſtow Royal Dignities, but upon the Branches of Royal Families. Neither did his very Ambition Aſpire to any thing more then to beg it for Alexander the Brother of Mariamne; the Nephew of Ariſtobulus by the Father's ſide, and of Hyrcanus by the Mother's; whom he cauſed afterward to be put to Death, as will be ſeen in its proper Place. This Great Work was but ſeven days a-doing, and Herod Diſpatch'd away out of Italy with his Royal Commiſſion.

Auguſtus and Anthony are Herod's Friends.

Herod choſen King of Judæa by the Senate without oppoſition upon the Motion of Anthony.

Upon the breaking-up of the Senate, Anthony and Cæſar took Herod out betwixt them, accompany'd with the Conſuls and the Senators, who conducted him to the Capitol, where they were to Sacrifice in Form, and to depoſite the Senatus-Conſulta or their Decrees. Anthony Gratulated the New King upon his Acceſſion to his Authority with a moſt Magnificent Treat. Upon the Firſt Day of his Reign, in the Olympiad One Hundred Eighty Four: C. Domitius Calvinus, (now the Second time) and C. Aſinius Pollio, Conſuls.

In this Interim of Herod's Abſence, Antigonus preſs'd hard upon his Friends in the Caſtle of Maſſada, where they had Plenty of all ſorts of Proviſions; ſave only of Water, which they wanted to ſuch a Degree, that Joſeph, with a Party of Two Hundred Choice-Men, had taken a Reſolution to ſally out of the Town, and Attempt the Forcing their Way thorough the Enemy to get to the Arabians; being well informed that Malchus had heartily Repented himſelf of the Inhoſpitality of his late Behaviour toward Herod: But in this nick of time there fell ſo Prodigious a Shower of Rain, that it fill'd all their Ciſterns, and Receptacles for Water; and upon this Supply, they ſtood to their Defence without any further Thoughts of quitting the Place. The Wonderful Providence of this Relief animated the Beſieged to that Degree, that not a Day or a Night paſs'd without a Succeſsful Sally upon the Enemy.

Antigonus preſſes hard upon Maſſada in Herod's Abſence.

While this was a-doing, Ventidius, a Roman General, drove the Parthians out of Syria, and went afterward into Judæa, under pretence of a Deſign to help Joſeph, but in truth to ſqueeze Mony out of Antigonus; which he did abundantly upon drawing his Troups toward Jeruſalem: and having gain'd his Point, he carry'd the Greater part of them off again; leaving only a ſmall Remainder under the Command of Silo, for the better Colour of the Cheat; for Antigonus was forced to come to a Compoſition with him too, for fear he might be Troubleſome before the Arrival of the Parthians, whom he expected to come-up to his Succour.

HEROD was now come back again out of Italy, as far as Ptolemais, with a conſiderable Body, both of Auxiliaries, and of his own People, and upon his March by the Way of Galilee toward Antigonus. Silo and Ventidius had Orders brought them alſo from Anthony by Gellius, to aſſiſt Herod in the taking Poſſeſſion of his Kingdom. But ſo it fell out, that Ventidius was at that time taken-up in Quieting the Tumults, that an Incurſion of the Parthians had raiſed in ſeveral of the Cities: But Silo was in Judæa, and a Penſioner to Antigonus. Herod's Army gather'd however in the Rolling, and encreaſed mightily upon the March. Galilee was in a Manner wholly for him. The Thing he was the moſt Intent upon in the Firſt place, was the Raiſing of the Siege of Maſſada, to ſet his Friends and Relations at Liberty, that were Coopt-up there. But Joppa was a Block in his Way, and would be ſuch a Check upon him in his Advance to Jeruſalem, that there was no leaving ſo ſtrong a Place behind him. Silo, upon this, March'd off; and the Jews plying him cloſe in the Rear, Herod charged-in upon them with a ſmall Party; Routed them, and brought off Silo when he was juſt falling into their Hands. Herod, after this, made himſelf Maſter of Joppa, and ſo immediately away to the Relief of his Friends in Maſſada, where the People came over to him, in abundance; ſome for his Father's ſake; others for his Own; ſome again out of a Senſe of the Obligations they had to both; but the Generality, out of the Hope they had to Ingratiate themſelves with the new King. Antigonus, in the mean time, laid ſeveral Ambuſhes and Traps for him in his way, though with little Effect; for Herod, ſo ſoon as ever he had Rais'd the Siege of Maſſada; Relieved his Friends, and taking the Caſtle of Reſa, he advanced directly toward Jeruſalem with Silo's Troups, and a Great Number of Citizens that ſtood in awe of his Power, to attend him. He Encamped with his Army upon the Weſt Quarter of the Town, where the Defendants gall'd him all that was poſſible with Arrows, Darts, and ſtrong Salleys: Herod, in the mean while, making Proclamation in Form, by his Herald from Place to Place round the Walls of the Town, that he had no other End in that Enterprize then the Publique Good, and the Welfare of the City; Nay, that he was ſo far from Contriving, or Deſigning them any Miſchief, that he was ready to Grant them an Indemnity and Oblivion, without Exception to any Perſon whatſoever, let the Crime or Indignity have been never ſo Spiteful and Notorious. Antigonus made anſwer, (addreſſing himſelf to Silo, and to the Roman Soldiers,) that it was a very Unjuſt, and an Unreaſonable Thing to pretend the ſetting of Herod upon the Throne; a Private Man, and an Idumæan: That is to ſay, but Half a Jew, neither; which was a Practice directly againſt the Law and Right of Succeſſion that was cuſtomary among them. If they took any Offence at his receiving the Crown from the Hands of the Parthians; and for that Reaſon thought fit to Depoſe him from the Dignity, there were Others, he told them, of the Royal and Sacerdotal Line, and Perſons that had deſerved every jot as well from the Romans, and had as Fair a Title to the Government; and it would be Great Iniquity to Deprive them of it. This Conteſt betwixt Herod and Antigonus grew ſo Hot, that they came at laſt to Angry and Foul Words: Inſomuch that Antigonus commanded his Men to force the Enemy off from the Walls; and they ply'd them ſo hard with their Darts and Arrows, that they were driven to Retire. It was no longer any Doubt after this, but that Silo was Corrupted; for he had ſo Tamper'd divers of his Familiar Aquaintance among the the Soldiers, that they brake out into Clamours, for Monys and Proviſions; and into Outcries for more Commodious Winter-Quarters: for Antigonus, they ſaid, had made ſuch Havock up and down in the Country thereabouts, that there was no living upon it. This Mutinous Extravagance put the Army into ſuch a Diſtemper, that the Soldiers were ready to lay down their Arms and be gone; but Herod, on the other Hand, made uſe of the Authority of Cæſar, Anthony, and the Senate, by whoſe Commiſſion he was now come thither, and Encourag'd both Officers and Soldiers to ſtand their Ground, and maintain their Station; and to depend upon him, that they ſhould want nothing that they themſelves could deſire for their Entertainment and Satisfaction. Immediately upon this, he ſent out his Commiſſaries to provide them all Neceſſaries, and left Silo no further Pretence of Murmur, or Complaint; for they were preſently ſupply'd with vaſt Quantities of Proviſions beyond Imagination: Herod having order'd his Friends at Samaria to lay up Stores of Corn, Wine, Oyl, Cattel, and all other Neceſſaries at Jericho, and from thence to ſupply the Army. Antigonus took the Matter right, and preſently diſpatch'd away Parties up and down the Fields and the Paſſes, to Way-lay, and Intercept the Forages; who according to their Orders, diſpos'd of their Detachments about Jericho, and the Crags of the Mountains, where they were very careful to Watch the Convoys. Herod, on the other ſide, was as careful on his part, and with Ten Companies; One half, Romans, the other, Jews; together with a Body of Mercenaries, and ſome few Troups of Horſe, he Marched ſtreight forward to Jericho, where he found the Town Abandon'd; and Five Hundred of the Inhabitants, with their Families, fled to the Mountains; which he Took, and Diſcharg'd again. The Romans Rifled the City, and the Booty, in Mony, Jewels, and other Precious Goods and Furniture, amounted to an Ineſtimable Value. The King left a Gariſon in the Place, and went his Way back again; Aſſigning his Army their Quarters in his new Conqueſts, as Idumæa, Galilee and Samaria; Antigonus prevailing alſo with Silo, by the Force of Mony, that part of the Roman Army might be Quarter'd in Lydda; which was done to make a Friend of Anthony. So that the Romans were now at Eaſe, and in both Peace and Plenty.

But Herod, that could not lie Idle, ſent away at this time his Brother Joſeph into Idumæa, with a Thouſand Foot, and Four Hundred Horſe, and went himſelf to Samaria, where he provided for his Mother, and the reſt of his Kindred that he brought from Maſſada, and ſo March'd for Galilee to take-in ſome Gariſons, which were then in the Poſſeſſion of Antigonus: coming-up to Sephoris in a Deep Snow, he found the Place wholly abandon'd, and Proviſions in it of all ſorts, and in Great Plenty. The Country thereabouts not far from Arbela, being Vexatiouſly Infeſted with Robbers, that from the Faſtneſſes of the Mountains terribly Annoy'd the Neighbourhood, Herod commanded out a Squadron of Horſe, and Three Companies of Foot, to Ferret them out of their Hiding Places. Some Forty Days after this Detachment, he Detachment, he March'd againſt them with his whole Army: whereupon they drewout, and made ſo brave a Charge upon him, that Herod's Left-Wing gave way; till, upon a Victorious Reinforcement, with Herod himſelf in the Head of it, he brought his own Men on again, and put their Adverſaries to a Total Rout, purſuing the Victory as far as the River Jordan. This Overthrow brought all Galilee over to Herod in time, ſaving only thoſe that Shelter'd themſelves in the Receſſes of the Mountains. The Work being now over, Herod order'd the Common Soldiers a Hundred and Fifty Drachma's a Man for a Reward, and the Officers more in Proportion; and after this Donative, they were all Diſmiſs'd to their Winter-Stations. Silo and his Officers, that had been hitherto Billetted upon Antigonus, gave Herod to Underſtand, that he did not only refuſe to allow them more then One Months Entertainment, but ſent likewiſe up and down to the Neighbours everywhere thereabouts, to be gone with what they had up to the Mountains, and to clear the Country of all manner of Neceſſaries for Life, to ſtarve the Romans out of their Quarters: But Herod prevented this Miſchief by committing the Charge of providing for the Army to his Younger Brother Pheroras, with Orders alſo to repair the Fort of Alexandrion, which lay then in Ruins; in both which Commiſſions he acquitted himſelf Effectually, and much to his Reputation.

Anthony was now at Athens, and Ventidius in Syria, where he order'd Silo to joyn him with the Auxiliary Troups of the Parthians, but ſtill to aſſiſt Herod in the Firſt place, if there ſhould be Occaſion. Herod however ſent away Silo and his People to Ventidius, and Marched himſelf againſt the Rovers that lay lurking in their Hiding Holes up and down the Hills. The Rocks were ſo Steep and Craggy, and the Paſſes ſo Streight, that it was almoſt Impoſſible to come at them; and theſe Caves ſerv'd them and their Families, both for their Retreat and their Habitations. The King, upon the View of the Place, finding that there was no Good to be done by Scaling from from below, or by Creeping, or Stealing down upon them from Above, made uſe of this Invention. He cauſed ſeveral Cheſts to be Fram'd, and ſo let down by a Machine, with Iron-Chains, from the Top of the Hills, and theſe Caſes to be fill'd with Soldiers, Lances, Darts, Hooks, and other Arms, either by Attacque to deſtroy them in their Dens, or to draw them out, and caſt them down Headlong, as the caſe ſhould Require. This was a Bold, and almoſt a Deſperate Experiment, conſidering the Horid Depth of the Precipice; beſide that they were Victuall'd, and Provided in their Cells with all Manner of Neceſſaries. One of theſe Boxes being let down juſt upon the Entrance into a Cavern, and not a Man of them daring to ſhew his Head out of the Vault, a Soldier ſtarted-up with his Sword and Buckler, and catching hold with both Hands, of the Chain that Upheld the Coffer, he ſlipt down into the Cavity of the Rock, out of an Impatience to wait any longer for their coming out. In one of theſe Receſſes, he killed ſeveral with his Darts, and Pluck'd others out with his Hooks, where he met with any Reſiſtance, and threw them down the Cliffs: ſome at a further Diſtance he Diſpatch'd with his Lance, and then betook himſelf to his Cheſt again. The Cries of the Wounded Frighted the reſt to the laſt degree of Deſperation; but Night coming-on put a ſtop to the Execution. The King, in the mean while, having offer'd an Indemnity to all that would lay down their Arms, and come-in to him, they ſubmitted in Great Numbers, and laid hold of that Act of Grace.

An Act of Grace Offer'd, which brings a Great many over.

On the Day following, they Ply'd the Attacque in the ſame Manner as before; only their Bodies were more Expos'd, and putting Fire to the Combuſtible Matter they had in the Caves, they ſet all in a Flame, and ſmother'd their Adverſaries in their Holes. There was among the reſt an Old Man, with his Wife and Seven Sons, begging leave of him in that Hopeleſs Extremity, to deliver-up themſelves to the Enemy: The Man Planting himſelf at the Mouth of the Cavern, ſtabb'd them one after another, every Creature of them as they Attempted to paſs by him, and the Woman laſt of all; caſting their Bodies down the Precipice, and Himſelf after them; chuſing rather to loſe his Life then his Liberty, but not without Scandalous Reflections upon Herod for the Meanneſs of his Extraction, though this Prince at the ſame time gave him all the Aſſurances of Clemency, and Mercy, that could be given by Signs and Geſtures at a Diſtance, if he would but have accepted of the Pardon. This was the End, in ſhort, of this War betwixt Herod and theſe Rovers.

An Old Man kills Himſelf, his Wife, and ſeven Children, rather then accept of it.

The End of the War with the Rovers.

This Adventure being now over, and the Government of that Quarter given to Ptolemy, Herod marched away with Six Hundred Horſe and Three Thouſand Foot into Samaria, with a Deſign to bring Antigonus to a Deciſive Battle; but Ptolemy's Command prov'd Fatal to him, for he was ſet upon and ſlain by a Party of thoſe People that had formerly put Galilee in Diſorder. Upon the Committing of this Outrage, they betook themſelves to the Bogs, Crags, and other Places of Difficult Acceſs, for Refuge, and from thence they Robb'd and Ravag'd the Whole Country, as they ſaw their Opportunity: But Herod, at his coming back, made them pay dear for their Purchaſe; for ſome he kill'd; Others he forced out of their ſtrong Holds, and put to the Torture; Demoliſhing all their Caſtles and Fortifications; and when he had rid his Hands of the moſt conſiderable of his Enemies, he ſet a Time of a Hundred Talents upon the Cities that were ſuſpected to Favour them.

The Government is left to Ptolemy, and Herod marches for Samaria. Ptolemy ſlain by a Party of High-way-men.

The Parthians having by this time received a Great Overthrow, with the Loſs of their King Pacorus in the Battle Ventidius, according to his Inſtructions and Orders from Anthony, ſent away Machæras to Herod with an Enforcement of Two Legions, and a Thouſand Horſe: who having been dealt withal, and Tamper'd by Antigonus, was abſolutely for going to him, under a Pretext of giving Intelligence, and making Diſcoveries; Notwithſtanding that Herod was utterly againſt it, and ſo he went his way; but finding upon his Approach, that Antigonus was ſo far from Truſting him, or Admitting him, that he Order'd his People to keep him off with Slings and Darts, this gave him ſufficiently to underſtand that Herod was in the Right when he diſſuaded him, and he himſelf in a Great miſtake for not complying with his Advice. Hereupon he returned to the City Emmaus, in a furious Rage, putting all the Jews to the Sword that he found in the way, without Diſtinction of either Friend or Foe. Herod was ſo irritated at this Barbarous way of Proceeding, that he went away preſently to Samaria, with a Reſolution to inform Anthony of this Outrage, and give him to underſtand that he was in Condition good enough himſelf to deal with Antigonus without need of any ſuch Aſſiſtants as did more Miſchief to their Own Party, then to the Enemy. As he was going forward upon this Errand, Machæras Poſted after him, and overtook him upon the way, preſſing him Earneſtly either to put a ſtop to his Journey, or at leaſt to leave Joſeph his Brother behind, for them Two to carry-on the War together againſt Antigonus. Herod, upon his Importunity, Granted him his Requeſt,

He leaves the Command of the Army to his Brother Joſeph.

Matters being thus ſettled, he Marched away Immediately with an Auxiliary Body of Horſe and Foot to joyn Anthony, who was at that time before Samoſata upon the River Euphrates. At his coming to Antioch, he found Great Numbers of People that would fain have gone-in to Anthony, if they could have got to him; but the Ways were ſo beſet with Troups of Bloudy Barbarians, that there would have been no coming at him, if Herod had not put himſelf in the Head of them, and undertaken both for their Conduct and Protection: So that they Proſecuted their March, and when they were advanced within Two-days Journy of Samoſata, they fell into an Ambuſh of the Enemies Horſe that lay cloſe behind the Buſhes upon the Entrance into the Champian, to prevent any Succours from going that way to Anthony. They ſuffer'd the Front to paſs forward on to the Plain, without either Diſcovery or Interruption; but upon Herod's coming-up with the Rear, they fell Furiouſly upon him with a Matter of Five Hundred Horſe, and brake thorough the Firſt Rank: But the King preſſing violently upon them with his Guards, beat them from their Ground; Rally'd his own ſcatter'd Troups, and follow'd the Execution till he made himſelf Maſter of the Booty they had Taken, in Priſoners, Horſes, Mules, Carriages, and all the Baggage, which was very Conſiderable: And this being done, Herod continu'd his Journy to Anthony; but not without other Encounters upon the Way with Troups of Barbarians that ſally'd out of the Woods and Thickets upon him in his Further Progreſs; but ſtill Defeating, and cutting them to pieces upon every Attempt; till in the End, the Way was ſafe and open to him without any Difficulty or Hazzard; his People Adoring him as their Protector and Preſerver.

Several Encounters by the Way.

Anthony having heard of his Exploits upon the Barbarians, and how Bravely he had accquitted himſelf upon ſeveral Other Occaſions, ſent out the Flower of his Troups to Receive him upon his Approach to the Town, with all Honour and Reſpect Imaginable, both for his Perſon and his Services: Embracing him upon his Arrival with Infinite Joy, Affection, Friendlineſs, and Eſteem; Celebrating and Admiring him for his Virtue; and in fine, Treating him with a Dignity anſwerable to the Royal Character that he himſelf had conferred upon him. In a ſhort time after this, Antigonus deliver'd up the Place, and in ſo doing put an End to the War. Anthony gave the Government of the Province, and the Command of the Army to Soſius, with Orders to aſſiſt Herod upon all Occaſions; and ſo went himſelf into Ægypt. Soſius hereupon ſent away Two Legions with the King toward Judæa, for the Guard of his Perſon, and marched after them Himſelf with the reſt of his Army.

Anthony receives Herod with Infinite Honour and Reſpect.

While theſe Things were a-doing, Joſeph, in the Abſence of his Brother, was ſlain in Judæa for want of obſerving Herod's Order when he went to Anthony. He march'd out toward Jericho with his own Troups, and Five Companies of Machæras, with a Deſign to get-in the Harveſt, and he Encamped upon the Mountains. Now the Romans with him being but Raw, and Undiſciplin'd Soldiers, and the Greater part of them only New-Rais'd Men out of Syria, the Enemy took Advantage, both of the Place where he was Poſted, and the Inexperience of the Men they had to do withal: So that falling upon them, they Surpriz'd and Routed them; entirely deſtroying Six Companies, and cutting Joſeph to pieces, fighting Manfully in the Head of them. Antigonus being Maſter of the Field, and finding Joſeph among the Dead Bodies, cauſed his Head to be cut off, and his Brother Pheroras redeem'd it at Fifty Talents. This Rout was follow'd with the Revolt of Galilee, and with drowning as many of Herod's Friends as they could lay hold of in the Lake: beſide divers Seditious Commotions in Judæa: Machæras in the mean while Fortifying the Caſtle of Gath.

The ſad Story of theſe Calamities, one upon the Neck of another, was brought to Herod at a place call'd Daphne, the Suburbs of Antioch; and it was the leſs ſurprizing to him for ſome Foreboding Dreams he had a little before, which manifeſtly pointed at the Death of his Brother. He went from thence in all haſte for Mount Libanus, and taking Eight Hundred Men of the Place along with him, and a Roman Legion, he advanced to Ptolemais: and ſo paſſing forward by Night through the Country of Galilee, he was ſet upon by the Way, but beat the Enemy back into the Caſtle they came out of the day before; immediately Inveſting the Place, and Diſpoſing his Troups Early next Morning for an Attacque; but there fell in that very Nick of time ſo violent a Tempeſt, that he was forc'd to draw-off into ſome of the Neighbour Villages for Shelter. Juſt as this hapned, comes another Legion to Herod from Anthony; which Enforcement put the Garriſon in ſuch a Fright that they quitted the Place, and ſtole away in the Dark of the Night. Herod thought the Time long till he had Avenged the Bloud of his Brother, and ſo made all the Haſte he could to Jericho, rico, where he Treated with Great Magnificence all the Princes of the Place upon his Arrival. When Supper was juſt over, and the Company gone, Herod retir'd into his Own Apartment, without leaving ſo much as one Creature in the Eating Room. So ſoon as ever the Place was Empty, the Roof fell flat to the Ground into the Parlour, without any further Miſchief; which was look'd upon as a Singular Providence that watched over Herod in the Delivery of him from ſo Eminent a Danger.

Herod preſerved at Jericho by a ſtrange Providence.

The Enemy falling down from the Mountains next Day upon the Romans, with a Body of Six Thouſand Men, put them into a downright Conſternation; Beating back the Forlorn, and Over-running all before them, even to the Wounding of Herod himſelf, in the Side, with an Arrow. Antigonus, at this time, out of an Oſtentation as if he had Men to Spare, ſent Pappus away to Samaria with ſome Troups under his Command; and while he and Machæras were deſigning upon one another, Herod got Poſſeſſion of Five Towns, put Two Thouſand Men to the Sword that were there in Gariſon, and leaving them all in Aſhes, went back to look after Pappus, who was then Encamped at a place called Iſanas, where he was joyn'd with Great Numbers that came-over to him from Jericho and Judæa; but Herod perceiving that the Enemy had the Heart yet to Puſh it to a Battle, put it immediately upon that Iſſue, and gave them a Total Rout, doing Execution upon them in revenge of his Brother's Death in the very Town they fled to for Sanctuary. The Houſes were preſently crouded with Soldiers from Top to Bottom, ſome in one Place, ſome in Another; but upon taking off the Roofs, what with Stones and other Weapons from above, they were all laid open to an Univerſal Slaughter. And after all this, the moſt Diſmal and Horrid part of the Spectacle, was the Piles of the Dead Bodies that lay in Heaps up and down in the Chambers; which was the only Thing that ſunk their Hearts into a Deſpair beyond all Recovery.

Pappus defeated by Herod.

The Miſerable Remainder of their Broken Troups fled in ſuch Diſorder, and in ſuch Shoals, that if it had not been for a Furious Tempeſt at that very time, the Victors had march'd directly up to Jeruſalem in that Heat, and put an End to the War. For Antigonus was already upon the Point of Reſolving to Abandon the City. It was now late in the Evening, and Herod having Order'd his Soldiers to go to Supper, retired into his Chamber to Refreſh himſelf after the Fatigue of the Battle; and upon this Occaſion, he had a Second Deliverance no leſs Providential then the Former. For as he was there in the Bath, Stark-naked, and only one Boy to wait upon him, out ſtarted Three Soldiers with Swords in their Hands, and Croſſing the Room in haſte, Ruſh'd out at the Door. Now theſe were People that had hid themſelves in the Houſe it ſeems, for fear of the Enemy in the Heat of the Outrage; and ſo ſcamper'd away in a Fright, to ſave themſelves, without ever Dreaming of any Violence upon the King, whom they might Eaſily have Deſtroy'd. The Body of Pappus being found among the ſlain, Herod the next Day order'd his Head to be ſtruck-off, and ſo ſent it to Pheroras, as a kind of Conſolatory Revenge for his Brother Joſeph, whom Pappus put to Death with his own Hand.

Herod ſurpriſed in the Bath.

The Bleud of Pappus that kill'd Joſeph, ſent to Joſeph's Brother.

So ſoon as the Confuſion of this Hurry was over, Herod march'd away with his Army, and Encamped near Jeruſalem, taking up his Quarter upon the Temple-ſide of the Town, as Pompey had done long before him, and as the Place that lay faireſt for an Attacque. When he had gotten his Pioneers, and all Neceſſary Materials about him, and given his Orders for the Caſting-up of Three Trenches, and Bulwarks about the Place, and the Erecting of ſuch and ſuch Towers, away he went himſelf to Samaria to Conſummate his Marriage with Mariamne, the Daughter of Alexander, and the Grand-Child of Ariſtobulus, who had been for ſome time Contracted as we have ſaid before, leaving Officers behind him in his Abſence to carry-on the Siege.

WHen the Marriage-Solemnity was over, Soſius ſent away his Troups before him, being a Conſiderable Body of Horſe and Foot, and ſoon after follow'd them himſelf by the way of Phœnicia. The King returned alſo from Samaria with an Enforcement of about Thirty Thouſand Men: which being joyn'd, the whole Army drew together toward the Walls upon the North-Quarter of the Town, to the Number of Eleven Eleven Regiments of Foot, and Six Thouſand Horſe, over and above the Auxiliaries they brought from Syria. The Two Generals were Soſius, and Herod; the Former Employ'd by Anthony, as an Aſſiſtant; the other Acting upon his own Account, in a Proſpect of ſettling himſelf in poſſeſſion of the Kingdom that the Senate had given him upon the Overthrow of Antigonus, the Profeſs'd Enemy of Rome.

Soſius and Herod, Generals at the Siege of Jeruſalem.

The Jews within were Bold, and Numerous; for the whole Nation of them in Effect was gotten into the Town, where they made a very Obſtinate Defence; Animating their Companions with Emphatical Outcries of THE TEMPLE OF THE LORD; THE TEMPLE OF THE LORD; ſtill at every turn, by way of Exultation: and ſuch Preſages of Victory by God's Bleſſing upon their Cauſe, as ſeemed Prophetically to Foretel their Deliverance. Neither were they wanting all this while in their Endeavours, by frequent Excurſions, and Ravaging the Country, to Streighten, and Diſtreſs the Beſiegers: For they ſwept it ſo Bare that there was hardly any thing left for Man or Beaſt to Live upon. But Herod quickly put a ſtop to this Inconvenience, partly by the Ambuſhes he laid up and down to Entrap the Pillagers, and partly by the Commiſſaries and Convoys he employ'd far and near, for the Supply of the Camp. The Seaſon was ſo Fair and Favourable, and ſo many Hands at Work, that the Pioneers had by this time finiſh'd the Approaches, and the Beſiegers were now advanced to the Battery, leaving nothing unattempted for the Gaining of their Point. The Beſieged, on the other hand, made a Stout Reſiſtance; oppoſing Stratagem to Stratagem, and by one Invention Diſappointing another. They made a great many Deſperate Sallies, and ſet Fire to divers of the Enemy's Works, as well thoſe that were Perfected, as thoſe that were only Begun; and their Courage, when they came to Handy-ſtrokes, was nothing Inferiour to that of the Romans, though in the Matter of Military Knowledge and Experience, the Romans in truth had the Advantage of them. As faſt as one Wall was thrown down, the Defendants ſupply'd it with a Retrenchment that ſerv'd for another. They Counterwrought Mine againſt Mine, and met, and fought many times Under-ground in the very Work; ſtanding it out to the Laſt, their very Deſperation doing the Office of Valour. This was their Bravery in Defiance of a Formidable Enemy before the Town, and a Starving Want of Neceſſaries within the Walls; for they were now in the Sabbatical Year, when it was not Lawful for them to Till the Ground. Upon the Fortieth Day after breaking Ground, Twenty Brave Fellows mounted the Firſt Wall; and after them, a Centurion of Soſius's. The Second Wall was taken Fifteen Days after, and ſeveral Galleries about the Temple ſet a-fire, which Herod Invidiouſly imputed to Antigonus, to make him odious to the People. Upon taking the Out-Quarter of the Temple, and the Lower-Town, the Jews betook themſelves into the Middle of the One, and the Upper-Part of the Other: and for fear the Romans ſhould Interrupt them in their Daily Prayers and Sacrifices, they deſired leave of Herod by their Embaſſadors, only to bring in ſo many Beaſts as ſhould be neceſſary for that Service. Herod readily granted their Requeſt, in hope it might work ſome Good upon them: But finding his Miſtake, and that they were more and more Violent for Antigonus, he fell-on immediately with his whole Strength, and Took the City by Aſſault. The Romans were ſo Exaſperated at the Oppoſition, and the Delay; and the Herodian Jews alſo ſo Embitter'd againſt thoſe of the other Party, that they put all to to the Sword without Mercy, as well in the Streets, as in the Houſes, and without ſparing either Age or Sex: Nay the Temple it ſelf was no longer a Sanctuary to thoſe that Fled into't. Never ſo Diſmal a Spectacle for Bloud and Slaughter; and the Soldiers were Tranſported betwixt Fury and Revenge, to ſuch a Degree of Implacable Inhumanity, that though the King himſelf did all he could by his Authority and Earneſt Entreaties to put a Stop to the Butchery, there was not a Man that Heeded or Obey'd him.

The City and Temple, Taken.

A Bloudy Execution.

The Moderation of Herod.

In this Extremity, Antigonus came down from the Tower, and (below the Dignity of his Late Character) caſt himſelf at the Feet of Soſius; who was ſo far from Pitying him, that inſtead of Antigonus, he ſaluted him by the Name of Antigona, and made a Woman of him, in Contempt of ſo Effeminate a Spirit. But he did not Treat him afterwards like a Woman; for he was put in Chains, and ſecur'd under the Cuſtody of a Guard.

The Abject Submiſſion of Antigonus.

Herod brings him in Chains.

But Herod's work was not yet done neither; for he was as hard put to't afterward to keep his own Party in Order, as he he had been already to gain a Victory over his Enemies. His Mercenaries, in fine, were ſo Preſſing and Importune in Troups and Throngs to be prying into the Temple, and the very Sanctuary it ſelf, that all Herod could do by his Authority, Fair Words, Threat'nings, and Force it ſelf, was little enough to reſtrain them. And in truth, his Succeſs would have been worſe then a Defeat to him, if he ſhould have ſuffer'd the Expoſing of the Sacred and Incommunicable Myſteries of Religion, to the Pragmatical Curioſity of the Prophane Multitude.

The Army Mutinous.

The Tenderneſs of Herod.

He kept off the Soldiers alſo from Pillaging, all he could too; by Reaſoning and Expoſtulating the Matter with Soſius, laying it before him, that if they went on Killing and Spoiling at that rate, the Romans would find him the King of a Deſert, rather then of a People: and telling him that if the whole World were Offer'd him upon thoſe Terms, he would not purchaſe it at the Price of ſo much Bloud. Soſius made Anſwer, that it was a Thing of Courſe, Juſtice, and Common Practice, upon the taking of a Place by Aſſault, to allow the Soldiers the Advantage of the Booty. Herod told him, on the other ſide, that as to what concern'd the Soldiers, he would Compound himſelf for the Plunder, and Gratify them upon his Own Account abundantly to their Satisfaction, which he did accordingly; for he was in every Point as good as his Word. He was, in ſhort, ſo Generous to the Common Soldiers; ſo Bountiful, in proportion, to the Officers, and ſo Magnificent in his Preſents and Acknowledgments to Soſius, that the City was Redeem'd; and all Parties, in Concluſion, very well appay'd.

This happen'd in the Conſulate of Marcus Agrippa, and Canidius Gallus; Olympiad 185: in the Third Month, and upon the Day of a Solemn Faſt, being the very Anniverſary of their Deſtruction by Pompey; for the City was Taken upon the very Day of the Taking it [a] Seven and Twenty Years before.

Antigonus carry'd in Chains to Anthony.

Soſius, upon this, Dedicated unto God a Golden Crown, and ſo went his way from Jeruſalem, taking Antigonus his Priſoner along with him in Bonds to Anthony. Herod had a Jealouſy in his Head, that perhaps Anthony would not take away his Life; and that in caſe of his appearing at Rome, and putting-in his Claim to the Government before the Senate; Antigonus being of the Royal Blood, and himſelf but a Plebeian, Herod did not know what might come of it. Antigonus, he thought, might ſuggeſt, that though for his own part, he could not pretend to the Dignity, having been in Arms againſt the Romans; but though his own Guilt might be taken for a Sufficient Forfeiture as to himſelf, he might be yet in hope, that they would not Puniſh his Innocent Sons for the Guilty Father's ſake, but admit him into the Succeſſion. Herod found himſelf very Uneaſy under this Proſpect, and Apprehenſion, and ſo prevail'd with Anthony, for a mighty Sum of Mony under-hand, to have Antigonus Diſpatch'd out of the Way: and that being done Herod's Heart was at reſt.

Anthony Order's Antigonus to be put to Death.

The End of the Aſmonæan Family.

Thus ended the Reign of the Aſmonæan Family, after a Hundred and Twenty Six Years Poſſeſſion of the Government; a Family Illuſtrious in it ſelf for the Long Continuance of the Sacerdotal Succeſſion in it: and no leſs Famous for the Signal Services they and their Anceſtors had from time to time render'd to the Publique: But it was Diverted at laſt by an Inteſtine Broyl, as we have it upon Tradition, from our Forefathers; and the Adminiſtration was Transferr'd to Herod, the Son of Antipater, a Perſon of a Plebeian Extraction, and a Private Subject.

CHAP. I.

Pollio and Sameas, Great with Herod. A notable Prediction of Pollio's. Herod presents Anthony. Five and Forty of Antigonus's Men put to Death, and himself Beheaded at Antioch.

WE have already set forth the taking of Jerusalem by Sosius and Herod, and the making of Antigonus a Prisoner; and we are now to proceed to what follow'd upon it. So soon as Herod came to the Exercise of his Royal Authority over Judæa, he made it his Bus'ness to promote, and to provide for those of the City in the First place, that took part with him as yet while he was in the Condition but of a Private Man. But for those of the Opposite Party, hardly a Day past without a Capital Execution upon some or other of them. Pollio, the Pharisee, and his Disciple Sameas, were highly in his Favour for the Good Offices they did him, in advising the Citizens when he lay before the Town, to open the Gates and Receive him. This was that [a] Pollio that formerly foretold to Hyrcanus and the rest of the Judges, upon the Questioning of Herod for his Life; that if they Acquitted him, the Time would come, when he should as certainly take away their Lives, as they might now take away his. This Prediction was verify'd in the Event.

Pollio, the Pharisee, and his Disciple Sameas, Great with Herod.

A notable Prediction of Pollio's.

No sooner was Herod in Possession of the City, but he got together all the Royal Furniture, with the Rich Booty in Goods, Gold and Silver, that had been taken away by the Wealthy Citizens, and had it all carry'd to the Palace; out of which he made a Mighty Present to Anthony, dividing the rest among his Friends and his Favourites. He order'd also Forty Five Principal Men of Antigonus's Interest to be put to death, and a Guard set at their several Doors to wait for the bringing out of the Bodies, and to inspect whether they were Dead or not, and to take care that they carry'd out nothing else. In case of Discovering any Gold or Silver, it was all brought to the King; and in one Word, they saw no End of their Misery. They were in the Hands of a Griping, and a Necessitous Prince; and all they were worth in the World was too little to Satisfy his Avarice. They were also in their Sabbatical Year, and consequently no Harvest to supply their Wants.

45 Men of Antigonus's Party put to death.

Anthony having at this time Antigonus a Prisoner, had some Thoughts of Exposing him in Chains for the Honour of his Triumph. But when he heard that the Jews began to be Mutinous, and, out of the Aversion they had for Herod, to favour Antigonus; Anthony, without any more Ceremony, struck-off his Head at Antioch, as the Best Expedient he could think of to keep the People Quiet. Strabo of Cappadocia has a Touch upon this as follows.

Antigonus beheaded at Antioch.

Anthony, says he, brought Antigonus the King of the Jews a Prisoner to Antioch, where he caused his Head to be struck-off; the First King that ever the Romans put to this Manner of Death: But he had This to say for himself, that the Jews would never acknowledge Herod for their King, so long as Antigonus was Living. Nay so great was the Reverence and Esteem they had for their former Prince, that they were not to be wrought upon, even by Torments, to Allow Herod so much as the Name of a King: but Herod Propounded to himself by this Scandalous and Shameful Punishment, to blast the Memory, and Re- putation of the One, and to ſoften the Popular Averſion of the Multitude to the Other. Thus far goes Strabo.

We have ſpoken already of the Two Parthian Generals, Barzapharnes, and Pacorus; and of their carrying away Hyrcanus and Phaſael Priſoners: The Former having been firſt High-Prieſt, and then Prince of the Jews; the Latter, the Brother of Herod, who out of a Generous Indignation Daſh'd out his own Brains rather then he would ſubmit to the Slaviſh Infamy of an Inglorious Death. Hyrcanus being at this time in the Hands of the Parthians, News was brought him of Herod's Promotion to the Government; upon which Intelligence, he made his Court to the New King, and we are now to ſhew how he came to Obtain his Liberty, and to return.

CHAP. II.

Phraates treats Hyrcanus with Great Reſpect. Upon Herod's Promotion, Hyrcanus would needs viſit him; but his Friends oppos'd it. Herod invites Hyrcanus, and complements Phraates, Hyrcanus goes for Jeruſalem, where Herod entertains him very Generouſly. Ananus advanc'd to the Pontificat; which Alexandra takes for an Affront, and puts Cleopatra upon moving Anthony for her Son. Alexandra ſends Anthony the Pictures of Ariſtobulus and Mariamne. Anthony tells Herod, he ſhould be glad to ſee Ariſtobulus, but Herod is againſt it; Anthony being a Man of Liberty and Pleaſure. Herod charges Alexandra for Plotting with Cleopatra. Ananus depos'd, and Ariſtobulus in his Place. Alexandra's Excuſe.

Phraates treats his Priſoner Hyrcanus with Great Honour.

HYRCANUS being brought Priſoner to Phraates, the King of Parthia; and this Prince being well Informed of his Birth and Character, he had ſo Great a Reſpect for his Illuſtrious Blood and Quality, that he immediately order'd his Chains to be taken off, and allow'd him the Freedom of the City of Babylon for the Bounds of his Confinement: a Place where there were a great many of his own Sect; and where he had the ſame Reverence paid him, not only by the Jews of that City, but by thoſe likewiſe on the other ſide of Euphrates, as if he had been their Governour and High-Prieſt. So that the Preſent Condition of Hyrcanus was not very uneaſy to him. But when he came to Underſtand that Herod was Advanced to the Government, he being a Grateful, and a Good Natur'd Man himſelf, made a Judgment of others according to the ſame Meaſure; flattering himſelf with the Hope of Mighty Things that Herod would do for him now upon this Elevation, as an Acknowledgment to the Preſerver of his Life and Honour, which he himſelf had fav'd when it was all at Stake (of which we have ſaid enough heretofore.) This Phancy ran in Hyrcanus's Head to that Degree, that he reſolved within himſelf to make a Journy to him, but not without the Formality of Adviſing firſt with ſome of his Confidents about it. Upon laying their Heads together, he found all his Friends Unanimouſly Poſitive againſt his going. For, ſaid they, ſo long as you are here, you may aſſure your ſelf from us, and all our People, of a Reverence and Obedience ſuitable to the Duty of your Subjects and Servants, and to the Dignity of your own Character, which you can never expect in your own Country, by reaſon of the Maim Antigonus has given you, which puts you into an Incapacity of pretending to it. They told him likewiſe, that in the Matter of Good Turns and Reciprocal Services, it is not with Princes as it is with Private Perſons. Kings have ſhort Memories commonly in thoſe Caſes, and Men change their Manners with their Fortunes. This Diſcourſe was Reaſonable enough, but the Paſſion Hyrcanus had for his own Country, made him Deaf to all Good Counſels. Herod gave Hyrcanus an Invitation alſo by Letter to come over to him, and take his part in the Government, deſiring him likewiſe to move Phraates, and his Brethren the Jews, not to Envy him the Comfort of ſo great a Bleſſing; for now was the Time, he ſaid, to ſhew his Gratitude to the Perſon he ſtood Indebted to, both for his Bread, and for his Life. And this was not all neither, but he ſent Saramalla upon an Embaſſy to Phraates with Fair Words and Magnificent Preſents over and above, to ſweeten him on the Behalf of Hyrcanus, his worthy Patron and Dear Friend. But this was all Countenance and Freak; for Herod, being a Crafty, and a Suſpicious Prince, and an Uſurper to boot, his Buſ'neſs was to ſecure himſelf againſt Poſſible Charges and Turns of State, and upon that Conſideration, either to get Hyrcanus into his Power, or out of the World, as afterwards he did.

Upon Herod's Promotion, Hyrcanus had a Mind to give him a Viſit.

All his Friends againſt it.

Herod invites Hyrcanus to come over to him;

and ſends Saramalla to Phraates with Complements and Preſents, to ſweeten him toward Hyrcanus.

Hyrcanus Diſcharg'd, and ſo goes his way for Jeruſalem.

Hyrcanus being, in fine, Diſcharged by Phraates, and amply ſupply'd with Monies and Neceſſaries by the Jews in Babylon for his Journy, he went his way to Jeruſalem, where he was received with all the Marks of ſingular Honour and Reſpect; as for Inſtance, Herod gave him the Firſt Place at all Meetings and Entertainments; Treated him in the Style of Father, and carry'd every thing on with ſuch a Face of Good Faith, that there was no Room left for any Poſſible Doubt or Jealouſy of the contrary. There was nothing, in fine, omitted, that might conduce to his Eſtabliſhment, ſaving only that he was ſo over Sollicitous in that Particular, that it prov'd the Occaſion of a Dangerous Breach in the Family; for he was ſo Cautious of having any Man of an Honourable Extraction Advanced to the Pontificat, that he ſent to Babylon for one Ananel, a Perſon of a Mean and Obſcure Condition, and made him High-Prieſt. Alexandra, the Wife of Hyrcanus, and the Widow of Alexander the Son of King Ariſtobulus, by whom ſhe had a Son whom ſhe called Ariſtobulus, after his Granfather's Name, and a Daughter Mariamne, a Woman of Admirable Beauty, and the Wife of Herod: This Alexandra laid it extremely to Heart, to ſee her Son thus Affronted, and the High-Prieſthood uſurped by One from abroad, while her Son was yet Living. In this Diſcontent ſhe wrote by a certain Muſician to Cleopatra, to beg the Pontificat of Anthony for her Son. But Anthony never minding the Matter, it ſo happen'd, that one Gellius, a particular Friend of his, being at that time in Judæa about ſome Affairs of his own, had the good Fortune to ſee Ariſtobulus, and Mariamne, whom he look'd upon to be Two of the moſt Graceful Beautiful Perſons that ever his Eye beheld. Inſomuch that he highly Complemented Alexandra upon the Bleſſing of bringing Two ſuch Miracles into the World, and recommended it to her to make a Preſent of their Pictures to Anthony, as the way to ſecure her ſelf of any Good Office that lay in his Power to do her. Upon this Conſideration, ſhe ſent the Pictures; and Gellius that had a Mind to Inveigle Anthony into a Paſſion for Mariamne, made the Matter yet more then it was, with Hyperbolical and Extravagant Flouriſhes, that they were Perfect, and Lovely, ſo much beyond the ordinary rate of Fleſh and Bloud, that they look'd liker Angels in Humane Shapes. It would not have been either Handſome, or Honeſt, in Anthony to ſend for the Wife of a Prince that was his Friend; and he was not willing neither to give Cleopatra any Juſt Ground of Jealouſy; but he wrote however to Herod how glad he ſhould be to ſee Ariſtobulus upon any fair Occaſion, if it might ſtand with his Convenience. Ariſtobulus was at that time but Fifteen or Sixteen Years of Age, and Herod did not think it ſafe to ſend a Delicate Charming Youth, nobly Born, and in the Flower of his Years, to the Perſon of all Men Living the moſt Abandon'd to Unnatural Luſts, and the moſt Eager in the Purſuit of Unlawful Pleaſures; for this was Anthony's Character; beſide that being one of the Greateſt Men in Rome, he made uſe of his Power and Authority to bear him out in theſe Liberties. So that Herod put him off with this Pretence, that the Jews were ſo Seditious, and ſo bent upon Change, and the Experiment of another King, that if Ariſtobulus ſhould but ſtir out of the Kingdom, it would blow-up all in a Flame.

Herod advances Ananel, a mean Perſon; to the Pontificat.

Alexandra takes this for an Affront to her Son.

She puts Cleopatra upon begging it of Anthony for her Son.

Alexandra ſends Anthony the Pictures of Ariſtobulus and Mariamne.

Anthony writes to Herod how glad he ſhould be to ſee Ariſtobulus.

Herod againſt it as a Matter of Ill Conſequence: Athony being a Man of Liberty and Pleaſure.

When he had Fobb'd Anthony off with this Anſwer, he manag'd his Matters ſo as to keep Civilly Fair with the Young Man, and Alexandra; his Wife Mariamne preſſing him over and above at every turn, to do her Brother Right in the Buſneſs of the Pontificat; urging withal that it was his own Intereſt ſo to do, for the very Duty of the Office would Excuſe him beyond all Exception from taking the Journy. Herod, upon this Diſcourſe, took a Freak in's Head; and calling ſeveral of his Friends about him, in a way of Conference and Advice, he fell into a Bloudy Invective againſt Alexandra; telling them that ſhe was Enter'd into a Secret Conſpiracy againſt him, and that ſhe wrought by the Means of Cleopatra, who was to engage Anthony to Diſpoſſeſs himſelf of the Government, and Transfer it to her Son; which, he ſaid, ſhe was the more to blame in, becauſe ſhe could not Vindicate Ariſtobulus without Degrading her Daughter, and making way by a Publique Broil to the Dethroning of her Son-in-Law, and removing him from a Dignity that he had Acquir'd with ſo much Toil and Hazzard. But upon the whole Matter, ſays he, I am ready to Forget and to Forgive all theſe Injuries; and to ſhew the Reverence and Tenderneſs I have for my Mother, and the reſt of her Relations, I will immediately Veſt her Son in the Exerciſe of the Office: and I had done it ſooner too, when I put Ananel into't, if the other had been of Age to Execute it. This ſtudy'd Speech (for in Truth ſo it was, and intended only for an Amuſement to the Women and the Counſel) put Alexandra into the Greateſt Confuſion Imaginable, betwixt the Joy of ſeeing her own Buſneſs done, and the Trouble of finding her ſelf ſuſpected: So that Burſting out into a Paſſionate Tranſport of Tears and Proteſtations, ſhe gave this further Account of her Behaviour. That as to the Point of the High-Prieſthood; ſhe had ſuch an Indignation, for the Affront was put upon her Son in that Particular, that ſhe left no Lawful Way or Means to do him Right in't, unattempted; but as to any Deſign ſhe had of Raiſing him up to the Throne, ſhe was ſo far from any Thought that way, that if the Thing were Offer'd her, ſhe would Refuſe it: For her Ambition look'd no further, ſhe ſaid, then to ſee Juſtice done to her Son in that Station, and conſequently the Honour and the Safety of the Family provided for. But as the Caſe then ſtood, ſhe ſaid, ſhe was ſo ſenſible of the Kings Grace and Goodneſs to her ſelf in the Perſon of Ariſtobulus, that he ſhould ever find her moſt Dutyful for the future: And if upon any Puntillo of Honour, or of Haughtineſs of Mind ſhe might have paſs'd the Preciſe Bounds of Reſpect and Moderation, ſhe begg'd his Pardon for it. This Diſcourſe put a ſeeming End to the Controverſy, for they ſhook Hands, and in appearance parted Friends.

Caſe

CHAP. III.

Herod is Jealous of Alexandra, and ſets ſpies upon her. She writes to Cleopatra for Advice, What to do: Who invites Herod and her Son, into Ægypt; whither they are privately convey'd. Æſop tells Sabbion the Secret, and he betrays it to Herod; who ſurprizes them in their Eſcape. Herod contrives the drowning of Ariſtobulus; who is Univerſally lamented. Alexandra diſguiſes her Affliction. A ſplendid Funeral; and Herod ſets up for the Chief Mourner.

Ananel being now Depoſed;

THE King immediately depos'd Ananel from the Pontificat, being a Forreigner, as we have ſaid before, and of the Race of thoſe Jews that were formerly carry'd away by the Syrians beyond the Euphrates, whereof many Thouſands took-up their Habitations in Babylon. He was, in truth, of a Sacerdotal Extraction, and of Herod's Old Acquaintance; who, upon his coming to the Crown, had created him High-Prieſt, and afterwards depoſed him, (though contrary to Law) for the Peace of his Family; for otherwiſe the High-Prieſthood is an Office for Life, and not to be taken away again where it is duly conferr'd. The Firſt that brake-in upon that Rule was Antiochus Epiphanes; who removed Joſhua to make way for his Brother Onias. Ariſtobulus was the Second, who ſupplanted Hyrcanus, and Aſſumed the Dignity to Himſelf. The Third was Herod; who put Ariſtobulus into the Holy Function, while Ananel was yet Living.

Herod is ſtill Jealous of Alexandra.

By this Expedient, they thought to ſet all Right in the Family; but, as it prov'd, the Conſequence was not ſo clear yet, as after ſo Solemn a Reconciliation a Body would have expected: For it ran in Herod's Head ſtill, that Alexandra would be no longer quiet, then till ſhe had an Opportunity of Compaſſing her Ends by being Troubleſome. In this Humour he confin'd her to the Palace, and abſolutely forbad her Meddling in any Publique Buſineſs; ſetting ſo many Guards and Obſervers upon her over and above, that ſhe did not the leaſt Thing in the World, but the King had notice of it. This Odious way of Proceeding went to the very Heart of her; for being a Woman of Birth, Senſe, and Stomach, nothing could have Touch'd her ſo to the quick, as to find her ſelf thus Watch'd, and Spy'd upon: Inſomuch that ſhe reſolved, in ſhort, rather to Endure any thing then the Plague of ſo Scandalous a Jealouſy, and under the Title of a Woman of Honour, to lead the Life of a Slave, in Fear, and Miſery. In this Diſtreſs of Thought, ſhe put the Whole State of her caſe in a Letter to Cleopatra, together with an Application to her for Advice and Relief; who gave her for Anſwer, an Invitation to get away privately with her Son, and to come over to her into Ægypt. She could not but approve of the Councel, and ſo bethought her ſelf of this way of putting it in Execution. She order'd Two Coffins to be provided, and her ſelf, and her Son, to be put up in them; appointing the Servants that were Privy to the Contrivance, to ſee them carry'd out by Night, and put a-board a Ship that lay ready near at hand to Tranſport them into Ægypt. There was one Sabbion, who was look'd upon to be Alexandra's Friend, and ſo Mortal an Enemy of Herod's; that he was ſtrongly ſuſpected to have been a Party in the Plot for the Poyſoning of Antipater. A Servant of Alexandra's, whoſe Name was Æſop, making no doubt of Sabbion's being Privy to the Deſign, blabb'd the whole Story to him; and the other, laying hold of this Occaſion for the Redeeming of his Credit with Herod, went and acquainted him with the Whole Intrigue: Who let them go on without any Noiſe, till they came to the Point of Execution, and then ſurpriz'd them in the very Act of making their Eſcape. Herod was yet ſo over Gracious as to forgive her this Attempt, not out of any Motion of Tenderneſs and Generoſity, but for fear of Cleopatra's Power with Anthony, in caſe he ſhould provoke her to a Revenge. Nay ſo far was he from putting her to any Extremity, that with a kind of Oſtentation of Magnanimity and Good Nature, he rather out-did it the other Way, by appearing more Indulgent then in truth (all things Conſider'd) it was poſſible for him to be. But after all this External Fairneſs toward Alexandra, the Death of the Young Man ſome way or other was a Thing Reſolv'd upon; only it was to be a Work of Time to prevent Suſpicion or Diſcovery.

The

The Feast of Tabernacles now drawing on, (being one of the most Celebrated and Solemn Festivals we have) Herod dispos'd himself to his Good Humour, and to Rejoyce, and make merry with the People: But while this past, there fell out an Unlucky Circumstance, that put him upon the Execution of his Murderous Purpose, sooner then he intended. Aristobulus was at this time betwixt Seventeen and Eighteen Years of Age, Tall and Lovely to Admiration; and in one Word, the very Picture of his Grandfather: and as he was Advancing toward the Altar in his Pontifical Robes, to Officiate according to the Law, he Discharg'd his part with so Wonderful a Grace, having all the Personal Advantages of Beauty and Stature, and the Dignity of a great Soul in the very Face of him, that the Eyes and Hearts of the Spectators were all set upon him: Insomuch that they could not forbear Expressing the Love, Honour, and Esteem they had for him, in a Thousand Good Wishes, Prayers, and Acclamations, and those Indications of their Joy and Affection, accompany'd also with Large Acknowledgments of the many Obligations they had to that Noble Family. Now they never consider'd that the Magnifying of the one, was a kind of Derogating from the Other, and that Herod's Envy would understand it so, which Effectually it did; and the Jealousy he Contracted upon it, hasten'd the Young Man's Ruin. Upon the Breaking-up of the Festival, Herod took his part of a Treat with Alexandra at Jericho, where he took Aristobulus aside, as in point of Complaisance, and to bear him Company in his little Diversions and Pleasures. The Weather was too Hot for any stirring Exercise; so that they quickly gave over their Play, and withdrew into the Cool of the Shade, by certain Large Fish-Ponds there at hand, where several of their Acquaintances and Servants were Bathing themselves. Aristobulus was Tempted by Herod to make One of the Party, and so Plunging into the Pool for Company, some of Herod's Instruments that lay ready upon the Catch, took the Opportunity of Ducking and Dipping him so Long, under a Pretence of only Paddling and Fooling with him, that in the End they kept him down, and drown'd him. This was the Deplorable End of Aristobulus, in the Eighteenth Year of his Age, and the First of his Office, which was then immediately restor'd to Ananel. When this Tragical Disaster came to be known to the Women, never was so Dismal an Alteration in the Face of Things; never so Passionate a Lamentation over the Body of any Creature; nor ever so Inconsolable a Sorrow. It was so Publique a Loss, that the whole City was in Tears for it, and not a Family but had their Part in't. But the chief Mourner of all was Alexandra, and it was an Aggravation of her Calamity, that though she was Convinc'd of the Malicious Treachery of the Fact, she was yet glad to keep her Tongue in her Head for fear of a worse Mischief. Such was the Outrage of her Despair, that she was many times about to lay Violent Hands upon her self, but still check'd her Passion, in Hope that if she could but Survive the Sense of that Barbarous and Flagitious Murder, without Discovering what she knew of the Contriver of it, she might yet live to the Opportunity of a Revenge; wherefore she carry'd it Fair in appearance, and without seeming to understand any thing of the Matter: But Herod made it his Bus'ness of all things in the World to possess People that he had no Hand in't; and in his Looks, Words, and Behaviour, acted the Part of a Forlorn, sorrowful Wight, so to the Life, that a Body would have thought his very Heart had been breaking in Good Earnest. And who knows at last yet, but betwixt Humanity and Conscience, he might come to have somewhat of a True Remorse for his Wickedness in spilling the Innocent Blood of so Angelical a Creature, in the Prime of his Youth and Beauty: But the Death of the one was Necessary, he thought, for tht Security of the other; beside that his main Point was to keep himself clear of being suspected of so base a Crime. As to the Matter of Pomp and Expence toward the Solemnity of the Funeral, there was nothing left undone either in the Adorning of the Herse, or in the Embalming of the Body, that might advance the Magnificence of the Ceremony; and this Course he took, as the most likely way to make the Woman Soft and Easy.

BUT there was no Working upon the Embitter'd Spirit of Alexandra, by ſuch Amuſements as theſe: Neither was the Sourneſs of her Canker'd Melancholy Capable of any other Relief then that of a Revenge. With this Proſpect in her Head, ſhe ſent Cleopatra an Account of Herod's Perfidious Practice upon the Life of her miſerable Son. Cleopatra, who had ever been ready and forward to ſerve her, contracted ſo Generous a Compaſſion for her upon this Occaſion, that She Eſpouſed her Intereſt as her own; Preſſing and Plying Anthony with Perpetual Importunities, to ſee Juſtice done upon the Author of ſo Barbarous a Murder. She laid before him, The Baſeneſs of the Thing, and how Diſhonourable it would be for him to ſuffer a King of his own making, and the Uſurper of Another Man's Right, to commit ſo Horrid an Outrage upon the Lawful Heir of the Government, and to come off at laſt Unpuniſh'd. Anthony laid the Thing to Heart; and ſo coming to Laodicea, he ſent for Herod to know what he had to ſay for himſelf, about the Death of Ariſtobulus, for he could not but have a Horror for the Action, even though Herod himſelf ſhould have been the Doer of it. Herod was too Conſcious to caſt himſelf voluntarily upon the Merit of his Cauſe, and then he conſider'd on the other Hand, that Cleopatra would never leave Teizing Anthony againſt him; but at all Hazzards however, he reſolv'd to appear, and in truth there was no avoiding it. So that committing the Care of the Government in his Abſence, to his Uncle Joſeph, he gave him privately in charge, if Anthony ſhould put him to Death, he ſhould immediately deſtroy Mariamne: For he doted upon his Fair Wife to that Degree, that it was Worſe then Death to him to think of any other Man's Enjoying her when he ſhould be gone; beſide, that he look'd upon her Excellencies as the Sources of his Misfortune. Anthony had long ſince profeſs'd a Paſſion for her upon the very Fame of her Beauty. Having Diſpatch'd his Orders, away he went to Anthony; but with a Sad, and a Foreboding Heart.

His Uncle Joſeph adminiſters in his Abſence; with Orders, if Anthony put him to death, he ſhould immediately deſtroy Mariamne.

While Joſeph was in the Adminiſtration, he took Care of his Truſt, and made Frequent Viſits to Mariamne; partly, upon Bus'neſs, and partly out of Reſpect. Joſeph, as they were together, would ever and anon be taking Occaſion to Extol Herod, as the moſt Tender, Uxorious Husband upon the Face of the Earth. The Women ſhook their Heads at it to ſee him ſo Poſitive, Alexandra Eſpecially; but Joſeph grew ſo over-zealous upon it, to make good the Character, that he betray'd a Secret he was Enſtruſted with, before he was aware; inſiſting upon it as an Infallible Argument of his Affection, that as he found he could not live without her, ſo he was Reſolv'd that Death it ſelf ſhould never part them. Now the Women did not underſtand theſe Words as an Evidence of his Love, but as an Intimation of a Tyrannical Purpoſe he had taken-up, in caſe of his own Death, not to ſuffer them to ſurvive him.

Joſeph diſcovers the Secret at Unawares.

There was at This time a Rumour Rais'd and put about the Town by ſome Ill-Willers to the King, that Anthony had cauſed Herod to be put to the Queſtion; and after that, to Death. The whole Court was Startled at it, and the Women above the reſt: Inſomuch, that Alexandra put it to Joſeph to fly for Protection to the Roman Legion under Julius, that was then Quarter'd without the City, and to take them along with him. For if there ſhould come to be any Broils in the Palace, the Romans would take care of them; or if ever Mariamne ſhould but come into the Sight of Anthony, he would deny her nothing that ſhe ſhould ask him, though it were the Kingdom it ſelf, and all the Royal Privileges ſhe could pretend to.

While this Affair was under Deliberation, in come Letters from Herod that quite daſh'd the Former Intelligence; for Herod, it ſeems, was no ſooner come to Anthony, but by the Force of Preſents, and Fair Words, he brought him ſo far over to his Intereſt, that Cleopatra had no longer any Power with him to the Diſadvantage of Herod: for Kings, ſays Anthony, are to be Unaccountable for their Doings, they are no Kings elſe; for that's but the Privilege of all Crowned Heads: and it would be well, ſays he, if Cleopatra would not Trouble her ſelf ſo much how other Princes Govern. Herod made Oſtentation in his Letters alſo, of the Honours Anthony had done him; how he call'd him to his Councel, and to his Solemn Feaſts, in deſpite of all the Calumnies of Cleopatra, that had a Deſign upon the Government her ſelf, and did all ſhe could in the World to Ruin him: But Anthony, he ſaid, was a Prince of Honour and Juſtice, and that they might Expect him back again in a ſhort time better Eſtabliſh'd in the Poſſeſſion of his Kingdom, and in the Aſſurance of Anthony's Friendſhip then ever: Cleopatra being quite taken off, by the Acceptance of Cælo-Syria as a Preſent from Anthony, upon Condition never to Trouble him again about Judæa.

This Anſwer put an End to the Deſign they had of Ranging themſelves under the Protection of the Romans, which was not kept ſo ſecret yet, but Herod had got an Inkling of it: Who, ſo ſoon as Anthony was Advanced upon his Expedition againſt the Parthians, returned to Jeruſalem, where his Siſter Salome, and his Mother inform'd him of the whole Matter. Nay and his Siſter went ſo far, as to Charge her Own Husband, Joſeph, and Mariamne, with the Privacy of a Love-Intrigue together: But this was out of an Old Grudge to her, being a High-Spirited Woman, for reproaching her in a Wrangle once about the Meanneſs of her Birth. This put Herod into ſo Furious a Tranſport of Jealouſy, and Indignation; (for he lov'd Mariamne as he did his own Soul) that he had much ado to forbear Laſhing out into Open Extravagancies, and contain himſelf within the Compaſs of Sobriety and Good Diſcretion. But, upon Second Thoughts, he took Mariamne aſide, and put her to the Shrift about this Familiarity with Joſeph. She Purg'd her ſelf by all that was poſſible for an Innocent Woman to ſay in her own Defence; that ſhe was Clear, not only as to Joſeph, but to the whole World, of any thing that did but look like Criminal, or Diſhonourable in her Converſation. The King, in fine, betwixt the Power of his Wife's Charms, and that of his own Infinite Paſſion, ſoften'd by little and little, to ſuch a Degree, that he not only acquitted her of the Calumny, but Acknowledg'd himſelf convinc'd of her Unſpotted Integrity, deſiring her Pardon over and above, for the Raſhneſs of his Credulity in giving any ſort of Credit to ſo Scandalous a Rumour; Intermixing all ſorts of Tenderneſs in his Diſcourſe. Theſe Endeavours, in Concluſion, brought them to Tears and Embraces (as it falls out commonly in theſe Love-Encounters) and the more Diffident Mariamne appear'd of the Good Faith of Herod's Affection, the more Sollicitous was he ſtill to Confirm her in the Aſſurance of it. Yes, Yes, ſays ſhe, a Notable Sign of a Loving Husband indeed, to Order the putting of his Innocent Wife to Death, in caſe he ſhould happen to Die himſelf! At theſe Words, he flung himſelf out of her Arms in a Rage; Tearing his Hair, and crying-out like a Mad-Man. It is now as Clear as the Sun, ſays he, that Joſeph has Corrupted my Wife; for nothing leſs then the Power of ſuch a Confidence could ever have Extorted from him a Secret that was Committed to him with ſo much Caution and Truſt. In this Impotency of Paſſion, he had it in his Thought to ſtrike Mariamne to the Heart; but having ſome Wamblings of his Old Kindneſs about him ſtill, he Overcame, though with ſome Difficulty, That Provocation. As for Joſeph, he Commanded him immediately to be put to death, without ſo much as Hearing him; and Alexandra, at the ſame time, to be Impriſon'd, as the Root of all this Miſchief.

Herod Jealous of Mariamne for Joſeph.

Joſeph put to death, and Alexandra Impriſon'd.

There were Troubles about this time in Syria, Promoted chiefly by the Practices of Cleopatra, who had an abſolute Power with Anthony, and employ'd it wholly to Miſchief: Teizing him perpetually againſt the Great Men of the Country, till ſhe had worm'd them out of their Governments, and then begg'd them for her ſelf. Her Avarice, and Ambition, in fine, were ſo Inſatiable, that ſhe made a Conſcience of nothing ſhe might get by. In the Firſt place ſhe diſpatch'd her Brother out of the way; a Youth of ſome Fifteen Years of Age, and the next in Succeſſion to the Kingdom. She then prevail'd with Anthony to have her Siſter Arſinoe taken-off at Epheſus, in the Temple of Diana, even at her very Devotions: ſo that neither Temples, Sepulchres, nor Sanctuaries ſcap'd her, where there was Mony or Spoil to be gotten by a Sacrilegious Violation of them: But Right, or Wrong; Sacred, or Prophane, all was a Caſe to her, ſo ſhe might be a Gainer by it. In one Word; the Treaſure of the whole World would have been too little to Satisfy the Expenſive Pride and Vanity of this Voluptuous Woman. So that being of this Humour, it was no wonder to ſee her ſo Preſſing upon Anthony to take from Others, when it was all Deſign'd for her Self: and ſhe had no ſooner ſet Foot into Syria with him, but ſhe fell to Projecting immediately how to make her Self Miſtreſs of it. Lyſanias, the Son of Ptolomey, was a Friend, ſhe ſaid, to the Parthians, and ſo ſhe procured him to be put to Death upon that Account. She begg'd alſo of Anthony, Judæa, and Arabia, out of the Hands of the Kings that had them in Poſſeſſion. Anthony was, in ſhort, ſo much at the Command of this Woman, as if ſhe had not only Captivated, but bewitch'd him: But there were ſome Indignities ſo Groſs yet, that he could not comply with them, without proclaiming himſelf the Scandalous Slave of an Infamous Woman. In Few Words, being loth to diſoblige his Miſtreſs on the One Hand, by denying her any thing, and as much aſham'd on the Other, to Publiſh himſelf for the Meaneſt Creature Alive, in Granting all her Askings; he Compounded the Buſineſs

Cleopatra Honourably received by Herod at Apamia and Ptolemais

WHEN Cleopatra had ſettled her Affairs, and ſeen Anthony as far as Euphrates, upon his Expedition into Armenia, ſhe came back again, and took Apamia and Damaſcus in her way to Judæa, where ſhe was Honourably received by Herod; who Treated with her for the Revenue of that part of Arabia, and Jericho, that had been Granted her: The Latter being a Place Famous for Balſam, which is the moſt Pretious of all Gumms, and likewiſe for the Faireſt Palm-Trees in the World. Upon this Occaſion, ſhe ſet all her Wits and Arts at work to engage Herod in an Amour; and being a Woman naturally Luſtful, and Shameleſs, ſhe did as good as meet him half way, toward the ſtriking-up of a Bargain: but Love was the Pretence all this while, though 'twas likely enough ſhe might have ſome Further Treacherous Reach in't. Now Herod, that knew Cleopatra already for one of the Spitefuleſt Creatures Living, was as good as Fortify'd againſt her beforehand; but when he came to ſee the Proſtituted Impudence of her Behaviour, it gave him ſuch a Horror, that he Reſolved, if ever it came to the Point, directly to turn her off, and Affront her. The Queſtion was now (and he Conſulted his Friends about it) whether it might not be his Beſt Courſe to make ſure of this Vile Woman while he had her; for it would be both a Satisfaction to thoſe ſhe had abus'd heretofore, and a Security to thoſe ſhe might otherwiſe abuſe hereafter: Nay and Anthony himſelf would be the better for it too, for ſhe was the common Enemy of Mankind, and would be Falſe to himſelf too, if ever he ſhould come to ſtand in need of her. Herod was abſolutely for taking her-off; but thoſe about him, no leſs Poſitively againſt it, as a Thing below the Dignity of a Prince to run ſo Great a Hazzard for. Wherefore they beſought him by all means to bethink himſelf, and to do nothing Raſhly; for Anthony, they ſaid, would not bear it, let it be never ſo much to his Advantage; beſide that the loſing of his Miſtreſs by Force, or ſecret Practice, would but Enhance the Value he had for her before, and Irritate him to a Revenge. And then for the Excuſing, or Palliating of a Violence upon the Perſon of a Princeſs of her Illuſtrious Bloud and Quality, there would be no Room left for't: And let the Beneſit he might reap by her Death, be never ſo Conſiderable, the Outrage upon the Honour, and Inclinations of Anthony would be yet Unpardonable. They laid before him alſo the Mortal Confuſions that would Inevitably follow, both in the Kingdom, and in the Royal Family, upon the Execution of what he had in his Thought. As for the Laſcivious Importunities of the Woman, there could be neither Harm, nor Danger in Rejecting them; and as to other Matters, he had no more to do then to Act according to the Reaſon of the Preſent State of Things. His Friends, in fine, betwixt the Strength of their Arguments, and the Credit of their Counſels, brought Herod over to an Acknowledgment of his Miſtake, and ſo diverted him from his Deſperate Intent: Upon which Change of Mind, he Complemented Cleopatra with Rich Preſents, and Conducted her to Ægypt.

Armenia being now over-run by Anthony, he ſent Artabazes, the Son of Tigranes, a Priſoner into Ægypt, with the Princes, his Sons, and made a Preſent of them to Cleopatra; together with the whole Pretious Booty he had taken there. Artaxias, the Eldeſt Son of Artabazes, who fled out of the Country at the breaking out of the War, ſucceeded to his Father; but was afterward driven out again by Archelaus, and the Emperour Nero, who put up Tigranes, the Youngeſt Brother of the Family into his Place.

As to the Revenue of the Country that Anthony had given to Cleopatra, Herod made Punctual Payment of it; for he well knew that Women was not to be Provok'd; and that it was his Intereſt to keep Touch with her. The Arabians, conſidering that Herod had the Levying of the Tax, made due Payment for ſome time, at the Proportion of Two Hundred Talents a Year: But this did not laſt long, for they fell-off by degrees, till it fell in the End to leſs then Half.

The* Arabians had another Great Army at Cana in Cœlo-Syria; and they routed that alſo: But Athenion falling upon the Jews afterward, when they were Spent and Weary, gave them a Total Overthrow.

HEROD would certainly have reveng'd himſelf by a War upon the Arabians for this Contempt, and Breach of Faith, if the Civil Broils of the Romans had not prevented him; for the Battle of Actium was now drawing-on, which in all likelyhood would put an End to the Competition that was then a-foot betwixt Auguſtus and Anthony, for the Empire. This happen'd in the Olympiad 187. Herod having been now a Long time (by the Favour and Bounty of Anthony) the Maſter of a Rich and Populous Country in Peace, and Plenty, with Men, Mony, Corn, Cattle, &c. in abundance, he Levy'd a Powerful Army out of Hand, and March'd with it toward the Aſſiſtance of his Patron; but Anthony telling Herod that he had no need of it himſelf, appointed him rather to March back with it againſt the Arabians, whom he look'd upon to be a Falſe, and a Faithleſs People. Now this was carry'd by the Counſel and Direction of Cleopatra, who play'd her Own Game in ſetting the Jews and the Arabians together by the Ears. Herod, upon this Order, drew-off his Army back again, and ſoon after fell into Arabia with a Formidable Body of Horſe and Foot; taking his March toward Dioſpolis; where the Arabians having Intelligence of his Motions, were ready to Encounter him. The Two Armies Engaged, and after a Bloudy Battle, the Jews carry'd the Day. After this a while, they got together another Great Army at Cana in Cœlo-Syria. Herod, upon Notice of their March, drew the Greater part of his Troups that way too; propoſing to Encamp and Fortify, and there to Wait the Firſt Fair Opportunity of breaking-in upon the Enemy. But the Soldiers were ſo animated with their Former Succeſs, and ſo well Aſſur'd of the Reſolutions, State, and Condition of their Army, that Expectation (they cry'd) was but ſo much Time loſt, and nothing would ſerve them but they muſt fall-on immediately. Nay ſuch was their Impatience, that there was no keeping them in Order without it. The King was ſo well pleas'd with the Preſſing Forwardneſs, and Alacrity of his Men, that he Reſolv'd to Encourage the Good Humour while it was upon them, and to ſtrike while the Iron was Hot. So he put himſelf immediately in the Head of his Army with Sword in Hand; gave the Word of Command to March, and fall-on, and only to Act after his Example. They Advanced, upon this, with ſo much Fierceneſs and Bravery, that the Arabians were ſtruck at the very Sight of it, before ever it came to the Shock. They made ſome little ſhew however of a Faint Reſiſtance upon the Firſt Encounter; but preſently gave way, and finding they were not able to abide the Impreſſion, the Greater part of them fled.

This Athenion had a Mortal Averſion to Herod, and ſtood in a kind of Neutrality, but with his Men in Order and Drawn-up, attending the Iſſue of the Battle. If it had gone for the Arabians, Athenion would have been Quiet; but finding them to be Worſted, and the Jews not only Spent and Weary'd out with the Action, but Careleſs alſo and Secure in the Confidence of a certain Victory, Athenion, with a Conſiderable Body of the Natives, took the Jews off their Guards, and Attaqu'd them by Surprize; Diſperſing them without much Difficulty; and in the Purſuit over Bogs and Crags, which the Jews were not Acquainted with, did great Execution. Upon This Defeat, the Arabians took-heart; Rally'd, and Reinforced the Battle, following the Chace with ſo Terrible a Slaughter, that a very ſmall Party of this great Body got-off. The King finding the Caſe Deſperate, and his Troups Overborn with Numbers, Poſted away with all poſſible Speed for Relief; but before he could bring it up, the Jews Camp was taken and Pillag'd: So that here was a Victory gain'd beyond all Hope, or Imagination, and a Powerful Enemy deſtroy'd, both in one, by the Means of an Unexpected Surprize. Herod was forced after this Diſaſter, to betake himſelf to Depredations, and Incurſions upon the Arabians, and to Encamp in the Faſtneſſes of the Mountains, without daring to Expoſe his Army to the Fate of a Battle; but This was not Time utterly Loſt however, for the keeping of his Men in Breath and Exerciſe, and Inuring them to all the Duties of Military Diſcipline, he put them in Condition to Atone in ſome Degree for the Honour they had loſt.

A Dreadful Earthquake in Judæa.

IN the Seventh Year of the Reign of Herod; and the Year of the Famous Battle of Actium, there happen'd in Judæa the moſt Dreadful Earthquake that ever had been heard of. It devour'd a Great Number of their Cattle; and there Periſh'd Ten Thouſand Men in their Towns by the Ruins of the Houſes that were overturn'd; but the Soldiers in the open Air ſcap'd better, becauſe there was Nothing over their Heads to fall upon them. It is not to be Imagin'd, how Proud and Inſolent the Arabians grew upon the News of this Calamity; which, how Dreadful ſoever in the Truth, was yet further Aggravated in the Report; for they computed upon it that Judæa was totally Depopulated; their Cities and their People ſwallow'd-up, and the Nation no longer in Condition to make Head againſt them. In this Diſtreſs, they ſent their Embaſſadors to the Arabians to ſue for a Peace; who not only ſeized, and put them to Death, but ſoon after Advanced with an Army againſt them. The Jews were ſo Broken-Hearted in the Senſe of the Deplorate and Hopeleſs State of their Affairs, that they gave all for loſt, Publique and Private, without either minding what became of the Government, or daring to ſtand their Ground upon the Approche of the Enemy. The King did all that was Poſſible, to ſupport and encourage them in this Abandon'd Deſperation, by Courting and Cajoling them into a Neceſſary Reſolution of Defending themſelves. There were ſome, even of the more Generous ſort of his People, that while the Wound was Freſh and Green, were not to be dealt withal by Councel or Reaſon: But Herod, having brought them to a more Tractable Temper, by this Frank way of Proceeding, deliver'd what he had to ſay by way of Comfort and Encouragement to the Army, in Words to this Effect.

The Jews ſue for a Peace, and the Arabians put their Embaſſadors to Death.

Herod's Speech to the Army; with a State of the War, and of the Caſe. The Jews take Courage, and beat the Arabians out of the Field. The Arabians in a miſerable Diſtreſs for want of Water: and they deliver up themſelves to Herod for Protection.

Herod's Speech to the Army.

YOU cannot be Ignorant, ſays he, my brave Fellow-Companions and Soldiers, of the Difficulties and Misfortunes we have Encounter'd of late, to our very Great Diſappointment; and in truth, it is no Wonder to ſee, even the greateſt Reſolutions Stagger'd at it; but conſidering that the War is Inevitably brought home to our Doors; and that there is nothing as yet has befall'n us, but may in ſome degree, be Repair'd by Valour and Conduct, I look upon it to be my part to Raiſe and Enliven your Spirits, and to lay before you the Means of Recovering your Primitive Virtue.

The State of the War, and of the Caſe.

To begin with the War; you are to conſider, firſt, the Juſtice of it, and then the moſt Injurious Provocations to it; Two of the moſt Powerful Impulſes in Nature to Men of Honour and Courage. I ſhall then ſhew you that our Misfortunes are not ſo Hopeleſs and Inſuperable as they may appear to be. To ſpeak in the Firſt Place, to the Firſt Article; that is to ſay, the Juſtice of the Cauſe: be your ſelves the Judges, and the Witneſſes, of what I am about to ſay. As to the Arabians, you know them very well to be an Impious and a Barbarous Generation of People, without either Truth or Honeſty; and that they lye under this Character wherever they have to do. But they have been ſo to us in a Tranſcendent Manner, as if we had been Singled-out for the Mark of their Avarice and Envy, above all others. To paſs over their Ingratitude for other Obligations, what was it but my Intereſt with Anthony that prevented their falling under the Yoak of Cleopatra? And it was for my ſake again, that Anthony was otherwiſe ſo Eaſy to them out of a Tenderneſs he had, not to do any thing that I might take ill: And ſo for the Portions of Land out of both Provinces, that Cleopatra obtained from Anthony; what was it but my Induſtry there alſo that ſettled the whole Matter, partly by the Preſents I made him at my own Coſt, and partly the Two Hundred Talents I undertook to pay, my ſelf, and Two Hundred more that I gave Security for? Notwithſtanding that ſeveral parcels of the Land that pay their parts toward this Tribute, and are at preſent in their Poſſeſſion, do of right belong to the Jews; who in Equity ought to pay no Tribute at all, eſpecially upon the Account of the Arabians that ſtand indebted to us even for their very Preſervation. But it ſeems more Unreaſonable yet, for a Nation that Enjoy their Liberty by our favour, as they have Confeſs'd it over and over with a Thousand Thanks, to refuse us a just Debt now at last in a time of Amity and Peace, and to violate that Faith to their Friends, which has Hitherto been Held Sacred even among Enemies. But these are a sort of People by themselves, that understand no Honesty, but Profit, and account nothing a Crime that's done for Gain. What is there more in our Case now, then the Unquestionable Liberty of calling a Faithless Enemy to an Account by a Just War? Now this is but according to the Will and Precept of God Himself, who gives us both Command and Authority to Right those that suffer Wrongfully under the Power of Violence and Oppression; Especially in a State of Hostility, not only Just, but Necessary: As what could be more Horrid, or a Greater Affront to Humane Society, even in the Judgment of both Greeks and Barbarians, then that Execrable Outrage of theirs upon the Persons of our Embassadors, a Ministerial Order of Men, whose Character is every where held Sacred, and Inviolable, and with the Jews as much as any other; for what are the Angels, and the Messengers of God from whom we have received the Knowledge of his Blessed Will and Commandments, but a Glorious sort of Embassadors? And it is by this Way of Mediation that we are brought to the Knowledge of our Duty to our Maker, and to the Means of living peaceably one with Another. Judge now, if any Thing can be more Brutal then to destroy the only Competent Provision God hath given us for the Well-Being and Quiet of Mankind, amd to cut-off those necessary Ministers in the very Execution of their Office. How can these People now ever Expect either to Prosper in War, or to be Happy in Peace, after such an Usurpation upon the Natural Equity and Common Privileges of Humane Society? For my own Part, I cannot find that they have one Word to say for themselves. If it shall be suggested, that they that have the Right on their side may make their Best on't so long as the Other have the Power. This is not a Phancy to pass upon People that have been better Taught; and that know wherever Justice is, God is; and that Numbers and Strength can never prevail against him.

But extraordinary Cases, apart: Let us Reason the Matter a little upon the Square, and set Force against Force. In the First Battle, we were to hard for them; and in the Second they presently gave way, and fled before us, upon the very First Shock. When we were Absolute Masters of the Field, In came Athenion upon us, contrary both to Law and Honour; for there was no War declar'd. Will you give this Action now the Name of Valour, or of Perfidy; or make any thing more of it then a Successful Iniquity? This is not a Time to sink in our Courage, when we have so much Ground for Hope. Why should we be afraid now of those that we have always Beaten whenever we have had to do with them, upon Fair and Honourable Terms. Men that never pretended to a Victory but by Fraud, and Foul Play. But put the Case now that they were valiant indeed, that very Consideration would be a Spur to Men of Honour to Encounter them: For there's no Reputation to be gotten by the Baffling of a Scoundrel; but it is the Glory of one Brave Man to overcome Another. If any of you should be Stagger'd at the Thought of our Domestique Broils, or the Judgment perhaps of our Late Earthquake: 'tis a Main Point that the Arabians will find themselves mightily Mistaken in the Opinion of, and in reckoning upon the Calamity to be much Greater then it was: Neither is there the Least Colour of Reason in the World, why any thing should Discourage us because it Emboldens them: and they have no ground in Nature for their Confidence, but that they take us to be Broken Hearted and Desponding: So that we have no more to do to bring down their Stomachs then generously to bear-up against our own Misfortunes; and the more considerable we make our selves, the less considerable we shall find the Enemy. Neither are we so Despicable as we are suppos'd to be; for our Disappointment has nothing in it that looks like a Fatality; but we are to reckon upon it among the Common Chances of War. If God brought this Evil upon us, it is as Certain that he remov'd it from us too, according to his Merciful Method of Punishing Sinners, without Destroying them: But for a more Convincing Argument of God's Approbation of our Proceeding in this War, do but observe what a Signal Evidence he has been pleas'd to give us in Favour of it. What clearer Manifestation of God's Distinguishing Goodness toward you could you Desire, then that when so many Thousands of other People up and down the Province, were taken away by this Devouring Earthquake, not one Soldier suffer'd in't: And who knows, if the whole Nation had been Engag'd in the same Cause, but the Piety of it might possibly have Averted the Judgment. Keep this Providence in your Thought, with this further Comfort, and Assurance; that you have the Almighty for your Protector; and take this along with you too, that you have Right on your Sides, and a most Impious Generation of Men to deal withall; a People Faithless to Friends and Allyes, Private and Publique; Bold only in Sacrilegious and Unmanly Murders, and not the Heart to look a Resolute Enemy in the Face.

This Harangue of Herod's set the Jews a-fire to be in Action: so that taking them in the Fighting Humour, he Sacrificed in Form, and march'd away immediately toward the Arabians beyond Jordan, where he encamped. There was a Castle betwixt the Two Armies, which Both Parties (it seems) had an Eye upon, as a Place of Great Advantage, in case either of Decamping, or of a Battle. The First Point in dispute

The Jews take Courage, and beat the Arabians out of the Field.

Diſpute was the Gaining of this Poſt, which began in a Skirmiſh at a diſtance, with Darts and Launces; but drawing nearer one another by Degrees, it came in the End to a Cloſe Engagement with Loſs of Men on both ſides, 'till in the Concluſion the Arabians turn'd their Backs, and Quitted the Field. This Succeſs put the Jews in ſuch Heart, finding the Arabians ſo Cow'd, that they Puſh'd them to their very Trenches; where for a while they made a Shew, in a Diſorderly way, of ſome ſort of Reſiſtance; but it was ſo Faint that there was not to be ſeen either in their Looks or Actions, the leaſt Hope of Prevailing. They fought it however after their way, partly Encourag'd by their Numbers, and partly forced upon it by the Inevitable Neceſſity of either Fighting, or Dying, till at laſt, after a Long Conteſt, and a great deal of Bloud Spilt, they were put to a Total Rout: and with ſo Terrible a Slaughter, that betwixt thoſe that fell by the Enemy's Swords and their Own, and thoſe that were Trod to Death in the Croud, they wanted Five Thouſand of their Number: the reſt making away to their Camp, but with a Miſerable Proſpect before them, for they had neither Meat nor Drink to keep Life and Soul together. And in this Deplorable Condition, the Jews Coop'd them up ſo cloſe, that there was no Room left either for Relief, or Eſcape.

Their Miſerable Diſtreſs for want of Water.

In this Extremity, they ſent out a Requeſt to Herod, by their Deputies, that he would either Grant them a Peace, or but the Charity of Cold Water to Quench their Parching Thirſt: But Herod was ſo bent upon his Revenge, that he would not ſo much as hear of any thing of Embaſſadors, or Preſents from them, nor Gratify them in any thing whatſoever that they deſir'd. Within the Compaſs of Five Days after This, a matter of Four Thouſand of them came out, and offer'd themſelves to Captivity and Chains to Avoid the more Inſupportable Calamity of a Raging Drought. On the Sixth Day all the reſt made a Sally by Conſent, and Attaqu'd the Beſiegers; chuſing rather a Preſent Certainty of Death, then to Expoſe themſelves with Infamy to the Lingring Torment of it. In this Deſperation, they Iſſu'd out of their Camp, but without either Spirts, or Strength, anſwerable to the Pretence of ſuch an Action: Only they ſought their Death as the only Eaſe their Condition was Capable of. There fell Seven Thouſand of them upon the Firſt Encounter; and this Overthrow taught them to their Coſt, that Herod was a Great Captain, and not to be Treated at that Rate, and thereupon they deliver'd themſelves-up to his Protection.

They deliver-up themſelves to Herod's Protection.

Herod puff'd up with this Victory.

THis Victory Elevated Herod to ſuch a Degree of Vanity in his own Thoughts, and of Reputation in the World for a Great Man at Arms, that away he went back again to Jeruſalem, in the full Poſſeſſion of his Uttermoſt Wiſhes: But in the very Rapture of this Imaginary Eſtabliſhment of his Fortune, there came ſuch a Cooler to him in the News of Anthony's being defeated at Actium by Auguſtus, that he gave himſelf for a Loſt Man upon't; and it was not his Thought alone neither, but Friends and Foes were all of the ſame Opinion; and that Auguſtus would never forgive any Man that had been ſo Great a Friend to Anthony. The Former were ſo Plain with him, as not to Diſguiſe the Apprehenſion they had of his Ruine; the Other, under a Pretence of Condoling with him, were nevertheleſs Heartily Glad at the Hopeful Proſpect they had of better things. It ran in Herod's Head, that Hyrcanus being the only ſurviving Branch of the Royal Family, it would be much for his Intereſt to have him Taken out of the Way, whatever might become of himſelf, with a Reſpect to Cæſar; for whether he ſcap'd his Diſpleaſure, or fell under it, he did not think it ſafe to have ſo Fair a Pretender betwixt himſelf and the Government; beſide that on the other hand, he Gratify'd his End by cutting him off from the Succeſſion. While he was Caſting about in his Thoughts what to do, the very Family of Hyrcanus furniſh'd him with an Occaſion to bring him to a Reſolution. This ſame Hyrcanus he knew to be a Man of a Soft, Eaſy Nature; One that had ever been Averſe to Bus'neſs, leaving all things to Chance, and a Contented Creature in all Conditions; but his Daughter Alexandra, Anthony's Defeat at Actium.

Herod is for taking Hyrcanus out of the Way.

Hyrcanus, a Soft, Eaſy Prince.

Alexandra, on the Contrary, was a Woman of an Aſpiring Turbulent Spirit; Impotent in her Paſſions, and Manifeſtly over-joy'd in the Hope ſhe had of a Change. This Woman was ſtill Preſſing, and Tampering with her Father to bethink himſelf of ſome way to deliver his Family from the Oppreſſions and Perſecutions of Herod, and to provide in time for his own Security, in the Proſpect and Contemplation of his better Fortune. Her Advice was, that he ſhould write to Malchus, at that time Governour of Arabia, deſiring him, if there ſhould be Occaſion, to Receive him into his Protection. For if it ſhould be Herod's Hap to fall under the Diſpleaſure of Cæſar, he could not fail of being Reſtor'd to his Dignity, having an Indiſputable Right of Title, and the Good Will of the People, clearly on his ſide. Hyrcanus hung-off for a good while; but being Ply'd Day and Night to the ſame Tune with Hopeful Encouragements on the One ſide, and the Treacherous Practices of Herod on the Other, he ſuffer'd himſelf to be Overborn in the End, by the Importunity of a Woman, and ſo wrote to the Arabian, and committed the Charge of the Letter to one Doſitheus; in Subſtance, to this Purpoſe: that he would ſend him a Party of Horſe-men to the Lake Aſphaltitis ſome Three Hundred Furlongs from Jeruſalem. This Letter was the rather Entruſted to Doſitheus, as a Confident both of Hyrcanus, and Alexandra; and in regard that he was look'd upon as an Enemy to Herod; not only for the putting of his Kinſman Joſeph to Death, but for the Sake of his Brothers that were Diſpatch'd ſome time before by Anthony at Tyre. But all this was not enough yet to keep Doſitheus True to his Truſt: ſo that he rather choſe to make an Intereſt with the Preſent King, and went and ſhew'd him the Letter, who gave him Thanks for the Good Office; deſiring only one thing further of him, which was that he ſhould make-it-up again and Seal it, and ſo carry it forward to Malchus, and receive his Anſwer; for it would much concern him, he ſaid, to ſee how the Other behav'd himſelf upon it. Doſitheus acquitted himſelf Punctually of his Commiſſion, and brought back with him the Arabian's Anſwer, which was to this Effect: That he was ready to Entertain Himſelf and his Family; and that if he brought the whole Party of the Jews along with him, that were in that Intereſt, they ſhould be all Welcome; and that he would ſend him a Convoy for their Safety; and, in fine, that he was ready to ſerve him to all Manner of Purpoſes. Herod, upon the Receipt of this Letter, called Hyrcanus to him, and ask'd him the Queſtion, Whether he held any Intelligence with Malchus or not; who ſaid, None at all: and thereupon Herod produc'd the Letter; had it read Publiquely, and Order'd Hyrcanus to be put to Death. This is the Story as we find it in Herod's Commentaries, though 'tis Reported ſeveral Ways. Some will have it, that he was put to Death for a Conſpiracy, and not for the Crime that is hereSuggeſted. But it goes, that Herod put it to Hyrcanus once at an Entertainment, and without any ſhew of Suſpicion; whether he had received any Letters from Malchus. He ſaid, Yes indeed he had: But they were only Letters of Courſe, and Common Civility. Herod went then a little further with him, and ask'd if he had never receiv'd any Preſents from him. He ſaid, Yes he had; but they were only Four Horſes for his Pleaſure. The King would have this to be Treaſon, and Corruption, and had him preſently taken away for't and Executed. Many are of Opinion after all this yet, that he Dy'd Innocent, and upon very Good Grounds too; for he was known to be one of the Mildeſt Unmeddling Creatures that ever was heard of: ſo Modeſt and Temperate, that he was not Guilty of One Raſh Action in the whole Courſe of his Life: no not ſo much as in the Liberties of his Youth, or the Exerciſe of his Authority, for he Govern'd altogether by the Advice of Antipater, the Father of Herod. He was now upward of Eighty Years of Age: Herod ſafe in the Eſtabliſhment of his Power, and himſelf on the Wrong ſide of Euphrates, having left his Friends behind him, and all this in Submiſſion to his Dominion. Now for Hyrcanus to attempt a Thing in appearance ſo Impracticable, and Otherwiſe ſo contrary to his Genius and Inclination; no Mortal can pretend to believe; or that there was any thing more in the whole Story, then a meer Practice, and Contrivance of Herod's.

This was the End of Hyrcanus, after a ſtrange Variety of Fortune in a Long and a Troubleſome Life. He was Advanced to the Pontificat in the Reign of his Mother Alexandra; upon whoſe Deceaſe, after Nine Years Execution of his Office, he ſucceeded to the Government. In Three Months after this, he was driven out by his Brother Ariſtobulus; but Reſtor'd after that, by Pompey, to the Poſſeſſion of all his Dignities, which he Enjoy'd for the Space of Forty Years. He was once again then Dethron'd by Antigonus; had his Ears cut-off, and carry'd away Priſoner to the Parthians. He had not been there long, but he was ſet at Liberty, and came back again; promiſing himſelf mighty Matters from the Friendſhip of Herod, who was ſo far from anſwering his Expectations, that on the contrary, after ſo many Turns and Croſſes of a Vexatious Fortune, he cauſed him to be put to an Infamous Death in the Extremity of his Old Age. He was, in fine, a Man of Eminent Candour, Juſtice, and Moderation; ration; but a Lover of his Eaſe, and ſo Conſcious to himſelf of his own Inſufficiency for the Offices of a Publique Adminiſtration, that for the moſt part he Entruſted the Charge into other Hands. This Facility of Hyrcanus was the making of Antipater's and Herod's Fortunes, and it was ſo order'd, that this Goodneſs of his, without any Colour of Law, or Equity, coſt him his Life.

Herod goes away preſently to Cæſar.

So ſoon as Herod had made ſure of Hyrcanus, he went his way preſently to Cæſar, but without any Thought of Favour from him, toward a Man that had ſo Heartily Eſpouſed the Cauſe of Anthony. He had a Strong Suſpicion of Alexandra; and not knowing what Advantage ſhe might make of his Abſence, toward the Stirring-up of the People to a Rebellion, he Lodg'd the Government in the Hands of his Brother Pheroras; diſpoſing of his Mother Cypris, with the Siſter, and other Relations into the Caſtle of Maſſada, appointing his Brother, in caſe any Miſchief ſhould befal him, to maintain his Poſt, and continue the Adminiſtration in his Own Name. As to his Wife Mariamne, he Placed her in Alexandrion, with her Mother Alexandra, there being ſo great a Feud betwixt his Wife, his Mother and his Siſter, that there could be no Thought of their living quietly together. He put the Government of the Fort into the Hands of a Couple of Try'd and Truſty Friends, Joſeph his Treaſurer, and Sohemus, an Ituræan, under a Pretext of doing Honour to theſe Princeſſes; but with Private Order over and above, ſo ſoon as ever they ſhould come to be certainly inform'd of any Violence upon his Perſon, immediately to deſtroy them both; and to the Uttermoſt of their Power, ſecure the Government to his Sons, and to his Brother.

He Commits his Government to his Brother Peroras: Leaves his Relations in Maſſada; his Wife in Alexandrion. Joſeph and Sohemus their Keepers.

A Generous Speech of Herod's to Cæſar; which is Extremely well Receiv'd, and he himſelf reſettled in his Government. Herod intercedes for Alexander; but Auguſtus *had bound himſelf up by a Vow: So that nothing could be done in it. SO ſoon as Herod had given all Neceſſary Orders, he Haſten'd away to Rhodes to find out Cæſar there. Upon his Arrival, he took off his Crown, and laid it aſide; but for the reſt of his Royal Robes, he kept them, without Shifting them. Upon Cæſar's admitting him to his Audience, he gave a Noble Teſtimony of the Greatneſs of his Mind; and without any Submiſſions, Excuſes, or Supplications, as is Common in ſuch Caſes, he made a Frank Report of Matter of Fact, without the Formality of any Crouching Preface, or Apology.

A Frank, and a Generous Speech of Herod to Cæſar.

I am not come hither Great Cæſar, ſays he, to Diſown the Sacredneſs of a Friendſhip I have ever had for Anthony; and I ſhall take a further Freedom to declare, that he ſhould have been Maſter of the World, if I could have made him ſo. 'Tis true, I was not Perſonally in the laſt Battle with him; for my Commiſſion call'd me away againſt the Arabians; but at the ſame time, I ſerv'd him to the Uttermoſt of my Power with Mony and Proviſions; and I was ſorry I could do no more too; for ſuch was the Tenderneſs I had for Anthony, and ſuch my Obligations to him, that I reckon'd my Life as much a Debt to him; and it was Effectually as much at his Devotion, as my Fortune: But ſince I could not be with him at Actium, I muſt yet juſtify my ſelf, that I had ſtill the ſame Affection for his Perſon and Cauſe, after that Fatal Day, that I had before: Neither did I ſo much as Waver, at this Change of Fortune, toward the Changing of my Party. Nay, in thoſe Occaſions, when I could not Aſſiſt him with my Arms, I never fail'd to ſerve him with my Advice, which was to Cut-off Cleopatra in time, and ſieze her Kingdom into his own Hands, as the only Courſe in Nature to Preſerve him. And if he had taken this Precaution, I dare appeal to Cæſar himſelf, whether he would not have thought it Reaſonable to have Treated with him at this Inſtant upon Fairer Terms; but he choſe rather to go another way to Work; and for want of Conſideration, Advanced your Intereſt inſtead of his own. Now if you ſhall think the worſe of me for taking part with Anthony, becauſe you were his Profeſs'd Enemy, this ſhall not hinder me yet from Owning and Juſtifying the Services I have done him, and the Reſpect I have ever had for him. But if you ſhall be pleas'd now to conſider the Quality the Friendſhip, abſtracted from the Circumſtances of the Perſon, you will find in the Faith of and Gratitude of the Caſe, ſomewhat perhaps that may Encourage you to make Tryal of it your ſelf; for whether it be to Cæſar, or to Anthony, the Dignity of the Character will be ſtill the ſame.

Cæſar treats him with a Singular Reſpect;

Theſe Words of Herod's were deliver'd with an Ayr ſo Generous, and accompany'd with ſo Moving a Grace, that Auguſtus, who had in him Naturally a Greatneſs and Benignity of Mind, was not able to Reſiſt the Charms of his very Defence: Inſomuch, that Treating him with Singular Inſtances of Humanity and Eſteem, he bad him take up his Crown again, and be the ſame Friend for the future to Himſelf, that he had formerly been to Anthony; giving alſo to Underſtand that [a] Capidius had made him ſenſible of the Good Offices Herod had done him in the matter of the Gladiators. When Herod came to find theſe Fair words follow'd with Anſwerable Effects; as the Re-inſtating of him in his Kingdom, with a Decree of the Senate, to ſecure him in the Poſſeſſion of it; and all this done by the ſpecial Favour and Procurement of Cæſar, which was a Felicity ſo much beyond Herod's Expectation, that nothing could be more ſurprizing to him. Upon this Eſtabliſhment, he attended Auguſtus into Ægypt, Treating himſelf and his Friends upon the way with a Magnificence of Pomp, and Preſents, ſuitable to the Perſon, and the Obligation; and every way Anſwerable to the Largeneſs of his Heart. He did what he could with Cæſar on the behalf of Alexander, a Friend of Anthony's, toward the Gaining of his Pardon; but Auguſtus having ty'd himſelf up by a Solemn Vow not to ſpare him, his Requeſt could not be Granted.

and ſettles him in his Government by a Decree of the Senate.

Herod intercedes for Alexander; but he's under a Vow not to ſpare him.

The Jews, that upon this turn, gave Herod for loſt, were in ſuch an Amazement at his coming back Greater then he went out, that they look'd upon him as a Perſon under the Care of a Peculiar Providence, that turn'd all his Perils and Diſgraces to his Advantage.

When Cæſar was now upon his Return out of Ægypt, Herod went out to meet him at Ptolemais, where he Treated him with an Incredible State and Expence; and not only Himſelf, but his whole Army too, whom he ſupply'd with all manner of Neceſſaries. Upon this Occaſion, Cæſar took him, in a Friendly way of Familiarity, with him; inſomuch that they Two Rode together commonly, while their Troups were drawing-out. Herod, having at hand a Train of a Hundred and Fifty Perſons, richly Habited, and perfectly well Inſtructed in the Province that was committed to their charge, it was their Bus'neſs to Attend the Service of Cæſar and his Friends in their Paſſage, and to provide, that neither Himſelf, nor his Army ſhould want either Wine or Water let the Ways be never ſo Dry, and Barren: which gave him a Mighty Reputation among the Soldiers. He Preſented Cæſar, in fine, with Eight Hundred Talents, and gave ſo Univerſal a Satisfaction, that they paid a greater Veneration to the Dignity of his Mind then to that of his Crown. Upon this Generoſity of Behaviour, in the Emprovement of ſo ſignal an Opportunity to ſhew himſelf; and afterward, the ſame Manner of Reſpect over again to Divers others of the Eminent Romans, in their Paſſage out of Ægypt: All People gave him the Character of the moſt Illuſtrious Prince under the Cope of Heaven.

Herod waits upon Cæſar at Ptolemais, and treats him with all Magnificence and Splendour.

HEROD at his Return to his Kingdom, in the very Height of all his Glory, found a Diſorder'd Family, and his Wife and Mother-in-law miſerably out of Humour; for they look'd upon themſelves rather as Priſoners in that Caſtle (which in truth they were) then as there Depoſited for the Security of their Perſons, and it went to the Heart of them alſo to Conſider, that they had not the Command there of any thing in the World. Mariamne was ſtrongly poſſeſs'd with an Opinion that All her Husband's Countenances of Love to her, were only Diſguiſe and Pretext for his own Convenience. But the Thing at laſt that ſhe took the moſt Heinouſly, was her Husband's Reſolution not to ſuffer her to ſurvive him in caſe of his Death. It ran ſtill in her Head, the Bloudy Order her Husband had given to Joſeph: So that ſhe had no Other Way of Safety left her, unleſs ſhe could ſweeten her Keepers; Sohemus Eſpecially, for her Life was manifeſtly in his Hands. He ſtood his Ground a while at the Beginning, and kept True to his Truſt; but upon the Women's paying him with little Favours, and Fair Words, he gave way by little and little; and in the End, out comes the whole Story of Herod's Inſtructions. Now he look'd upon Herod at this time, as a Man out of Play: So that, thought he, there's no Danger of him, on the one hand, and I ſhall be ſure of the Princeſſes to Friend on the Other; and by this means ſecure my ſelf againſt all Chances: Or put the Caſe, ſays he again, at worſt; and that Herod ſhould ſucceed in Every thing to his wiſh, he has, to my Knowledge, ſo Doting a Paſſion for Mariamne, that he will never do any thing without her. Upon theſe Conſiderations, he Blabb'd the Whole Secret. Now the Thought of theſe Repeated Practices, one after another upon the Life of Mariamne, gave her ſuch a Diſguſt for her Husband, that ſhe made it her Daily Prayer he might never come Alive back again; ſuch was the Dread and Horror ſhe had at the very Thought of Living with him: and this was no more then ſhe own'd a while after Barefac'd, when ſhe could Diſguiſe the matter no longer.

*Herod was ſo Full of his New and Unexpected Honour and Preferment, that he thought the Time long (as he had Reaſon) till he brought Mariamne the Firſt Tidings of it himſelf; which he did with all the Tenderneſſes of Kiſſes and Embraces, as the Woman of the World he had the Greateſt Value for. But while he was Amplifying upon the Story of his Good Fortunes, his Wife was looking Careleſly about her all the While, without giving any heed to what he ſaid. The Slight indeed was a little too Open; but ſhe being a Woman of Candor and Sincerity, gave to Underſtand in her Countenance, that Herod's Good News and Careſſes were rather Troubleſome to her, then Agreeable. So that he was no longer Tormented with a Jealouſy, but it was now come to a Demonſtrative Certainty of what he fear'd; for his Wife's Averſion to him was by this time ſo Manifeſt, that what with Indignation to ſee his Love ſo Deſpis'd, and what with the Confuſion he was in betwixt the Tranſports of his Rage, and his Affection, ſuch was his Diſtraction under the Violence of theſe Two Extremes, that he was like a Man Torn to pieces upon the Competition, while his Tenderneſs drew him this way, and his Reſentments Hurry'd him that: So that he could not Gratify the one without giving Offence to the other. But the Thing he moſt of all Dreaded was this, leaſt in taking a Preſent Revenge upon his Wife, he might draw a Worſe Miſchief upon his Own Head in the Conſequence, when he ſhould come to find afterward that he could not live without her.

This Indifference made Herod raging mad.

While Herod was labouring in this Reſtleſs Anxiety of Thought how to behave himſelf toward Mariamne, his Mother and Siſter could not have wiſh'd for a Fairer Opportunity of Blowing the Coal, and of Interpoſing by Calumnies and other ill Offices, to Inflame the Outrageous, Jealous Humour of her Husband againſt her. They ply'd him, in ſhort, with ſuch Suggeſtions, as though he could not Abſolutely reject, yet neither could he ſo thoroughly believe them as Irrevocably to Deſtroy a Perſon he had ſo great a Kindneſs for upon the Credit of that Evidence. Herod however became every Day more and more Uneaſy; and by degrees Harſher to her: and as Mariamne on the other Hand made no Difficulty of Diſcovering her Diſcontents, ſo Herod's Extreme Affection came by little and little to be Tranſported into an Embitter'd Hatred: Inſomuch that he might probably have put her to Extremities out of hand, if it had not been for the News juſt at that Inſtant of the Death of Anthony and Cleopatra, and of Cæſar's being at that time in the Poſſeſſion of Ægypt. Upon this Intelligence, Herod Haſten'd away to Auguſtus; leaving things at this paſs in his Family, and recommending Mariamne to Sohemus over again, with Acknowledgments of his Former Care and Fidelity, and the Grant of a Command in Judæa for a Gratification. Upon this Congreſs in Ægypt, Cæſar treated Herod at another rate of Freedom and Confidence then before, and with divers Inſtances of a Singular Eſteem and Reſpect: As he Preſented him with the Four Hundred Gauls that had been of Cleopatra's Guards; putting him into Poſſeſſion of that Port of the Country that Anthony had beſtow'd upon Cleopatra; with the Additional Government of Gadara, Hippen, and Samaria; and toward the Sea, of Gaza, Anthedon, Joppa, and the Tower of Straton, which was no ſmall Acceſſion of Power and Splendor to his Royal State.

When he had waited upon Cæſar as far as Antioch, he went back again to Jeruſalem, where he found himſelf as Miſerable at Home, as he had been Fortunate Abroad; and that the Dazzling Satisfactions of a Crown were not Sufficient to Ballance the Mortifications of an Unhappy Marriage; Eſpecially being a Match that he had ſet up his Reſt upon, as the Greateſt Bleſſing of his Life; for no Mortal ever Doted upon a Woman as he did upon Mariamne, and with an Honourable Paſſion too. Not but that ſhe was a Perſon Loyal all this while to the Higheſt Degree of a Scruptulous Chaſtity: but withal ſo Freakiſh by Fits, that ſhe forgot all Reſpect for her Husband's Patience, Authority, or Power; even to the Reproaching of him ſometimes beyond Meaſure. But he carry'd Every thing Temperately and Fair, notwitſtanding all the Provocations of hitting his Mother, and his Siſter in the Teeth at every Turn, with the Meanneſs of their Families; and this ſo Publiquely too, that the Fewd it rais'd among the Women, was Implacable; beſide that it kept up the Malevolent Humour of Calumnies and Scandals. Theſe Jealouſies went forward for a whole Year after Herod's coming back from Cæſar, and Encreaſing Daily, till in the End this Following Contrivance was put in Execution. The King took an Occaſion once in the Heat of the Day to Retire into his Cloſet to Repoſe himſelf, where a Kind Fit taking him, he call'd for Mariamne: She went in to him; and upon his Careſſing of her, made no other Return to all his Dallyances, Importunities, and Prayers, then that of a Contemptuous Scornful Repulſe; minding him at the ſame time with Bitterneſs, of the Death of her Father, and her Brother. Herod was ſo Incenſed with the Indignity of this Affront, that ſtarting up in a Rage, he had much a-do to forbear laying Violent Hands upon her. His Siſter hearing a kind of Buſtle kept the Butler in Readineſs to diſcharge himſelf of a Commiſſion that ſhe had given him ſome time before; which was to go to the King with a Story, how Mariamne had been dealing with him to Aſſiſt her in the Preparing of a Love-Potion for him: directing him, if the King ſhould Ask what was in it, he ſhould only ſay, that it was of Mariamne's Ordering; and for the Ingredients, that he knew nothing of them, His part being only to Preſent it; but in Caſe the King made no further Enquiry, he ſhould ſay nothing neither, and there would be no hurt done. The Butler having his Inſtructions at his Fingers Ends, did every thing according to his Order, and ſo Addreſſing himſelf to Herod with a Face of Gravity, and Buſ'neſs, he gave him to underſtand that Mariamne had been Tempting him with Mony and Rewards to Provide a Philtre for him. The Butler finding the King to be ſtartled at it, told him further, that having ſuch a Potion Offer'd him, and not knowing what might be in it, he thought it the ſafeſt Way, both for his Majeſty, and for Himſelf, to wait upon him with this Information. Herod was ſufficiently nettled already; but the Surpriſe of this Diſcourſe made him directly Outrageous: So that he Order'd immediately the Putting of a Particular Confident of Mariamne's to the Torture, taking for granted that there was not any Thing Little or Great, that ſhe would do without his Privity. As to the Points he was Queſtion'd upon, there was nothing to be Extorted from him; but letting fall ſome Words in the Anguiſh of his Pains, Hinting that it was ſomewhat Sohemus told Mariamne, that made her ſo Uneaſy; Herod Burſt-out into an Exclamation while the Words were yet betwixt his Lips: That Sohemus who had ever been ſo Faithful a Subject and a Patriot to his Prince, and to his Country, would never have Betray'd ſuch a Secret as This was, but in the Confidence and Endearment of a Laſcivious Embrace. In this very Inſtant, he appointed Sohemus to be Seiz'd and put to Death; Summoning his Wife to Anſwer for her ſelf in a Court of Juſtice, before a Cabal of his own Creatures for her Judges. The Charge Exhibited againſt her was a Pretended Conſpiracy to Poyſon the King. Herod was Fiercer and Fouler upon her both in Words and in Actions then ſtood with the Dignity of a Tribunal of Juſtice: and perceiving how he ſtood Affected, they all pronounced her Guilty after his Example. But yet the Sentence notwithſtanding, neither Herod Himſelf, nor the People about him, were of Opinion for Precipitating the Execution, but rather to keep her in a Priſon then to take away her Life; only Salome, and her Faction were Tooth and Nail for Diſpatching her out of Hand, and the King was the more Eaſily prevail'd upon to Agree to't, for fear of a Revolt, as they ſuggeſted, when the People ſhould underſtand that the Queen was yet Living. This was the Pretence that brought Mariamne to her End.

Alexandra, after this Proceeding upon her Daughter, might reaſonably enough Expect that her Own Turn ſhould be Next: So that for fear of the Worſt, ſhe Abandon'd her Reputation to ſave her Skin, and fell ſo Low, that her Behaviour was become a Scandal to her Character. She was ſo Over-Zealous to Purge her ſelf of any Confederacy with her Daughter, that ſhe made it her Buſ'neſs to Blacken her in all Companies, as the moſt Wicked and Ungrateful of Women, and to celebrate the Juſtice of rewarding her according to her Deſert, for ſo Barbarous a Practice upon ſo Indulgent a Husband. Nay the Hypocriſy was ſo Groſs, that every Body look'd upon it as Ridiculous in the Forced Affectation of ſo many Extravagant Outrages; as Flying in the Face of her Daughter, and the Like: But Mariamne ſtill, as they were leading her to her Execution, paſs'd by all theſe Intemperances without one Word of Reply, or the leaſt Sign of Perturbation, more then in her Countenance, for the Shameful Part her Mother had in ſo Extravagant and Frantick a Scene. She Demeaned her ſelf all the way, in ſhort, with a Serene Conſtancy of Spirit, and without ſo much as Changing Colour upon the Approach or Apprehenſion of Death. She Dy'd, in fine, as Great as ſhe Liv'd, Firm, and Fearleſs, to her Laſt Gaſp.

Mariamne's Conſtancy to the Laſt.

This was the End of that Virtuous, Generous Princeſs; a Creature without Exception, had ſhe not been a little too Hot perhaps and Haughty. The Charms of her Beauty, the Graces of her Perſon, and the Agreeable Majeſty of her Converſation, were not only Superiour to the Excellencies of the reſt of her Sex, but even beyond Expreſſion too upon the Compariſon. Now Theſe Advantageous Gifts and Qualities were in a Great Meaſure the very Cauſe of her Misfortune, in the Uneaſy Life ſhe led with her Husband; for he Ador'd her like a Goddeſs; denying her and croſſing her in nothing; ſhe did what ſhe liſted, and took what Liberty ſhe pleas'd; nay greater perhaps then ſhe ſhould have done, in the Frequent Reproaches ſhe caſt upon him, without ever conſidering that this World was not to Laſt always. By this Heedleſs way of an Inconſiderate Freedom, ſhe made her ſelf Hateful to her Husband's Mother and Siſter, and in Concluſion to himſelf too, whom ſhe thought ſhe could never have loſt.

The Horrors of Herod's Conſcience.

The Paſſion Herod had for Mariamne in her Life-time (which we have ſpoken of before) was become much more Unruly and Importune, now ſhe was Dead and Gone; for he did not Love his Wife at the Common Rate of other Husbands, but with ſuch a Paſſion of Dotage too, over and above the Tye of Conjugal Affection, that he grew rather Fonder and Fonder of her, the Worſe ſhe us'd him. In his Reflexions now upon what he had done, he brake out not only into Un-kindly, but Un-manly Exclamations, with Mariamne's Name ſtill in his Mouth, and her Bloud crying for Vengeance. In the Agony of this Horror, he did all that was to be done by Wine, Company, Feaſting, and Variety of other Entertainments, to divert his Melancholy; but when he ſaw all would not do, he threw up the Care of his Government; fell by Degrees to be Light-Headed, and Talk-Idle; and in his Raving Fits, he would ever and anon be calling for Mariamne to be brought to him; his Phancy running upon her as if ſhe were yet Alive. While he was in This Diſtemper, there brake-out a Terrible Raging Plague in Jeruſalem, that from the Higheſt to the Loweſt, ſwept away all ſorts of People; and every Body look'd upon it as a Juſt Judgment for the Murder of the Innocent Queen. The King growing Worſe and Worſe, with-drew himſelf into a Solitary Retreat out of the Way, and had it given out that he was gone a Hunting. He had not been long in this Retirement, but he fell into ſo Deſperate an Illneſs, with a Violent Inflamation, and a Deadly Pain in the Head, that he ſcarce knew what he did. The Common Methods of Remedy they found did him more Hurt then Good: Inſomuch that his Caſe, in one Word, was little leſs then Deſperate. So that conſidering the Difficulty of the Diſeaſe, the Condition of the Patient, and that there was no Place for any Regular Courſe of Preſcription; his Phyſicians found it to no Purpoſe to Tamper any further with him, and ſo gave him over to be his own Doctor; bidding him call for what he had a Mind to, and Committing the Event to Providence. This was at Samaria, now called Sebaſte.

A Raging Plague in Jeruſalem.

Herod viſited with a Judicial Diſtemper.

When Alexandra, who was at this Time at Jeruſalem, came to Underſtand how it was with Herod, ſhe ſet her Wits at Work, how ſhe might get ſome of the ſtrong Forts into her Hand; and ſhe had an Eye upon Two of them above the reſt: the one Joyning cloſe to the Temple; the Other in the City; conſidering that whoever is poſſeſs'd of theſe Towers, has the whole People at Mercy. For the Jews will rather part with their Lives then with their Religion; and as they cannot Live without their Daily Sacrifices, ſo whoever Commands theſe Turrets hath it at Choice whether they ſhall have any Sacrifices or no. Alexandra, in purſuance of her Deſign, apply'd her ſelf to the Governours of theſe Forts after this Manner. You well know, ſays ſhe, that the King is at this preſent in a Miſerable Extremity; and therefore pray be pleaſed to Deliver Theſe Two Fortreſſes into the Poſſeſſion of the King's Wife's Mother, and the Children of Herod and Mariamne; for otherwiſe the Succeſſion may come to be Tranſported into another Family; and in Caſe of his Recovery, the Government cannot be Lodg'd in ſafer Hands then thoſe of his Neareſt Relations. They could not be prevail'd upon to take this for a Reaſonable Requeſt; partly out of a Senſe of Duty to their Truſt; but principally out of the Hatred they bare to Alexandra, beſide the Scruple they made of Prejudging and Pronouncing upon the King's Life, with whom they had Entertain'd a Friendſhip of Long-ſtanding; and one of them, whoſe Name was Achiab, being Herod's Own Nephew. The Firſt Thing Achiab did after this Propoſal, was to ſend Herod Word of it, who Commanded her immediately to be put to death.

Achiab ſends Herod word of the Propoſal; and ſhe is immediately put to death.

This

This Fit of Sickneſs wrought ſuch a Wonderful Effect upon Herod's Body and Mind (for with much ado he got over it at laſt) that his Humour was ſo Outrageous and Bloudy, after his Recovery, that every Triſle put him upon the moſt Inhumane Extremities; and Friend or Foe was all a Caſe to him, if they fell in his Way. As for Inſtance. There was Coſtobarus, Lyſimachus, Antipater otherwiſe called Gadia, and Doſitheus, upon theſe Pretexts following. Coſtobarus was one of the Greateſt Men in Idumæa, and of a Family whoſe Anceſtors had formerly Officiated as Prieſts of Coze, a Deity that they had in Great Veneration, till they came in the Days of Hyrcanus to Embrace the Worſhip of the Jews. Herod was no ſooner come to his Kingdom, but he gave this Coſtobarus the Commands of Idumæa and Gaza, with his Siſter Salome to Wife, whoſe Husband Joſeph, he Himſelf (as we have ſaid elſewhere) had cauſed to be Slain. This was a Promotion ſo much beyond any Hope, or Pretence of Coſtobarus, that he grew Proud and Inſolent upon it, to the Degree even of Diſputing the Authority of his Maſter; looking upon it as an Unworthy Deſcenſion for the Idumæans to own Themſelves the Subjects of the Jews, in Conſequence of Embracing their Ceremonies and Worſhip. He ſent, upon This, an Embaſſy to Cleopatra; Minding her that Idumæa had been ſtill under the Adminiſtration of her Forefathers, and that ſhe ſhould do well to make her Application to Anthony for the Command; profeſſing himſelf likewiſe to be at her Devotion. Now he did not Propoſe this Addreſs out of any Deſire he had to have Cleopatra for his Miſtreſs; but to the End that by the Weakning of Herod, he might the more Eaſily ſeize the Government of Idumæa to himſelf: For he had Two Fair Encouragements to the Hope of Succeeding in his Enterprize; That is to ſay, the Honour of his Extraction, and Mighty Sums of Mony which he had rak'd together without any Scruple of either Honeſty or Conſcience, provided he might but Gain his End; and after All this, his Ambition was as Notorious as his Avarice. Cleopatra try'd her Intereſt with Anthony for Idumæa, but it would not do; and This coming to Herod's Ear, Coſtobarus had loſt his Life for it, if the Mother and the Siſter had not Interceded for him; but he had his Pardon upon Condition at laſt never to be Truſted again. There was a Falling-out afterwards betwixt Coſtobarus and Salome, and the Wife ſent her Husband a Bill of Divorce, though directly againſt the Cuſtom and Practice of the Country, and a Manifeſt Uſurpation of the Man's Privilege, who has a Right to Diſcharge the Woman, and ſhe not to Marry again, but with leave of her Former Husband. Salome's Will however paſs'd for a Law, and ſo ſhe parted, and betook her ſelf to her Brother, with This Complement, that her Duty to him was Dearer to her then that to her Husband, and that ſhe came to tell him that Coſtobarus, with Lyſimachus, Antipater, and Doſitheus were in a Conſpiracy againſt him: Enforcing the Credit of her Information with an Inſtance of his Kindneſs to the Sons of Babas, whom he had now kept Twelve Years under his Protection. This was ſo Surprizing a Truth, that it made an Impreſſion upon him more then Ordinary; for he had taken-up a Reſolution long ſince of having them Diſpatch'd out of the World, as the known Enemies of his Intereſt; but ſomething or other came in the way ſtill, and put it out of his Head. Now the Ground of the Offence was This.

Idumæa and Gaza given to Coſtobarus.

A Falling-out betwixt Coſtobarus and Salome his Wife.

Salome charges Coſtobarus and Lyſimachus, Antipater and Doſithes with a Conſpiracy againſt Herod.

When Herod was before Jeruſalem, in the time of Antigonus, the People were ſo Tir'd out with the Streights and Difficulties of the Siege, that the Greater part of them were for Opening the Gates, and letting Herod into the Town. The Sons of Babas being Men of Credit and Authority in the place, and Friends to Antigonus, were abſolutely for ſtanding it out, and Maintaining the Government in the Royal Line. Upon taking the City ſoon after, Herod gave Coſtobarus in Charge to have an Eye upon all the Paſſages about the Town, and not to ſuffer one Creature to 'ſcape, that was of the Country-Faction. The Sons of Babas were generally taken Notice of to be the Darlings of the People, and conſequently the Fitteſt Inſtruments to be made uſe of in caſe of any Attempt upon another Change. Coſtobarus play'd his Own Game in ſaving them, and had them ſecretly Convey'd away into a Place of Safety according to his Order. Herod was ſo Quick upon him, that he ſuſpected the Matter at that very Inſtant, and Queſtion'd him upon it; but the other diſcharg'd himſelf upon his Oath, that he knew not what was become of them. There was then publiſhed a Proclamation upon This Subject with a Promiſe of Reward to the Diſcoverer, and Twenty other ways of Enquiry; but no Confeſſion yet: for after the Firſt Denyal there was no Retracting; ſo that the Concealment was now become a Point of Prudence, and Neceſſity, as well as of Kindneſs. But now, the whole Intrigue being laid open by the Help of Salome, the King ſent immediately to their Hiding-Holes, and had them all cut to Pieces, with their Complices and Abettors, and the whole Houſe of Hyrcanus by that Inroad totally extinguiſh'd: ſo that from this time forward, the King did what he pleas'd without Oppoſition or Controul.

The Sons of Babas.

Coſtobarus charg'd with Entertaining the Sons of Babas.

Salome makes the Diſcovery, and they are all cut to Pieces, with the Houſe of Hyrcanus.

Herod was no ſooner ſettled in the Eſtabliſhment of an Abſolute Power, but he fell off by little and little from the wholeſome Laws and Government of our Forefathers that kept the People formerly in the Awe and Practice of their Duty; Introducing Foreign Inventions, and Innovations inſtead of them. As for Inſtance; he inſtituted the Spectacle of Wraſtling-Matches, to be celebrated every Fifth Year in Honour of Auguſtus: Erecting a Theatre in Jeruſalem on purpoſe to Receive them. He built a ſtately Amphitheatre alſo, without the Walls of the City; which Two Fabricks were of a wonderful Magnificence and Expence: But to the Jews, that had nothing to do with the Vanity of ſuch Games and Shews, they were of no Uſe or Satisfaction at all. Now for the Greater Glory of theſe Entertainments, he cauſed them to be notified by Proclamation far and near with large Promiſes of Reward to the Victors. By this Means, he drew-in Competitors at all ſorts of Exerciſes, and from all Quarters, in Abundance, and the moſt Eminent Maſters alſo in their ſeveral Profeſſions: Not only Wraſtlers, but Muſicians Vocal and Inſtrumental, Mimicks, Charioteers, ſome for Two Horſes, others for Four; Horſe-Racers, &c. It was the King's Care, in fine, that nothing ſhould be wanting that might contribute to the Pleaſure, Ornament, or Curioſity of the main Deſign. The Theatre was Dreſs'd up round with Titles, Trophies, and Devices, to Cæſar's Honour, and in Memory of his Triumphs: The whole Work being Set-out and Illuſtrated with Gold and Silver, and Beautify'd with Coſtly Hangings, Rich Habits, and Precious Stones. For the Greater Variety of the Diverſion, he had a Proviſion alſo of Lyons, Tygers, and ſuch other Wild Beaſts as had any thing in them more then Ordinary, either for Fierceneſs and Vigour, or for any thing Singular in their Kind. Theſe Beaſts of Prey were turn'd looſe, ſome time one upon another, other whiles to Encounter Condemn'd Criminals. Now this was a Spectacle that Foreigners were mightily pleas'd with; but the Jews, on the contrary, had a Horror for it, as an Ignoble Cruelty, and not only a Violation of their Laws, but a Corruption of their Manners: For what can be more Unmanly, then to take Delight in the Brutal Entertainment of Sacrificing Men to Beaſts, and to Spill Humane Bloud in Sport! Beſide the Folly and Madneſs of changing Good Old Cuſtoms for Bad New ones. The Jews lay, in ſhort, under a General Diſſatisfaction; but nothing went more againſt the Grain with them, then the Trophies, which they look'd upon to be the Images of Men cover'd with Arms, and conſequently a Flat Contradiction to the Inſtitutions of their Country. They were ſo Bold and Extravagant in their Averſion to theſe Trophies, that Herod did not think it ſafe to deal with them by Force, but choſe rather to try if he could bring them by Reaſoning and Fair words, to a Sight of the Vanity of their Superſtition; but this was ſo far from Convincing them, that they cry'd out with one Voice againſt the Indignity of his Proceeding. They could bear any thing elſe, they ſaid, but to bring Images into the City (for ſo they call'd the Trophies) or to ſubmit to the Guilt of ſo abominable a Wickedneſs; That was a Thing they would never give way to. Herod, finding this Diſtemper to go Higher and Higher, and that the People were not to be Pacify'd by downright Authority or Perſuaſion, he took ſome of the Chief of the Party along with him to the Theatre; ſhew'd them the Trophies, and asked their Opinion of them, and what they took them to be: So they all cry'd-out that They were the Images of Men. Herod, upon this, cauſed them to be Stript and Undreſs'd, and finding only certain Stumps of Wood under the Covering, the Fierce Eagerneſs of their Suſpicion was turn'd into Ridicule; and upon the Quieting of this Tumult, the Greater part of them was prevail'd upon to Swallow every thing elſe: But there were ſome yet that perſiſted in the Abhorrence they had for the Admittance of Foreign Cuſtoms, for fear of the Pernicious Changes of State they might probably draw after them; reckoning themſelves Obliged, at what Hazzard ſoever, to Aſſert their Tottering Diſcipline, and not to ſuffer Herod, under the Name of a King, to Act the Part of an Enemy, and break-in upon their Conſciences and Liberties with Unlawful Impoſitions.

Herod changes Old Laws and Cuſtoms for Foreign Inventions and Innovations.

The People were ſo Enflam'd with This Diſcourſe, that Ten Citizens enter'd immediately upon it into a Conſpiracy againſt the Perſon of the King, in defiance of all Dangers whatſoever that might attend the Enterpriſe; and there was one Blind Man among the reſt, ſo Tranſported at the Story of this Uſurpation and Oppreſſion, that though he was not in Condition to Act any thing for the Common Good, he Offer'd himſelf yet to bear a-part with his Companions in their Sufferings for it, let it be what it would; and this Generous Encouragement did not a little ſettle them in their Determination. Having laid their Heads together upon this Matter, they put Daggers under their Coats, and went to the Theatre, with a Full Reſolution to Stab the King himſelf, if they could come at him, as they hop'd they ſhould; or however to make ſuch Havock of his Guards, that they promis'd themſelves this Comfort at worſt, in Caſe of a Miſcarriage, that their Death would make him Odious, and that the Preſident ſident of their Bravery in Vindication of their Religion and Diſcipline, would be an Incitement to Others hereafter to follow their Example.

A Spy diſcovers the Conſpiracy.

As Herod was juſt Ent'ring the Theatre, one of his Spies prevented him with a Diſcovery of the Whole Intrigue; whereupon being Conſcious to himſelf of the Invidious Hatred he lay under, he withdrew to his Palace, and ſent for the Conſpirators, Every Man by his Name. Being now as good as Taken in the Fact, and without any Poſſibility of Eſcaping, they ſtood the ſhock with an Invincible Courage; Owning, and Juſtifying the whole Matter charg'd upon them. This they did with an Undaunted Conſtancy of Mind and Behaviour, producing the very Daggers that were to have done the Execution. They were not engag'd, they ſaid, in any Criminal Combination to Gratify any Paſſion or Intereſt; but in a Sacred League for the Common Good, and the Defence of their Laws, which all true Patriots and Profeſſors were bound to maintain with their Lives. After this Frank and Glorious Declaration, they were hurry'd away, and put to Death by moſt Exquiſite Torments. Neither did that Execrable Wretch the Informer long out-live his Treaſon; for he was Set upon, Butcher'd, and Torn to pieces; and his Body thrown to the Dogs. This in the Sight too of I know not how many Lookers-on, and not one Man detected that had a Hand in the Exploit: till in the End a Diſcovery was Extorted by Dint of Torment from ſome certain Women that happen'd to be preſent at the Committing of the Fact: whereupon the Actors in it, and their whole Families, were all immediately put to Death; the Common People all this while, ſtanding Firm in the Maintenance and Vindication of their Ordinances and Cuſtoms. When Herod came to conſider of the Danger of theſe Mutinous Diſpoſitions, and to find that the People were not to be kept in Order but by main Force, it ſtood him upon, he thought, to do all he could in time toward the Preventing of a Revolt. Now having Two Forts in the City all ready; his Palace in the One, and the Other (Antonia) which ſerved for a Guard to the Temple, he Fortify'd Samaria alſo (otherwiſe called Sebaſte) for a Third, which lay conveniently to keep the whole Country in Obedience. It was about a days-Journy from Jeruſalem, and commodiouſly enough ſeated for the Diſappointing of Broils in the City. There was likewiſe another Strong Hold that lay very opportunely for his purpoſe, formerly known by the Name of Straton's Tower; but at that time, Cæſarea. He built a Caſtle alſo in the Great Plain, which he made a Horſe-Quarter, and ſo Gabala in Galilee, and Eſthmonitis in Peræa. Theſe Fortifications were ſo Advantageouſly Poſted up and down the Country, that it was Impoſſible for the People to Enter into any Plot or Practice againſt the State, but they would be upon them preſently; being ever at Hand, and in readineſs, either to Obviate Miſchief, or to cruſh it. He made it his Firſt Buſineſs to ſettle Affairs in Samaria, as a Place naturally Strong and Proper for his Purpoſe. To this End he drew a Great Body of Troups into the City, both Forreign and Domeſtique, partly for the Temple's ſake, that he Propounded to Build there, and partly for the Reputation of the Work, but principally for his own Safety; which, under this Pretext of Magnificence, was abundantly provided for. He changed the Name of the Town of Samaria to that of Sebaſte as is ſaid already; and divided among the Inhabitants the Country about it; by which means, the Lands being Fruitful, they became quickly Rich and Eaſy. He ſurrounded it with a Thick Subſtantial Wall; and enlarged it in ſuch a Proportion, that it was reckon'd in the Firſt Rank of Famous Cities. It was Five and Twenty Furlongs about, and a Furlong and a Half of Ground in the Middle, which he Reſerv'd for a Temple; and accordingly Erected one; which, for the Magnificence both of the Dimenſions and Expence, and all Varieties of Curioſity and Ornament, was not Inferior to any other Fabrique whatſoever. He went on likewiſe Every Day more and more improving other Parts of the City at the ſame rate, depending upon the Advantages of the Place for his Security, and Gratifying his Ambition in the Proſpect of Tranſmitting to Poſterity ſo laſting a Monument of his Greatneſs and Glory.

Judæa viſited with miſerable Calamities.

A Blasting Drought; a Famine; Plagues, and other Diseases.

Natural Providences, is not to be determin'd. The First Judgment was a long and a Blasting Drought, which was follow'd with such a Sterility, that the Earth was lock'd-up and brought forth Nothing at all. The want of Food, and the Necessitated change of Diet, brought-on Plagues and Diseases, and other Disorders Innumerable, one upon the Neck of another. And it was a Further Aggravation of their Extreme Misery, that the Sick were in a manner Abandon'd, and left without the Comfort of either Help, Food, or Remedy. And with all this, they dy'd so fast, that the Survivors gave one another over, without so much as looking after them, in the Despair of doing them any Good. The last Years Stores being all spent, and no Recruits appearing, the Case was Desperate, and their Starving wants pinch'd them every day more then other; for one Season was already lost and gone, and the Earth still Barren, without any Hope of Relief. These Extremities however, in the mean time, set all People's Wits at work how to shift for themselves.

Such, in fine, was the General Distress, that the Revenue even of Herod himself how large soever, was not sufficient to Maintain him, for his Rents and Customs were all sunk; his Old Stock of Treasure Expended upon Buildings and Fortifications; together with an Universal Desolation, upon all Accounts; the Outrageous Hatred and Clamour of the People over and above, which, in all Cases of Popular Discontents, never fail of casting the Blame upon the Government. His Thoughts were not Idle yet upon the Main, how to Obviate these Difficulties; but the Particular means of doing it was the Question. As for his Neighbours that were in the same Condition with himself, there was no supply of Provisions to be expected that way: and for matter of Monies to procure Necessaries, his Stock was exhausted, and he had not enough remaining to Answer the Charge. But somewhat or other was to be done however in this Extremity of a Common Cause. So that the King, upon bethinking himself, Melted down all his Plate, Curiosities, and other Ornamental Furniture, and Vessels of Gold and Silver, to the Services for his own Table; put the whole Mass into one Sum of Mony, and sent it away into Ægypt, where Petronius was at that time Governour by a Commission from Cæsar. Petronius was quite Tir'd-out with a Multitude of Applications and Importunities, upon the same Errand; but yet out of a Particular Affection he had for Herod, and consequently for his Interest and People, he gave him in Preference to all others, a Grant for the Exportation of Corn, and Assisted him all he could in the very Price and Carriage, which turn'd exceedingly to the Account of Herod, and his Designs. For upon the Importing of this Relief, he did not only redeem his Reputation among those that before had a very Ill Opinion of him; but made himself Famous by his Care and Conduct for a Prince of a Truly Royal Wisdom and Virtue. The First thing he did after the receit of this Succour, was, to make an Equal Distribution of it in proportion to the number, and Condition of those that were to Receive it; as he provided for the sending of it to those that could not fetch it, and appointed Bakers to Assist those that either through Age, Infirmity, or any other Impediment could not make their Bread Themselves; taking care likewise in all other Respects that they might not want any thing, either for the Filling of their Bellies, or the keeping of them warm; supplying them with Garments and Coverings also as well as with Victuals, in the Great Scarcity of Sheep and Wool, as well as of Corn for Food and Clothing. So soon as he had competently provided for his own People, his Charity carry'd him in the Next Place to the Assistance of his Neighbours the Syrians, whom he furnished with a Quantity of Seed-Corn for the Next Season, which came to them in the very Nick of their Occasions for it; and it yielded so Prodigious an Encrease upon the Following Crop, that he sent Fifty Thousand Men, which he himself had preserv'd from Starving, to help them-in with their Harvest. By this Foresight, and Industry of Herod's, Matters were so well Reestablish'd (even when all was given for lost) that every thing succeeded to his Wish both at Home, and Abroad, wherever he had to do; for no Man ever sought to him in Vain; Strangers, Soldier, Citizens, Rich and Poor, or whatever they were: Insomuch, that upon a Clear Account he was out, Ten Thousand Cori of Wheat to Strangers, reckoning every Corus at Ten Attic Medimni: (a Measure of Six Bushels) and Fourscore Thousand Cori upon his own People.

Herod's wonderful Wisdom in providing for the People.

A Grant for Exportation of Corn out of Ægypt.

An equal Distribution among the People.

This Seasonable and Effectual Grace and Goodness of the King was such a Charm upon the Hearts and Souls of the People, that past Unkindnesses, and Misgovernments, were all Forgotten, and not one word more of his Encroachments upon their Laws and Discipline; reckoning his Generous Care and Liberality upon this Occasion, as an Ample Attonement for all his Former Misdeeds. Neither was his Character less venerable Abroad then at Home; for it so fell-out, that his Misfortunes in the One place enhanced his Reputation in the other; for upon this Instance of his Compassionate Humanity toward Strangers, People made a Judgment of him from what they now found him, and not from what he had been.

 Much

Much about this Time he made Augustus a Present of Five Hundred Choice Men out of his own Guards, which serv'd under [a] Ælius Gallus in the Arabian War with much Honour. The State of Judæa being now compos'd, Herod bethought himself of Erecting a Mighty and a Glorious Palace, in the Upper-part of Jerusalem: Rooms large enough for a Great Receipt of People; Finished with Seats, and other Ornaments, of Gold and Marble curiously wrought, and bearing the Names of the Persons they were design'd for; one inscribed Cæsar's Apartment; Another, Agrippa's.

Herod erects a Glorious Palace.

While Herod was Intent upon this Building, a Phancy came in his Head to take a Second Wife, and by that Means to divert him from the Loose Liberties of Wand'ring Amours. The Case, in short, was This: There was one Simon, a Citizen of Jerusalem, the Son of [b] Boethus, an Alexandrian, and a Priest of a Noble Family; This Simon had a Daughter of so Exquisite a Beauty, that there was no Talk comparatively of any Other Woman. Herod was first struck with the Fame of this Lady, and then Enamour'd upon the Sight of her; but yet resolving to make no Tyrannical Use of his Power, he only propounded the Regular way of taking her to his Bed as his Lawful Wife. It was a Match, in truth, below his Quality, but not Inconsiderable neither, to the Degree of Despicable; so that in some sort to Ballance this Inequality, and to Indulge his Passion, both in One, he had no Better way then by Conferring some Eminent Dignity upon Simon, to Qualify him for the Honour he intended him. To This End he Deposed Jesus [c] the Son of Phabes from the Pontificat; Advanced Simon in his stead, and then Marry'd his Daughter.

Jesus depos'd from the Pontificat.

Herod advances Simon the Son of Boethus, and Marries his Daughter.

So soon as the Nuptial Solemnities were over, he built a Glorious Castle upon the Place where he formerly defeated the Jews in the War he had with Antigonus. This Fort was a Matter of Sixty Furlongs from Jerusalem; naturally Strong by the Situation, and Capable of being made Impregnable. The Hill rises in a gentle Ascent, as if it had been Artificial; the Figure of it Round, and the Castle Encompass'd with several Towers; and Two Hundred Stone-Steps up to't. The Lodgings in it Rich and Stately, and the whole Structure Beautiful and Firm. At the Bottom of this Mount, there are several Buildings worth the Seeing in many Respects, and particularly for the Famous Aquæducts, that with Infinite Difficulty and Charge, were brought thither from a Vast way off. The Plain about it was Cover'd with Houses, to the Proportion of a Considerable City: the Castle from above overlooking it like a Cittadel both for Command and Protection.

Herod builds a Castle in Memory of a Victory over Antigonus.

A Description of the Building and Place.

Herod having by this time settled his Matters to his Mind, he reckon'd himself out of Danger of any further Commotions and Tumults. He kept his People in Order, partly by Awe, and Fear, and partly by Love and Interest; for he was a Prince of a most Inflexible Severity where a Criminal was to be Punish'd, and of as Unbounded a Liberality, where the Common Good of the Subject requir'd it. He kept himself upon such a Guard, and every thing in such a Posture of Security, as if it were to shew that the Prince and the People are to stand and fall together. He was Humane and Easy, indifferently, to all Men, Strangers as well as Others, and upon Occasion most Munificently Generous to the Great ones; for he had the Heart of an Emperour. By this Means he gain'd a General Love and Esteem, to the Great Advantage of his Affairs and Designs. But this Ambitious Affectation of Ingratiating himself with Augustus, and the Noble Men of Rome, Inveigled him away by little and little from the Discipline and Customs of our Forefathers, into the Erecting of Cities and Temples to the Honour of his Patrons. This was not done, 'tis true, in the very Land of Judæa it self; for the Jews would never have born an Abomination so expresly forbidden, as the Worshipping of Images and Idols, after the Manner of the Greeks: So that he Built these Cities only upon the Borders of the Province, and not within the Jurisdiction of it; Excusing himself upon the whole, that what he did was not any Act of his own, but purely in Obedience to the Higher Powers. He got the Good Will of Cæsar and the Romans however, by the Pretence of Renouncing the Discipline and the Principles he was brought-up in, for their Sakes: But all this apart, the Thing he Aim'd at was his own Advantage, and the making of himself Glorious to Posterity, by these Everlasting Memorials of Magnificence and Bounty.

Of Straton's Tower, or Cæſarea.

THere was a Certain Place by the Sea-ſide, formerly called Straton's Tower, which Herod look'd upon as a very Commodious Tract of Ground to Raiſe a City upon. He drew his Model; ſet People to work upon't, and Finiſh'd it. The Buildings were all of Marble; Private Houſes as well as Palaces; but his Maſter-piece was the Port, which he made as large as the Pyræum, and a ſafe Station againſt all Winds and Weathers; to ſay nothing of other Conveniences. This Work was the more Wonderful, becauſe all the Materials for it were brought thither at a prodigious Expence from a-far-off. This City ſtands in Phœnicia upon the Paſs into Ægypt, between Joppa and Dora; Two wretched Sea-Towns where there's no Riding in the Harbours with a South-weſt Wind; for it beats ſo furiouſly upon the Shore, that Merchant-Men are forc'd to keep-off at Sea many times for fear of being driven a-ground. To Encounter theſe Difficulties of the Place, Herod Order'd a Mole to be made in the Form of a Half-Moon, and large enough for a Royal Navy to Ride in. He directed alſo Prodigious Stores to be let down there in Twenty-Fathom-Water; Stones of Fifty Foot in length, Eighteen Foot over, and nine Foot deep; ſome Greater, ſome Leſs. This Mole was Two Hundred Foot in Extent; the one half of it to break the Setting of the Sea; the other half ſerv'd for the Foundation of a Stone-Wall Fortify'd with Turrets; calling the Largeſt and the Faireſt of them by the Name of the Tower of Druſus, from Druſus the Son-in-law of Auguſtus, who dy'd Young. There were ſeveral Arched Vaults alſo that ſerv'd for Seamens-Cabins. There was likewiſe a Key, or Landing-Place, with a large Walk upon it around the Port, as a Place of Pleaſure to take the Air in. This Port opens to the Northward, which is the cleareſt Quarter of the Heavens. On the Left-hand of the Entrance into it, there was a Turret Erected upon a large Platform, with a ſloping Bank to ſhoot off the Waſhing of the Sea; and on the Righ-hand, were Two Stone-Pillars over againſt the Tower, and both of a Height. The Houſes about the Port, were all Uniformly Built, of the moſt Excellent ſort of Marble. Upon a Mount in the Middle, ſtood a Temple, Dedicated to Cæſar, which was of Great Uſe to the Mariners, for a famous Sea-Mark. There were in this Temple Two Statues, or Images; the One of Rome; the Other of Cæſar: and from hence the City took the Name of Cæſarea, which was no leſs Celebrated for the Stuff then for the Workmanſhip. The Contrivance of the Vaults and Common-ſhores was wonderful too, being laid at equal Diſtances one from another, and ſo Diſcharging themſelves into the Sea. Only there was one Conveyance that went Croſs all the reſt; and as it carry'd off all the Filth, and Naſtineſs of the Town, ſo it made way for the Tides to Swill, and Waſh the Paſſages; and to make all Sweet and Clean. Herod built alſo a Stone-Theatre; and upon the South-ſide of the Harbour, a Spatious Amphitheatre, with a Goodly Proſpect to the Sea-ward. He ſpared, in ſhort, for neither Mony nor Pains; and in a Matter of Twelve Years, This Work was brought to Perfection.

After the Finiſhing of theſe Two Cities, Sebaſte, and Cæſarea, Herod Diſpatch'd away his Two Sons, Alexander, and Ariſtobulus, upon a Complement to Cæſar. Pollio, that was Herod's Particular Friend, provided Lodgings for them; which was more then needed, for Auguſtus had given Order for the Entertaining of them in his own Palace. He received them, in fine, with wonderful Humanity, and after the Additional Bounty of Conferring upon Herod the Three Provinces, of Trachon, Batanæa, and Auranitis, he gave him his Choice likewiſe, which of his Sons he would appoint for his Succeſſor to the Kingdom of Judæa. People of Damaſcus. Now Zenodorus was ſo far from Diſcountenancing theſe Robbers, that he went Shares with them in their Booty. The ſuffering part of the Country, upon theſe Outrages, apply'd themſelves to [a] Varro, who was at that time Governour of the Province, for a Letter to Cæſar againſt Zenodorus; whoſe Anſwer was, that he would have thoſe Thieves ſmoak'd out of their Holes like Hornets, and commit the Care, and Command of that Province to Herod, to keep the Trachonites in Order for the Future. Now they had neither Towns, Houſes, nor Poſſeſſions; but liv'd like Beaſts in Dens and Caves; and with ſuch a Proportion of Water and Proviſion about them, that it would be a hard matter either to come at them, or to ſtarve them: beſide that making a Livelyhood of the Trade, they would be loth to leave it. The Entrance into their Hiding Places was ſo Narrow, that there was no Paſſing for above one at a time; but the Receptacle within was Large beyond Imagination; and the Roof over-head, Plain and Flat. Take it all together, it is but one Sharp, and almoſt Impaſſable Rock: full of Difficulties and Turnings, and no finding the Right way into't without a Guide. In few Words, Theſe are a People that ſtick at nothing; and rather then not keep their Hands in ure, Rob one another. So ſoon as ever Herod Enter'd into the Poſſeſſion of his New Province, he took his Conductors and Inſtruments along with him; and Hunting them out of their Retreats, ſet the Neighbourhood at Quiet. But Zenodorus was ſo Irritated, whether out of Vexation for the loſs of his Commiſſion, or out of Envy at Herod's having it, that he Poſted away to Rome with an Accuſation in his Mouth againſt Herod, but could do no good on't.

While Matters were in this State, Auguſtus ſent Agrippa into Aſia to take upon him the Command of the Tranſmarine Provinces there. He was Herod's ſingular Friend and Old Acquaintance; ſo that he met him upon the Way at Mitilene, and then went back again to Judæa. He was no ſooner arriv'd, but the Gadarens went preſently Open-Mouth to him with Grievous Complaints againſt Herod; whereupon, without ſo much as giving them the Hearing, he ſent them to the King himſelf in Chains.

The Gadarens complain of him too: and the Arabians;

The Arabians at the ſame time began to ſhew their Teeth upon the Score of an Antient Grudge they had to him, and truly the Pretence ſeem'd to have ſomewhat in it. Zenodorus, (the Perſon before-mentioned) finding himſelf Sinking, came to an Agreement with theſe Arabians for ſo much of his Eſtate in the Province of Aranitis, as they were to pay him Fifty Talents a Year Rent for. Now this happening to fall within Cæſar's Grant to Herod, the Arabians would not ſubmit to't; but Conteſting the Matter, one while by Force, other while by Law, they engaged alſo a Party of Indigent Soldiers in the Controverſy; who, according to the Practice of other Miſerable People in the World, were willing to mend their Own Fortunes upon the Ruines of other Men. Herod knew well enough what they were a-doing; but thought it good Diſcretion yet to deal with them by Fair Means rather then by Foul, for fear of Creating New Troubles. In the Seventeenth Year of Herod's Reign, Cæſar came into Syria, where he was Entertain'd immediately with Outrageous Exclamations of the Gadarens againſt Herod, as a moſt Inſupportable Tyrant and Oppreſſor, and this chiefly at the Inſtance and Inſtigation of Zenodorus, who it ſeems had bound himſelf by an Oath never to give over the Proſecution till they ſhould be Quit of Herod, and under the Dominion once again of Auguſtus. This confident Undertaking of Zenodorus made them ſtill Bolder and Louder; eſpecially finding thoſe Priſoners that were deliver'd-up to Herod by Agrippa, to continue Unpuniſh'd. Now Herod, how Inexorable ſoever toward Offenders of his own Party, was yet of all Men living perhaps the Eaſieſt and the moſt Remiſs in the Caſe of Injuries receiv'd from Strangers. The Miſdemeanours charg'd upon him were Rapine, Oppreſſion; the Violating and the Demoliſhing of Temples, and the like; and Herod, on the other hand, offer'd himſelf as frankly to his Juſtification. Cæſar treated him never the leſs reſpectfully for the Roaring Importunities of the Multitude, though for the Firſt day there paſs'd ſome Diſcourſe upon it; but there the Debate fell, and put an End to the Queſtion. It was ſo Evident by this Time to the Gadarens how Cæſar and his Friend ſtood Affected, that giving for granted it would be their Fate upon the Cloſe of the Matter, to be deliver'd up to Herod, ſome of them cut their own Throats the very next Night; others brake their Necks down Precipices, and ſome again Drown'd themſelves for fear of being put to Tortures: And Cæſar taking this Execution upon themſelves for a Self-Condemnation, acquitted Herod without any more ado. And there was yet another Singular piece of Providence attended him; which was the Death of Zenodorus by a Violent Dyſentery at Antioch in Syria; whereupon Cæſar beſtow'd upon Herod a very Conſiderable Eſtate belonging to him, that lay betwixt Galilee and Trachonitis, Comprizing Ulatha, [b] Panium, and the Borders thereabouts; giving him alſo a Sovereign Command over the Governours of Syria, and Appointing every thing to be done according to his Direction and Order. Herod was now advanced to ſuch a point of Credit and Good Fortune, that as Cæſar and Agrippa were the Two Supreme Adminiſtrators in the whole Empire, ſo Herod was the Man of the World that Cæſar lov'd next to Agrippa, and Agrippa next to Cæſar. By Virtue of this Intereſt, Herod obtained a Tetrarch's Commiſſion in Judæa from Auguſtus for his Brother Pheroras; upon whom he beſtow'd the Revenue of a Hundred Talents out of his proper Income, that he might have ſomething to truſt to in Caſe of the Worſt, without being forced to a Dependence upon his Children. After this, he waited upon Cæſar till he ſaw him Embarqu'd, and then went back again; Erecting to the Honour of Auguſtus, and upon the Ground of Zenodorus, a moſt Glorious Temple of White-Marble, near the Cave that they call'd Panias, which is at the Bottom of a Mountain, Famous for being the Source of the River Jordan. Herod erects a Temple to Auguſtus.

The King took an Occaſion at this time to Ingratiate himſelf with his People, by Eaſing them of a Third part of their Taxes, under pretence of a Tenderneſs for their Sufferings by the Diſtreſs of the Famine; but in Effect to ſweeten Ill Humours: for they were ſo Diſguſted at many things the King did, to the Scandal of Religion, and Good Manners, that every Body's Mouth was open againſt him for it: So that he was fain to make uſe of other ways yet to keep his Subjects Quiet, by tying up every Man to his own Buſ'neſs; prohibiting Caballs, Clubs, and other Publique Meetings; Planting Spies upon all Companies; and Officers every where at Hand to take into Cuſtody all Offenders againſt theſe Orders; as there were ſeveral Committed to the Fort Hyrcania, publiquely, as well as privately, and there puniſh'd with the uttermoſt Rigour. The very Roads, Streets, Paſſes, and Avenues were all Beſet, and Way-laid: All Meetings, upon what Account ſoever; Watch'd and Obſerv'd. Nay ſuch was the Care he took, that he would many times ſlip out by Night himſelf in a Diſguiſe among the Rabble, to Fiſh-out what Opinion the Multitude had of him. Wherever he met with any Man that was Bitter and Malicious, he had no Mercy of him, and for the Moderate ſort, he put them to an Oath of Allegeance, and ſo Diſmiſs'd them. By this Means he brought the Majority, out of Fear, to a Complyance with him; and for thoſe that had the Courage to ſtand upon their Terms, and to Diſpute the Point, he never fail'd of ſome Device or other to Remove them out of the Way. This Oath was put to Pollio the Phariſee, and to Sameas, with their Diſciples, as well as to the reſt; but they refuſing it, Herod, out of the Reverence he had for Pollio, preſt them no further to the Taking of it. And he was as kind to the Eſſenes too; a Sect ſomewhat like the Pythagoreans among the Greeks. We have ſpoken a great deal of them elſewhere already: But it will not be amiſs however to ſay ſomewhat further in this Place; and how Herod came to have ſo Tender an Eſteem for theſe People.

He makes himſelf Popular, to attone for his Apoſtacy from Religion and Good Manners.

His Care to prevent Tumults.

Herod's Kindneſs for the Phariſees and Eſſenes.

There was one Manahem, an Eſſene, who, over and above the Virtue, and the Character of an Exemplary Probity of Life, was likewiſe Endu'd with the Spirit of Prophecy. This Perſon, upon the Sight of Herod, among his School-Fellows, when he was a Boy, Greeted him with a Salutation of Hail King of the Jews. The Boy told him that he was not of a Family to be a King, and ſo took him up ſhort, either that he did not know him, or that he Laugh'd at him. Yes, yes, ſays Manahem; ſmiling upon him, and laying his hand gently upon his Shoulder, You are to be a King, and you ſhall Rule Happily; for it is the Pleaſure of God that it ſhall be ſo: But keep theſe Words of Manahem in Mind now, which will give you to Underſtand the Inſtability of your Fortune. It will be your Duty to Govern with Juſtice, Conſcience and Equity; but I have a Secret Impulſe which tells me, that you will never Menage your Authority by theſe Meaſures. You will keep touch neither with God nor Man; though in all other Reſpects a Fortunate Perſon, and Worthy of Immortal Honour. Depend upon it, that God will find you out, and bring you to your End by a moſt Deplorable Judgment.

The Prediction of one Manahem an Eſſene.

Herod gave little heed to theſe Words, as a Matter that never enter'd into his Thought; but when he came afterward to the Throne, and to the Higheſt Pitch of his Glory, he ſent for Manahem, and ask'd him how long he thought he ſhould Reign: Manahem returning an uncertain Anſwer, Herod put it to him again; whether he thought he ſhould Reign Ten Year. Yes, yes, ſays Manahem, and Twenty, and Thirty: and there he ſtopt, leaving the Preciſe Period Undetermin'd; but Herod reſting Satisfy'd with what he had heard, took a Friendly leave of him, and from that time forward had always a Great Eſteem for the Eſſenes. This may poſſibly appear Incredible; but the Reader may conſider that we have many Inſtances of Good Men to whom Allmighty God has been pleaſed to reveal his Secret Purpoſes and Counſels.

AFter ſo many Great and Glorious Actions, and the Finiſhing of ſo many Magnificent and Pompous Buildings, Herod bethought himſelf in the Eighteenth Year of his Reign, of Erecting a Temple to the Holy God, in all reſpects Larger, and more Stately then the Former, and a Work that he made Account would redound more to the Honour of his Name and Memory, (as in truth it did) then all that he had ever done before; But yet leſt the People ſhould ſtumble at the Difficulty of the Undertaking, he call'd them together to try what might be done by Reaſon and Diſcourſe, to the Removing of that Rub out of the Way.

Herod propoſes the Erecting of a Temple, with a Salvo to all Objections.

It would be time loſt, ſays he, my Friends and Countrymen, to give you the Hiſtory of my Doings ſince I came to the Crown; wherefore let it ſuffice that I have more attended to your Benefit and Security then to my own particular Reputation. You know very well what Care I have taken for you in your Greateſt Extremities, and without any Regard to my own Profit; and you know likewiſe that you your ſelves have had the Greateſt ſhare in the Advantage of all the Mighty Works, which by God's Bleſſing and Aſſiſtance I have brought to Perfection: Inſomuch that Judæa is in a better State at this Day then ever it was: Wherefore, as I was a-ſaying, there will be no need of running into the Particulars of the Cities, Caſtles, Palaces, &c. that I have either Built, Fortify'd, or Repair'd in Judæa, and the Tributary Provinces. But the ſhort Sum of my Preſent Buſineſs is Matter of Worſhip and Religion, and what concerns the Reputation of your Country. You ſhall do well to Obſerve, that this Temple that was Erected by our Forefathers at their Return from Babylon, wants Sixty Cubits of the Height of Solomon's; and this was no Fault of our Anceſtors neither: for it was not long of them that it came not up to the Proportion of the Firſt; being raiſed according to the Expreſs Model of Cyrus, and Darius the Son of Hyſtaſpes, under whoſe Dominion they then liv'd, as afterward under the Macedonians: So that they had it not in their Power to Advance that Monument of their Piety and Zeal up to the Meaſures of the Original. But ſince God hath been now pleaſed in his Gracious Providence to put the Government into my Hands, and at the ſame time to furniſh me with all neceſſary Means for the Accompliſhing of my End; as Peace, Leiſure, Ready Mony, a Large Competency of Revenue: and which is more then all the reſt, the Maſters of the whole World to Friend: (that is to ſay, the Romans) It ſhall be my Care and Buſineſs now to ſupply thoſe Defects which it was not poſſible for our Predeceſſors under their Circumſtances to prevent: and to do that Right, in fine, to the Glory of God, which we have hitherto been ſhort in, with all Due Reverence to his Holy Name, and with a Gratitude ſuitable to the Mercies we have receiv'd.

The People were ſo ſurpriz'd at this Unexpected Diſcourſe and Declaration, that it put them all to their Wits End to conſider what would come of it; beſide the Anxious Dread they had of having the Old Temple pull'd down, before they were ſure of Another in the Place of it; which, in truth, they Deſpair'd of, as an Enterpriſe next to Impracticable. This put them to a Stand; but the King finding what it was they ſtuck at, bad them reſt ſatisfy'd that the Old Temple ſhould ſtand Firm, and Untouch'd, till all the Stuff for the New one ſhould be Prepar'd; and he was as good as his Word.

The Old Temple not to be Touch'd till the New one is provided for.

He provided a Hundred Carriages for Stones and other Neceſſaries; Ten Thouſand Artiſts in all Handicrafts, the beſt of every ſort that were to be gotten. A Thouſand Prieſts that [a] underſtood Maſons and Carpenters Work, to overlook them, which he furniſhed with Sacerdotal Robes and Veſtments at his own Charge. The Artificers, Stones, Timber, and all the Preparatory Materials being now in readyneſs, the firſt Work they ſet upon was the clearing of the Old Foundation, and the laying of a New one; upon which Baſis they raiſed the Superſtructure of a Temple a Hundred Cubits in length and a Hundred and Twenty in Height; but the Odd Twenty Cubits ſinking afterwards, it fell ſo much ſhort of the Firſt Deſign; which our Anceſtors in the Days of Nero had ſome thought of Supplying. The whole Fabrick was made of Durable White Stone Five and Twenty Cubits-Long, Eight in Heighth, and Twelve over.

Herod prepares the Materials, and enters upon the Work.

The Front of this wonderful Pile had the Reſemblance of a Palace; much Higher in the Middle then on the Sides, and looking with ſuch a Proſpect into the Fields as was very Agreeable to thoſe that either liv'd directly over againſt it, or were Travelling towards it: And this View extended ſeveral Furlongs into the Country. [a] The Porch was a Curioſity Anſwerable to the Artifice of the reſt; the Upper-part of it ſet-out with Variety of Rich Tapeſtry, and Delicate Purple Flowers, with Pillars interwoven, and a Golden Vine creeping and twining about them; the Branches of it laden with Cluſters of Grapes that hung dangling down from the Corniſhes: a piece of Maſtery no leſs Valuable for the Skill then the Matter.

The Galleries. Round about the Temple were Large-Galleries, not Inferior to the reſt of the Work, in Magnificence; but much exceeding all that ever was before them for Grace and Beauty. Two of theſe Galleries were ſupported by Two ſtrong Walls; a Work of as Singular an Excellency as any we have ſeen yet.

The Temple-Walls. There was a Steep Rocky Hillock, but with a Gentle Deſcent to the Eaſtward of the City, which Solomon, a long time before by God's ſpecial Direction, Encompaſs'd with a Wall, and the Lower-part of it was ſurrounded with another Wall, and a deep Valley under it toward the South. This Wall was Compacted of mighty Stones cramped together with Irons, including the Whole, and reaching down to the Bottom of the Hill. The Form of the work was Square, and conſidering the Depth, and the Magnitude of it, an Incomparable Piece. The vaſt Bigneſs of theſe Stones was beſt ſeen on the outſide, being joynted within, one into another, to keep them Firm againſt all Weathers.

When this Wall was run-up to the Top, the Space betwixt that and the Hill, was all fill'd-up till it came to a Level, and then Four Galleries, reckoning every Gallery to be a Furlong-over. There was alſo within the Square, Another Stone-Wall, carry'd round the Top of the Hill, with a double Porch to the Eaſtward facing the Portal of the Temple, that ſtands in the Middle. This Portal was glorioufly Adorn'd by the Royal Bounty of ſeveral Princes; and round about the Temple it ſelf were the Spoils and Trophies that had been taken from the Barbarians, which Herod Dedicated over again, with the Addition of others of Later Date, that he himſelf had taken from the Arabians.

Baris, or the Tower. Upon one of the Angles on the North-ſide, ſtood a Strong well-Fortify'd Building, the Work of ſome of the Aſmonæans, a Family that for a long time Executed the Authority both of Prince, and High-Prieſt. They call'd this Place Baris, or the Tower, and there they kept the Pontifical Habits, which according to Cuſtom were never to be taken-out, but when the High-Prieſt was juſt about to Officiate. Herod apply'd it alſo to the ſame Uſe; but after his Death, it came to be lodg'd in the Hands of the Romans: and there it reſted till the time of Tiberius; in whoſe Reign, Vitellius being made Governour of Syria, and going to take Poſſeſſion of his Command, was ſo Honourably treated at Jeruſalem, that in Acknowledgment of their Affection and Reſpect, he prevail'd with Cæſar on the behalf of the Jews; and at their Earneſt Requeſt, that they might have the keeping of the Sacred Depoſitum, or the Stola Sacerdotalis, to themſelves. This Petition being granted, it continu'd in their Cuſtody till after the Death of King Agrippa: at which time Caſſius Longinus, the Governour of Syria, and Cuſpius Fadus, Lieutenant of Judæa, order'd the Depoſiting of the Holy Habits in the Fort Antonia: inſiſting upon it, that they ought to be ſtill in the Power of the Romans as they were formerly. Hereupon they ſent away their Deputies immediately to Claudius Cæſar to Sollicit this Affair. The Young King Agrippa, happening to be then at Rome, begg'd of Cæſar the charge of theſe Habits, which was forthwith granted him, and Orders ſent to Vitellius to deliver them. The Sacred Robes were formerly kept under the Seal of the High-Prieſt, and the Treaſurer of the Temple; who, upon the Eve of their Solemn Feſtivals, apply'd themſelves ſtill to the Commander in chief of the Fort for the Romans; ſhew'd him their Seal, and took-out the Stole; and then when the Holy Office was over, carry'd it back again to the ſame Place, and there in the preſence of the Governour, ſealed it up and left it. I ſhould not have been ſo Particular in this Point, but for the many Changes that have happen'd in this Proceeding. This Fort was a Place of Great Strength already; but Herod ſtill Fortify'd it more and more, and in ſo doing he Fortify'd the Temple alſo; giving it the Name at laſt of Antonia, in Honour of his Great Friend Anthony once Emperour of the Romans.

The Fort Antonia.

A Plan of the Temple, or the Firſt Encloſure. On the Weſt-ſide of the Wall there were Four Gates: One led to the Court, croſs a Valley that lay betwixt; Two to the Suburbs, and the Laſt to the City: with a Deſcent of a Great many Steps down to the Valley, and an Aſcent on the other ſide of as many Steps up to the Top. The City ſtood juſt over againſt the Temple, with the Appearance of a Theatre, bounded toward the South with a Deep Valley. In the middle of That Square was Another Gate juſt Equi-diſtant from the Two Angles, with a Triple Stately Gallery, ſtretching from the Eaſt-ſide of the Valley to the Weſt; which was the Uttermoſt Length the Place would bear. There never was any thing under the Sun more Confounding then this Spectacle: for the Valley was of ſo Prodigious a Depth, and the Height of the Building over it, ſo Stupendious, that it turn'd a Body's Eyes and Brain to look down from the Top to the Bottom of it. Theſe Galleries reſted upon Four Rows of Pillars Equally diſtant one from another; and a Stone-Wall wrought-up betwixt thoſe of the Fourth Rank. The Pillars themſelves were as much about as Three Men could Fathom; Seven and Twenty Foot in length, and upon a Double Baſe. The Number of them was One Hundred Sixty Two in the Whole; the Chapters Fair and Curious to a Miracle; and the Sculpture Corinthian Work. Between theſe Four Rows of Pillars were Three Galleries; Two of them alike; that is to ſay, Thirty Foot broad a piece, upward of Fifty in Height, and a Furlong in Length: but that in the middle was half as broad again as the other, and Twice as High. In the Wainſcoting, there was great Variety of Curious Figures. The Roof of the Middle Gallery, was ſupported with Stone-Work; ſo Delicately wrought, and Cemented together, that it look'd like one Entire Stone.

This may ſerve for a Deſcription of the Firſt Encloſure, and there was Another not far off with a Stone-Wall, and ſome Two Steps up to't, with a Partition of Stone; and an Inſcription upon it, prohibiting any Strangers to Enter there upon pain of Death. This Inward Encloſure had Three Gates toward the South and North of an Equal Diſtance one from the other: and to the Eaſtward, Another much Larger, where Men that were Purify'd had Admittance with their Wives; but the Women were not permitted to paſs any further. Another Encloſure.

There was Another place in the Middle betwixt the other Two, where it was Lawful only for the Prieſts to Enter; and that was it where the Temple was Erected, and before it, the Altar, where they offer'd-up their Sacrifices. Now Herod durſt not preſume to Enter into that Place Himſelf, becauſe not being a Prieſt, he ſtood Prohibited by the Law: So that he committed the Care of this part of the Holy-Work to the Prieſts Themſelves; which they finiſh'd in Eighteen Months, when he himſelf had been Eight Years a Finiſhing the reſt. The Middle Encloſure. The work finiſhed in 18 Months.

The People were Overjoy'd to ſee ſo Great a Work over in ſo ſhort a time, giving God Thanks for his Bleſſing upon the Undertaking, and Extolling the King to the Heavens, for the Zeal he had ſhewn to God's Holy Worſhip. The Reſtauration of the Temple was now Celebrated with an Univerſal Joy; a Sacrifice of Three Hundred Oxen upon the King's Account, and ſo for the reſt in their Proportion; which amounted to a Number, in the Whole, hardly to be Computed. And the Solemnity was as much beyond Expectation too; for the Dedication of the Temple, and the Anniverſary of Herod's coming to the Crown, falling-out upon the ſame Day, doubled the Solemnity. Among other of his Temple-works, the Vault muſt not be forgotten, that Herod cauſed to be carry'd under-ground from the Fort Antonia to the Eaſt-Gate of the Temple, where he Erected another Fort; This Vault being deſigned for a Private, and ſafe Retreat, either for himſelf or his Succeſſors, in caſe of any Seditious Practice againſt the Government. There goes a Tradition, that it never rain'd in the Day time all the while this Temple was a building, but only in the Night, out of a Divine Care (as it was Interpreted) not to Interrupt the Progreſs of the Work. This Story hath been handed down to us from Father to Son, and it conſiſts well enough with the Methods of God's Providence, where his Worſhip is concern'd. But let this Suffice as to the Reſtauration of the Temple. The Dedication of the Temple. A Privy-Paſſage of Communication from Fort to Fort.

A Law against House-Breakers.

THE King taking it for a Duty belonging to his Office, to see Justice done Indifferently both in Town and Country; and Private as well as Publique, made a New Law for the Punishing of House-Breakers, to this Effect: That all Offenders in That kind should be sold for Slaves, to any that would purchase them; without Exception, even to Strangers. Now the People did not take this so much for an Animadversion upon the Malefactor, as for an Encroachment upon the Laws and Customs of the Nation: for the Subjecting of People to the Impositions of Men, that liv'd by other Rules and Measures, does not so much hurt to the Criminal in the Penalty, as to Religion it self in the Example: And therefore Our Ancient Laws have made a Good Provision in the case, by condemning the Felon to a Four-fold Restitution, if he be worth it; or if Insolent, to be sold, but not to Strangers, nor into Perpetual Slavery, and at the end of Seven Years to be Discharg'd. The Construction, in fine, that they made of this New Law, was, that it was Unkingly, Tyrannical and Unjust; and a Deliberate Contempt upon the establish'd Practice and Discipline. At this rate of Liberty did every Body talk of the King. Much about this time Herod took a Voyage into Italy, to make his Court to the Emperour, and to look after his Sons there, whom he found every way accomplish'd, in the understanding both of Letters and Bus'ness. Cæsar treated him with Singular Humanity and Honour, and deliver'd the Young Princes back to their Father in much better Circumstances then he receiv'd them. They were well made, Tall, and Graceful, and gave to Understand in their Conversation and Behaviour, that the Excellency of their Minds was not Inferior, in proportion, to the Agreeableness of their Persons: and taking All together, there appear'd somewhat of a Royal Dignity in whatever they did. When Herod had paid his Complement, he took leave of Cæsar, and went back with his Charge; where they were no sooner Arriv'd, but all people were gazing upon them with Joy and Admiration. This did not please Salome the King's Sister, nor any of the Complices in the Ruin of Mariamne; for they looked upon them with Jealousy, and Envy, in their Hearts, and as Instruments that Providence had Preserv'd, and Rais'd-up to Revenge the Death of their Mother. With these Thoughts in their Heads they Emprov'd the Matter they had to Work upon, by Scandalous Calumnies and Suggestions. The Sons, they said, would never endure the Conversation of their Father, after the Dipping his Hands in the Innocent Bloud of their Mother. They found in short, no good to be done upon the Father against the Sons, but by Slanderous Insinuations, and that was the Course therefore, they resolved to put in Ure. It must not be suppos'd that they talk'd at this rate to the King himself; but they left the Poyson to work rather in Wand'ring Hints, and Rumours, among the People, making no doubt but some way or other it would come to the King's Ear at last, and Probably Create in him such an Aversion to his Sons, as would utterly destroy the natural Affection of a Father.

Herod marries Ariſtobulus to Berenice, and Alexander to Glaphyra. Agrippa gives Herod a viſit.

THIS Conſpiracy of Salome and the reſt had wrought nothing as yet upon the Confidence and Paternal Affection of Herod; but he continu'd open, kind, and eaſy to his Sons as poſſible, and without any Suſpicion or Reſerve. The Firſt Thing he did was to Match them into Princely Families; Ariſtobulus to Berenice the Daughter of Salome; and Alexander to Glaphyra, the Daughter of Archelaus King of Cappadocia.

Herod marries Ariſtobulus to Berenice, and Alexander to Glaphyra.

Being given to Underſtand by this time, that Marcus Agrippa was gone back again out of Italy into Aſia, he went over to him with a Generous and a Friendly Tender of all Service and Reſpect, and Earneſtly beſought him for the Honour of a Viſit. This Requeſt being granted, there was nothing wanting on Herod's Part that might contribute to Agrippa's Welcome and Satisfaction. He ſhew'd him all the Glorious Cities and Palaces that he had lately Built, or Repair'd; carrying him to Sebaſte, the Port of Cæſarea, and the Forts of Alexandrion, Herodion, Hyrcania, &c. where he treated Agrippa and his Friends with all the Splendor and Magnificence imaginable. After this Tour, he Conducted him to Jeruſalem, where he was received by the whole Multitude with the Joy, Pomp, and Acclamations of a Solemn Feſtival: Agrippa, to Crown the Work, dedicating to God the Sacrifice of a Hecatomb, and Feaſting the People. He was ſo well pleas'd with his Journy, and his Entertainment, that he would fain have ſtay'd longer; but Winter coming-on, and thoſe Seas being Dangerous, he Embarqued with his Troups for Jonia, laden with Honours and Preſents.

WHen Herod had paſs'd the Winter at Home, he took Another Voyage upon the opening of the Spring to find out Agrippa; who according to his Intelligence was gone with an Army toward the Boſphorus. Herod took Shipping for Lesbos, where he ſuppoſed he might meet with him; but after he had paſs'd Rhodes and Coos, he was driven by a North-wind upon the Iſle of Chios, where he was forc'd to Ly-by for ſome Days. In this Voyage he had many Viſits made him Incognito, which he anſwer'd with ſuitable Preſents in return; and taking Notice in his ſhort ſtay here, of ſeveral Publique Buildings that lay yet in Ruins ever ſince the Mithridatick War, for want of Mony to Repair them, he gave them Credit for a Sum ſufficient to do the Work, with an Expreſs Charge to put it in Hand, and finiſh it the Firſt thing they did.

Herod takes Shipping for Lesbos, in hope to find Agrippa there; driven by contrary Winds upon the Chios.

He repairs the Buildings that were ruin'd by Mithridates.

The Wind coming now about, Herod ſet ſail, firſt to Mitylene, then to Byzantium; and hearing that Agrippa had already paſs'd the Cyaneon Rocks, he made after him with all the ſpeed he could, and joyn'd him at Sinope, a City of Pontus: Agrippa little dreaming of ſuch a Friend, and ſuch a Fleet ſo near him. His coming, in ſhort, was ſo Seaſonable, and the Greeting of the Two Princes reciprocally ſo Tender and Hearty, that nothing could be more Demonſtrative of an Honourable Faith, and Friendſhip, then for One Prince to poſtpone his own Buſineſs, and upon ſuch a pinch of Time too, for the Service of Another. So that Herod and Agrippa were, in Effect, all one, in their Arms, Labours, Hazzards and Councels: And they were both as One in their Delights and Pleaſures too: in Difficulties, out of kindneſs; and in their Diverſions, out of Reſpect. When Agrippa had diſpatch'd what he came for in Pontus, he took his way back again over-land, and ſo they paſs'd through Paphlagonia, Cappadocia, and the Greater Phrygia, to Epheſus, and thence by Sea to Samos. Herod's Magnificence and Generoſity was remarquable by the Many Good Offices he did upon the way; as well by the Power he had with Agrippa, as by large Donatives and Charities, at his Own Expence whetever there was Occaſion for it. There was hardly a Town they paſs'd, but Herod prevail'd with Agrippa for ſomewhat or other in their Favour: upon whoſe Mediation Nothing was deny'd. Agrippa, 'tis true, was in his Own Diſpoſition a Friend, even to Mankind, where he could Oblige any one Man without wronging Another; but it was not amiſs yet, to have ſuch a Remembrancer and Intereeſſor

At the Inſtance of Herod, Agrippa pardon'd the Ilienſians, againſt whom he was highly provoked. He paid an Arrear for the People of Chios, that they had Incurr'd to the Emperour; procured them Privileges; and in one Word, he did all the good he could wherever he came.

UPon their coming into Ionia, there was a mighty Concourſe of Jews of that Province gotten together upon that Occaſion, with Complaints againſt the Natives for breaking-in upon them in the Exerciſe of their Laws and Worſhip; their Officers dragging them from their Meetings to their Courts of Juſtice; and putting a ſtop to the Holy Treaſure that ſhould be ſent to Jeruſalem; forcing them to bear Arms and pay Publique Duties out of their Bare Subſiſtance-Mony; contrary to Common Faith, and to the Liberties and Exemptions granted them by the Romans. Herod laid hold of this Opportunity of doing the Jews a Service, and ſo prevail'd with Agrippa to Grant the Plaintiffs a Hearing; Aſſigning them one Nicholas, a Particular Friend of his, for their Counſel. There was a Court call'd upon this Occaſion, Agrippa himſelf being Preſent, together with a Bench of Honourable Romans, ſeveral Princes, and other Great Men; the Advocate opening the Cauſe after this Manner.

Nicholas of Counſel for the Jews.

Whither, moſt Illuſtrious Agrippa, ſhould the Miſerable and Oppreſſed fly for Sanctuary and Relief, but to thoſe Princes that are able to Protect and to Relieve them? This is the Caſe of your Humble Supplicants; and we muſt preſume to Appeal from your Authority to your Juſtice, in a full Confidence of your Royal Goodneſs; for we have nothing more to deſire at preſent, then the Poſſeſſion and Enjoyment of what you your ſelves have granted us already, and which our Fellow-Subjects are now Endeavouring to take from us. If the Favours we Enjoy be great, we doubt not but you will now think us as Worthy to keep them, as you found us before to receive them. If the Benefit be ſmall, it reflects upon your Honour to Imagine that you are not able to make it Good: Neither is this a Greater Injury to Us, then it is an Indignity to your ſelves in the Contempt of your Judgment, and in the Diſappointment of your Pious Intentions. If it were put to theſe very People, whether they would rather part with their Lives, or with their Laws, Cuſtoms, Diſcipline, Sacrifices, Feſtivals, &c. in Honour of their Gods, I think, with Submiſſion, that a Body may ſafely Anſwer for them, they would chuſe the Former. It is a common thing to take-up Arms for Religion: And what is the Great Bleſſing of the Peace and Freedom the World Enjoys under the Roman Empire, but that every Honeſt Man may Live and Worſhip after his own Way? What Pretence is there for People to Impoſe that upon Others, which they will not ſubmit to themſelves? as if it were not all one whether we hinder another Man from doing his Duty, or Neglect our Own. It is a Thing further to be conſider'd that there is no City, People or Nation Extant, that does not depend upon the Adminiſtration, and the Power of Rome, for all the Happineſs they can pretend to? Will any thing now but a Madman, reckon it his Intereſt to Fruſtrate your Bounties? When every Man living, ſome way or other ſhall be a Loſer by it? Our Enemies are not aware of it, that while they Labour to Invalidate our Rights, they deſtroy their own: for why ſhould the ſame Conceſſions be Good to them, and Void to us? And that Ineſtimable Priviledge among the reſt, of living at Eaſe and Liberty, under the Protection of the Roman Emperours, while ſeveral other Nations lie groaning in a State of Servitude at the Mercy of Rigorous Kings. Neither is ours, at the beſt, a Condition to be Envy'd; for as to other Matters, we deſire nothing more then a Common ſhare of Advantage with the reſt of our Fellow-Subjects; provided we may but be allow'd to Worſhip God after the Manner of our Forefathers: which, as it is Innocent in it ſelf on the one Hand; ſo it is for the Service of thoſe that permit it, on the Other: for God does not only love thoſe that Worſhip him themſelves, but thoſe alſo that Encourage the Worſhip of him in Others. What is there in our way of Holy Offices that any Sober Man can take Offence at? Or, in truth, that is not in all Reſpects agreeable to Piety and Juſtice? We make no Difficulty of owning the Rules and Precepts of our Lives and Profeſſion. The Seventh Day is a Day of Reſt from all our Labours, and a Day that we ſet apart for the Study of the Law, as a Diſcipline that much conduces to the Rectifying of our Manners. Now theſe Cuſtoms of ours are not only Blameleſs in themſelves, even upon the Strickeſt Examination of them, but Venerable even for their Antiquity; (all Cavils to the Contrary notwithſtanding) ſo that there can

Your Wiſdom conſults indifferently the Common Welfare of all your People, in the Promoting of Peace, and the Preventing of Fewds. It is againſt theſe Injuries, moſt Excellent* Agrippa, that we crave to be Relieved, and that we may be allow'd the ſame Liberty hereafter in our Lives and Converſations, that we have Enjoy'd heretofore; and that our Adverſaries may have no more Advantage over us then we pretend to over them. We take this to be a Juſtice, not only in the Reaſon of the Thing, but in the Right which your Goodneſs has given us to it by declaring in our Favour; to which Purpoſe there are at This Day to be ſeen in the Capitol ſeveral Decrees of the Senate in Tables of Braſs, for the Perpetual Memory of the Thing. Theſe Monumental Records were Undoubtedly grounded upon the Experiment of our Faith and Loyalty to the State; beſide that the Obligation would be yet Sacred and Inviolable, even without any Antecedent Merit on our part; for your Generous Goodneſs hath been ever ſo far from Leſſening or Revoking the Bounties you have once beſtow'd (and that not only to us, but to all Mortals) that it hath been your Practice, rather to Amplify and Enlarge them, even beyond all Thought and Expectation, as I could give Inſtances abundantly, if my time would bear it. But not to value our ſelves too much upon our own Services, let our Royal Maſter's Good Offices ſpeak for us. Where did he ever fail, to the Uttermoſt of his Power, to Oblige your Nation? Has not his Faith and Zeal for your Intereſt be entry'd over and over? Has he not made the Advancing of your Honour his Buſ'neſs and his Study? Were your Affairs ever in any Difficulty, and he not Eſpouſe them as his Own? So that if it were but for our King's ſake, we might pretend to ſome ſort of Conſideration. We muſt not forget the Services of his Father Antipater neither, nor the Enforcement of Two Thouſand Auxiliaries that he brought to Cæſar in Ægypt, where his Behaviour was ſo ſignally Brave, and ſo much to the Advantage of the Empire, that he had the Reputation of not being Inferiour to any Man Living, either at Sea or at Land, for Conduct and Courage. We might appeal to the Glorious Preſents that Cæſar made him, or rather to the Letters Recommendatory that he wrote to the Senate in his Favour, upon this Occaſion, by which he obtained for him the Priviledge of a Citizen of Rome; with other Additional Honours. This Single Argument, Great Prince, might be Sufficient, even of it ſelf, to Evince that Thoſe Favours were at firſt well beſtow'd, which we are now Imploring may be Confirm'd: beſide that conſidering the Preſent League of Friendſhip betwixt your ſelf and our Royal Sovereign, we do rather Hope for an Augmentation of your Bounty, then Fear any Abatement of it. I might enlarge upon your Holy Vows and Sacrifices at Jeruſalem; the Splendor of your Entertainments, and the Satisfaction you were pleaſed to own in the Reciprocal Exchange of Offices of Hoſpitality and Reſpect, which were all Evident Proofs of an Affectionate Tenderneſs, and an Amicable Underſtanding betwixt the Jews and the Romans, Confirm'd and Ratify'd under the very Roof of the King himſelf. Now our Final Requeſt to the Majeſty of Agrippa, and in the preſence of the King of the Jews too, is only This; that we may reap the Fruits of your own Bounty, without being made a Prey to others.

This Diſcourſe of Nicholas went off without any Reply from the Greeks; for it was not a Judicial Tryal of Right; but a Petitionary Complaint only, to get the Grievance remov'd. They could not deny the Fact; but the Jews, they ſaid, were Strangers, and would be a Burden to them; who inſiſted upon it on the other hand, that they were no Strangers, but a People that liv'd in their own way without Offence to God or Man.

When Agrippa came to underſtand how they were Oppreſs'd, he declar'd himſelf in their Favour, as well for the Juſtice of their Cauſe, as out of the reſpect he bare to Herod: and that he thought their Deſires ſo Reaſonable, that if they had been much larger he ſhould have comply'd with them, ſo far at leaſt as would have conſiſted with his Duty to the State of Rome. But ſince I find them ſo Moderate, ſays he, in their Demands, as to Content themſelves with the Ratification of what is already conferr'd upon them, I do here pronounce a Confirmation of the Claim they make to theſe Privileges; and take it further upon my ſelf, that ſo long as they keep themſelves within the Bounds of their Diſcipline and Profeſſion, they ſhall have no more Trouble of this kind for the Future. With theſe Words he diſmiſs'd the Convention, and upon the Breaking of it up, Herod gave Agrippa Infinite Thanks in the Name of the whole Nation; and ſo with an Interchange of Mutual Tenderneſſes and Embraces, betwixt the two Princes, they both left Lesbos.

The Jews in Ionia complain againſt the Natives.

UPon their coming into Ionia, there was a mighty Concourſe of Jews of that Province gotten together upon that Occaſion, with Complaints againſt the Natives for breaking-in upon them in the Exerciſe of their Laws and Worſhip; their Officers dragging them from their Meetings to their Courts of Juſtice; and putting a ſtop to the Holy Treaſure that ſhould be ſent to Jeruſalem; forcing them to bear Arms and pay Publique Duties out of their Bare Subſiſtance-Mony; contrary to Common Faith, and to the Liberties and Exemptions granted them by the Romans. Herod laid hold of this Opportunity of doing the Jews a Service, and ſo prevail'd with Agrippa to Grant the Plaintiffs a Hearing; Aſſigning them one Nicholas, a Particular Friend of his, for their Counſel. There was a Court call'd upon this Occaſion, Agrippa himſelf being Preſent, together with a Bench of Honourable Romans, ſeveral Princes, and other Great Men; the Advocate opening the Cauſe after this Manner.

HEROD, upon parting, put to Sea with a Fair Wind for Cæsarea; and in a few Days, from thence to Jerusalem, where he called the Jews immediately together, Strangers, as well as Citizens, and gave them an Account of his Expedition, and the Great Things he had done for their Friends in Asia, where they were at that Time Free and Easy in their Persons, and in their Religion. He did not forget to mind them neither, how they had prosper'd under his Government; and that he had no Interest in what he did, but the Well-being of his Subjects. And for a further Instance of his Goodness, he did at the same time Discharge them of a Fourth Part of their Tribute. These Fair Words, as they were attended with suitable Effects, chear'd the Hearts of the People, and sent them away with Acclamations in their Mouths, and the Wishes of all Glory, and Prosperity to the King.

Salome's Plot and Practice upon the Two Princes.

WHile this was a-doing abroad, Grudgings and Heart-Burnings were fomented at Home by the Practice of Salome upon the Two Young Princes, whom she hated Mortally: and taking Courage from the Success of her Calumnies upon the Mother, she proceeded with the Greater Confidence in her Design upon her Sons, and with a Resolution not to leave any thing alive that might be in a Condition to Revenge the Bloud of that Innocent Lady. And the Plot was not carry'd-on without some sort of Colour neither; for the Young Men did not behave themselves so respectfully toward their Father as they should have done; partly out of an Indignation for the Violence upon the Person of their Mother, and partly out of an Ambition to get the Rule into their own Hands. The Factious were now at work, betwixt Reviving old Grudges, and Creating new Ones. The Sons railing in downright Scurrility at Salome and Pheroras; and they on the other side as spitefully, but more Slyly, undermining the Brothers: So that though there was no Love lost, they had differing Ways yet of Expressing their Hatred: for the Princes in Heat of Bloud, and in the Simplicity of their Hearts, bolted out at a Venture, whatever came at their Tongue's End: but the other made way to the Execution of their Malice by Artifice, and Disguise, provoking the Young Men to Extravagancies of Language, on purpose to Entrap them. They took it for an Honour, they said, to be the Sons of such a Mother: Insisting upon it still that she was basely Murder'd. Now these Words were a Sufficient Ground for a Calumnious Jealousy to work upon; for they would bear the Construction of Deliberating upon a Revenge with their own Hands. This was now become the Talk of the whole Town, and while every Body else Pity'd the Young Men for the Dangerous Liberties they took of talking at that desperate rate, Salome made her Advantage of their Indiscretions, and emprov'd them to her own Ends. They would be saying commonly in the Heat of their Impatience for the Loss of their Mother, that next to the Miserable Fate of that unhappy Princess, they look'd upon their own Circumstances to be the most Deplorable of all others, in the Necessity of Cohabiting with the Murderers; and in some Measure becoming Partakers of the Crime by Communicating with the Company.

Artificial Calumnies against the Two Brothers.

Herod's being out of the Way all this while, was a Great Advantage to the Menagers of this Intrigue. But soon after his Return now, and the Harangue to the People that I told you of; Salome and Pheroras were presently at work upon him with Cautions and Insinuations of the Danger he was in from his own Sons; and how they made their Publique Braggs that the Murderers of their Mother should never carry it off so. They patch'd up a Story of Archelaus, the King of Cappadocia too; and how they depended upon his Interest with Cæsar to assist them in the Prosecution of their Father. This wrought the more sensibly upon Herod, because he heard the same things over and over again from ſeveral Hands. Upon this Occaſion he could not but call to Mind the Miſeries he had already endured by Factions in his Family, even to the Depriving him of his Beloved Friends, and the Deareſt Wife in Nature. With theſe Reflexions in his Head, and taking his Meaſure of Things to come by Things paſt, the Proſpect before him was ſo Confounding, that he had no longer the Uſe of his Reaſon. He was, in ſhort, Fortunate abroad, beyond all Thought, or Imagination; and no leſs Wretched at Home: Inſomuch that conſidering both Extremes, it may be a Queſtion whether the Glory of his Proſperous Condition in the World was ſufficient to Ballance the Calamity of his Family-Diſtempers; and whether he might not have been a Happier Man in a Private State betwixt both.

While he was now caſting-about what Courſe to Steer, he bethought himſelf of taking another Son he had, that he brought up privately, into his Family, and there to Entertain him with Honour and Reſpect, propoſing by this Means to take down the Stomachs of the Brothers: His Name was Antipater. Now Herod had no Thought at firſt of putting the Government into this Young Man's Hand (as out of a Fond Facility afterward he did) but he betook himſelf to this Experient by way of Tryal, to ſee if he would put a Check upon the Inſolencies of Mariamne's Children, and bring them to better Reaſon, when they ſhould find, that let them do what they would, the Government ſhould not want a Succeſſor. In this Contemplation, Herod treated Antipater with a Countenance of Authority and Truſt; and as the next Pretender to the Crown; making no Doubt, all this while, of Reducing his other Sons by this Means, within the Bounds of Modeſty and Duty. But it fell-out quite otherwiſe, for they reſented it as an Affront; ſo that inſtead of a Curb, it prov'd a Provocation. Antipater, when he had now got Footing, and ſo much beyond his Expectation too, was not a Man to quit his Ground; but on the Contrary, labour'd with all his might by Tales and Calumnies to ſupplant his Brothers in the Affection of their Father; who was in truth ſo Credulous, and Open, to thoſe Ill Offices, and Impreſſions, that he eaſily gain'd his Point to his own Wiſh, and wrought him into an Averſion that grew every day more Implacable then other. His Heart was ſo ſet upon this Project, that he ſcarce minded any thing elſe; but only to keep himſelf upon his Guard, without ſo much as one hard Word of his Brother: for he menag'd his Deſign by ſuch other Inſtruments as he knew the King would give Credit to, and as he might ſafely Depend upon himſelf. Antipater was now look'd upon as the Riſing Son, and Court made to him accordingly, as the ready way to Preferment; his Party covering the whole Practice ſtill, with a pretended Zeal for the Service of Herod. The Confidents of this Secret being all True to the Plot, made Advantage of the Young Men's Impotences in Heat and Paſſion, who laid themſelves now opener then before: Breaking out by Fits into Tears and Exclamations; Fierce Remonſtrances of the Intolerable Wrongs and Affronts that they Endur'd; calling out in a Bitterneſs of their Hearts upon the Ghoſt of their Innocent Mother, and charging their Father, in plain Terms, with manifeſt Injuſtice. Now all theſe Intemperances were Watch'd and Obſerv'd by the Complices of Antipater, and then carry'd to Herod, with Improvements and Additions to widen the Breach. Theſe Incendiaries had ſo Exaſperated the King, that he reveng'd himſelf upon Alexander and Ariſtobulus, by heaping more and more Honours and Favours upon Antipater; who in the Concluſion ſo far prevail'd upon Herod that he got his Mother ſent for to Court, and Recommendatory Letters to Cæſar for himſelf, much to his Credit, and Advantage. And finally, upon Agrippa's Return to Rome, after Ten Years Adminiſtration in Aſia, Herod made a Voyage by Sea to Complement him upon the Way, and took only Antipater, of all his Sons, along with him, together with many Rich Preſents: And upon Parting, he begg'd the Favour of Agrippa, that his Son might wait upon him to Rome, and be there Introduced by him to Cæſar. This was to ſhew that all was done now by Antipater, to the Excluſion of his Two Brothers.

ble for fear he might poſſibly come to Change his Mind, and be brought over to Terms of more Moderation toward the Children of Mariamne. This ran in his Head; but he purſu'd his Firſt Point ſtill: and what he could not now do by word of Mouth, he ſupply'd by ſpiteful Letters to keep-up the Evil Humour, upon the Pretext of being wonderfully in pain for his Father's Safety, when he was, in truth, working his way all this while by Under-hand Practices to poſſeſs himſelf of the Government, having already Tranſported Herod to ſuch a degree of Diſpleaſure, that his Sons had not in the World a Greater Enemy. But this Unnatural Rigour was not yet without ſome Intervals of Reluctancy; ſo that for fear of doing any Raſh Thing in his Anger, eſpecially in the caſe of a Father and his Children, he took up a Reſolution of Another Journy to Rome, and there openly to exhibit an Accuſation againſt his Sons to Cæſar; but miſſing him at Rome, he follow'd him to Aquileia: where Herod, upon an Application to him for Leave to bring an Unhappy Cauſe before him, produced his Two Sons, and charg'd them, not only with Inſolence; but an Attempt to Poyſon him: aggravating the Malice and the Horror of the Wickedneſs to the Degree of a Conſpiracy againſt the Crown and Dignity of their Father. And all this, notwithſtanding the Licence Cæſar had given him to leave the Succeſſion to which of his Sons he pleas'd; or to Him of the Two that he ſhould find moſt Dutiful. Nay and in caſe of their failing of the Sovereignty themſelves, They would be Content, even with the Single Death of their Father, though with the Uttermoſt Peril of their own Lives in the Procuring of it: So inhumane ſays he, and ſo Impious is the Rancour that is ſettled in the Minds of theſe Young Men. And ſo he went on, how long he had born theſe Indignities: which he was now at laſt Enforced, even againſt Duty and Good Manners, to obtrude upon Cæſar's Ear and Patience. But what have I done, ſays he, to deſerve this. Whom have I wrong'd? Or with what Face ſhall any Man pretend to Diſpoſſeſs a Prince ſo long ſettled in the Exerciſe of a Power Acquired by ſo many Hazzards! Or to bar him the liberty of leaving it, when he goes off, to Him that ſhall by his Faithful Piety beſt deſerve it? this would be Reaſonable, if it were but to provoke a Generous Emulation, and to make Virtue the way to Honour: Eſpecially when 'tis againſt Religion, and Nature, ſo much as to Entertain ſo lewd a Thought. For whoever wiſhes himſelf on his Father's Throne, wiſhes the other Dead; in regard that the one cannot ſucceed, while the Other's Living. Can they pretend, ſays he, that ever I was wanting to them in any Office becoming a Gracious Prince, or an Indulgent Father; either in matter of State, Retinue, Curioſities, or the like? Have I not match'd them to Princeſſes of the Firſt Quality? Ariſtobulus to the Daughter of my own Siſter, and Alexander to the Daughter of King Archelaus: Nay, which is more then all the reſt, when I might have Puniſh'd them by my Own Authority, I have rather appealed to Cæſar, the Common Patron and Benefactor of us All: and ſetting aſide the Authority of a Prince, and of a Father, over theſe Treacherous Violators of their Duty, I have now ſet my ſelf upon a Level with my Subjects and Children, to be Determin'd by Cæſar; only with this Requeſt to his Imperial Majeſty, that ſo Enormous a Wickedneſs may not paſs Unpuniſh'd; and I my ſelf ſtand Condemn'd to ſpend the Remainder of my Days in a Reſtleſs Anxiety of Apprehenſion. Theſe Wretches deſerve certainly never to ſee the Light again, after ſo Audacious an Affront, upon the moſt Sacred Rights of Soceity and Humane Nature.

Herod appeals to Cæſar in the Caſe of his Sons.

When Herod had deliver'd his Charge (and with Warmth enough too) the Young Princes that could not but weep now and then, more or leſs, as he was a ſpeaking, burſt out into a Floud of Tears, upon the Finiſhing of his Diſcourſe; not as Conſcious of any Crime, but out of an Honourable Senſe of Piety to ſee their Father their Accuſer; with this Proſpect before them, that they muſt either Conteſt the Cauſe, or Abandon their Own Integrity; The Former being Undecent, and the Other Unſafe. In this Heſitation and Suſpence, they betook themſelves to Sighs and Tears, without one Word ſpeaking: and this Silence, they were afraid, would be taken for Guilt, when in truth, it was only want of Practice, and Aſſurance, being Unwonted to ſpeak before ſuch an Auditory. Cæſar made a Right Judgment of the Matter, and ſo did the whole Aſſembly; who were all moved, to the Higheſt degree of Tenderneſs and Compaſſion, and the Accuſer himſelf among the Reſt.

The Tender and Generous Behaviour of the Brothers.

CHAP. VIII.

Alexander's Addreſs and Defence. The Two Brothers clear'd. Herod preſents Auguſtus; and Auguſtus preſents Herod in Return. Herod goes back with his Sons to Judæa, and meets Archalæus at Eleuſa. He calls a Council at Jeruſalem, and declares his Succeſſor.

IT was by this time Evident, that Cæſar and Herod were both tenderly affected to theſe Unfortunate Princes; inſomuch that ſeveral there preſent wept in Pity of them. So ſoon as they came to take notice of this Favourable Diſpoſition, Alexander, the Elder of the Two addreſs'd himſelf to his Father upon the Subject of their Charge, as follows.

Alexander's Addreſs and Defence.

Sir, we cannot but take it for a clear Evidence of your Good Intentions toward us, that you have brought us to this Place before ſo Great, and Juſt a Judge, and ſo Gracious a Prince, for the Deciſion of our Cauſe, without employing either your Regal, or your Paternal Power over your own Children and People. But in transferring us to Rome, and by way of an Appeal to Cæſar too, it is given manifeſtly to Underſtand that you have a Deſire and Purpoſe to Preſerve us; for Men do not uſe to carry thoſe to Temples and Altars, that they intend to Deſtroy. But yet after all this, for an Aggravation of our Misfortune, we are Conſcious to our ſelves, that we are not worthy to live; if we had but done any thing that looks like Diſloyalty or Ingratitude toward ſo Good a Father; and we had much rather Dye Innocent then ſurvive the Scandal of ſuch a ſuſpicion. If Providence ſhall Enable us to Defend the Truth, the Proof of our Innocence will be a much greater Comfort to us then the Deliverance of our Perſons; but if Calumny ſhould prevail, a Life under thoſe Infamous Circamſtances would be worſe then a Thouſand Deaths. The Pretext of an Ambitious Deſign upon the Government, is well enough Accommodated to the Intemperate Heats of Young Men; and the Inſtance of our Unfortunate Mother furniſhes more Colour for it. But whoſe Caſe, I beſeech you, Sir, may not this be as well as Ours; and why may not the Children of all other Princes under our Circumſtances, be charged with the ſame Deſign, if Suſpicion ſhall paſs for a Proof? For here is only an Invidious Accuſation, without the leaſt Shadow of any Evidence of Preſumption, or ſo much as a Probability to ſupport it. Why is not the Poyſon it ſelf, or the Complices and the Inſtruments of the Practice produced? Where are the Conſpirators; the Conſpiracy, the Bribery, or the Defamatory Letters? But the whole Story, in fine, is Invention and Slander, without any Countenance to give it Credit. A Divided Court, 'tis true is a Great Misfortune; but the Hope of Preferment, which you are pleaſed to call the Reward of Virtue, proves an Incentive many times to all ſorts of Wickedneſs. Nay we Inſiſt ſo far upon our Integrity, that we defy the Whole Earth to diſprove us. As for Scandals, there's no Refuting them, where the Ear is open to the Calumny, and Deaf to the Defence. If we have talk'd at large, it was not meant againſt your ſelf Sir; (which would have ill-becom'd us) but againſt your Tale-bearers. If we have Paſſionately lamented the loſs of our Dear Mother, it was not purely for the Death it ſelf; but out of a Zeal to the Honour of her Memory, which we found Blaſted where ſhe leaſt deſerv'd it. And to what End again ſhould we Aſpire to the Government in the Life-time of our Father? For if we do already Enjoy the Honours belonging to the Royal Family, (as effectually we do) what have we further to ſtruggle for? Or if we are at preſent barr'd of our Right, may we not yet preſume to Wiſh, and Hope for't? Can it be imagin'd that ever the Murderers, in ſuch an Inſtance as this, ſhould ſet up for Succeſſors, when Sea and Land, after ſo Flagitious a Villany, would Conſpire to Ruin them? How would it conſiſt with the Piety of the Subjects, or with the Religion of the Country, to ſet-up Parricides for Kings; and to ſee the Holy Temple that you your ſelf Erected to the Great God, prophaned by the baſeſt of Aſſaſſins? Or all other Conſiderations apart, how ſhould any Man think to deſtroy Herod the Emperor yet Living, and not fall under the Power and Juſtice of Cæſar? We are not ſuch Fools, and Profligates, as we are ſaid to be, but the Misfortune of our Family, rather then the Scandal. Now if there Appears nothing Againſt us, upon any Colorable Pretence; where is the Ground of the Accuſation that Expoſes us for ſuch Impious Wretches. As to the Death of our Mother, 'tis a Conſideration to make us rather Cautious then Outrageous. We might Multiply Words Endleſly; but there's no need of excuſing a thing that never was done. Wherefore we have only this now to beg of the Mighty Cæſar; and at preſent our Sovereign Judge, that if you can Sir, in your Conſcience Diſcharge us of any further Suſpicion for the Future, we may be Allow'd to Live, how Miſerable ſoever; for what can be more Grievous then to lye under the Imputation, even though falſely, of the moſt Horrid of Crimes! But if you go on ſuſpecting us, the Torments of our Own Thoughts will do our Buſ'neſs, without your Help: for we are not ſo Fond of Life, as to think of preſerving it to the Trouble of Him from whom we receiv'd it.

The

The Accuſation was ſo Extravagant that Cæſar had no great Faith in it from the very Beginning; but when he came to Reflect upon the Honeſty and Frankneſs of Alexander's Defence, and the Change of Countenance he obſerv'd in Herod, he was more and more confirm'd in an Opinion that it was not Fair Dealing. The whole Court, in ſhort, was mightily in pain for the Young Princes, and not without Hard Thoughts of the King himſelf, for ſo Raſh and Violent a Proſecution: So that what with the Nonſence of the Story, and the Trouble they were in to ſee the Lives of Two ſuch Lovely Youths in Danger, they reſolved, one and all, to do them the beſt Offices they could; eſpecially after ſo Sober a Reply to ſo provoking a Charge: the Princes ſtill continuing in the ſame Poſture of Modeſty and Sadneſs, with down-caſt Eyes, waiting for the Iſſue; which was not altogether hopeleſs in the Concluſion. For the King himſelf diſcover'd a kind of Conſcious Confuſion in his Looks; as who ſhould ſay, What a Madman was I to bring ſuch a Cauſe as this upon the Stage, without better Proof! Cæſar took notice of all theſe Things; and after a ſhort pauſe to bethink himſelf, came to this Reſolution upon the Whole Matter. That is to ſay; that the Sons were in ſome ſort to blame to give their Father any Cauſe of Jealouſy; but that, upon the main, he acquitted them ſo far, that he Pronounced them Innocent; deſiring Herod at the ſame time to Forgive and Forget, without any further Diſtruſt: and ſo to make a Final End of the Controverſy, as being a moſt Unreaſonable Thing for a Father to Encourage Ill Offices againſt his Own Children; telling him further, that things would Mend in time, and Friends piece again, if they could but come to a Mutual Confidence once, and a Fair Underſtanding one with Another. After this Declaration of himſelf, upon that Occaſion, he beckon'd to the Brothers to come forward, and as they were advancing with Tears in their Eyes, and Submiſſion in their Hearts, and upon the very Point of caſting themſelves at their Father's Feet, the King with Infinite Tenderneſs took them into his Arms, one after the other, and Prevented them. The Surprize of this Unexpected Encounter drew Tears of Joy from the Whole Company; after which Greeting, and the Payment of their Dutiful Acknowledgments to Auguſtus, Herod and his Two Sons went their way together, taking Antipater along with them; the moſt Joy'd Man in the World, as he pretended, at this Reconciliation.

The Two Brothes clear'd.

Some few days after this, Herod, while Auguſtus was Treating the People with Spectacles, and Doles, made Cæſar a Preſent of Three Hundred Talents; who in Requital beſtow'd upon him one Moyety of the Profits of the Mines of Cyprus, and the Diſpoſition of the Other, with ſeveral Honourable Bounties and Commiſſions, over and above. He gave him Liberty alſo to appoint which of his Sons he pleas'd for his Succeſſor; or otherwiſe to divide the Government betwixt them, which he lik'd beſt. Now Cæſar finding him ready to Comply, put only this Bar upon him, that he ſhould not part with it in his own Life-time; but keep his Kingdom in his Power as well as his Children.

Herod preſents Auguſtus; and Auguſtus preſents Herod, in Return.

This was the Poſture of Affairs when Herod returned with his Three Sons for Judæa. The People at Trachonites, a Conſiderable part of that Kingdom, had in his Abſence Revolted, it ſeems; but by the Vigilance and Good Government of the Officers he had left behind him, they were Reduced to their Duty. As Herod and his Sons were upon their Voyage, coming to Eleuſa a City of Cilicia, now called Sebaſte, whom ſhould they find there but Archelaus, the King of Cappadocia; who was even over-joy'd to ſee Herod and his Sons ſo well together again, and to underſtand that his Son-in-law Alexander had acquitted himſelf upon his Tryal with ſo much Honour. Archelaus, in fine, received Herod with all Humanity Imaginable; and ſo after a Reciprocal Exchange of Endearments and Preſents, the Two Kings Parted. Herod immediately upon his Arrival at Jeruſalem, call'd the People together into the Temple, and there Entertain'd them with an Account of his Expedition: and when he had run through the Hiſtory of the Honours Cæſar had done him, and other Paſſages that he had a Mind they ſhould know, he turn'd his Diſcourſe at laſt to his Sons, with a Particular Recommendation of Peace and Unity, as well to the Court as to the Common People; declaring to them in form, that he had appointed his Sons to be his Succeſſors; Antipater, in the Firſt place; and after him, Alexander and Ariſtobulus in their Order. But during My Life, ſays he, You are to own no other Lord and Maſter then my ſelf. I ſpeak this to my Family with my Officers and People of all ſorts whether Military or Civil. Make this the Meaſure of your Allegeance, as ever you hope for one happy Hour. I ſhall grow in Years, 'tis true, but that will be rather an Advantage then an Incapacity; for Age brings Experience, and Experience teaches Men Wiſdom, which can only fit a Man for the Functions of Government; eſpecially accompany'd with other Neceſſary Circumſtances for a Political Adminiſtration. With theſe Words he Finiſh'd his Speech, and diſcharg'd the Meeting. Some were well enough pleas'd with it; others as much the Contrary; for upon the Caſting of this Bone of Emulation among the pretenders, Matters look'd already toward a Change.

Herod goes back with his Sons to Judæa.

He meets Archelaus at Eleuſa.

He calls a Councel at Jeruſalem, and declares his Succeſſor.

Cæſarea finiſhed. The Solemnity of the Dedication. The Certamen Quinquennale. Herod builds Capharſaba, Cypron, Phaſael, &c; Rebuilds the Temple of the Pythian Apollo, and ſettles an Annuity for the Olympique Games. The Character of Herod.

THE City of Cæſarea was now finiſh'd, in the Tenth Year from laying the Foundation of it, the 28*th.* of Herod's Reign, and in the Olympiad One Hundred Ninety Two. The Dedication of it was celebrated with all the Magnificence and Splendor imaginable: Maſters procur'd from all parts, and the beſt that could be gotten too in alll Faculties, and Exerciſes; as Muſicians, Wraſtlers, Swordſmen, and the like; and theſe in their ſeveral Profeſſions, to play their Prizes. They had their Horſe-Races alſo, and ſeveral ſorts of Wild Beaſts, with all other Varieties of Spectacle and Entertainments that were in Vogue, either at Rome, or Elſewhere. This Solemnity was Inſtituted to the Honour of Cæſar, under the Appellation of Certamen Quinquennale; and the Ceremony to be exhibited every 5*th.* Year. It was a Prodigious Charge that the King was at for the Furniſhing of this Pompous Shew, in Curioſities from all Quarters far and near; beſide what Julia the Wife of Cæſar contributed toward it upon her own Account, and in Expenſive Rarities out of Italy, computed at about Five Hundred Talents upon the Whole: over and above the vaſt Multitudes of People that flock'd thither npon this Occaſion, and divers Embaſſadors from abroad out of a Complement to Herod, which were all Entertain'd, Treated, and Diverted at the Kings Coſt, with Spectacles by Day, and ſumptuous Feaſtings and Jollities by Night, to the Infinite Reputation of his Character for a Generous and a Magnanimous Prince. He made it all his Buſ'neſs, in fine, to out-do himſelf; and by the Splendor of every ſucceeding Action, to darken the Glory of the Former: Inſomuch that both Cæſar and Aggrippa had been often heard to ſay, what Pity it was that both Syria and Ægypt was not caſt into his Province; for the Command and Revenue of Judæa was too Narrow for his Soul.

Cæſarea finiſht.

The Dedication of it celebrated with all manner of Plays, Spectacles, and Games.

The Certamen Quinquennale.

When the Solemnity of this Feſtival was well over, he ſet himſelf to the Building of Another City, upon a Plain call'd Capharſaba, a ſpot of Ground that was moſt Deliciouſly Wooded and Water'd; a Pleaſant River about it, and a Grove with a delicate Plantation of Curious Trees near the Place. He gave this Town the Name of Antipatris from Antipater, his Father: And he built after this a Caſtle beyond Jericho, which he call'd Cypris, from the Name of his Mother; a ſweet delightful Seat, well built and fortify'd: Not forgetting his Beloved Brother all this while; to the Honour of whoſe Memory he Dedicated ſeveral Glorious, and Moniumental Structures: As in the Firſt Place a Tower in the City it ſelf, not Inferior for Strength and Largeneſs to the Alexandrian Phazo, to which he gave the Name of Phaſael, after which he Erected a Town upon the North-ſide of the Valley of Jericho, which he called by the ſame Name. By this Means, the Country round about, that was before Abandon'd, came to be Peopled again, and was called the Province of the Phaſaelites.

Herod builds. Capharſaba, Cypron, Phazael, &c.

It would be Endleſs to run thorough the Hiſtory of all his Bounties in Syria, Greece, and in truth, wherever he came, by giving his Aſſiſtance to ſome; advancing Publique Works for Others; and ſupplying Monies Elſewhere, for the Perfecting of what ſome had begun, and could not go thorough with.

But to come to the moſt Magnificent and Illuſtrious of all his Undertakings, there was the Temple of the Pythian Apollo at Rhodes, that he Rebuilt upon his Own Particular Account, and I know not how many Talents, of free-Gift to the Rhodians, for the Building of ſo many Ships. Another vaſt Sum to the Repairing and Finiſhing of ſeveral Publique Edifices in the City of Nicopolis, which was Erected by Cæſar, near Actium. He built Two Galleries in Antioch (which is the Largeſt City of Syria) that went quite croſs the Town, with a Walk betwixt them. Theſe Galleries were glorioufly Adorn'd, and the Streets pav'd with a Smooth Poliſh'd Stone, both for the Ornament of the Place, and for the Convenience of the Inhabitants.

He rebuilds the Temple of the Pythian Apollo.

He ſet apart alſo a Yearly Allowance out of his Own Revenue toward the Maintenance of the Olympick Games, which began now to ſink in their Reputation, for want of a Maintenance to bear the charge of Sacrifices and Pompous Expences, ſuitable to ſuch a Meeting: By which Munificence he got the Name of a Perpetual Maſter of the Revels.

and ſettles an Annuity for the Olympian Games.

But after all this, there never was any Man perhaps made up of ſo many ſeeming Contradictions. Take him in the General, for his Liberality, and the External Appearance of a Diſpoſition to do good to all Men, one would have concluded him the beſt natur'd Creature under the Sun: But then to Conſider, on the other hand, the

The Character of Herod.

Extreme Rigour and Injuſtice of his Practices, even upon his neareſt Relations, as well as upon his Subjects at large, it is not to be deny'd but that he was Harſh and Inexorable, without either Pity or Shame. Now upon this View, a body would take him to be a Man divided within himſelf; but I am rather of Opinion that he was Uniform, and Steady, to the ſame Meaſure, and Principle. As he was greedy of Honour, and a Perſon wholly abandon'd to that Impotent Vanity, he was conſequently Magnificent, in Order to the Compaſſing of his End; and according to the Proſpect he had, either of a Glorious Life, or of an Honourable Memory. This made him Profuſe beyond his Fortune, and Burdenſome to his Subjects; for there was no ſupplying of his Extravagant Expences by Fair and Warrantable Means. He was then Senſible of the Ill-Will he had drawn upon himſelf by his Oppreſſion, and of the Difficulty of Allaying thoſe Seditious Diſcontents: which he ſaw was a Thing not to be done, without either retrenching his Disburſements, or ſhort'ning his Revenue. So that he had no way left now, but to Emprove the People's Spite to his own Benefit; which he did, firſt, by Provoking Men beyond all Patience, and then treating them as the worſt of Enemies for Grumbling: and this was the Courſe he took, without Diſtinction of Perſons, whether Friends or Relations; being reſolved to aſſert his Dignity in all Caſes whatſoever. But he gave to underſtand by the Honours he paid to others, what he expected to himſelf; as, to Cæſar and Agrippa, and the reſt of his Illuſtrious Friends; and that he intended the one ſhould be exemplary to the other. This was enough to ſhew the Bent and Biaſs of his Inclination. Now Herod's way of doing Homage to Superiors, was no Precedent for the Jews to follow; but a Flat Contradiction to their Laws and Practice; being trained-up to Principles of Obedience for Conſcience, without any regard to Intereſt, or Power. This Reſtraint was exceedingly to their Loſs, for they might otherwiſe have Inſinuated themſelves by the Pompous Dedications of Temples, and Statues, into the Good Graces of the King; and with other ſuch like Flatteries have gratify'd the Vanity of an Ambitious Man. This, in fine, do I take to be the True Reaſon of Herod's Exceſſive Generoſity and Bounty toward Strangers; and no leſs, of his Inexorable Cruelty toward his own Subjects.

CHAP. X.

The Greeks Petition Cæſar againſt the Jews. Cæſar confirms them in their Privileges. Several Decrees highly in their Favour.

The Greeks Petition Cæſar againſt the Jews.

THE Jews of Aſia and thoſe of Cyrene in Africa, were at this time ſo Ill Treated by the Greeks, and without any End or Meaſure, upon a Pretence that they carry'd their Mony out of the Country, and were in other Reſpects a Grievance to them, that having a Grant from Former Kings, of Free Privileges, and Immunities, in Common with the reſt of the Citizens, and the Natives themſelves, they ſent their Embaſſadors, upon this Occaſion, with a Petitionary Complaint and Appeal to Cæſar; who thereupon wrote back to the Provinces, that it was his Will and Pleaſure the Jews ſhould continue in the Enjoyment of their Exemptions: The Copy of this Edict I have here ſubjoyn'd, for the better Authority of our Pretence, and to ſhew the World what Opinion the Emperours of Former Times had of the Jews.

Cæſar confirms them in their Privileges.

Cæſar Auguſtus, High-Prieſt and Tribune of the People, hath Decreed This.

Several Decrees highly in Favour of the Jews.

Whereas the Jews have ever been a People Faithful, and well affected to the Romans, eſpecially to Cæſar, my Imperial Father, in the Pontificat of Hyrcanus, and remain to this preſent in the ſame Diſpoſition of Faith and Good-Will as formerly, we have deemed it Reaſonable, with the Advice and Conſent of the Senate and People of Rome, to permit unto the ſaid Jews the Free Exerciſe of their own Laws and Rites, in as ample Manner as they Enjoy'd them formerly in the days of Hyrcanus, the High-Prieſt of the Great God. We do likewiſe permit their Temples ſtill to continue Sanctuaries, and Places of Refuge: Their Contribution-Mony toward Holy Uſes to be committed to the Treaſury of Jeruſalem, by ſuch Perſons as they ſhall appoint, without any Let, or Moleſtation: that they be not forced upon Appearances before the Magiſtrates on the Day of their Sabbath, or after Nine of the Clock on the Eve before: That it be made Sacrilege, and Confiſcation of Goods, to ſteal out of their Religious Places any of their Holy Books or Treaſure. And we do further require, out of the Tenderneſs and Reſpect we bear to all Mankind, that the Addreſs or Memorial now preſented us by Caius Marcius Cenſorinus on the behalf of the Jews, together with this Decree, be ſet-up in that Eminent Place at [a] Ancyra, which was Dedicated by by the whole People of Aſia to the Honour of our Name. And let no Man do any thing contrary to the Tenor hereof, at his uttermoſt Peril. There was this following Inſcription alſo upon one of the Pillars of the Temple.

Cæſar to Norbanus Flaccus, Greeting. Let no Man preſume to hinder, or Interrupt the Jews in any place whatſoever, in the ſending up of their Mony to Jeruſalem for Holy Uſes, according to their Ancient Cuſtom. Thus far Cæſar. And Agrippa afterward wrote a Letter on the Jews behalf in like manner too, as follows.

Agrippa to the Magiſtrates, Senate and People of Epheſus, Health. It is our Will that the Jews in Aſia have the Keeping and Diſpoſing of the Mony Themſelves, that they ſend-up to Jeruſalem, according to Ancient Uſage for the Service of their Temple, and their Worſhip: and in caſe any of that Sacred Treaſure ſhall be ſtoll'n, and the Criminal fly to the Altar for Sanctuary, let him be taken away by Violence, and deliver'd up to the Jews to be Baniſh'd as a Sacrilegious Perſon, and out of Protection. The ſame Agrippa wrote alſo to the Prætor Syllanus, againſt Hurrying the Jews upon the Sabbaoth-day, before their Courts of Juſtice. And once again.

Marcus Agrippa to the Magiſtrates and Senate of Cyrene, Greeting. Whereas the Jews of your Parts have written complaining Letters to me, of the Vexatious Practices of ſome Pick-thank People among you, that take upon them to put a ſtop to the Tranſmitting of their Monys to Jeruſalem, under pretext of being in an Arrear of Tribute, which is not ſo neither: And all this, notwithſtanding the Poſitive Letters and Orders from Auguſtus to Flavius, the Prætor of Lybia, and the Other Magiſtrates of That Province; not to give them any Interruption, in ſending-up their Mony as formerly; It is my Command that they be left wholly to their own Way and Liberty, as heretofore: and that Commiſſioners be Appointed for reſtoring to the Jews as much of their Treaſure as ſhall be found either Conceal'd, or Miſapply'd.

Caius Norbanus Flaccus, Proconſul, to the Magiſtrates of Sardis, Health. Being Commanded by an Expreſs from Cæſar, to take care that no Obſtruction be given to the Jews in the Collecting and Sending up of Monys to Jeruſalem to ſuch Purpoſes as they have formerly done; This is to acquaint you that Auguſtus will have it ſo, and that I expect his Orders ſhall be Obey'd.

Julius Antonius, Proconſul wrote alſo to the Magiſtrates, Senate and People of Epheſus to the ſame Effect. i. e. The Jews of Aſia (ſays he,) as I was upon the Bench in a Court of Juſtice at Epheſus in the Ides of February laſt paſt, gave me to underſtand that Auguſtus Cæſar and Arippa, had granted them the Freedom of their own Ways and Ceremonies, and Liberty to Diſpoſe of their Firſt Fruits, as they thought fit among themſelves: and ſo to carry the Mony to Jeruſalem, without any Interruption or Controul, and there to Dedicate it to the Temple of the High God. So they made their Application to me, ſays he, for a Ratification of theſe Privileges. This is therefore to Enform you, that I do abſolutely Subſcribe to the Reſolution and Determination of Cæſar and Agrippa: And I do further require, that no Trouble or Vexation be given them in any ſort whatſoever, either to Diſtract, or to Diſappoint them in the Peaceable Exerciſe of theſe Immunities.

We have the rather Cited theſe Inſtances and Preſidents, to ſhew the Greeks upon the Peruſal of theſe Papers, the Honour that has been done us by Antiquity, and the Privileges in matter of Cuſtom, Diſcipline, and Worſhip, that have been from time to time allow'd us by the Sovereign Powers, even to the Degree of Tolerating our Religion it ſelf, in the Service of the True God. And I do the more Inculcate theſe Notices, and Hints, becauſe I would ſoften Strangers, and deface, if poſſible, the Impreſſions of a moſt Unreaſonable Averſion and Prejudice. It is no new Thing, for whole Nations as well as Particular Places, to change Humours and Manners; but Juſtice is with all People, and in all times and places, evermore the ſame; a Bleſſing that extends Indifferently even to Greeks and Barbarians; the very Reaſon and Foundation of all our Laws: So that if we do but maintain them Sacred; that Virtue alone will both Endear us, and make us Friends to all Mankind: Wherefore it ſhould be my Requeſt to the whole World, that People would not Hate one another for differing in the way of Living, ſo long as they agree in the main End and Buſ'neſs of Life. Virtue, in fine, is common to all Men, and Humane Society can never be Happy without it. But I ſhall return now to my Text.

HEROD had ſquander'd away vaſt Sums of Mony both at Home and Abroad; and hearing that his Predeceſſor Hyrcanus had fetch'd Three Thouſand Talents of Silver out of David's Sepulchre, and that there was enough left behind there to Anſwer any Occaſion whatſoever: This Phancy ran in his Head a long time before he could come to any Reſolution upon it. But at laſt, taking ſome few of Thoſe he could beſt truſt along with him, he convey'd himſelf by Night into the Sepulchre; but with all care imaginable to keep it from the People. He found a World of Rich Plate, and Veſſels, both Gold and Silver, and took it away with him; but for the Ready Mony that he expected, there was none to be found; for Hyrcanus, it ſeems, had been before-hand with him. This Succeſs however, ſuch as it was, gave him an Encouragement to make a ſtricter Search: So he advanced further in, till he came to the very Coffins where the Bodies of Solomon and David were Depoſited. The Story ſays, that he loſt Two of his Guards there by a Flaſh of Fire, that brake out of the Receſs, which was Interpreted as a Judgment upon the Temerity of the Undertaking. The Prodigy put Herod into ſuch a Fright, that in a Fit both of Terror, and of Conſcience, he quitted his Deſign; and to Expiate in ſome Meaſure for the Sacrilege, he Erected a moſt Sumptuous Monument of Marble to bar-up the very Entrance into the Sepulchre. Nicolaus an Hiſtorian of thoſe times, makes mention of this Work; but ſays nothing of the King's Adventure, which he look'd upon to be ſo Impious and Diſhonourable; that he choſe rather to ſuppreſs it; for being Co-temporary with the King, and writing his own Story to his Face, he was to ſpeak only Pleaſing Things that might redound to his Glory, without ever ſo much as Touching upon his Failings. And the Courſe he took, was either to Palliate and Diſguiſe his moſt Notorious and Extravagant Cruelties, or in ſome Caſes perchance, to ſay nothing of them at all. How does he Colour the Murder of Mariamne, and the Horrid Indignities put upon her Two Sons, with a Brand of Incontinency in the One, and of a Practice upon the Life of their Father in the other! And this is his way throughout, to Elevate to the Skies, what the King did well, and either to paſs over, or Extenuate what he did amiſs. But he has this to ſay for himſelf however, that he wrote Panegyrick rather then Hiſtory; and not ſo much for the Enformation of Poſterity, as for the Gratifying of his Patron. But for my own part now, having in my Veins the Royal Bloud of the Aſmonæan Family, and the Dignity likewiſe of the Pontificat, I have no more to do but to report Matters plainly as I find them, with all Reverence to the Deſcendants of that Prince; but by their leave yet, with a Greater Reſpect to Truth: for I would not willingly blaſt the Reputation of my Character with one falſe Word.

Herod rifles divers Sepulchres, of Plate and Veſſels; but finds no Ready-Mony.

Two of his Guards conſum'd by Fire in the Sacrilegious Attempt.

Herod walls up the Paſſage, upon this Judgment.

From the time that Herod brake-in moſt Sacrilegiouſly upon this Sepulchre, things went ſtill Croſſer and Croſſer in his Family, whether upon a Judicial Vengeance upon that Part of it that was before Ill-affected, or by the Calamity of a Seaſon that look'd ſo like the Puniſhment of a Flagitious Wickedneſs. The Fewd was a kind of Civil War in the Houſe, and carry'd on by ſome ſort of Competition, betwixt Outrage, and Calumny. But the Maſterpiece of the whole Story was the Artifice, and Hypocriſy of Antipater; who at the ſame time while he was on the one hand ſuborning of Practices againſt his Brothers, acted the part himſelf on the other hand, of an Advocate with Herod to defend them: Under this Diſguiſe, the better to ſecure their Ruine. Antipater wrought ſo far upon the King by theſe Wiles, that he look'd upon him, as the only Zealous Friend in the World that took care of him. Inſomuch that he recommeded his chief Miniſter Ptolomy, to Adviſe with Antipater ſtill, about the State of the Government; who immediately conferring Notes upon it with the Mother, made every thing go their way, ſo that the King's Love, or Hatred, was menag'd for the Better or the Worſe, according as it ſerv'd their Intereſt.

Herod and his Family puniſhed for the Sacrilege.

Alexander and Ariſtobulus, on the other ſide, being Men of Honour and Spirit, Stomach'd this way of proceeding beyond all Patience, to ſee themſelves degraded ſo much below their Birth, and Trampled upon by their Inferiours; and their Wives labour'd under the ſame Paſſions too; for there was no Love loſt betwixt Glaphyra, Alexander's Wife, and the Daughter of the King of Cappadocia: betwixt her, I ſay, and Salome; whom the other Mortally hated, both out of the Love ſhe bare her Huſband, and out of a Womaniſh Fret to ſee her Daughter that was Marry'd to Ariſtobulus, ſit upon the ſame Level with her ſelf.

There fell-in likewiſe at the ſame time, another unlucky Circumſtance, that Engaged Pheroras the King's Brother in the Controverſy, and it was improv'd, in the Concluſion, to a High Degree of Jealouſy and Hatred. Herod made an Offer to Pheroras of his Daughter in Marriage; who excuſed himſelf, that being deſperately in Love with his own Maid, he could not Marry any Body elſe. The King could not but lay this Refuſal to Heart, eſpecially from a Brother that he had been ſo kind to, even to the Degree of Sharing his Government with him. But, in ſhort, finding himſelf ſo ill-requited; the Honour he offer'd him rejected; his Good Intentions diſappointed, and that there was no way of bringing him to Reaſon, he Marry'd this Daughter, upon it, to the Son of Phaſael, his Elder Brother. Herod by the time that the Love had cool'd a while, went to Pheroras once again, and when he had School'd him ſufficiently about the Affront of his Former Repulſe, as a freſh Inſtance of his Affection, he made yet another Offer of his other Daughter Cypras. Pheroras went preſently upon this Propoſal to adviſe with Ptolomy about it, who told him, that if he were not a Mad-man, he would cloſe with his Brother, and not Hazzard his Fortune as well as his Quiet, in the Loſs of the King's Favour, which would make him an Enemy inſtead of a Friend; and all this for the Freak of a Scandalous Amour: Pheroras could not but approve this, and he embrac'd the Counſel; begg'd the King's Pardon; and Diſcharging himſelf of the Firſt Woman by whom he had one Child, he promis'd the King within a Month to Marry the other Daughter; binding himſelf by an Oath to make good his Word, and never to have any thing more to do with her he had now Renounced. In this while, Pheroras relaps'd into his old Fit of Dotage again; took the Former Woman Home to him; and when the Month was out, without any Regard to his Oaths and Promiſes, moſt ſhamefully brake Faith with his Brother. The Provocation of this Affront put Herod ſo far out of the Government of himſelf, that he could not forbear Laſhing-out into Intemperances of Language againſt his Brother: There were Make-bates enough to lay hold of This; and to Emprove the Diſtemper into an Occaſion of making further Miſchief. So it was, in fine, that there ſcarce paſs'd a Day, or an Hour without bringing ſome new Trouble or other into the Family, by the Enflaming of Piques and Jealouſies, and ſetting the Neareſt, and the Tendereſt of Friends and Relations one againſt another. Nay ſo Deadly was the Rancorous Hatred of Salome to the Sons of Mariamne, that ſhe would not ſuffer her Daughter to enjoy ſo much as the Conjugal Converſation of her own Husband, Ariſtobulus; but was ſtill Pumping of her, and Tampering, to Fiſh-out the moſt Sacred Privacies that paſs'd betwixt them; or if they happen'd at any time to be out of Humour one with another, as that's a common Caſe, ſhe never fail'd of Blowing the Coal, and doing her part toward the Enflaming of the Diſcontent. By this Means ſhe Div'd into all her Secrets; and as ſhe ſaw Occaſion, caſt-in a Bone betwixt the Wife and the Husband. She got out of her what the Brothers ſaid of Mariamne when they were by themſelves: at how courſe a Rate they talk'd of their Father; and how they threaten'd all the Sons he had by other Women, if ever they came to the Throne, to make Country-Scriveners, or Pariſh-Clerks of them, as a Profeſſion that beſt ſuited with their way of Education: And ſhe had heard them talk further, ſhe ſaid, that if ever they ſhould ſee any of Herod's Wives ſet out with their Mother Mariamne's Jewels, they would without any more ado put them into Sackcloth, and lay them up where they ſhould never ſee the Sun. Salome, by this, thought the time long till the King had the Story, and ſo away ſhe carry'd it her ſelf to him immediately. He was ſufficiently Nettled upon the Main; but Inclining yet, to try if he could ſet Things Right by Fair Means, rather then by Foul. In one word, they ply'd him ſo hard with Hammering Jealouſies and Whimſeys into his Head, that they brought him at laſt Herod offers his Daughter to Pheroras, and he refuſes her.

He offers him his other Daughter Cypras.

Pheroras breaks his Oath and Promiſe.

Salome hates the Children of Mariamne Mortally.

She makes a Spy of her own Daughter againſt her Husband.

The Private Confidences of Man and Wife betray'd.

laſt to a Hankering after Tales, and Calumnies; and to ſuch a Degree of Credulity, that he Swallow'd whatever was told him; but contenting himſelf however, for the preſent, with a Severe Rebuke to his Sons: and upon their Anſwer he came prettily well to himſelf again.

A Story from Pheroras to Alexander, of Herod's being in Love with Glaphyra.

But this was not the Worſt on't yet; for Pheroras took an Occaſion to ſpeak to Alexander, the Husband of Glaphyra, of an Odd kind of Story that Salome had told him; which was, that Herod was fall'n paſſionately in love with Glaphyra, and that he could not be Quiet for it. The Young Man, that was naturally Hot-headed and Jealous, was ſo gall'd at this Diſcourſe, that whatever Herod did, day after day, in Favour of Glaphyra, for his Son's Sake, was ſtill Interpreted in Confirmation of his Suſpicion. This Phancy, in ſhort, had made ſo ſtrong an Impreſſion upon him, that when he could bear the Importunity of it no longer, he went directly to his Father with Tears in his Eyes, and told him what had paſs'd betwixt him and Pheroras. If he was Outragious before, this made him ſtark-mad, to ſee himſelf ſo baſely Calumniated for the Fouleſt of Crimes, and this out of his own Inſenſible Family too, in return for all the Good Offices he had done them. In this Heat, he ſent for Pheroras, and read an Angry Lecture to him in Terms to this Effect. How ſhould it come into Thy Head or Mine, ſays he, Thou Vileſt, and moſt Ungrateful of Mortals, to Report, or but ſo much as to think me Guilty of ſo Horrid a Wickedneſs! But the Malice of the Deſign is only this, under the Colour of an Office of Confidence to my Son, to incite him to ſome Treacherous Practice upon the Life of his Father; for what Son that were not Reſtrain'd by a ſpecial Providence, would put up ſuch an Indignity from a Father, Unreveng'd! Where's the Difference, at this rate, betwixt the putting of a Jealouſy in the Head of this Son of mine, or a Sword in his Hand againſt his own Father? But what would you be at? for you hate both alike; and at the ſame time, with Fair Words to my Face, make the Lewdeſt Wretch in Nature of me behind my Back. Go, go, thou moſt Unthankful of Men, to ſo tender a Brother; but I ſhall rather deliver you up to your Conſcience for your Tormentor; and endeavour to be better then my Relations; in not returning Evil for Good, after your Example; but on the Contrary, Good for Evil.

Herod calls Pheroras to account about it.

Pheroras ſays he had it of Salome.

This was ſo clear a Caſe againſt Pheroras, that he had no way to come-off but by Diſcharging himſelf upon Salome, and laying the Scandal at her Door, as the Original of the Story. Salome happening to be within Hearing, brake out, with a Stage-Face, and Action, into Violent Exclamations, that it was all a Lie, and only a Malicious Practice and Conſpiracy, for the taking away of her Life in Revenge of the Zeal and Affection ſhe had expreſs'd for the ſaving of the King's; who at that Inſtant, ſhe ſaid, was in Greater Danger then ever. Pheroras, ſays ſhe, abhors me to Death; for it was I that preſs'd him to turn-off the Slut he doted on, and Marry the King's Daughter. This is the Thing he hates me for, ſays ſhe; tearing her Hair, and beating her Breaſt, with a Rage ſo to the Life, that never was a Part better Acted: Pheroras was all this while, in the Greateſt Pain imaginable, betwixt Two Inextricable Difficulties; for he could neither deny what he told to Alexander, nor prove what Salome ſaid to him. They were at it Pro and Con however a good while; but the King grew Sick on't at laſt, and being now late, ſent them both away, and ſo went to Supper; Herod highly commending the Moderation of his Son, and the Generous Candor of his Nature, in coming ſo Frankly to him with the Story. This Squabble brought Salome under the Scandal of being thought the Auth'reſs of this Calumny, and the King's Wives were ready enough to ſet it forward; for the Woman being Sour, Fickle, and Unequal, Kind and Croſs by Fits as the Toy took her, they did not like her Humour at all; and in this Diſguſt, they were perpetually Ringing ſomething or other in Herod's Ear againſt her; and this Diſpoſition was aſſiſted by an Accident as pat as could be, to their purpoſe.

Salome ſuſpected for the Auth'reſs of this Report.

Obodas, King of Arabia.

Syllæus his prime Miniſter.

Obodas was at that time King of Arabia; a Lazy, ſlothful Prince, that minded nothing but his Eaſe. Now there was one Syllæus, that menag'd under him; a Man of Brains, and Addreſs; in the prime of his Years, and a well-made Graceful Perſon. This ſame Syllæus, coming to Herod about Bus'neſs, as he was once at Supper with him, and Salome in the Company, he took a particular liking to this Princeſs: Inſomuch that hearing ſhe was a Widow, he ventur'd to make her ſome kind of Overture toward Marriage. The Woman finding her ſelf every day more and more Uneaſy with her Brother, and being well enough pleas'd with the Young Man too; laying thoſe Things together, was not Averſe to the Propoſal: and upon further Converſation, and better Acquaintance, (for they were often together) People came to take notice by Countenances, Hints, and Twenty little Love-tricks, that the Amour advanc'd on both ſides. This went all to the King; and his Wives made themſelves Merry with it; but Herod was not yet thoroughly ſatisfy'd with what the Woman told him, till he ſet Pheroras for a Spy upon them; who brought him word, that by what he gather'd ther'd from the Intelligence of Looks and Signs, there was Undoubtedly a Concerted Intrigue betwixt them. Herod took it now for granted, and the Arabian went his way Home again. Within ſome Two or Three Months after this, he returned upon the ſame Errand, and treated with Herod himſelf about the Match; enlarging upon it, how Advantageous it would be to his Intereſt, not only in the Point of Commerce, but in reſpect alſo of his own Right and Pretentions to a Conſiderable part of the Country already. The King immediately put the ſhort Queſtion to his Siſter, whether ſhe had a Mind to Marry or not; and without any Difficulty ſhe anſwer'd him, Yes. This was told Syllæus; and that if he would turn Jew, he might have her: but otherwiſe by the Law of the Country, it could not be. Syllæus reply'd on the other hand, that if he ſhould fall-off from his Religion, the Arabians would ſtone him to Death, and ſo the Treaty brake-off. Pheroras took a Riſe from hence to be ſeveral times hinting to the King how Salome Expos'd her Reputation; but the King's Wives carry'd the Liberties ſhe took with the Arabian to the Degree of Incontinence it ſelf.

And he is convinc'd of the Amour.

Salome Conſents; but they break-off upon Religion.

Herod was now half reſolved, at the Importunity of Salome, to Marry his own Daughter that Pheroras had refuſed, to a Son of hers that ſhe had by Coſtobarus. But Pheroras put it off, by telling him that the Young Man would never forgive his Father-in-law the Death of his Father, and adviſed him rather to give her to his own Son that was to ſucceed him in the Government. The King took his Counſel; gave her a Hundred Talents for her Portion, and all paſt Miſunderſtandings with Pheroras laid aſide and forgotten.

A Match betwixt Pheroras's Son and Herod's Daughter.

But this was ſo far yet from compoſing the Diſorders of Herod's Family, that they went every Day from Bad to Worſe, and from Diſhoneſt, Shameful Beginnings, to Tragical Ends. Herod had Three handſom Eunuchs about him, that he had a mighty Kindneſs for; one ſerv'd him in the Quality of a Cup-bearer; another, in the Office of a Steward, and a Third waited upon him in his Bed-Chamber; over and above, that he made further uſe of them in Matters of State. Some body had told Herod, it ſeems, that Alexander had been Tampering with theſe Young Men for a Sum of Mony to betray him. Upon this Enformation, they were put to the Torture to make them Diſcover what Communication had paſs'd betwixt them. They acknowledg'd they had been together; but for any Treaſonous Deſign Alexander had upon the Life of his Father, they knew nothing of it. The Tormentors being of Antipater's Faction, preſs'd them ſtill harder and harder, till at laſt in the Intolerable Anguiſh of their Pains, they extorted this Declaration from them, i. e. That Alexander Hated his Father Mortally; and did what he could to ſeduce them from their Allegeance to him, as a Prince that was now good for nothing; Old, and out of Date: only he cover'd his Decays the beſt he could with Paint and Artifice. Now if they would come over to him, it ſhould be his Care, he ſaid, to ſee them preferr'd in a very ſhort time; for the Government was not only to deſcend to him in Courſe, but Matters were ſo laid, it was not in his Father's Power to diſappoint it: for over and above the Prerogative of his Title, Every thing was Ripe and Ready for the putting of him into the Poſſeſſion of his Pretences. He had made a great Party among the Officers of the Army, he ſaid, and the King's Friends, which were all reſolved to ſtand by him with their Lives and Fortunes. This Confeſſion put Herod into a fit of Rage, and Trembling, both at once; for there was Contempt and Menace in it; and in the Diſtraction of an Uncertainty, how to behave himſelf for fear of an Immediate Surprize, he could not reſolve upon the ſudden whether to avoid the Danger, or to Encounter it. But the Reſult at laſt was this, to Menage his Buſineſs by Spys and Enformers, without the Pomp of any publique Enquiries. Wherever he ſuſpected, he conſequently Hated; and he ſuſpected thoſe too that did not deſerve it, as well as thoſe that did; for his own Security depended upon it. And there was no End of this Jealouſy neither, for the nearer the Relation, the Greater was his Apprehenſion of them, as Perſons that had it more in their Power to do him Miſchief. As for thoſe he never had any thing to do withall, the leaſt word of an Enformer's Mouth was certain Death to them; for he could never think himſelf ſafe while they were living. The Condition of his Domeſtiques was yet more to be Pity'd then all the reſt, for they had no way to ſave their own Lives, but by Calumniating their Fellows; by which Practice, even when they ſucceeded in it, they drew upon themſelves ſuch an Envy and Deteſtation, that they ſeldom fail'd of being paid in their own Coin, and of receiving the ſame Meaſure themſelves that they meted to others. And ſo in the Caſe of Private Grudges, they enform'd againſt one another by Turns, and were noos'd in their own Snares. Not but that the King was now and then Touch'd in Conſcience, for putting ſo many to Death without Tryal and Conviction; but this did not yet hinder him from doing the ſame thing over again. He was ſo fair however in the Concluſion, as after the Deſtruction of ſo many Innocents, to do Juſtice at laſt upon the Falſe Witneſſes themſelves.

The Confeſſion of Three Eunuchs againſt Alexander.

Herod's Jealouſy ſpares neither Friend nor Foe.

The Falſe Witneſſes themſelves brought to Juſtice at laſt.

The

The Court was at this time in ſuch a Fright and Conſternation, that many of the King's moſt Intimate Friends were Baniſh'd his Palace and Preſence; and Thoſe in the Firſt place that were generally Reputed to have Merited beſt at his Hands; as Andromachus, and Gemellus (Two Favourites of an Antient ſtanding) were turn'd off among the reſt. Theſe Miniſters had ſerv'd the King both Abroad and at Home, in Embaſſies, and Counſels; the Careful Education of his Sons; and in Places, in fine, of the Greateſt Confidence and Truſt. He renounc'd Andromachus for the Kindneſs Alexander ſhew'd to his Son Demetrius, and then he diſcarded Gamellus, for the Love he bare to Alexander; having been a kind of Governour and Tutor to him, as well as a Companion in his Travels to Rome. Nay in all likelyhood, he would not have ſtopt here neither, if the Popular Reputation of the Perſons had not kept him in ſome ſort of Awe: ſo that he contented himſelf with putting them out of Office, and ſending them away, that he might be the more at Liberty in their Abſence, to Rage, and Swagger without Controul.

Andromachus and Gemellus baniſh'd.

The Firſt, and the Chief Author of all this Miſery was Antipater, who finding Herod Fearful and Suſpicious, Inſinuated himſelf into his Counſels, and apply'd to his Humour; Enflaming him to Fierceneſs and Cruelty; and Inculcating this Maxim to him, as a State-Maſterpiece, to make ſure of all thoſe that had it in their Power to do him any Miſchief. And this was the way that Herod went to work; for when he had expell'd Andromachus, and the reſt of his Friends that had the Honeſty and Courage to be Plain and Free with him, he put all the Confidents of Alexander to the Queſtion, concerning Treaſonous Plots and Commotions, who dy'd upon the Torture, having nothing to Confeſs. This Generous Conſtancy being taken for Obſtinacy, they encreaſed the Torments; in great Admiration, that with all this Extremity, they were not able to Extort ſo much as the Shadow of one Diſloyal Thought. Now Antipater craftily took the Matter by another Handle, and made it a Point of Honour in them rather to deny the Truth in Queſtion then to Violate the Faith and Truſt repoſed in them by their Friends and Maſters. So that he was for putting more and more ſtill to the Torture, making no doubt, as he pretended, but ſome or other of them would confeſs at laſt; and in the End one Faint-Hearted Wretch, that ſhrunk under the Pain, declared that upon Occaſion of People's Commending Alexander for a Goodly Perſon of a Man; an Excellent Markſman, and other Laudable Qualities, he had heard him ſay divers times, that theſe Natural Advantages were rather Misfortunes to him then Benefits; for his Father bare him ſuch an Envious Hatred for them, that when they were walking together, he was fain to go ſtooping for fear of over-topping him: And ſo at the Chace, he durſt not ſtrike the Mark; for his Father he knew could not endure to ſee him do any thing Well, or to hear him well-ſpoken of. Upon this pretended Diſcovery, they reſpited the Poor Man's Torment, and ſo he went on with his Tale, How Alexander and Ariſtobulus enter'd into a Conſpiracy once to take away their Father's Life, when he was abroad a Hunting: and if they ſucceeded Alexander was to fly to Rome to demand the Succeſſion. There were certain Letters alſo produced from him to his Brother, complaining of his Father for giving away Two Hundred Talents a Year in Land, to Antipater. Herod look'd upon all this together to be a ſufficient Evidence to Confirm the Suſpicion he had of his Children: and upon this he fell into another Raging fit againſt his Son Alexander, and made him a Priſoner upon it: not that he himſelf gave much Credit to what he heard; for what Intereſt could they have to deſtroy their Father? Or what ſhould they go to Rome for, after ſo Notorious a Parricide? There might be ſomewhat I confeſs, in the Turbulent and Childiſh Heats among the Young Ambitious People about Antipater, and that was all. But in the mean time however, Alexander being clapt-up, and no Body knowing for what, Herod could not think himſelf ſafe without giving the World ſome better Satisfaction in the Reaſon of it: So that he put divers of Alexander's Confidents and Friends of the Beſt Quality, firſt to the Torture, and afterwards to Death, the better to colour the Pretence of Alexander's Guilt; but they confeſs'd nothing. While the Palace was in an Uproar, and nothing to be ſeen or heard of in it but Tumult, Terror, and Torments, a certain Young Man than had been tortur'd it ſeems beyond his Strength and Reſolution, told a Story, how Alexander had written to ſome Friends of his at Rome, to Enform Cæſar, that there was a Conſpiracy againſt him, and that if he were but ſent for thither, he could diſcover it; for that his Father had abandon'd the Intereſt of Rome, to treat with Mithridates, the King of the Parthians; adding withal, that there was a Poyſon in readyneſs that he had gotten prepar'd at Aſcalon. This Invention had ſuch Credit with Herod, that he preſently order'd the Strickteſt Enquiry after the Poyſon that could be made; but there was no ſuch thing to be found. Alex-

Alexander was ſo far from ſinking under this Oppreſſion, that he ſcorn'd to Trouble himſelf with ſo much as one Word, either of Denial or Defence, partly to Exaſperate his Father by the Contempt of Theſe Outrages, and partly to put him out of Countenance for giving an Ear to ſuch Traſh: Or otherwiſe, in caſe he ſhould go on to Swallow Flams and Fables at that credulous Rate, he took-up a Reſolution to give him and his whole Family enough on't. He ſent him Four Pieces in Writing, wherein he gave him to Underſtand, that he ſhould not need to Torture any more People upon Interrogatories, to learn the Truth of Things; for he did aſſure him there was a Conſpiracy againſt his Life; and that Pheroras, and ſeveral Others that he leaſt ſuſpected, were in the Bottom of it. He told him how Salome ſtole to Bed to him one Night, and lay with him, and would not be ſaid Nay; telling him likewiſe, that in ſhort, all People were agreed upon the Abſolute Neceſſity of making him away; for there was no Freedom or Happineſs to be expected without it: Naming Ptolemy, and Sapinius (the Two Men of the World that he moſt Confided in) among the Conſpirators. The Court was by this time rather a Mad-Houſe, or a Medly of Wild-Beaſts, then a Society of Reaſonable Men; the Greateſt Friends in Nature one day, and tearing-out one another's Throats the Next: and no Time or Place left for Argument or Proof; for the Puniſhment went before the Judgment. Some were put in Chains; others kill'd outright, and the reſt in a Deſpair more Painful then Death it ſelf. There was nothing to be ſeen in the Palace of what it had been; but inſtead of the Gayety and Splendor of it in Former times, there was little now but Heavineſs of Heart and Inconſolable Sorrows. Nay Herod himſelf was as weary of his own Life, as he had made other People of theirs; for there was no body he could Truſt; his Preſent State was Miſerable; and no Proſpect before him, but of Confuſion, and Horror. He never took any reſt either Sleeping or Waking for Hideous Frights and Imaginations. One while he would Phancy his Son with a Dagger at his Heart; Another while ſomewhat elſe; and in one word, he was upon the whole matter little better then a Mad-man.

WHile Herod lay in this Anguiſh and Torment of Thought, Archelaus, the King of Cappadocia, reckon'd it the part, both of a Father, and of a Friend, to make him a Viſit, and to do the beſt Offices he could toward the ſetting of things Right betwixt Herod, and his Daughter and Son-in-law; for whom he had an Exceeding Tenderneſs and Compaſſion. Matters went very ill, he heard, and upon his Arrival, he found them rather Worſe then he Imagin'd; but he thought it would not do well however to pick a Downright Quarrel with him for his Temerity, and for taking ſo many Senſeleſs Shams as he did, upon Truſt. A conteſt he thought would look like a Reproach, and do more Hurt probably then Good; ſo that inſtead of falling upon Herod, himſelf, he laid the Blame upon Alexander; for the King, he ſaid, had done nothing but what was Honourable and Juſt; and that for his Part, he would tear the Marriage to pieces, and never own Glaphyra again for his Daughter, if he ſhould find that ſhe was Privy to the Plot, and did not diſcover it. This Paſſionate Pretence and Zeal of Archelaus, for the Vindication of Herod, brought him upon Second Thoughts, to a more Conſiderate Senſe of what he had done, and by little and little to the Softneſs of a Father again. In this Merciful Humour, the King, that before took any Man for his Enemy that gave Alexander a Good Word, fell now directly into Tears to hear Archelaus ſpeak againſt him, begging of him that he would not break off the Match, and Tranſport himſelf to that degree for the Folly of a Young Man. When the Cappadocian had now brought Herod into a more Practicable Temper, he Palliated the Miſtake as well as he could, by laying the Fault in ſome Meaſure upon Evil Counſel, and the Company he kept. He might be Tractable, indeed, he ſaid, but truly he never found him Malicious. He might perhaps be Miſled and Corrupted; and ſo by a ſidewind he ſtaunted all the way upon Pheroras. Now Pheroras was come by this time ſufficiently to underſtand how deſperately he had loſt himſelf in the Opinion of Herod: and reflecting upon it that No Man was ſo Proper for him to make uſe of as Archelaus; he made his Addreſs to him in Mourning, and with the Humility of a moſt Penitent Supplicant, implor'd his Interceſſion for him to the King. Archelaus was not wanting to him in any Matter of reſpect, but he told him withal, that Herod's Diſpleaſure was not ſo eaſily remov'd as he might imagine: but if he were to be his Adviſer, he ſhould rather go and Humble himſelf to his Brother, and owning himſelf the Cauſe of all the Calamities of the Family, crave his Pardon. Such a Confeſſion might perchance [a] work upon him, and make way for a Mediation. He follow'd the Advice, and it ſucceeded both Ways; for Alexander, beyond all Expectation, was Diſcharg'd of his Pretended Crime; and Herod, at the Inſtance of Archelaus, reconcil'd to his Brother. Herod, was now ſo ſenſible of the Obligations he had to Archelaus in his Extremity, that he look'd upon him as the beſt Friend he had in the World: The other returning into Cappadocia, charged with Rich Preſents, and no leſs Satisfaction in the Succeſs of his Voyage. They were now Agreed upon it that Herod ſhould go to Rome to Inform Cæſar of the Preſent State of his Family, having written formerly to him upon the ſame Subject. They went together to Antioch, where Herod reconcil'd [b] Titus the Governour of Syria to Archelaus, and ſo return'd to Judæa.

WHen Herod had been at Rome, and was come back again, there brake-out a War with the Arabians, upon this Occaſion. The Inhabitants of Trachon (a Province that Cæſar took away from Zenodorus, and gave to Herod) when they could no longer Exerciſe their Old Trade of Free-booting, betook themſelves to Planting and Tillage; a Courſe of Life that yielded them neither Satisfaction nor Profit. But yet for a while, at firſt, Herod, to his Honour, kept them in pretty good Order, and without any Barbarous Inroads upon their Neighbours; but upon the King's going into Italy to Accuſe Alexander, and Recommend Antipater; and a Rumour Spread at the ſame time, of the Death of Herod, the Trachonites Revolted, and betook themſelves to their Former Courſe of Life; but they were quickly Broken and Suppreſs'd by the King's Troups; only Forty of the Heads of them made their Eſcapes and fled into Arabia; where Syllæus (who had not as yet Digeſted the Refuſal of Salome) gave them Entertainment, and a ſafe Retreat, with a Strong, and a well Fortify'd Place for their Habitation: from whence they did not only Infeſt Judæa, and Cælo-Syria, and carry away Booty and Cattle into their Holds; but they committed all theſe Outrages, without Oppoſition, or Controul. When Herod found at his Return from Rome, what Spoil theſe Robbers had made, and that he was ty'd-up from meddling with them ſo long as they were under the Arabians Protection, the Affront went ſo near the Heart of Him, that without any more ado he preſently made an Incurſion into Trachon, where he put whole Families of theſe People to the Sword. This Tranſported the reſt into ſuch a Rage, being obliged by a Law of their Own Country not to paſs over ſuch an Indignity Unrevenged, that in Contempt of all Danger and Oppoſition, they would never let Herod be free from the Vexation of their Perpetual Incurſions. Under theſe Circumſtances, he apply'd himſelf to Cæſar's Governours of thoſe Provinces, Saturninus, and Volumnius, to deliver-up thoſe Vagabonds into his Hands. This complaint made them Madder and Madder: So that getting a matter of a Thouſand of them into a Body, they Ranged up and down in Parties; Ravaging Town and Country, and killing what ever they could come at: So that, in fine, Theſe Encounters had the Face rather of a War then of a Scuffle; Herod inſiſting upon the Delivering-up of the Thieves, and the Repayment of the Sixty Talents (ſome time ſince Due) which Herod by the Hand of Syllæus lent to Obodas. Syllæus, who had now Uſurp'd the Government of Obodas to himſelf, flatly deny'd any of the Thieves to be in Arabia, and ſhuffled off the Payment of the Mony till Saturninus and Volumnius order'd the full Satisfaction of the Debt, within the Compaſs of Thirty Days; and that the Fugitives ſhould be deliver'd-up on Both Sides. This Article diſcover'd the Fraud of Syllæus; for there was not ſo much as one Arabian that took Sanctuary with Herod, but a World of the Robbers were found with the Arabians.

Having obtained their Permiſſion, he fell with an Army into Arabia, and in three Days march'd Seven Stages. Coming at laſt to the Caſtle, by Name, Repta, whither the Robbers had withdrawn themſelves, he took it at the Firſt Attacque, and then demoliſh'd the Fortifications, without doing any other Damage to the Inhabitants. While this paſs'd, Nacebus the Arabian General march'd away to the Succour of his Party, and brought it to an Encounter, where there were few or none of the Herodians Loſt: Five and Twenty of the Arabians, together with their General, ſlain upon the Place, and the Remainder of them Scatter'd and put to flight. The King having now taken his Revenge upon the Thieves, he March'd with Three Thouſand Idumæans into Trachonitis, to keep the Rovers there within Compaſs. Herod ſent a Narrative of this Proceeding to the Roman Governours alſo in Phœnicia, giving them to Underſtand, that he had done nothing without leave, in Fighting with a Party of Rebellious Arabians: And this Account upon a further Enquiry, the Governours found to be True.

THis was the naked Truth of the Matter; but the Arabians Report of it to Syllæus at Rome, as it was dreſs'd up, in their way of Amplification, and Diſguiſe, was quite Another Thing. Syllæus had already ſo far inſinuated himſelf, as to be perſonally known to Cæſar; and as he was walking before his Palace, an Expreſs brought him a Pacquet; whereupon he ſhifted his Clothes immediately, and in a Mourning Weed, with Tears and Lamentations, carry'd the ſad Story to Auguſtus. How Herod had enter'd Arabia with an Army; overturn'd the Government, and totally Ruin'd the Country; Kill'd Two Thouſand Five Hundred Noble Arabians upon the Place, with his Friend and Kinſman, Nacebus their General among the reſt; Pillag'd Rapta of a vaſt Treaſure that was laid up there: and all this by the Advantage Herod took of the Weakneſs and Neglect of Obodas, who had neither Troups in readineſs to oppoſe him, nor a General in his Abſence that was fit to Command them. Syllæus ſaid further, that he ſhould never have undertaken this Journy to Rome, but in Confidence that Cæſar would provide for the Publique Peace of all his People; and that if he himſelf had been upon the Place, Herod ſhould have paid dear for the Undertaking. This Unlucky Buſineſs made Cæſar very Uneaſy, and put him upon Enquiring from one to another among Herod's Friends as well as his Own that came lately out of Syria, whether or no Herod had been any where with his Army out of his own Juriſdiction. When he ſaw this could not be deny'd, he took all the reſt for Granted, and without any more ado ſent away immediately a Sharp Menacing Letter to Herod, with a Direction to this Purpoſe; Formerly to my Friend, Hereafter to my Subject. Syllæus wrote alſo to the Arabians at the ſame time. When they came to find by theſe Letters, that Herod was in Diſgrace with Cæſar, they grew ſo Inſolent upon it, that there was no dealing with them. They would neither deliver-up their Malefactors, nor pay their Debts; no not ſo much as their Rents, nor do any thing elſe, according to the Rules of Common Faith and Contract. The Trachonites made the ſame Advantage of this Occaſion too, againſt Herod's Idumæan Garriſons, by joyning with the Arabian Ravagers: tearing all into pieces, and Spoyling and Pillaging, not ſo much for Profit, as for Revenge. But Herod having now loſt Cæſar, was fain to put up all this and more; for his Courage as well as his Credit fail'd him. He made two Tryals to purge himself by his Embassadors; but Cæsar would not so much as see them the First time, nor take any Notice of their Business the next. Herod had a Terrible Apprehension of Syllæus all this while, who never fail'd of Improving Cæsar's Tears and Distractions to his own Benefit; for being still within distance of making the best of Opportunities, and finding him Ductile, and Credulous, he could Wind and Turn him which way he pleas'd; beside that he had far Greater Matters now in Prospect.

Herod's Embassadors to Cæsar deny'd Audience.

King Obodas being by this time Dead, Æneas succeeded him by the Name of Aretas: Syllæus doing all that was to be done by Calumnies, Court-Bribes, and large Promises to Augustus, toward the Outing of him again, and Engrossing the Power to himself. The thing that Encourag'd him to this Attempt, was the Disgust that Cæsar took to Aretas, for Ent'ring upon the Administration, without his Privity and Consent. This New King complemented Cæsar by his Embassadors, with Letters and Magnificent Presents; one above the rest being a Crown of Gold of a Prodigious Value. Now these Letters were in Substance a Flat Accusation of Syllæus for Poysoning his Master Obodas, after the Usurping of his Authority in his Life-time: for Debauching the Wives of the Arabians, and taking up vast Sums of Mony to make way to his Pretensions. But Cæsar deny'd these Embassadors Audience as well as Herod's; rejected their Presents, and sent them away without their Errands. During this Distemper, Matters in Judæa and Arabia went every day worse then other: A General Confusion, and no body to compose it; one of the Kings not being as yet Establish'd in his Government, and the other as little Master of his People; For Herod's Condition was such, that he could not defend himself without Affronting Augustus: So that he lay under a kind of Necessity of Crouching, and submmitting to all Indignities. But being now brought to the last Extremity, he took-up a Final Resolution of making the Best Interest he could to Cæsar by his Friends, and trying the Fortune of a Third Embassy to Rome, employing Nicolaus of Damascus upon the Commission.

The Fewd in Herod's Family Higher then ever.

HEROD's Family was a House always divided against it self by Inteſtine Jealouſies, which are the Plague of all Courts; but the Fewd at this time ran much higher yet then ever, and it was upon this Occasion. There was one Eurycles, a Lacedæmonian; a Man nobly Born, but of a peſtilent Diſpoſition; Senſual, and Glorying, to Extremity; but ſo Artificial a Diſſembler, that there was nothing to be ſeen in him of Either. This Eurycles made an Acquaintance with Herod; enterchang'd Preſents, and other Good Offices with him, in the Houſe of Antipater; and by that Means (being often together) became familiarly acquainted with Alexander: And he would be often ſaying what a Wonderful Friendſhip there was betwixt him and Archelaus, King of Cappadocia, and how Great an Honour he had for Glaphyra. So that under the Semblance of the moſt Unconcerned, Indifferent Perſons in Nature, he lay upon the Catch for every thing that was ſaid or done, and never fail'd of ſome Pick-thank Story or other, to carry away with him. He had, in fine, ſo Obliging a way of Dividing his Good Humour, that wherever he apply'd himſelf, he had the Faculty of making People believe that he lov'd nothing elſe, and that it was only for their Sakes, and Service, if he had any thing to do with others. By this Addreſs he gain'd ſo far upon the Affection and Esteem of Alexander, that he made Choice of him for the Single Confident of all his Secrets, and the only Man that he could safely Trust. So he up and told him the whole History of his Misfortunes; the Unkindness of his Father, the Death of his Mothers; Antipater's Credit with the Kings. This Oppreſſion, he ſaid, was not to be Endur'd; for the Averſion was now come to that paſs, that he could neither Eat, nor talk with his Children. Theſe Privacies were ſafe, he thought, in the Breaſt of a Friend; but Eurycles however carry'd every Word that paſs'd, to Antipater. Theſe are Things, ſays he, that do not concern me; and truly in Matters of ſo Dangerous a Conſequence, I cannot but Adviſe you to look to your ſelf, and to have a Care of Alexander; for he is grown ſo Confident, I perceive, that he does not think it worth his while to mince the Matter; but without any Scruple throws out the very bottom of his Heart in Words at length; and the Deſign he has upon the Perſon of his Father. Antipater took this from Eurycles as ſo Singular an Inſtance of a Reſpect and Friendſhip, that he could not but acknowledge it with ſome very Conſiderable Preſents; and was prevail'd upon in the End, to diſcourſe the Matter with Herod. The King was ſo prepoſſeſs'd with a Diſpoſition to believe any Ill Thing of Alexander, that what with that Prejudice, and other Ambiguous Hints and Circumſtances of Diſcourſe, he contracted a Hatred far more Implacable then ever, as was given to underſtand ſoon after. Herod, in fine, made him a Preſent of Fifty Talents for the Generous Office he had done him; and ſo away went Eurycles to Archelaus with a Thouſand fine things in his Mouth, of his Son Alexander; and not forgetting the Honour he had done himſelf upon ſeveral Occaſions toward the ſetting of Matters Right betwixt him and his Father. So that he got Mony of Archelaus too on the Other hand; and carry'd it all off before the Myſtery of this Impoſture was Detected. Eurycles was now gone back into his own Country, where he kept to his Old Trade ſtill, till he was brought to Juſtice upon the Diſcovery, and Baniſh'd Lacedæmon.

Herod was not now of a Humour as formerly, to content himſelf with lending an Ear to Calumnies againſt his Sons, and wait till the Slanders were brought to ſeek him; but his Suſpicions did the Office of Tale-bearers, and his Particular Scrutinies and Enquiries ſav'd him the Need and Trouble of any other Accuſation: not but that his Ear was ſtill open to all Informations againſt the Brothers, let them come whence they would; neither was there any thing more Welcome to him then thoſe Stories: As he was told of one Evaratus of Cous, that was ſaid to be a Confederate with Alexander.

Herod Credulous and Jealous.

It was now come to a kind of Strife and Competition, who ſhould do moſt Miſchief, the Worſe the Office appear'd to the Sons, the more Acceptable it was to the Father; the Care of the King's Safety being the main Pretence. The young Princes fell at this time into the moſt Deſperate Calamity that had yet betided them. There were Two Perſons, by Name, Jucundus and Tyrannus, formerly of Herod's Life-Guard, and Men of mighty Credit with him for Strength, and Stature; but ſomewhat or other they had done that they were Baniſh'd the Court for. Alexander knowing theſe Men to be very Brave; took them into the Guard of his Perſon, and was a Bountiful Maſter to them. The King took ſuch a Freak upon this, that he had them put to the Queſtion about the Conſpiracy: and when they had ſtood it out as long as Fleſh and Bloud could live under the Torments, they yielded in the End to this Confeſſion, that they had been Sollicited by Alexander to take an Opportunity of Killing the King ſome time or other while he was a Hunting; which might be eaſily ſhifted off, under the Colour of a Fall from his Horſe upon his own Arms; Eſpecially having narrowly ſcap'd ſuch a Danger once before. They made a further Diſcovery of Mony hid in the Stable, and ſome of the King's Lances and Darts deliver'd out by the Maſter of the Game, to the Servants of Alexander by his own Order.

The Next Man they put to the Torture was the Governour of Alexandrion, upon the Queſtion of promiſing to receive the Brothers into the Caſtle, and of putting into their Hands the King's Treaſure that was there Depoſited. The Governour deny'd the Charge; but his Son declar'd it, and produced Letters under Alexander's Hand, as he pretended, to this Effect. You ſhall be ſure to hear of us, God willing, ſo ſoon as ever we are ready for you: Wherefore remember to take us into the Caſtle according to your Promiſe. After theſe Letters, Herod made no longer Doubt of the Conſpiracy; but Alexander all the while, inſiſted upon the whole Story to be only a Contrivance of Antipater's, and a Forgery of the Secretary Diophantus; who was a Man Famous for ſuch Exploits, and Taken afterward in the very Act and Puniſh'd for it.

Herod, being now at Jericho, after the Tormenting of the Witneſſes, had them brought thither to accuſe his Sons before the People: where the Multitude ſton'd them to Death, and in this Fury would have done as much for Alexander and Ariſtobulus, if Herod, by the Means of Ptolemy and Pheroras, had not prevented it. They were however committed cloſe Priſoners; Spies ſet upon them to obſerve every thing they did or ſaid, and given over for Dead Men by every body elſe, as well as by themſelves.

Salome* carry'd this to her Brother, who in a Rage forthwith commanded his Sons to be both bound, and laid apart one from another; and there to ſet down ſeverally in Writing the Particulars of their Treaſonous Deſign. They wrote as they were Order'd, and both agreed in the ſame Story, that they were in no Conſpiracy at all, and never ſo much as thought of any. They had ſome Thoughts indeed of making an Eſcape, they ſaid; for the Life they led under Perpetual Jealouſies was worſe then Death.

Mela, an Embaſſador from Archelaus to Herod.

There came at this time upon an Embaſſy to Herod from Archelaus King of Cappadocia, one Mela, a Perſon of Eminent Quality in that Country. Herod was ſo Fond of giving Archelaus to underſtand how Ill he took ſomething at his Hands, that he ſent for Alexander out of the Priſon, and examin'd him over again in the Preſence of Mela about his Eſcape, Whither he intended to Go, and What he meant to do with himſelf. His Anſwer was, that he propoſed to go to Archelaus, his Father-in-law, upon his Promiſe to Convey him to Rome; and this is all, ſays he, that ever we were Guilty of toward our Father, whatever theſe Falſaries, and Knights of the Poſt may pretend to the contrary. He wiſh'd, he ſaid, that Tyrannus and his Companions had but been a little more particularly examin'd; but it was Antipater's Buſ'neſs to have them put out of Danger of telling Tales as ſoon as he could; and ſo upon the Inſtigation of His Inſtruments, they were Hurry'd to Death by the Rabble.

Glaphyra Examin'd alſo before Alexander, and Mela.

Herod, in this very Inſtant, order'd Alexander and Mela to be carry'd to Glaphyra, and to have her put to the Shrift too to diſcover what ſhe knew of this Abominable Treaſon againſt Herod. They were no ſooner come within View of the Princeſs, but upon the firſt ſight of her Husband in Chains, ſhe fell to Tearing of her Hair, with other Violences upon her ſelf; and into ſuch Groans and Paſſions (the Prince bearing her Company alſo in her Lamentations) that the People ſtood at gaze, as if they had been Planet-ſtruck, at ſo ſurprizing a Spectacle, without knowing what they did, or what they came for: But Ptolemey, at laſt, that had the Guard of the Prince, put it to him to know whether or no his Wife was concern'd in his Plot. Why you need never doubt that, ſays Alexander; for wherever I am, ſhe is; a Woman as Dear to me as my Life and Soul, and the beſt Wife, and the beſt Mother both in one, upon the Face of the Earth. No no, ſays the Princeſs, my Conſcience acquits me; but yet if my owning of a Guilt might be any Eaſe to my Husband, I would frankly declare it, though I were ſure to die with that Lie in my Mouth. No no, again, ſays Alexander, we are Guilty of nothing that's charg'd upon us, and we have deſerv'd better Things at their Hands too that ſuſpect us. As to the Thought we had of getting away to our Father, and thence to Rome, if that be Treaſon, we are both to Anſwer for it: and Glaphyra confeſs'd as much. There was Matter enough againſt Archelaus in this Paſſage, for a Jealous Head to work upon; ſo that Herod preſently ſent away Olympus and Volumnius with Letters to him, with Orders to call at Eleuſa a City in Phœnicia, and there to deliver them. They had further Inſtructions alſo to Expoſtulate with him, upon a Strong Preſumption of his being engaged with his Sons, in the Confederacy. Their Orders were, after the Delivery of theſe Letters, to Sail forward for Rome; and in caſe they ſhould find by Nicolaus of Damaſcus, that Cæſar was any thing more Tractable now then formerly, they were to preſent another Expreſs to him with the Proceedings againſt Alexander and Ariſtobulus, and Copies of the Evidence whereupon they were Convicted. Archelaus, in his Anſwer, own'd his Willingneſs indeed to receive the Young Men, and that he undertook it as the beſt Service he could do both the Father and Sons; for he was in truth afraid, leſt Herod, in that Violent Heat of Wrath and Jealouſy, might put them to Extremities: But affirming, upon the Main, that he had no Thought, after all, either of ſending them to Cæſar, or of ſupporting them againſt their Father.

The ſame Queſtion put alſo to Alexander.

They agree in the Denyal of the Charge.

Herod ſends Olympus and Volumnius to Archelaus with Letters and Inſtructions.

The Subſtance of Archelaus's Anſwer.

Cæſar reconciled to Herod.

Olympus and Volumnius, upon their coming to Rome, finding Cæſar reconciled to Herod, Delivered their Letters according to their Order. They were Framed by the Addreſs of Nicholas, who manag'd his Commiſſion after this Manner. So ſoon as ever he came to Rome, and to the Emperor's Palace, over and above the Inſtructions that he had in charge, he drew up a Formal Accuſation againſt Syllæus, having gotten unqueſtionable Proofs upon him from the Arabians themſelves, (who were then miſerably divided) of the moſt Flagitious Practices that could be Imagin'd: as the Murder of Obodas, and ſo great a part of his Family, for one; and this was all to be made out undeniably by Intercepted Letters under his own hand. Now this Nicolaus, whoſe Buſ'neſs it was to ſet Herod Right again with Cæſar, took this Providential Diſcovery by the Right Handle, and Emprov'd it to the Advantage of his Principal.

A Formal Accuſation againſt Syllæus. The Articles of his Charge.

If, ſays he, I ſhould now begin my Application with an Excuſe or Defence of Herod, it would ſtrike too Point-blank upon the Emperour; but If I make my way to my Matter by the Side-wind of a previous Charge upon Syllæus, the King's Juſtification will fall-in by the By. So that the Cauſe being brought-on, and a Day appointed for the Hearing, Nicolaus, with the Aſiſtance of the Agents of Aretas, advanced an Accuſation againſt Syllæus, as the Murderer of his Lord and Maſter the King, and Greater Numbers of the Arabians; a Man that took up extravagant Sums of Mony toward the Embroiling of the Publique Peace; a Profligate Corrupter of Women both at Rome and in Arabia: Beſide the moſt Audacious Affront of Impoſing with Lyes and Calumnies, upon Cæſar himſelf. As for Inſtance, the Account he gave of the Action of Herod, which was all Falſe from one end to the other. They proceeded upon the Whole till they came to the laſt Article, and there Cæſar interpoſed with a Command to Nicolaus to paſs over all the reſt, and ſpeak to that Single Point. Tell me (ſays the Emperour) as to that Particular of Herod: Did not he come with an Army into Arabia? Did he not kill Two Thouſand Five Hundred Men there? Did he not carry away Priſoners and Ravage the Country? Nicolaus made Anſwer, that no body could give a Better Account to theſe Queſtions then Himſelf. And, ſays he, there is little or nothing True in this whole Story, as he has reported it. Neither, with Submiſſion, was Herod any thing to Blame upon that occaſion. This was ſuch a Surprize to Cæſar, that with very Great Attention, he heard him forward: And ſo in Order, he told him Firſt, of Five Hundred Talents that Herod had lent him upon his Bond; the time of Payment Elaps'd, and the Law on his ſide for the Recovering of the Debt upon his Country. He told further, that this Body of Men that Syllæus calls an Army, was no more then a Strength barely competent for the putting of a Legal Claim fairly in Execution. And he did not yet proceed Raſhly neither, though the Time of Payment being expir'd, he might put the Bond in Suit when he pleas'd But he rather apply'd himſelf in the firſt place to Saturninus and Volumnius the Governour of Syria: and upon this Appeal Syllæus in their preſence at Beritum, obliged himſelf upon his Oath, by the Fortune of Cæſar, to make payment of the Mony to Herod, and deliver up all Refugees to him in thirty Days. The time came, but no News of either Mony or Fugitives: ſo that Herod was forced to addreſs to the Governours once again, who gave their Opinion that he might do himſelf Right by diſtreſs. Now this was the Occaſion of his going into Arabia; and this the War that his Adverſaries have complain'd of, with ſo much Aggravation. But how can this be taken for a War, that was done by the Approbation and Permiſſion of the Governours, in Proſecution of a Lawful Right, and Compact, and after a Perjurious Violation of a Sacred Oath, both in the Name of the Gods, and of Cæſar.

Cæſar puts one ſingle Queſtion to Syllæus.

Nicolaus charges Syllæus, and defends Herod.

Syllæus ſwears to make all Good.

But to come now to the Priſoners, there were firſt a matter of Forty of the Heads of the Trachonite-Robbers, and after them a great many more, that when they had broken into Judæa, and made Havock in the Country, fled from Herod into Arabia for Sanctuary; where Syllæus did not only Entertain them, though the Common Enemies of Mankind; but gave them Lands alſo, and Protection, and went ſhares with them in their Booty. Theſe were the Men now that Syllæus bound himſelf by Oath to Reſtore, together with the Borrow'd Mony within the time Prefixt: And Sir, I can with Modeſty defy any Mortal now, to ſay, that Herod took any other Priſoners in Arabia then theſe Free-booters: Nay, and there were ſeveral of theſe that ſcap'd too.

But now after this Odious Sycophant-Story of the Priſoners, let Cæſar only vouchſafe to hear one Impoſture more that is yet behind, and ſtill more Scandalous and Provoking then all the reſt. I do affirm, that at the time when we were Invaded by a Band of Arabians, and that ſome few of our Men fell, Herod in his own Defence was forced to make Head againſt them; and upon Defeating them, that their General Nacebus was kill'd, and Five and Twenty of his People with him, and not one Man more. Now this Number Syllæus has enlarged, and made every Man a Hundred. Cæſar was ſo mov'd at this Relation, that turning toward Syllæus, he asked him with a Fierce Countenance how many Arabians were Slain in that Action? He pauſed a while upon it, and confeſs'd himſelf ſomewhat Miſtaken in the Number. After this, they read the Conditions of the Bond, and the Arbitrations of the Governours, and the Remonſtrances of the Cities and Towns, complaining of the Robberies. Auguſtus being by this time fully Inform'd in the whole Matter, paſs'd a Sentence of Death upon Syllæus; took Herod into Favour again, and not without Acknowledgment of his Miſtake, in Hearkening to thoſe Calumnies that Tranſported him to ſuch Severities againſt him: telling Syllæus that nothing but the Audacious Impudence of his Lyes and Slanders could ever have Tranſported him out of a reſpect for his Friends. It came, in fine, to this, that Syllæus was order'd back into Arabia, there to pay his Debts, and after that to be put to Death. As for Aretas, his Preſuming to Uſurp Royal Authority, without the Emperour's Leave, and Conſent, ſtuck in Cæſar's Stomach ſtill: Inſomuch that he was thinking to Transfer the Government of that Province to Herod; but upon reading the Letters ters which Olympus and Volumnius brought him, all full of Invective and Bitterneſs againſt his Own Sons, Cæſar chang'd his Purpoſe. Now their Inſtructions were, in caſe they found Cæſar Pacify'd, to deliver him thoſe Letters, which they did accordingly; and Cæſar, upon the Reading of them, conſidering his Age, Paſſion, and Misfortunes, Retracted his Reſolution, and thereupon call'd for the Embaſſadors of Aretas, and gave them Audience, with a Cheque for the Temerity of their Maſter in Aſſuming Sovereign Power to himſelf upon his own Account; and after this Preface, to their Great Admiration, he accepted of their Preſents, and Confirmed Aretas in his Authority.

Inſtructions to Olympus and Volumnius.

Cæſar, upon this Reconciliation, wrote Herod a Condoling Letter for the Mortification he had in two ſuch Sons; giving him Free Leave and Power to proceed againſt them as Parricides, if he found them Enga'd in ſo Unnatural, and Impious a Conſpiracy; but if there ſhould be no more in it at laſt, then the bare Contrivance of an Eſcape, it would become him, he ſaid, to Content himſelf with ſome more Moderate Animadverſion. The Advice he gave him upon the whole, was to call a Council at Berytus; a Place where there were a great many Romans; and there with the Aſſiſtance of the Governours of the Neighbouring Provinces, together with Archelaus, the King of Cappadocia, and Men of Quality, to Hear and Determine upon the whole Matter, and to bring the Point to a Final Deciſion. This was the Subſtance of Cæſar's Letter.

Cæſar writes Herod a Condoling Letter.

CHAP. XVII.

Herod outrageous in his Proſperity. He Summons a Convention to Berytus. Herod charges his Son with Rage and Bitterneſs. The Power of Parents. Reſolved, that Herod may diſpoſe of his Children. Saturninus is for puniſhing, but not to Death. Volumnius preſſes it for Death, and ſo he was Condemn'd. Herod goes for Tyre, and takes Nicholaus with him, to Cæſarea. Tyro's generous Reſolution, and his Expoſtulation with Herod. Tyro committed. Tryphon's Information againſt Tyro. Divers tortured about it. Three Hundred Captains, Tyro and his Son torn to pieces. Alexander and Ariſtobulus ſtrangled at Sebaſte. The Caſe of Herod and his Sons. Herod's Inhumane Cruelty.

THis Letter of Cæſar's was Joyful News to Herod, upon Two Accounts; firſt, as an Aſſurance that he was in favour again; and Secondly, as it left him at Liberty to do with his Sons what he thought fit. It is remarkable, that though he had been formerly in the time of his Proſperity a very ſevere Father, he never appear'd in thoſe Days yet, to be Raſh, and Bloudy toward his Children, where Matter of Life was the Queſtion: But now upon this Change, and Re-eſtabliſhment of his Fortune (how it came to paſs I know not) he Abandon'd himſelf to an Outrageous and Unbridled degree of Hatred, more Extravagant then ever. He ſent a Summons to all the Members of the Convention that were to meet at Berytus, according to Cæſar's Appointment, ſave only to Archelaus: perhaps out of an Averſion to the Man, or otherwiſe, for fear he ſhould croſs him in his Deſign. When they were alltogether according to the Summons, he would not bring his Sons up to the Councel; but rather kept them a little way off at Platane, a Village in Sydon, within Diſtance of appearing if they ſhould be call'd. The Aſſembly being now met, Herod advanced into the Councel-Chamber alone, and there deliver'd an Accuſation againſt his Sons, in the Preſence of a Hundred and Fifty Perſons: but without any Prologue to the Story upon the Subject of his own Misfortunes, or the Neceſſity of ſuch a Proceeding. It was a Charge, in fine, of Rage and Bitterneſs, that very ill became the Mouth of a Father, and accompany'd with Words, Countenances, and Behaviour, that were all menacing and violent, and not without Suſpicious Symptoms even of a Furious Madneſs. His Reaſonings were Confuſed, and Inconſiſtent; his Diſcourſe Flattering, backward and forward, and Dubious; no Proofs produced for the Guiding of the Court; but every thing to be taken upon the Credit of the Accuſer, and the Bench rather made Parties, then Judges, and of Councel with the Proſecutor againſt the Priſoners. There were ſome Letters of the Young Princes Read, 'tis True; but not one Syllable of Treachery or Malice in them. The Crime was their Conſulting how to get away, and here and there a word in them that Imported ſome Diſſatisfaction and Offence. And when Herod came to that part of the Letters, how did he exaggerate the Matter with Clamours and Outcries, that there never was a Clearer Proof of a Conſpiracy; backing thoſe Exclamations alſo with Oaths, that the very Words were worſe to him then Death.

Herod more Outrageous in his Proſperity, then Adverſity.

He Summons a Convention to Berytus.

Herod charges his Sons before 150 Perſons.

A Charge of Rage and Bitterneſs.

Death. I might (says he) Insist upon the Power I have received over my Own Children both from Nature, and from Augustus; to say nothing of an Express Provision for it by the Law of my own Country, that if a Stubborn and Rebellious Son shall be acccused by his Parents, and they lay their Hands upon him, the Men of the City shall Stone him with Stones that he dye, Deut. Cahp. 21. But I shall yet rather decline my Privileges in this Cause, and leave the matter to your Further Consideration, not as Judge, whether it be so or no, in a case so Indubitably manifest; but to take your Opinions along with mine in the Justification of the Sentence: and for an Instructive Document to Posterity, that such Exemplary Impieties ought not to scape Unpunish'd.

A Speech upon the Power of Parents over Children.

The Convention plainly perceiv'd by this way of Menage, and the Shuffling-up of Things Hand over Head, without so much as Suffering the Brothers to speak for themselves, that the Bus'ness was already resolv'd upon, and Hopeless; and so in a Despondency they gave their Votes that Herod might dispose of his Children as he pleas'd. The First Man that stood up was Saturninus, a Person of Consular Authority; and one that had discharg'd many Honourable Commissions. He was, 'tis true, for Punishing the Prisoners; but not to Death, he said, for having Children of his Own, he was the more sensible of the Case; and would be loth, after so many Calamities that Herod had endur'd already, to oppress him with the Heaviest of all at last. His Three Sons (as his Deputies) spake next in Course, and went along in Opinion with their Father: But Volumnius exclaimed, that nothing else but Death would satisfy for so Horrid a Crime; and the Majority striking-in with him, carry'd the Question.

Resolv'd that Herod may dispose of his Children.

Saturninus for Punishing, but not with Death.

The Sons of Saturninus give their Vote with their Father.

Volumnius is for nothing less then Death, and so they were Condemn'd.

The Sentence was no sooner pass'd, but away went Herod to Tyre, taking his Sons along with him; and meeting Nicolaus in his Return from Rome, he first gave him an Account of what had pass'd at Berytus; and then ask'd him how Squares went at Rome, and what his Friends there said of his Sons. Nicolaus told him that every Body blam'd them for their Lewd Practices, and said they deserv'd to be laid in Chains for what they had done: Nay and to be put to Death too, if the Conspiracy should be made out Unquestionably clear against them: For People would be apt to say else, that this Prosecution had more of Freak or Passion in it, then of Justice, or Reason. But however, if Herod found himself otherwise dispos'd, he might do well to set them at Liberty without Plunging himself into a Difficulty never to be recall'd. This he said was the Discourse, and Judgment of his Friends at Rome. Herod, upon these words, stood a good while Pausing and Thoughtful without one Word speaking; and in the End, bad Nicolaus put to Sea with him, and so they went together to Cæsarea.

Herod takes him along with him to Cæsarea.

When they came thither, they found the whole Town full of the Story of Herod, and his Sons, and every body in pain, and Sollicitous, to think where that Prosecution would End: Most People fearing the worst, and that so Inveterate a Rancour would very hardly be satisfy'd without the Death of the Brothers. They Pity'd them with all their Hearts, but durst not either say so much themselves, or hear it from others: so that they were fain to smother all their Resentments, as well of Grief, as of Compassion.

Only there was one Tyro, a Veteran Soldier of the King's, and a very Brave Fellow, who, having a Son of about Alexander's Age, and his Particular Friend, made no Difficulty of speaking-out, and at Liberty, those Truths that others suppress'd, and kept to themselves, crying out Publiquely many times, that there was neither Truth nor Justice left upon the Face of the Earth; but Juggling and Malice govern'd in their Places; and such a Mist cast before the Eyes of all Mortals, that they could no longer discern Right from Wrong, or Good from Evil. This was a Dangerous Freedom; but withal, so Generous an Instance of his Virtue and Courage, in such a time as this, that every Creature was pleas'd with it; and those that durst not venture so far Themselves, had yet a Reverence for his Hazzards; and the Man, in truth, must have been Insensible and Inhumane, that was able to Suppress his Commiseration in such a Case as this: Nay, and he did not rest here neither, but march'd up Boldly to the King himself, with a Request to have a little Private Discourse with him; which being Granted, he deliver'd himself as follows.

Tyro generously vindicates these Unfortunate Princes.

Sir, says he, I must either break my Heart, or give it vent, at what rate soever; for I know the Danger of the Province I am to undertake, and of the Words I am now about to utter: Danger, I say, as to my self; but on the other hand of as Great a Service and Advantage to Herod, if he pleases. Pray give me leave to Enquire, Sir, what is become of your Sense of Things, and your Understanding; that Magnanimity of Mind and Resolution, that in time past hath carry'd you through so many Difficulties? What have you done with all your Friends and Relations? Have you none left? For I do not reckon those People in that Number, that can see such Horrid Things done in your once-Happy Court and Family, and stand Idle Spectators, and Unconcern'd? Where are your own Eyes all this while?

Tyro's Expostulation with Herod.

Do you not see what is a doing? Are you Resolved then to destroy the Children of once so Dear a Wife, and a pair of such Matchless hopeful Youths too? Can you think at this time of Day, of trusting your self in the Hands of an Ambitious Young Man, and of those very Persons of your Relations that you your self have so often doom'd to Punishment? Do you not find your self tacitly condemn'd, and your Sons Lamented by the very Multitude, in the Profound Silence and Astonishment of the People? And so for the Military Men, both Officers, and Common Soldiers; They have all aking Hearts for the Young Princes, and lie cursing the Authors of their Misery.

He tells him it makes the Officers and Soldiers Hearts ake.

So far as Tyro's Discourse ran upon the Discourse of his Master's Calamity, and the Treachery of his Domestiques, Herod took his Liberty well enough; but when he came to pass the Bounds of Discretion and Good Manners, in a Bold, Blunt, Monitory Way of Expostulation; This Freedom look'd liker a Reproach then a Caution: And Herod taking it that way, ask'd him who those Officers or Soldiers were, that he spake of. Tyro nam'd the Men, and the King immediately order'd them All, together with Tyro himself, to be taken up and Committed.

Herod bids Tyro Name them, and then commits them with Tyro himself

Upon this Occasion, Tryphon, the King's Barber, went to Herod with an Information against Tyro, for Tempting him several times with Promises of Mony, and Alexander's Favour, to cut the King's Throat when he was a Shaving him. These Words were no sooner out; but the Barber, Tyro, and his Son were all put to the Torture. The Son seeing his Father so unmercifully tormented, and so Resolute in his Pains, and no hope of Mitigation from so Cruel a Prince, call'd out to the Tormentors to take him and his Father off, and he would tell them the whole Truth of the Matter: so upon promise of Ease, he declar'd that his Father having Private Access to Herod by himself, had resolved to kill him with his own Hand, what Risque soever he ran, for the Service of Alexander. Upon this Declaration, his Father was deliver'd from that Ling'ring Torture; but whether this Confession was a Truth, or only a Pretended Shift to get Present Ease, it does not as yet appear.

Tryphon's Information against Tyro. Several Tortur'd about it.

The Evidence doubtful, whether True or False.

Herod was now finally resolv'd to proceed to the Execution of his Purpose, without any Further Doubt or Deliberation about it; (if ever he had made any Difficulty of it before) and to leave no Place for Repentance. So that calling the People together, there were brought forth Three Hundred Captains, Tyro and his Son, and the Evidence-Barber; and upon his Accusation of them to the Multitude, the Rabble tore them all to Pieces, to a Man: But Alexander and Aristobulus were sent away to Sebaste, where they were strangled by their Father's Order; and their Bodys Depositted at Alexandrion in a Sepulchre, with their Grandfather by their Mother's side, and divers others of their Progenitors.

Alexander and Aristobulus strangled at Sebaste.

The Case of Herod and his Sons agitated.

There was no Great Wonder in it perhaps, for an Aversion of so long Growth and Continuance, to extinguish in Herod all Sense of Humanity and Natural Affection; but it may be yet a Question where to lay the Blame; whether upon the Young Princes forcing their Father by a continu'd Course of Provocations to so Implacable a Displeasure, or to the Hardness of the King's Heart; and so Insatiable a Thirst of Glory, and Absolute Power, as not to bear any Competition. Or shall we rather Impute it to the Irresistible Power of Fortune, which no Humane Wisdom can pretend to Controul? For my own part, I am fully persuaded that all Humane Actions are Determin'd into a necessary Train of Consequences; and that Providential Power we commonly call Fate, which orders every thing we do; though not without ascribing somewhat to our own Endeavours, and the Freedom of Searching into the Causes of the Variety of our Actions: But this is a Deep Point, and we shall only Touch upon it; the Subject being handled more at large in the Books of our Laws: But now for the Two First Motives, as to what concerns the Sons; they might perhaps in their Heat of Bloud, be too Bold and Imperious; over-easy to entertain Ill Reports of their Father, and Partial Judges of his Life and Practice; spitefully suspicious; Intemperate in their Discourses, and so laying themselves open to Spies and Informers that sought for Matter against them to work upon. But then on the other hand, what could be more Scandalous and Unpardonable, then for Herod, without any Proof, or Conviction, of a Treasonous Design; or so much as the Presumption of any such Contrivance, to Indulge an Impotent Passion in the putting of his own Sons to death: Persons so excellent at all Points for their Bodies and Minds; all manner of Exercises, for Sports, as well as War; their Skill in Letters, and the like; Alexander, the Elder, especially. If nothing less then a Condemnation would content him, why were they not rather Imprison'd, or Banish'd? There would have been no Fear of Treachery under those Circumstances; and as little of any Open Force either, under the Patronage of the Power of Rome. Now the taking away their Lives thus in such a Hurry, to gratify an Ungovernable Phrenzy, what was it but an Instance of an Impious, and a Tyrannical Outrage; and at ſuch an Age too as admitted no Plea of Ignorance, or want of Experience. Neither does the Delay in putting it off thus long, make it one jot the more Excuſable; for the Deliberation Aggravates the Crime; and it would in ſome Degree have Extenuated the Horror of the Wickedneſs, if it had but been committed in hot Bloud; or upon the Surprize of ſome Enflaming Provocation. But to mediate, and conſider ſo long upon ſo Daring an Affront to God and Nature, and at laſt to go thorough with it, nothing but a Barbarous and an Abandon'd Profligate could ever have done it. But he liv'd to make this, and the Remaining part of his Life all of a piece; for he ſpar'd none of the reſt of his Relations, though never ſo Dear to him. They were the leſs to be Pity'd, 'tis true, becauſe they Periſh'd deſervedly; but his Cruelty was never the leſs however, as will be ſeen further in what follows.

Herod's Cruelty to all People made his Life all of a Piece.

CHAP. I.

The Death of the Sons leads to the Murder of the Father. Antipater universally Hated. Herod had the Name, but Antipater the Power. Antipater sticks at nothing. He pretends to Salome, and she countermines him. Salome in Love with Syllæus. Herod forces him to Marry Alexas. He sends Glaphyra back to her Father. Whom Herod Favours, Antipater Hates. The People's Tenderness for the Princes was a Heart-break to Antipater. Herod dissolves certain Contracts.

The Death of the Sons a step to the Murder of the Father.

ANTIPATER had now made a large step toward the Compassing of his Impious Design upon the Life of his Father, in the Abominable Murder of his Brothers; but his Ambition spurring him on, things did not yet Advance so fast as he would have had them: for there were other Obstacles yet in the way. After this Remove, there was no body left, 'tis true, betwixt Him and Home. So that there was no longer any Fear or Danger of Competitors; but he had yet a Greater Difficulty to Encounter, before he could gain his Point. That is to say; the Mortal Hatred of the People, and (what he dreaded more then all the rest) that of the Soldiery; the only Safeguard and Support of Princes against Factions and Tumults. These Mischiefs he drew upon his own Head, Foolishly, as well as Wickedly, by the Destruction of the Princes; for if the Exercise of Power would have Tempted him, it was Effectually Antipater that Govern'd at that time, though Herod sat upon the Throne, and every Thing was Committed to his Menage: Nay the very Crime that he deserv'd to Die for, pass'd for an Instance of his Affection and Respect; as if he had only consulted the Safety and Preservation of the King in the Death of the Princes: whereas he Gratify'd his Aversion to the Father in what he did, as well as to the Sons; and such was his Pestilent Malice, that he Detested them even for their Father's sake. It was his Bus'ness, in short, not to leave One Soul Alive that could either give Evidence of his Treason, or oppose him in the Execution of it, or that might be in Condition to Protect Herod against him. But the Project being now a-foot, he was upon his uttermost Peril to go thorough with it. He look'd upon the Government as his own, 'tis true, after the Death of Herod; but then Delays he thought might be Hazzardous, for if he should come, betwixt this and that to be Detected to his Father, it would be his Undoing for ever: Wherefore, he spared for no Cost or Pains, to gain the Good Will of his Fathers's Friends by all the Courtly Ways of Civil Offices, and Magnificent Presents that are Usual in those Cases: even to the Degree of overcoming Unkindnesses with Benefits: His Friends at Rome especially, and in the first place, Saturninus the Governour of Syria, with his Brother. He was not without Hope neither of bringing-over Salome to his Interest, the Wife of a Particular Friend, and Confident, of Herod's. Now Antipater was a Man of Address, and none better skill'd perhaps in the Ways and Arts of Obliging; beside that for a Fair Outside to disguise a False Heart, no Man upon Earth was beyond him: But Salome, his Aunt, that saw thorough him all this while, was not to be impos'd upon; but, Countermining him with Trick for Trick, kept a Watchful Eye upon him through all his Disguises: though he had so Order'd it, that her Daughter the Widow of Aristobulus was Marry'd to his Uncle by the Mother's Side, and the other Daughter to Callæas. But neither the one Affinity, nor the other, was sufficient,

ſufficient, either to Cover the Wickedneſs of his Intent; or to Extinguiſh the Odium he had moſt juſtly Incurr'd. Salome her ſelf was all this while up to the Ears in Love with Syllæus; but Herod, with the Aſſiſtance of the Empreſs Julia, put her upon Marrying Alexas; the Empreſs charging her not to Oppoſe it upon any Terms, unleſs ſhe had a Mind to break with her Brother for ever, who had Bound up himſelf with a Solemn Oath, never to own her for his Siſter, after ſuch a Refuſal. Salome could not ſay but it was wholeſom Counſel, and ſo yielded to the Match.

Salome in love with Syllæus. Herod forces her to Marry Alexas.

Herod, at the ſame time, ſent away Glaphyra, the Widow of his Son Alexander, and the Daughter of Archelaus, King of Cappadocia, back to her Father again, together with the Portion he had in Marriage with her, that there might be no Further Cauſe of Controverſy; and, upon the whole Matter, he took great Care for the Education of his Grand-Children. Alexander had Two Sons by Glaphyra; and Ariſtobulus, by Berenice, the Daughter of Salome, had Three Sons, and Two Daughters. Herod would be now and then ſpeaking kindly of theſe Children to his Friends, Deploring the Misfortune of his Sons, and putting up Ejaculations to God, to Preſerve their Children from the like Calamity, and that they might grow up in Grace, as well as in Years, and live to acknowledge their Obligations to their Parents. He deſign'd the Daughter of his Brother Pheroras for Wife to the Eldeſt Son of Alexander; and the Daughter of Antipater to the Eldeſt Son of Ariſtobulus; and to the Son of Antipater, one of Ariſtobulus's Daughters: The Other Daughter to his Son Herod, that he had by the Daughter of the High-Prieſt; for Polygamy is among us allowable. The Principal Deſign the King had in theſe Allyances, was in Pity to the Orphans, to oblige Antipater by this Affinity, to treat them with the Greater Tenderneſs. But when all was done, he had juſt as much Kindneſs afterward for the Children, as he had for their Fathers before; and Herod's Commiſeration was ſo far from ſoftening Antipater, that on the contrary it made him Fierce and Jealous; and the more the King favour'd them on the one hand, the more Antipater hated them on the other, for fear of an After-Game; when they ſhould come to ſet up for themſelves: Eſpecially with the Aſſiſtance of Archelaus and Pheroras the Tetrarch, whoſe Son at that time ſtood fair to Marry one of the Daughters. It was another Heart-breaking Vexation to him, to ſee the Compaſſion the People had for the Caſe and Memory of the Unfortunate Princes; and with what Deteſtation they look'd upon the Contrivers of their Ruin; waiting all this while over and above, for an Opportunity of expoſing Antipater for his Malicious Practices againſt his Brethren. And it vex'd him to the Soul again, to think, according to the preſent State of Matters, how fair his Nephews ſtood to put-in for Sharers in the Government; and no way to ſecure himſelf but by prevailing with Herod to diſſolve the aforeſaid Contracts; which, with much Importunity, he obtained, and got the Promiſe of the Daughter of Ariſtobulus for himſelf; and for his Son, the Daughter of Pheroras, whereupon the Former Marriage-Agreements were all made void.

Alexander had Two Sons by Glaphyra; and Ariſtobulus had Three Sons and Two Daughters by Berenice. Herod intends well for theſe Orphans.

The more Herod favours them, the more Antipater hates them. The People's Tenderneſs for the Murder'd Princes was a Heart-breaking to Antipater.

Herod prevail'd upon to Diſſolve certain Contracts.

Herod had now Nine Wives; the Firſt, was the Mother of Antipater; the Second, the Daughter of Simon the High-Prieſt, by whom he had a Son whom he call'd by his own Name. The Third was the Daughter of his Brother; and the Fourth his Couſin-German, by which Two he had no Iſſue. The Fifth, a Samaritan, by whom he had Two Sons, Antipas and Archelaus, and One Daughter call'd Olympias, which was afterwards Marry'd to Joſeph the King's Kinſman. Archelaus and Antipas were brought up at Rome by a Particular Friend. His Sixth Wife was Cleopatra, of Jeruſalem, by whom he had Herod, and Philip, which Philip was alſo bred-up at Rome. The Name of his Seventh Wife was Ballas, by whom he had Phaſael. His Eighth was Phædra; and the Ninth, Elpis, by whom he had Two Daughters, Roxana, and Salome. As to his Two Daughters, the Siſters of Alexander and Ariſtobulus, by Mariamne, (thoſe that Pheroras refus'd in Marriage) He Marry'd one of them to Antipater, the Son of his Siſter Salome; and the other (as we have ſaid already) to the Son of his Brother Phaſael: and let this ſuffice for the Family of Herod.

HEROD was now at Work to make all ſafe againſt the Trachonites; and to that End he reſolv'd upon the Building of a Large Spacious Village in the Middle of the Country: and a Strong Garriſon in it, that might ſerve both to ſecure that Quarter Quarter from Inroads, and upon any Occaſion, to ſally-out upon the Enemy. While Herod had this Project in his Head, ſome body happen'd to tell him of a certain Jew that came out of Babylon with Five Hundred Horſe-Men, with Bows and Arrows, and near a Fifth part of them of his own Relations: And that with theſe Troops, he paſſed the Euphrates to plant himſelf about Daphne in Syria, where Saturninus the Governour gave him a Caſtle called Valatha, not far from Antioch, for his Habitation. Herod, upon this Intelligence, ſent an Invitation to the Jew, and all his People to come over to him, with a Promiſe of Lands, and other Conveniences in the Territory of Batanæa upon the Borders of Trachonitis, with Privileges of Exemption from all Duties and Tributes, for the Lands as well as for the Men, and a Commiſſion only to defend that Quarter againſt the Incurſions of Vagabonds and Robbers. Zamaris the Babylonian was well enough pleas'd with the Conditions; accepted the Offer, and built Forts upon the Ground that was allotted him, together with a Town that he called by the Name of Bathyra; and in this Poſt, he did not only Protect the Inhabitants againſt the Free-Booters; but ſecur'd the Jews alſo in their Proceſſions from Babylon to Jeruſalem, according to the Duty and Practice of their Profeſſion.

Zamaris a Jew paſſes the Euphrates with 500 Horſe-men to Plant in Syria.

Herod Invites him to Bathanæa, upon certain Conditions.

The Jew accepts of Herod's Terms, and ſettles at Bathyra: and Secures the Jews in the Practice of their Profeſſion.

Upon this Proviſion, there joyn'd with him vaſt Numbers of ſuch of the Jews as made a Conſcience of the Laws and Religion of their Forefathers, Peopling the Country to Admiration for the ſake of the Advantages and Immunities above mentioned, which they enjoy'd quietly, and without any Controverſy, during Herod's Reign: But Philip indeed that ſucceeded him, charged them with ſome ſmall Impoſitions; but they did not laſt long. Agrippa the Great, and his Son after him, of the ſame Name, Burden'd them with Heavy Taxes, 'tis True, and ſo did the Romans after them; but ſtill their Perſons were left at Liberty, of which we ſhall ſay more hereafter. As for Zamaris the Babylonian, that Herod put into the Poſſeſſion of this Command, after a Long, and a Virtuous Life, he left Children behind him, that Inherited the Honourable Qualities of their Father. And among others, there was Jacymus a Cavalier that had the Reputation of a Man of his Hands, and no Man Braver; and one that had ſerv'd the King's of Babylon in their Guards. This Jacymus dy'd at a Great Age, and left behind him a Son, Philip; who for his Exemplary Valour and Probity, was in ſuch Eſteem with King Agrippa, that he made him General of his Army.

They Enjoy their Liberties during Herod's Reign.

Philip Levies ſome ſmall Taxes.

The Government lodg'd in Antipater. Pheroras Hates, but Flatters the Women; who are all of a Piece. The Conſpirators Cautious. Salome diſcovers all. An Information againſt the Wife of Pheroras. Pheroras refuſes to part with his Wife. Antipater and his Mother forbid coming together.

WHile Herod's Affairs were in this Poſture, as above, and himſelf poſſeſs'd with ſuch a Confidence of the Faith, Zeal, and Affection of his Son; the Menage and Authority of the whole Government was effectually lodg'd with Antipater, which Truſt, however, he did moſt abominably Abuſe; but daubing over the Foulneſs of his Hypocriſy with ſuch Specious, and Artificial Pretences, that all paſs'd with his Father for Truth, and Good Faith, in every Word he ſaid: So that in Effect he was not leſs Dangerous for his Craft, then for his Power. But none ſo Great in appearance, after all, as He and Pheroras; the latter being Circumvented, and drawn into the Snare by the Women that were in the Faction with the other. For Pheroras durſt not Diſoblige, either his Wife; his Mother-in-law, or his Siſter; though in his Heart he hated them all Mortally, for the Indignities they had put upon his Virgin-Daughters. But theſe were not Things to break upon, with People ſo Neceſſary to the main Bus'neſs; and Privy, over and above, to ſo many Dangerous Secrets, and conſequently one to another: Beſide that Antipater was Inward with them to the Higheſt Degree, both upon his own Account, and his Mother's; for theſe Four Women were all of a Piece. But Pheroras and Antipater would be Peeviſh one with another yet for Trifles: That is to ſay, at the Inſtigation of Salome that blew the Coal betwixt them, and was ſo particularly Inform'd in the whole Train of the Deſign from End to End, that ſhe was juſt upon the Brink of Diſcovering the Conſpiracy to Herod himſelf. Now the Complices finding their Cabals watch'd, and obſerv'd; their Correſpondency ſuſpected of Myſtery and Intrigue; and themſelves under the Jealouſy and Diſpleaſure of the King; they laid their Heads together, and came to a Reſolution, not not to meet ſo Publiquely for the time to come, but to pretend Janglings, and Fallings-out, and be Talking one againſt another ſtill; Eſpecially when either Herod himſelf, or any body elſe that would be ſure to tell him again, was in Hearing: But for the League, and Confidence; that was to go-on ſtill in Private, and at this rate they Menag'd. Now Salome ſaw thorough the Juggle from Point to Point; Tracing every Step of it from the Firſt Contrivance, quite through the whole Conduct of it; and finally, to the Execution it ſelf: and ſtill as ſhe pickt-up any thing to Enflame the Miſunderſtanding, away ſhe went with it to her Brother, with Additions: As ſhe would be telling him every Foot, of the cloſe Intelligence they held, their Secret Conſultations, and how much it concern'd him to look well about him betimes, for no leſs then his Life was at Stake. As for their Brawls, and their Big Words againſt one another before Company, that was all but a Blind, ſhe ſaid; for they were very Good Friends when they were alone; but Enemies Undoubtedly to all thoſe, to whom ſhe would have that Friendſhip carry'd as a Secret. She made the Beſt, in fine, of her Diſcoveries, and all went to her Brother in Courſe, who, by this time, had gotten ſome Inkling of the Matter; but kept his Thoughts to Himſelf a while without taking all for granted that his Siſter told him, whom he knew to be Ill-natur'd enough to make the worſt of every thing.

The Conſpirators Menage with more Caution.

Salome diſcovers the Intrigue and the Cabal.

This ſet of Women were mightily devoted to a certain Sect among the Jews that valu'd themſelves upon their Legal Righteouſneſs, and an Oſtentation of being Holyer then their Neighbours. Theſe People had the Name of Phariſees; an Arrogant, Crafty ſort of Men, that in the Pride and Vanity of their Hearts, make no Conſcience of Affronting Kings, and Trampling Royal Authority under their Feet. As for Inſtance: When the whole Nation of the Jews were call'd upon to ſwear Allegeance to the King, and to Cæſar, theſe were the only Refuſers, to the Number of above Seven Thouſand: And being condemn'd afterwards in a Sum of Mony for this Refuſal, the Wife of Pheroras laid down the Fine. Theſe People having gotten to themſelves the Reputation of the Spirit of Prophecy, and the ſpecial Direction and Aſſiſtance of Divine Revelation, gave it out in requital for the Good Office of paying the Fine, that God had determin'd the Transferring of the Kingdom from Herod and his Line, to the Princeſſes, and her Husband, Pheroras, and their Iſſue. Salome gave the King Notice of this, and of the Bribery and Corruption that had been practic'd at Court in favour of this Intereſt. Upon a Strict Search and Enquiry, there were ſeveral of the Phariſees taken-up, and put to Death, as the Principal Authors of this Seditious Preſage; and among others there was Bagoas, the Eunuch, and Herod's Minion, Carus; a Youth that he doted upon for the Charms of his Perſon and Beauty: Beſide ſeveral others in his own Family that were Convicted of the Conſpiracy, upon the Proof and Teſtimony of the Phariſees themſelves: who held Bagoas in hand, that he was to be celebrated as the Parent, and the Benefactor of the Prince that was deſign'd for the Throne; for every thing ſhould ſucceed well to the New King, and the Government be eſtabliſh'd to his Family in a Legitimate Iſſue.

The Phariſees foretell the Tranſlation of the Government to Pheroras.

Salome carries all this to Herod.

Bagoras, and other Phariſees, taken up and put to Death.

Soon after the Tryal, Conviction, and Execution of the Phariſees, Herod call'd a Council of his Friends, and exhibited an Accuſation againſt the Wife of Pheroras; alledging, That it was by her Counſel and Advice, that his Brother ſo Contemptuouſly Rejected the Tender of the Royal Virgins to him in Marriage, and that ſhe had, moſt Unnaturally, and againſt all Law, fomented a Fewd betwixt Brethren to the Uttermoſt of her Power, as well in Deeds as in Words: That ſhe her ſelf had ſided with the Rebellious and Contumacious Phariſees, in eaſing them of the Fine that he himſelf had impos'd upon them: and in ſhort, that ſhe was Guilty, more or leſs, of the whole Conſpiracy. And therefore Pheroras ſhould do well, he thought, to caſt-off that Lewd Woman of Himſelf, that had done ſuch Diabolical Offices betwixt ſo near Relations, without waiting to be courted to it: Eſpecially conſidering the caſe to be now come to this Point, that either Pheroras muſt diſown that Woman for his Wife, or never expect to be own'd by Herod for his Brother.

Herod exhibits Information againſt the Wife of Pheroras; and preſſes Pheroras to take her away.

Theſe Paſſionate Expreſſions of Herod could not but Touch Pheroras to the quick; but yet with a ſaving to all the Duty and Reſpect that he ought, both to a Prince, and to a Brother; He made a Publique Proteſtation that nothing in the World ſhould ever make him Renounce his Dear Wife, and that he would rather Dye then Live without her. Herod ſufficiently reſented this Indignity; but kept his Anger to himſelf, only forbidding Antipater and his Mother any Communication with Pheroras, and Barring the Court Ladies the Freedom of their uſual Converſations. They all promis'd that they would obſerve the King's Orders, but nevertheleſs kept-up by Stealth their Private Entertainments; Pheroras and Antipater, Eſpecially. People talk'd at that time of an Amour betwixt Antipater, and the Wife of Pheroras, and that the Mother of Antipater brought them together.

Herod forbids Antipater and his Mother &c. any Communication with Pheroras.

Antipater Uneaſy. He gets himſelf ſent for to Rome. Herod ſends him with Preſents, and his Laſt Will and Teſtament. Syllæus charg'd with Treaſon, and to be try'd at Rome.

Herod's ill Humour makes Antipater Uneaſy.

Antipater gets himſelf ſent for to Rome.

Herod ſends him to Rome with Preſents, and his Laſt Will and Teſtament.

ANTIPATER began now to be Uneaſy under the Ill Humour and Jealouſy of Herod; and not knowing where it might fall next, he wrote to his Friends at Rome, to get him ſent for in all Haſte to wait upon Auguſtus. This was done, and Herod ſent away Antipater with Rich Preſents, and with his Laſt Will and Teſtament; wherein he declar'd Antipater his Succeſſor; or in caſe of his Deceaſe, his Son Herod that he had by the Daughter of the High-Prieſt.

Syllæus charg'd with Treaſonous Practices.

At the ſame time, Syllæus the Arabian went alſo to Rome, not having performed, it ſeems, what Cæſar had order'd him. Antipater charged him there before Auguſtus, in like manner as Nicolaus had done before. Aretas accuſed him alſo, for having put ſeveral Men of Honour to Death at Petra, contrary to his Will and Order, and among others Soemus, a Man upon all Accounts Eminent for his Virtue: And ſo likewiſe Fabatus, a Servant of Cæſar's. The Bus'neſs was this. There was a Certain Corinthian in Herod's Guards, that the King very much confided in. Syllæus treated with this Man for a Sum of Mony to Kill the King, and proceeded ſo far with him, that the thing was agreed upon. Fabatus had this Account from the Mouth of Syllæus, and forthwith went away with it to the King. The Corinthian was preſently put to the Queſtion, who upon a Particular Scrutiny, acknowledg'd the Deſign, and brought Two Arabians alſo, into the Plot; the one of them a Perſon of Great Quality; and the other, a Singular Friend of Syllæus, who being likewiſe put to the Torture, confeſs'd that they came thither on purpoſe to preſs the Corinthian to the Execution of what he had Undertaken, and to Aſſiſt him alſo in the Exploit, if there ſhould be Occaſion. The Informations were ſent by Herod to Saturninus, and by him to Rome, where the Cauſe was to be Heard and Decided.

The Cauſe to be try'd at Rome.

Herod falls ſick and ſends for Pheroras.

Pheroras excuſes himſelf upon his Oath.

Pheroras falls ſick ſoon after, and dyes.

WHen Herod ſaw that Pheroras ſtood ſo firm to the Tenderneſs he had for his Wife, he ſent him back to his Government, and away he went very willingly, with an Oath never to Return again during the Life of Herod; and he was as good as his Word; for the King ſoon after falling Sick, and he himſelf being call'd upon to give him a viſit, and receive ſome ſecret Orders from him before he dy'd, Pheroras excus'd himſelf that he was under an Oath, and durſt not break it; but Herod lov'd his Brother ſtill as well as ever he did, and without following his Example, Pheroras himſelf falling Sick ſoon after, Herod, of his own accord, made him a Viſit. This Diſtemper carry'd him off, and the King took Order for the Tranſporting of his Body to Jeruſalem, where it was Honourably Interr'd. This Calamity was the Forerunner of Great Miſchiefs to Antipater, though at preſent at Rome; for Divine Juſtice call'd him afterward to an Account for the Bloud of his Brothers. I ſhall now give the Story of it at length, and in Order; for an Exemplary Caſe to Mankind, and for a Caution to Poſterity, to Govern themſelves in all Contingencies, by the Meaſures of Equity and Virtue.

Inquiry about the Death of Pheroras.

PHERORAS being now Dead, Two of his Trachonite-Freeman that he lov'd extremely were very Earneſt with Herod for a ſtrict Enquiry to be made how their

Maſter

Maſter came to that Miſerable End; and that in caſe it ſhould be found a Practice, his Death might not paſs Unreveng'd. They Inform'd Herod (who laid a Great Streſs upon every Word they ſaid) that the Night their Maſter was taken ill; he ſupp'd with his Wife, where he had an Odd kind of mingled Drink, given him, that ſtruck him to the Heart upon the very taking of it down. This was brought him by an Arabian Woman under the Name of a Love-Potion, but in truth, a Mortal Poyſon; as the Women of that Country are the beſt at it in the World. The Woman they charg'd it upon, was found to be an Intimate Friend and Acquaintance of Syllæus's Miſtreſs, the Mother and Siſter of Pheroras's Wife, the Perſons that went to her for the Poyſon; and that they came back together, the Day before the Adminiſtring of this Deadly Draught. The King was ſo Tranſported upon the Hearing of this Story, that he preſently order'd ſeveral of the Women to be put to the Torture, Free, as well as Slaves. They ſtood Mute a Long time; but one of them at laſt, in the Horror of her pain, burſt-out into this Exclamation. Ah! ſays ſhe, that the Mother of Antipater were in my place now! for that Lewd Woman has been the Cauſe of all our Miſery. This Diſcovery put Herod upon a Reſolution to extort out of them every Particular of the Intrigue, and ſo to run thorough the whole Hiſtory of the Menage from Point to Point: As all their Secret Meetings, Collations, cloſe Conſultations and Cabals; ſeveral Occaſional Diſcourſes that paſs'd betwixt Herod and Antipater, were made common talk among the Women, even to the very Talent that was given to keep things from the Knowledge of Pheroras. The Women Witneſſes further enlarged upon the Hatred he had for his Father, and how he would be often Complaining to his Mother, that he thought the Old Fellow would never Dye; when yet at the ſame time, he was ſo far in Years Himſelf, that if the Government had dropt into his Mouth, he could hardly have Reliſh'd it; beſide ſo many Sons, and Grand Children in View, that he had a very Uncertain Proſpect of the Succeſſion: Nay, and as matters ſtood at preſent, the Kingdom was to deſcend to his Brother, not to his Son, in caſe he himſelf ſhould be taken out of the way. The Witneſſes ſpake further to his Common Practice of Inveighing againſt his Father for his Cruelty and Barbarity to his own Sons; inſomuch that he himſelf was forc'd away to Rome, and Pheroras to his Government to get out of his reach.

The Siſter and Mother of Pheroras's Wife fetcht it.

Several Women tortur'd about it.

The Mother of Antipater charged with it.

The Practice prov'd to every Point.

This was alſo Conſonant to what his Siſter had formerly told him, that without the Ceremony of any further Doubt or Deliberation, Doris the Mother of Antipater was as good as Convict of a moſt Malicious part in the Treaſon, and immediately Stript of all her Jewels to the value of many Talents, and expell'd the Palace: But for the Women of Pheroras's Family, the King was Gentler to them, for the ſake of their Information. There was Matter abundantly againſt Antipater; but the moſt Provoking and Unpardonable Article of his Accuſation, was drawn from the Confeſſion of Antipater the Samaritan, an Officer in a Place of Truſt under the other Antipater: who, among other Things declared, that his Maſter had put a Mortal Poyſon into the Hands of Pheroras for the King to take in his Abſence, when the work might be done with the leſs Suſpicion. This Poyſon he ſaid, was brought out of Ægypt by Antiphilus a Friend of Antipater, whoſe Uncle Theudion the Brother of his Mother Doris ſent it to Pheroras, who gave it to his Wife to keep. Herod, upon This, took the Woman into Examination, who confeſs'd ſhe had it; and making a ſhew as if ſhe went to fetch it, ſhe caſt her ſelf down from one of the Palace-Galleries into the Court: but falling upon her Feet, the Bruiſe was not Mortal. So ſoon as ſhe came to her ſelf again, the King promis'd both Her, and her Family their Pardon, upon Condition that they declar'd the whole Truth; with Menaces of the Uttermoſt Rigour of Torments, if either by Obſtinacy, or otherwiſe, they ſhould conceal any part of the Deſign. Upon this, Pheroras's Widow bound her ſelf by a Solemn Oath to tell the whole Matter of Fact without any Reſerve; and moſt People were of Opinion, that ſhe dealt clearly in her Story. That Poyſon, ſays ſhe, was brought by Antiphilus out of Ægypt, and prepar'd by a Brother of his, that was a Phyſician there. Antipater bought it for the Deſign againſt your Majeſty. Theudion brought it to Pheroras, who deliver'd it to Me. My Husband afterward falling ſick, had ſo Pious and Paſſionate a ſenſe of your Generous Friendſhip, in the Charitable Viſit you were pleaſed to make him, that he call'd me to him, and told me: Wife, ſays he, here's Antipater has Inveigled me into a moſt Unnatural Plot for the Poyſoning, both my Brother, and his Father; ſo that in the Senſe I have of the Steadyneſs of the King's Affection to me; and of my own Condition as a Dying Man, I am reſolved, God willing, never to carry into Another World with me, the Guilt and Infamy of ſo Baſe a Conſpiracy; Wherefore let the Poyſon be immediately brought up and thrown into the Fire before my Face: Upon which words (ſays ſhe) I fetcht it preſently, and threw it into the Fire, as he had order'd me; ſaving only a very ſmall Remainder of it that I kept for my own Uſe, in Caſe it ſhould be my Lot after the Death of my Husband to be put to Extremities my ſelf. With theſe Words, ſhe took-out the Poyſon that was left, with the Box it was in, and produced them both in the Court. In the next place, the Mother of Antiphilus, and Another Brother of his, were both put to the Queſtion, and Confirmed the ſame thing over again, with Evidence to the very Box it ſelf. There was an Accuſation Exhibited alſo againſt One of the King's Wives, the the Daughter of the High-Prieſt; but they got nothing out of her: Herod however, caſt her off, and ſtruck her Son of his own Name out of his Will, whom he Deſign'd his Succeſſor, if Antipater had dy'd before him. He Depoſed Simon alſo, his Father-in-law, and the Son of Boethus, from the Pontificat, and promoted Matthias of Jeruſalem, the Son of Theophilus, in his Stead.

Herod turns off one of his Wives.

Bathyllus brought Poyſon from Rome, for Antipater's Mother and Pheroras.

In this Interim, Bathyllus, one of Antipater's Freemen, came from Rome, and being put to the Torture, confeſs'd that he brought Poyſon for Antipater's Mother, and Pheroras, with an Intent, that if one fail'd, they might try the other. There came at the ſame time certain Letters from Rome to Herod; but of Antipater's Direction and Contrivance; and menag'd likewiſe by his Friends; who in Preſents and Gratifications were well paid for their Pains. Theſe Letters inſiſted much upon the Liberties that Archelaus and Philip took at every turn, to talk ſo Scandalouſly of Herod for the Murder of Alexander and Ariſtobulus, and of the Compaſſion they had for the Poor Innocent Brothers; ſuggeſting alſo, that they themſelves were now call'd back again only to be treated after the ſame Manner with thoſe that went before them. This was all Antipater's Menage from one end to the other, and not without Fair Letters to Herod of his own too, over and above, for the better Colour of the Buſineſs. They were Hot Young Men, he ſaid, and the more Excuſable, though perhaps not ſo Temperate and Reſpectful in their Words, as they might have been; with a great deal more of ſuch Stuff to the ſame Purpoſe. The Controverſy went on all this while with Syllæus; and Antipater had made as many Friends at Court as the Expence of Three Hundred Talents, in Preſents, and Gallantries, could procure him. It was a ſtrange thing now, that in Seven Months time (for ſo long had this Scrutiny been afoot) Antipater ſhould never get the leaſt Inkling of the Matter; but what with the Watches and Guards that beſet the Paſſages, and the Univerſal Malice of the People to Antipater, there was not a Man to be found that would run any Riſque for the Informing, or the ſaving of him.

An Artificial Way of Correſpondence betwixt Antipater and Herod.

ANTIPATER, having written to the King that he was upon ſettling his Affairs at Rome, and preparing for his Return; Herod adviſed him by all means, in a ſly Temperate way of Anſwer, to make what haſte he could Homeward, for fear any thing ſhould fall-out amiſs in his Abſence: and not one Angry Word in his Letter, more then ſome ſlight Glances upon his Mother, which would be eaſily made up again when they came together. This was all carry'd with Mighty Profeſſions of Candour and Friendſhip; for if Antipater had phancy'd a Trick in't, and delay'd his Journy upon it, he did not know what Intereſt he might make at Rome toward the Supplanting of him in his Government. Theſe Letters came to Antipater's Hand as he was upon the Way in Cilicia; but for thoſe that brought him Tidings of the Death of Pheroras, he received them at Tarentum, and with a Sorrowful Heart too, not for the Love of Pheroras, but for the Diſappointment of Poyſoning the King, which he had undertaken for. Upon his coming to Celenderis, a City of Cilicia, he had a kind of a Miſgiving upon him, that ſtagger'd him, whether he ſhould go forward or No. The Scandal that lay upon his Mother ran in his Head; and deliberating what to do, his Friends were divided upon the Queſtion. Some were for ſtepping aſide a while to ſee what would come of it; others, for Haſtning all he could

Home

Home again, making no doubt at all but upon his Appearance he would clear himſelf to all manner of Purpoſes; for what was it, even at preſent, but his being out of the way that gave his Adverſaries ſo much Advantage over him, by Tales and Calumnies! This Adviſe carry'd it: So that he continu'd his Courſe to Sebaſte, a Port that Herod had Erected at an Incredible Expence, in Honour of Auguſtus. By this time, every body read Antipater's Fate; for he that at his Departure was follow'd with Benedictions, Vows, and Acclamations, had not ſo much as one Creature now to take any kind of Notice of him, or to bid him welcom; but for Curſes and Imprecations, he had them in Abundance; the People crying aloud to Heaven for Vengeance upon him for the Blood of his Murder'd Brothers.

His Friends are for it, and ſo he advances to Sebaſte; where he is Received with Curſes inſtead of Acclamations.

Quintilius Varus, the Succeſſor of Saturninus in the Government of Syria, happen'd to be now at Jeruſalem, and at this very Time in Counſel with Herod. While they were ſitting upon Publique Bus'neſs, up comes Antipater in his Purple Robes, to the Palace-Gates, which were ſet open to him; but immediately ſhut again upon his Followers. This ſtruck him into ſuch a Damp (for he knew nothing as yet of the Matter) that he began now to think with himſelf whereabouts he was: But more eſpecially, juſt upon Preſenting himſelf to his Father's Embrace, to be thrown off with Indignation, and with Reproaches of Fratricide, and Treaſon; for theſe, they told him, were the Crimes would be charg'd upon him the Day following; and Varus there preſent to be his Judge. This Surprize daunted him as if he had been Thunder-ſtruck; ſo he went his way, meeting his Mother and his Wife in his Paſſage. The Latter was the Daughter of Antigonus, Herod's Predeceſſor, and having conferr'd Notes with them upon the State of the Cauſe, he prepared for his Tryal.

Quintilius Varus in Counſel with Herod at Jeruſalem. Antipater comes to the Palace-Gates in his Robes. Himſelf admitted, but his Followers ſhut-out. Antipater charged with Fratricide and Treaſon, to be Try'd next day, and Varus his Judge. He conſults his Mother and his Wife, and prepares for his Tryal.

Next day there met a Great Council; Varus and Herod, Preſidents, and their Friends about them. Salome the King's Siſter, was cited thither alſo, with others of their Relations. There was likewiſe the Diſcoverers of the Conſpiracy; the Witneſſes that had been upon the Torture; and in the laſt place, ſome of the Domeſtiques of the Mother of Antipater that had been taken-up a little before his Return from Rome, and Letters for him found about them to this Effect: Giving him Caution, That he ſhould not upon any Terms come back; for the King knew all, and he had beſt have a care how he fell into his Hands: concluding, in fine, that he had no way in the World to come-off, but by caſting himſelf upon Cæſar's Clemency and Protection. Antipater made it now his Requeſt to Herod, only to be admitted to his Defence, and not Condemn'd Unheard. The King preſently bad him Riſe, and ſtand forth to take his Tryal.

The Council Meets; Varus and Herod, Preſidents. Salome, the Witneſſes, and Diſcoverers all produc'd.

I am (ſays Herod) an Unfortunate Man to have been the Father of ſuch Children, and to fall at laſt in my Old Age now into the Hands of ſuch a Wretch as Antipater. And ſo he Amplify'd upon the Care he had taken for him in his Inſtitution, and Education; and Reproaching him, that he never ask'd, or ſo much as wiſh'd for any thing out of his Fortune that he deny'd him. And what Return now for all this, but a Conſpiracy againſt his Life, in Requital: and the ſeizing of a Crown, by an Impious Violence, that by the Double Right, of both Title, and Free-Gift, were to come to him in Courſe? I cannot Imagine, ſays he, what Advantage he could propoſe to himſelf in the Gratifying of ſo Extravagant an Ambition; for he had made him a Succeſſor, he ſaid, by his Will, and Effectually a Partner with him in Dignity, Glory, and Power, even in his Life-time: beſide the ſetling of Fifty Talents a Year upon him for a Revenue, and an Allowance of Three Hundred more, for the Expence of his Journy now to Rome. As for his Charge upon his Brothers, either they were Guilty, and he himſelf at the ſame time their Imitator, as well as their Accuſer; or on the other ſide, if Innocent, then was he again, the Calumniator, and the Murderer. For he had nothing againſt them, he ſaid, but out of his own Mouth, and ſo was the Sentence as well as the Information: ſo that in this Act he had acquitted his Brothers, and taken the Execrable Impiety upon himſelf.

Herod aggravates Antipater's Ingratitude.

Herod was overcome with ſo Paſſionate a Fit of Weeping, upon this Tender Occaſion, that he could go no further; and ſo deſired Nicolaus of Damaſcus, his Ancient and Particular Friend, and one that was thoroughly Inſtructed in this Matter, to proceed to the Examination of the Criminals, and to the Conviction of his Son. Antipater, by way of Prevention, apply'd himſelf to his Defence, and improv'd all the Inſtances of his Father's Kindneſs to the Juſtification of his own Piety, and Deſerts, aſſuming to himſelf to have done his Duty to all Purpoſes. What Likelyhood, ſays he, that after the Reſcuing of my Father from the Treacheries of ſo many other People, I ſhould at laſt turn Traytor to him my ſelf, and blaſt the Reputation of a Try'd, and an Unſpotted Loyalty, with ſo foul a Blot in the Concluſion? What could I pretend, or but deſire, to make me Greater, or Better, then in Truth I was: or how could I be ſuch a Fool, as under theſe ſplendid Circumſtances, to make my ſelf a Scandalous Villain, only for Infamy and Loſs! For the Succeſſion was with all Formality of Law already ſettled upon me, and my ſelf ſo far admitted by the King's Bounty into a Share with him in the Exerciſe of his Antipater's Defence.

Royal Power, that I was effectually in the very Poſſeſſion of the Government; rather then in the Expectancy of it; and no Creature either to Controul, or to Envy my Claim. Why ſhould I ſtruggle now for that with Danger, which my Virtue had put me in a Quiet Enjoyment of: and Expoſe my ſelf by ſo doing, to a moſt certain Infamy, for the vain Flattery of an Uncertain Hope; Eſpecially conſidering how this Ambition ſped with my Brothers, whom I my ſelf Accuſed, Convicted, and Puniſh'd. This I did, ſays he, and this I ſhall never Repent of; but on the Contrary, Value my ſelf upon the Merit of that Service, as the higheſt Inſtance I could give my Dear Father of a Filial, and Inviolable Love and Duty. As to my Behaviour in the City of Rome, I dare appeal to Cæſar himſelf, who is no more to be impoſed upon then an Oracle; and to ſeveral of his Letters that I could produce under his own Hand in my Favour. Pray'e would it not be hard now to ſet-up the Calumnies of Wicked Men, and Profeſs'd Enemies, againſt the Authority of theſe Sacred Evidences! A Scandalous ſort of Pick-Thanks, that are never ſo well pleaſed as when they are Embroiling the Royal Family; as they have now made Advantage of my Abſence for the Poſſeſſing of People with Falſe and Defamatory Rumours againſt me, which they were never able to Compaſs ſo long as I was within Diſtance of ſpeaking for my ſelf. Toward the End of his Diſcourſe, he made a ſhort Digreſſion upon the Reaſon and Cuſtom of examining by Torture; which was as likely away, he ſaid, to extort a Falſity as a Truth; for whether True, or Falſe, the Tormented muſt expect to be kept in pain till he be brought to Confeſs what the Tormentor would have him ſay: And yet Antipater, after all this, offer'd himſelf to the Queſtion, and to abide the Iſſue of it. He deliver'd theſe Words with ſo Paſſionate a Tranſport of Tone, Tears, Action, Striking his Head, and the like, that the Counſel were extremely mov'd at it; and the Greateſt Enemies he had in the World, could not but Pity him: Nay Herod himſelf was obſerv'd to Relent, notwithſtanding the Utmoſt he could do to Conceal it.

Antipater offers himſelf to the Torture.

When Antipater had gone thus far; Nicolaus took up the Cauſe where the King left it; Scann'd, and Sifted every Article; Cited, and Summ'd up the Proofs; the Names of the Witneſſes, and the Particular Confeſſions of thoſe that had been put to the Queſtion. He paſs'd then to the Subject of the King's Bounty, Care, and Tenderneſs in the Education of his Children, and how Ill it was anſwer'd. As for Alexander and Ariſtobulus, while they were under the Dominion of Ambition rather then Avarice, and Hurry'd-on by the Intemperate Motions of Youth and Hot-Bloud, it was not ſo much a Wonder for them, he ſaid, to be Debauch'd by Evil Counſel, and Lewd Company, into a Neglect, or Contempt of their Duty; but as to the Caſe of Antipater, it was worſe then Brutal; for in the very Fierceſt of Beaſts themſelves, there is yet a kind of Natural Gratitude for their Keepers, and their Feeders: Whereas this Young Man was ſo far from being gain'd upon by the Goodneſs and Bounty of an Indulgent Father, that as he was not to be deterr'd by the Calamitous Example of his Brothers; ſo on the contrary, he valu'd himſelf upon an Æmulation of their Wickedneſs and Cruelty. Was it not you your ſelf, Antipater, ſays he, that firſt diſcover'd their Deſign? Were not you then the Proſecutor: and you your ſelf again, the Director of the Sentence, and conſequently of the Puniſhment? This is not now to Reflect upon your Zeal, and Indignation, in ſo Juſt a Cauſe; but it ſtumbles me to find you ſo Bitter againſt your Brothers, for the very ſame thing that you do your ſelf: which manifeſtly ſhews, that your Buſ'neſs was not ſo much the Preſervation of the Father, as the Ruine of the Children; and under Colour of a Severe Brother, to get the Reputation of a Tender and a Dutiful Son; and ſo with the more Security, to Stalk under that Cloak up to the King himſelf. And this was the Exploit you were now about. How came it to paſs elſe, that the Brothers were put to Death, and not their Complices? What could be the Meaning, or the End of this; but firſt, that you and they were agreed upon the Matter; and ſecondly, that ſo ſoon as the firſt Difficulty ſhould be over, they might be within call to help you out with the next. So that you had a Double Satisfaction in the Contemplation of your Wickedneſs; the one was by Impoſing Publiquely upon the World a moſt Flagitious Impiety for an Honourable and a Meritorious Virtue; the other was in the carrying on, and the Hope of Executing that Inhumane Barbarity your ſelf, which you took upon you but now to Revenge in others. If you had heartily Deteſted that Malice, you would as well have Abhorr'd the Imitation of it. But you have had the Wit however, to take the beſt People out of the Way firſt; and to ſet your ſelf Clear of Competitors, being reſolved to leave neither Rivals, nor Witneſſes; and that being done, to Crown the Murder of the Brothers with That of the Father, and by ſo doing, not only to ſcape the Puniſhment you have deſerved, but to bring your Parent to bear the Burden of your Crimes, in ſuch a Parricide as was never either Heard, or Dreamt of before: For the Treaſon was not form'd againſt a Perſon of the Common Rate of Fathers; but againſt a Parent, Tender, and Indulgent, to the Higheſt Degree; the Conſpirator Markt-out for the Succeſſion already; a Half-Sharer in the Crown by Advance; ſettled beforehand in the Preſent Enjoyment of his Greatneſs, and ſecure of the Reverſion of it by his Father's Will: But, ſays Nicolaus, your Inſatiable Deſires were not to be Bounded by his Goodneſs, but by ſuch Mea- ſures only as your own Ingratitude and Perverſeneſs ſhould preſcribe. Your own half of his Right would not Anſwer your End, unleſs you might have his Part too. Your Pretence was the Saving of Him, when at the ſame time the Plot was to Deſtroy him: And the Lewdneſs was not all to your ſelf neither; but your Mother was made a Party to it; the whole Family embroil'd upon't, and the Brothers altogether by the Ears. And after all This, what d'ye think of the Impudence of calling your Father, Beaſt; and ſo making your ſelf the Arranter Brute of the Two. But neither your Relations, nor your Benefactors are to ſcape the Poyſon of your Scandals. And as if the Venom of your own Heart had not been Sufficient to Inſtruct, and Irritate a Revenge, you have call'd to your Help, your Guards, Councellors, and Suborners, of Both Sexes, to lay all their Heads together in a Confederacy againſt one Ancient Man: And now after the Torturing of ſo many Men and Women; Free, and Slaves, one with another, upon your Account, and after ſuch a Cloud of Undenyable Evidences, you have yet the Confidence to Out-face the Truth, and to follow your Enterprize upon the Life of your Father, with an Attempt upon the Authority of the very Law, that Puniſhes ſuch Criminals; and this you do in Contradiction to the Equity of Varus, and to the Univerſal Meaſures of Natural Juſtice. What is it that makes you Diſparage Extorted Teſtimonies, but becauſe you would Derogate from the Credit of thoſe Proofs that lay open your Wickedneſs, and Conduce to the Preſervation of your Father.

Nicolaus adjures Varus to do Juſtice.

Sir, ſays Nicolaus to Varus, By the Majeſty of the Roman Empire, and by your own Honour, I adjure you that you Vindicate the King from the Indignities of his own Fleſh and Bloud, and deliver up This Monſter of an Hypocrite to Death; that under a Pretext of Reverence to his Father, hunts after the Bloud of his Brothers; and if he had not been ſeaſonably Detected, his Father's Turn ſhould have been Next, to make his own way to the Crown. You know very well, Sir, that Parricide is no Private Crime, but a Publique Affront to the Laws of Life, and of our Reaſonable Being; and ſo Abominable a Pollution in the very Thought, as well as in the Act, that whoever ſuffers it to paſs Unpuniſh'd, offers an Indignity to Humane Nature it ſelf, in that Violence, and to the Common Mother of us All.

Antipater charg'd with dealing with Wizzards.

Nicolaus had a Touch too upon ſome Fooliſh Words, that the Mother of Antipater had let fall, it ſeems, in her Blabbing Talkative Humour; concerning Prognoſticators, Wizzards, and Sacrifices, that had been conſulted about the Life of the King, and the Succeſſion of the Crown. And then he had the Story of Antipater's Wallowing, and Beaſtly Debauches in Pheroras's Family, with his Cups, and his Women. There were ſeveral Particulars produced with Proofs to every Article; ſome Extorted; others Voluntary; ſome again deliver'd upon Recollection, and others upon Preſſing, and Occaſional Neceſſities: And Theſe were by ſo much the more Credible. For every Thing came out now to Antipater's Condemnation, but they durſt not ſo much as Mutter ſo long as he was in Favour. In ſhort, the People knew Ill Things by him; Hated him, and told All.

All Men's Mouths open againſt him.

His Condition was every way Miſerable; but the Horror of his Conſcience was yet the moſt Inſupportable part of his Calamity; having the Bloud of his Father (in the Sight of God that knew his Intention) together with the Diviſion, the Confuſion, and the Treaſon of the Family to Anſwer for. His Kindneſs, or his Hatred, was altogether ſteer'd by his Intereſt; and he never was, either a Friend, or an Enemy to any Man, but for his own Ends: And This Narrow Soul of his was ſo well known, that all Honeſt Men liv'd in a kind of Oppoſition to him, as if it had been Impoſſible to have an Eſteem for Antipater, and for Virtue, together: Inſomuch that ſo ſoon as ever they found him abandon'd by the Government, and expos'd for a Mark; People brought in their Informations againſt him in Huddles, and with Outcries for Juſtice; nor was there any Room, Need, or Pretence for Subornation in the Caſe; there being no Place for a Court-Flattery on the one Hand; nor any Danger, if they ſhoud have ſuppreſs'd the Truth, on the Other: But Exclamations were brought in from all Parts againſt Antipater, and his Vile Practices; as a Wretch, whoſe Death was not ſo neceſſary upon the ſingle Score of his Father's Safety, as for the ſake of Mankind it ſelf, in clearing the World of ſo abandon'd a Wretch. And his Accuſation was not Grounded neither upon bare Interrogatories, whether upon the Torture, or the Good Faith of the Witneſs: But Multitudes came thronging-in with Articles againſt him of their own Accord, and made the Matter ſo Clear, that withal his Art and Impudence, he had not one Word to Reply.

When Nicolaus had done ſpeaking, Varus told Antipater, that if he had any thing to ſay for himſelf, the Court was ready to hear him: And that his Father, and Himſelf ſhould be the Gladdeſt Men in the World to find him Innocent. Antipater caſt himſelf immediately down upon the Ground, and This ſhort Prayer in his Mouth. Lord, ſays he, Thou that art the Searcher of Hearts, I moſt earneſtly beſeech thee to vindicate my Innocence as to any Thought of Miſchief to my Father, by ſome Signal Token from Heaven

Antipater's Hypocriſy.

Heaven, that may Convince the World of my Integrity. This is the Way of Men Harden'd in Impiety, first to cast off the Fear of God in their Practices, and so, by degrees, they come to Renounce or Affront him in their Words; and yet when their Wickedness hath brought them into Danger, they go on calling upon God still, and Appealing to that Righteous Judge with certain Formal Pretences of Resignation to his Will and Pleasure. Antipater, that had gotten a Habit of this way of Proceeding; and after he had led the Life of an Atheist, without any Regard to a Divine Power or Providence, came in the Conclusion to fall under the Stroke of a Just Vengeance; and in That Distress, for want of Humane Aid, either by Friends, or Laws, he cast himself, he said, upon the Power and Goodness of the Almighty, who had preserv'd him hitherto by Miracle, to take care of the Life of his Father. Varus seeing that he could get no Direct Answer to any of his Questions, nor any thing but Invocations, and Appeals to Heaven, he found there would be no End of it that way, and so call'd for the Poyson to be brought out, and some Tryal made of the Force of it. It was fetch'd presently, and given to a Condemn'd Man, whom it Kill'd immediately. Upon This Experiment, the Court rose, and Varus went away the next day to Antioch, the Place of his Usual Abode, in regard that the Kings of Syria commonly made That their Residence.

An Experiment made of the Poyson.

Herod and Varus having conferr'd upon the Matter, Antipater was made a Prisoner; the Resolution not known; but most People imagining that what the King did was with the Advice of Varus. Soon upon Antipater's Commitment, Herod sent away to Cæsar about him, both by Word of Mouth, and by Writing, with the whole History of his Case and Crimes. There happen'd at the same time to be some Letters Intercepted from Antiphilus out of Ægypt, to Antipater, wherein were these Words: I have sent you here a Letter of Acme's, and you know I run the Risque of my Life in the doing of it; if I should be laid at the Mercy of Two Powerful Families, and My Deadly Enemies. Pray have a Care that nothing Miscarry. This was the Substance of the Letter; but the King was at a Loss still for the other Letter of Acme's, and caus'd a strict Search and Enquiry to be made after it; but none such to be found; and the Servant of Antiphilus, upon Examination, absolutely deny'd the Knowledge of any such Letter. When they had been a pretty while Bethinking themselves, One of the King's Friends happen'd to spy a Seam in the Lining of the Servant's Inward-Coat: (for he had two on) and it came into his Head, that perhaps the Letter they look'd for might be in That Fold: which was well Guess'd; for There they found the Letter; and This was the Tenor of it. Acme to Antipater. I have Written to Your Father, according to your Direction; and I have put in a Counterfeit Copy of a Letter, as if it came from Salome to the Empress, my Mistress. I make no doubt, but upon the Reading of it, Herod, without any more ado, will Treat her as a Traytress. This Letter that pretends to be from Salome, was the Project and Invention of Antipater, with Salome's Name to't; but dress'd up by Acme, who wrote to the King to this Effect. Acme to King Herod. Out of the Care and Desire I have to serve you, in acquainting you with any thing that may concern the Safety of your Person, I have transcrib'd, and sent you a Letter that I found of Salome's to my Mistress the Empress, against you; desiring her Leave for the Marrying of Syllæus. Pray let it be torn to Pieces, for the Discovery would be as much as my Life is worth. Now the Letter of Acme to Antipater laid open the whole Cheat, in shewing that she did nothing but by his Order; Writing to Herod, and sending a Copy of Salome's Counterfeit-Letter to her Mistress, and a Plot in the Bottom of it. Acme was by Nation a Jew, in the Service of Julia, the Wife of Cæsar, and bought over to Antipater's Interest by a vast Sum of Mony, to assist him in his Practices, both upon his Aunt and his Father. This Discovery exposed Antipater for so Turbulent an Incendiary, and so Pernicious, and Dangerous a Wretch, to Himself and his Sister (to say nothing of his Corrupting the Honour and Discipline even of Cæsar's Roof and Family) that Herod was within a very little of having him put to death upon the very Instant; and Salome was not wanting neither to Provoke him to it; breaking into Extravagant Outrages; as beating her Breasts, and other Frantick Violences; and offering her self to a Thousand Deaths, if they could but prove against her so much as the least Colour for a Suspicion of one Disloyal Thought. The King, upon this Occasion, sent for his Son, and bad him speak the Word Freely, if he had any Thing to say in his own Defence. Antipater stood stone-still a while, without one Word speaking; and Herod, finding him in that Confusion, put him to it once again, since he could not excuse himself, to tell him at least who were his Complices. He named Antiphilus, and went no further. Herod took This way of Trifling for such an Indignity, that he was once thinking in a Passion to send him away to Rome to take his Tryal before Cæsar. But upon Second Thoughts, for fear he might be Rescu'd upon the Way, or Acquitted when he came thither, he kept him in Prison as Before: but sent his Em-

Herod falls Sick, and makes his Will. A Sedition, and the Occaſion of it. Judas and Matthias, Two Eminent Jews. Herod given over. Judas and Matthias againſt the Golden Eagle. News that Herod is Dead. The Golden Eagle thrown down. Judas and Matthias taken Priſoners. They juſtify themſelves. The King ſends them bound to Jericho. WHile the Embaſſadors were now with their Letters and Mandates upon the way toward Rome, Herod fell into a Fit of Sickneſs; made his Will; and being put quite out of Opinion with Archelaus, and Philip, by the Calumnies of Antipater, he declared his Youngeſt Son his Succeſſor. He gave in Legacies, a Thouſand Talents to Cæſar; To his Wife Julia, his Children, Friends, and Freemen, Five Hundred Talents more. The reſt of his Mony, with his Lands, and Revenues, he gave to his Own Sons and Grand Children: And for his Siſter Salome, he bequeathed her a very conſiderable Fortune, in Acknowledgment of the Steadyneſs of her Affection to him. He was now in the Seventieth Year of his Age; and his Illneſs increaſing upon him, paſt all Hope of Recovery: Cholerick, and Furious as a Madman, and ſo Miſchievouſly Croſs-grain'd, that there was no Poſſibility of pleaſing him. The Thing that troubled him was the Haughtineſs of his Stomach, upon a Phancy that he was fall'n into the Contempt and Hatred of the People, even to the degree of their taking pleaſure in his Miſery: Beſide that he was further Confirm'd in this Opinion by a Commotion that ſoon after follow'd upon it, at the Inſtance and Inſtigation of ſome Popular Men that Headed the Sedition. The Thing was this. Herod falls ſick, and makes his Will. A Sedition, and the Occaſion of it.

There were Two Men that had a Mighty Reputation among the Jews, both for the Eminency of their Learning in General, and likewiſe for their Particular Skill and Excellence in the Law. And they had yet further Endeared themſelves to the People, by the exceeding Care and Pains they took in the training-up of their Children to the Knowledge and Practice of their Duty, and Profeſſion, which they made, effectually the Main Buſ'neſs of their Lives: Their Names were Judas the Son of Sariphæus, and Matthias, the Son of Margalothus. No ſooner was it come to the Ears of theſe Two Famous Men, that the King was given over, but they put it preſently in the Heads of the Young Men to ſet upon a Reformation, and to Deſtroy all thoſe New Works and Structures that the King has Erected contrary to the Laws of their Country; giving them all Aſſurance that if they ſhew'd themſelves Champions for the Truth, they ſhould not fail of their Reward. They bad them further Conſider, that all the Broils and Factions of the King's Family, and the Deplorate Condition of the King's Sickneſs, were only Divine Judgments upon him for his Innovations; which Judas and Matthias Zealouſly Inſiſted on. Among other Inſtances of a Superſtitious Magnificence, there was a Dedication of a Golden Eagle ſet up over the Portal of the Temple, of a Prodigious Weight, and Value. Now this being a Flat Contradicton to our Laws, that abſolutely forbid the Uſe and Ornament of Images in ſuch Caſes, theſe Doctors ſet their Diſciples at Work to pluck down the Eagle. It would be an Enterprize of Hazzard, they told them; but withall, that a Glorious Death was much more Eligible then a Life of Pleaſure, and that their Bloud could not be better ſpent then in the Vindication of the Laws and Rites of their Country, which would alſo make their Names Immortal: whereas otherwiſe the Brave, and the Mean would lye Undiſtinguiſhed in the ſame Common Fate; wherefore All Men of Honour and Virtue ſhould do well, they ſaid, to Improve the Irrevertable Neceſſity of Death, by a Right Choice of the moſt Glorious Occaſion for it; and ſo to quit the Troubleſome World with Comfort. It takes away the Sting, and the Terror of Mortality it ſelf, both at once, to dye in the Conſcience of an Honeſt Action, and of a Good Life; and to Tranſmit, both the Fame, and the Reward of it to thoſe that ſhall come after you. Judas and Matthias two Eminent Jews. Herod given over. The People Encourag'd to deſtroy Innovations againſt Law. Judas and Matthias inveigh againſt the Golden Eagle, &c. and preſs the deſtroying of it.

Juſt upon the Finiſhing of this Harangue, came a Rumour that the King was Dead: So that betwixt the Diſcourſe, and the Report, the People were ſo inflam'd to be upon Action, that they Mounted the Portal at Noon-day; Tore down the Eagle, and Hackt it to pieces, with their Axes; in the Sight of a vaſt Multitude of Spectators in the Temple. The King's Commander in chief immediately upon the News of this Uproar, haſten'd away to the Tumult with a Strong Body of Troups, to prevent further Miſchief; After this comes News that the King's Dead. The People throw down the Eagle.

chief; ſuſpecting the Matter, in truth, to be much more Conſiderable then he found it. For coming to the Place, there was no Enemy to be ſeen, but a Rude Undiſciplin'd Rabble, without either Order or Arms, which was Eaſyly Broken and Scatter'd upon the Firſt Charge, only a Matter of Forty of them with their Leaders, Judas and Matthias, ſtood their Ground, upon a Point of Honour not to turn their Backs. Theſe were all taken and carry'd Priſoners to the King; who put it to them how they durſt preſume to lay Violent Hands upon that Sacred Figure. Their Anſwer was, that they had thought of it a long Time, and coming at laſt to a Reſolution, they did as became Men of Honeſty and Courage, in the putting of it in Execution; and that what they had now done was only in Vindication of the Honour of God, and of the Precepts of their Great Maſter, whoſe Diſciples they profeſs themſelves to be; beſeeching Herod not to make it a Matter of Wonder, if they preferr'd the Laws that they had received from Moſes, and he from God himſelf, before any other Decrees whatſoever. They did not ſuffer, they ſaid, for Evil Doing, but for Conſcience and Duty; and that they were ready to Deliver-up their Bodies in this Cauſe, either to Death, or to Puniſhment. It was clear that their Tongues and their Hearts went together in all that they Said and Did; and they were now ready to ſuffer with the ſame Conſtancy they Acted with before. The King, after this, ſent them bound to Jericho, where he call'd a Great Council of the Jews, and was himſelf (being Sick and Weakly) carry'd in his Chair into the Aſſembly; where he gave them to underſtand what Unweary'd Pains and Labours he had undergone for the Service of the Common-wealth; his Rebuilding their Temple at an Immenſe Charge: a Work that the whole Race of the Aſmonæan Family had not been able to compaſs in a Hundred and Twenty Five Years: ſetting forth alſo that he had not only Re-edify'd the Fabrick, but Beautify'd, Endow'd, and Enrich'd it, with Ornaments, Preſents, and Donatives, worthy of ſo magnificent an Undertaking. And now, ſays he, in the Concluſion, when I thought my ſelf ſure of ſurviving my Own Funerals in the Fame of a Happy Memory, and an Everlaſting Glory for the Good Offices I have done; there am I Flay'd Alive, and pay'd with Indignities for all my Benefits and Reſpects: Affronted, in the Face of the Sun, and of the People; My Gifts and Oblations torn from the very Temple, and an Act of Malice Improv'd into a Sacrilege; for the Injury is to God, not to Me.

A Party of Horſe Scatters them: Only Judas and Matthias, with about 40 more ſtand their Ground, and are carry'd Priſoners to the King.

They are charg'd with Inſolence, and Juſtify what they have done.

The King ſends them Bound to Jericho; Enters the Council in his Chair, and Reaſons the Matter with them.

The Leading Men of the Council not knowinghow far Herod's Cruelty might Tranſport him, thought it their ſafeſt Courſe to Purge themſelves by way of Prevention; which they did, by Declaring, not only their Innocency of the Fact, but their Opinion alſo, that the Rioters deſerv'd to be ſeverely Puniſh'd for it. Theſe words ſweeten'd him toward all the reſt. He took away the High-Prieſthood from Matthias, upon a Preſumption that he was no Stranger to the Contrivance, and gave it to Jozar, his Brother-in-law. It ſo happen'd that while [a] Matthias was in the Exerciſe of his Function, and upon the Eve to a Faſting-day, he dreamt that he lay with his Wife; by which Accident he bacame Unqualify'd for the Next Day's Service; So that Joſeph, the Son of Ellemus, his near Kinſman was ſubſtituted for that Day to ſupply his Place. After Herod had deprived Matthias of the Pontificat, he gave Order for the Burning of the other Matthias, the Ring-leader of the Sedition, and all his Companions with him, Alive. The Moon, as it fell out, was that Night in an Eclipſe.

He depoſes Matthias, and puts Jozar in his place.

The Mutineers burnt Alive.

The King grew every day Worſe and Worſe, and his Diſeaſe look'd like a Judicial Puniſhment of his Wickedneſs. He was parch'd up with a Faint, Inward Fever, that almoſt burnt his Heart out, and yet ſcarce ſenſible to the Touch. He was Tormented with anInſatiable Dog-Appetite; Ulcers and Cholicks in his Guts; Phlegmatique Tumors in his Feet and Groin; his Privy-Parts putrifying, and crawling with Worms; a Noyſome and a Painful Tentigo; Aſtmah's, Cramps, and Contractions of the Nerves: All Men, in ſhort, of Religion, Philoſophy, or Obſervation, were agreed upon it, that the Hand of God was evidently upon Herod in this Viſitation. But ſtill in the Hopeleſs Extremity of this his Intolerable, as well as Incurable Miſery, he Himſelf was the Only Man that did not Deſpair, but continu'd laying-out every where for Phyſicians, and Remedies. He went over the River Jordan Himſelf, to the Hot Baths at Calliroe, that empty themſelves into the Lake of Aſphaltites. Theſe Waters, beſide their Mineral Virtue, are no Unpleaſant Drink. Upon his coming hither, his Phyſicians order'd him to be ſet up to the Shoulders in a Veſſel of Oyl, which put him into ſuch a Fit of Fainting; that his Domeſtiques giving him for Dead, brake-out into Lamentations and Outcries, that brought him to Himſelf again. By this Time he found all his Flattering Hopes of Life to be Vain and Idle; and therefore appointed a Donative of Fifty Drachma's a Man to be Diſtributed among the Soldiers; Large Sums among his Friends and Officers, and ſo he return'd to Jericho; where the Evil Humour ſo far prevail'd upon him, that he took-up a Final Reſolution for a Farewel; one of the Horrideſt perhaps that ever enter'd into the Heart of any Man to Imagine. He ſent out a Summons to all the Eminent Jews of the Country to repair immediately to him him at Jericho, and not to fail, on pain of Death. Upon their Appearance, according to the Proclamation, they were all Shut-up in the Circus, or Tilt-Yard, one with another, whether Guilty, or Innocent. He sent in the Next place for his Sister Salome and Alexas, her Husband; and spake to them to This Following Effect. My Time, says he, is drawing on. I am oppress'd with Pains; and Flesh and Blood must yield to Fate, which is no more then the common Lot of Mankind. It would be Troublesome, I must confess, to think of wanting any of the Funeral Honours that belong to Crowned Heads. I know very well what sort of Treatment I am to Expect from the Jews. They Hated me in my Life-time, and they'll be glad to see me Dead. But it lies in the Power of you Two, says he, to give me some Ease yet, even at my last Gasp; and it is no more then what you Owe me too. Do but follow my Counsel, and I dare yet promise my self the most Honourable Funeral-Solemnity that ever any Prince had under the Sun; the most to the Joy of my Soul; and for a Conclusion, an Universal Mourning, without one single Tear of Hypocrisy or Affectation. Wherefore so soon as ever the Breath is out of my Body, let the Circus be surrounded with Soldiers, and the Word of Command given to Destroy every Man within the Enclosure: But not a Syllable of my Death, till the Work be done. In the due Execution of this Order you will lay a Double Obligation upon me; one in the Performance of my Will; the other in the Celebration of my Death, with the Honour of a Publique Mourning. He accompany'd these Words with Tears and Lamentations; Adjuring his Relations by all that was Sacred in Humane Faith, Consanguinity and Friendship, to be true to him in the Punctual Discharge of all he had commmitted to their Trust, which they promis'd to make good to him in every Particular.

He sends for Salome and Alexas.

A Horrid Order given for a Farewel.

Some or other will pretend perhaps in the History of this Bloudy Monster's Barbarities, to his Neerest Relations in time past, that there might be Dangerous Jealousies and Competitions perchance, and consequently a kind of Necessity upon him to be Cruel in his own Defence. But in this last Action of his, he has laid himself open, even in his Pure Naturals, for the veryest Brute that ever wore the Shape of a Reasonable Creature. When he could live no longer himself, he bequeathed Destruction to those he left behind him, and took care to make the Whole Nation Mourners for him, by the order he left for the destroying of One at least out of every Family. And all this too, without any Injury, Provocation, Exception, or so much as any Reason given for the Doing of it: Whereas among People that have but the Least spark of Humanity, or Religion, Death puts an End to all Controversies, and Reconciles even the Greatest Enemies.

Acme put to Death. Antipater left to Herod's Discretion. Ahiab prevents Herod's killing himself. Antipater gives the King for Dead; and treats with the Keeper about his Escape. The Keeper tells the King of it, and the King orders him to be put to Death.

WHile Herod was giving his Last Orders to his Kindred, his Embassadors brought him an Answer from Cæsar to the Letters they carry'd to Rome. The Substance of it was Briefly this; That Augustus had put Acme to Death for a Correspondence with Antipater: and that he left Antipater Himself to the King his Father, either to be put to Death, or Banish'd, according to his Discretion. It was a Great Relief to Herod to find himself both Reveng'd upon Acme, and at liberty to do with his Son what he pleas'd: But he Relapsed quickly again into his Pains, and in an Outrageous Fit of Greediness and Hunger, he call'd for a Knife and an Apple, it being usual with him to Pare his own Apples, and so eat them by little and little. He was observ'd to look suspiciously about him, as if he had some Thought of Stabbing himself; but his Nephew Ahiab kept his Eye upon him, and in the very Instant of the Attempt catcht hold of his Uncle's Right-Hand with an Outcry, and Prevented it. This Noise put the Court now a Second time into an Uproar, all People taking for granted that the King was just then expiring. Antipater took all for granted; and making no doubt at all but his Father was Dead, he made as little also of Procuring his Liberty, upon this Occasion, and by that means, clearing his way to the Throne. In this Confidence, he Treated with his Keeper about his Discharge; with Large Offers and Promises, both of Rewards at present, and of Future Preferments, when he should come to the Crown; But the Keeper was so far from complying with his Proposals, that he went and Discover'd the whole Practice to the King, who hated him sufficiently before; but this Story of the Keeper's put him into so Extravagant a Passion, that he started up, though in the very Agonies of Death, and Lashing out into violent Outrages upon himself, Herod alters his Will, and declares Archelaus his Successor.

HEROD, upon Change of Mind, chang'd his Will too, and made Antipas, whom he had design'd in his Former Testament for Successor, to the Government, Tetrarch of Galilee, and Peræa; but gave the Kingdom to Archelaus: The Provinces of Trachon, and Gaulon, Patenæa, and Panias, to his Son Philip, the Brother-in-law of Archelaus, under the Title of a Tetrarchy. Jamnia, Axotus, and Phasaelis, he gave to his Sister Salome with Fifty Thousand pieces of minted Mony, not forgetting his other Relations also, either in Land or Cash. He left Cæsar, beside Gold and Silver; Plate, and Rich Furniture of all Sorts, Ten Millions of Pieces in ready Coin; and to the Empress Julia, with her Friends, Five Millions more of the same. Matters being thus settled, Herod departed this Life Five days after the Death of Antipater, Four and Thirty Years after the Expulsion of Antigonus, and in the 37th. Year from his being declar'd King of the Jews by the Romans. He was a Man Inexorably Cruel; a Slave to his Passions: His Will was his Law, and yet no Man, in the General more Fortunate then himself. He mounted the Throne from the Condition of a Private Man; fell into many Difficulties, but Surmounted them all, and liv'd at last to a Great Age. As to his Domestique Broils with his Children and Family, how Unhappy soever he might be in My Opinion, he was yet Fortunate in his own; for he still got the better of his Enemies.

Herod's Character.

Herod's Death kept Secret. Salome and Alexas discharge the People in the Circus in the King's Name. The King's Death published. The Soldiers Summon'd to Jericho; and the King's Letters to the Army Read. Archelaus the King's Son and Successor set-up. The Testament read with a Proviso.

Herod being now Dead, Salome and Alexas kept it for the present as the Greatest Secret in the World, and went directly to the Nobility that were shut up in the Circus, telling them in the King's Name, that they might go Home, and follow their own Bus'ness; for there was no further Occasion for them. This Contrivance laid upon the Jews the Highest Obligation imaginable. It was now a Proper time to make Publication of the King's Death; and the Soldiery being summon'd to Meet, at the Amphitheatre at Jericho, Herod's Letters to the Army were There read; full of Gracious Acknowledgments of their Past Faith and Services, and desiring them to continue the same Dutiful Affection to his Son Archelaus for the Future, whom he had now declared his Successor. Ptolemy the Keeper of the King's Seal, read after this, the Testament it self, with this Conditional Clause in it Express; that the Act it self was to be Reputed to be of no Force, without the Consent of Cæsar. This was follow'd with Acclamations of God save King Archelaus, and Wishes of a happy Reign to him, both from Officers and Soldiers, with Promises of the same Fidelity to the New King that they had paid to his Predecessor.

The Order and Pomp of Herod's Funeral.

The Next work was to provide for the Funeral-Solemnity, and this was the Province of Archelaus, to see that Nothing should be wanting to the Pomp and Splendor of it; he himself resolving, in Person, to bear a Part in the Ceremony. The Body was born upon a Golden Litter; sparkling with Variety of Precious Stones, [a] cover'd with Purple; a Diadem upon his Head; and over that, a Golden Crown, with a Scepter in his Right Hand; His Sons and Relations marching by his Side. After these, follow'd the Soldiers in their Distinctions and Divisions; First the Guards; then the Thracians; after them, the Germans; and Next, the Galatians: All of them Arm'd and appointed as for a Battle. After these, follow'd the rest of the Army under their Respective Officers, with Five Hundred of the Court-Domestiques in the Rear, with Aromaticks and Perfumes. They march'd in this Order as far as Herodium, Eight Furlongs from Jericho, where the Body was Bury'd, according to a Former Appointment, and this was the End of Herod.

When Archelaus had celebrated the Funerals of his Father, for the space of Seven days, according to the Custom of the Country, the Appointed Time of Mourning being now at an End, he treated the Multitude, and so went up to the Temple, where he plac'd himself upon a Golden Throne to receive the Gratulatory Prayers and Acclamations of the People, which were Answer'd on his part, with Great Affability and Respect; taking it very kindly, after the Hard Usage they had met with from his Father, to find them so well Inclin'd toward himself; and Assuring them withal, that their Good Will ſhould never be forgotten. He did not pretend, he ſaid, as yet, to aſſume the Name of a King, having no Right ſo to do, without the Aſſent and Authority of Cæſar, in the Ratifying of his Father's Teſtament; and that was it made him Decline the Acceptance of the Dignity when it was preſs'd upon him by the Army at Jericho, for want of being Lawfully Veſted in the Poſſeſſion thereof. But, ſays he, whenever I ſhall come to be ſettled in This Command, It ſhall be my Care to do All Things to your Advantage and Satisfaction, and to make my Reign much Eaſier to you then ever you found my Father's. The People were mightily pleas'd with the Modeſty of their New Prince's Behaviour and Diſcourſe, depending (as is uſual in ſuch Caſes) upon the Good Faith of every thing he ſaid: Inſomuch that they put his Good Nature preſently to the Tryal by asking him Boons; ſome one thing, ſome Another. Some to be Eas'd of their Taxes; Others to have their Companions ſet at Liberty, there being a great many of them that Herod had taken-up, and kept a long time in Priſon. Some again were wonderfully Fierce and Clamorous againſt Duties and Impoſitions, that were laid upon Market-ſtuff, and other Proviſions. Archelaus, in fine, found it for his Intereſt and Convenience, to Deny them nothing, for fear of Exaſperating the Multitude; ſo that when the Sacrifice was over, he took his Friends to Dinner with him to make Merry.

Archelaus waits the Ratifying Herod's Act by Cæſar.

THere was at this time a Dangerous Faction of Male-contented Jews, laying their Heads together in Conventicles, and Cabals, how to Embroil the Government. The Fitteſt Matter they could find to work upon, was the Caſe of Matthias, and his Companions, that Herod had put to death for the aforeſaid Riot upon the Golden Eagle. During the Life of the King, they did not dare to make any Publique Attempt, either in the Honour, or in the Vindication of Theſe Reformers; but now he was Dead, All Mouths were open againſt him in Clamours and Invectives, to the Diſgrace of his Memory: Inſomuch, that they Gather'd together in Tumultuary Meetings, to demand Juſtice and Satisfaction from Archelaus, upon Thoſe Friends of Herod, that were Inſtrumental in the Execution; as if that Vengeance upon the Living would have been ſome Comfort to the Dead. They inſiſted particularly upon the Removal of the High-Prieſt that Herod had Promoted, and the putting of ſome Worthy Man in his Place. This Peremptory way of Importunity was Provoking enough; but [a] Archelaus however (who was now Haſtening away to Cæſar, both for Authority, and Orders) did what he could by Fair Means to ſet Things Right for the Preſent; and to This End he Diſpatch'd away one of his Prime Officers to try what might be done upon Terms of Reaſon and Moderation. This was not a Time, he told them, for Violence and Revenge. The Men that ſuffer'd, he ſaid, had a Lawful Tryal; and their Interpoſing after That Manner was the Uſurpation of a Power they had nothing to do withal. They ſhould do well to Conſider that Archelaus was juſt now upon his Expedition to Rome, and that upon his coming back with his Commiſſion Ratify'd, all Theſe Difficulties would be provided for to their Content: Only in the Mean time, let them live Amicably and Peaceably one with another, without Incurring the Danger of a Sedition. This Diſcourſe was Encounter'd with ſo Impetuous an Outcry and Oppoſition, that one Sober Word among them was as much as a Man's Life was Worth. They had the Law in their Own Hands, they thought; and nothing Less would serve them, then a Revenge, now Herod was Dead, for the Friends he destroy'd of Theirs while he was Living; which they reckon'd hard to be deny'd them. In This Eagerness of Passion, they consulted no other Measures of Right or Wrong then the Impulses of their Own Humour and Interest, and so Intent all this while upon the Ruine of other People, that they Neglected the most Necessary Means of their own Safety. In the mean time, there was no Want of Seasonable Applications to them, as well from the King Himself, as from Others; but These Gentle Ways made them only more Insolent and Outrageous: insomuch, that they wanted nothing but Numbers, to Emprove This Tumult into a Direct Rebellion.

A Tumult little short of Rebellion.

The Feast of Unleavened Bread, or the Passover, being now at hand, the Celebrated Memorial of the Israelites being deliver'd out of Ægypt; a World of People coming up to Jerusalem more then Ordinary, as well from Abroad as at Home, to Worship, and offer Sacrifices upon that Occasion: a Seditious Party of Men Crouded into the Temple, and there made a Stand, with a Resolution not to stir out, though they were forced to beg their Bread to keep themselves from starving: Their Bus'ness There being to Condole with the People for the Loss of their Two Doctors, Judas and Matthias; and to Irritate the Rabble to a Revenge. No Body knew how far this Riot might go: So that Archelaus, for fear of the Worst, sent an Officer with a Party of Soldiers to suppress it in time, before the whole Body of the Multitude had taken the Infection; and with Orders also to seize the Ringleaders of the Tumult, and to bring them before him to make them Exemplary, in case of any Obstinate Resistance. The Guards no sooner appear'd, but the Mutineers ran down the Soldiers with such a Torrent of Rage and Clamour, that the whole Multitude falling upon them with Stones and other Weapons, destroy'd them All, save only the Officer Himself, and some few Wounded Men along with him, that scap'd. After This Action, they went on with their Sacrifices. The Contest was now brought to such a Push, that Archelaus must either Crush That Rabble, or Fall himself: So that he sent out his Whole Army to Encounter them, with Orders to his Horse, to put all to the Sword that should Endeavour to make their Escapes; and to keep all Succours out from them. This Body of Horse cut-off Three Thousand of their Men in the Action, and the rest fled to the Neighbouring Mountains for Shelter. So soon as this Brunt was over, Proclamation was made for every Man to return to his own Home; and after all their Swaggering they were glad to get off upon These Terms, and to leave Festival and all, for fear of a Worse Mischief.

Archelaus, with his army, cuts-off 3000, and scatters the rest.

Archelaus put himself now upon his Journy to Rome; taking his Mother; Nicolaus, Ptolemey, and several other of his Friends along with him; leaving the Care of his Kingdom and Family to his Brother Philip. Salome and her Family went also, and were accompany'd by divers others of his Kindred, under a Colour of Joyning Interests to Assist Archelaus in his Pretence to the Succession. But in Truth, rather to Obstruct, then to Further it; for they were resolv'd beforehand to Exhibit an Accusation against him for the Bus'ness of the Temple: But however, away they went, He and his Company together, Meeting Sabrinus, Cæsar's Procurator of Syria, at Cæsarea; Posting in all Haste toward Judæa to take Care of Herod's Mony: but Varus, very opportunely coming in the way, put-off his Journy; being himself, upon the Invitation of Archelaus by Ptolemy on the same Errand: So that out of a Respect to Varus, he neither meddled with any of the Forts in Judæa, nor seal'd up their Treasure; but left all things in the Power and Possession of Archelaus, till Cæsar should declare himself upon the Matter. This he promised, and so continu'd in Cæsarea. But soon after, upon the Embarquing of Archelaus for Rome, and the Departure of Varus for Antioch, Sabinus advanced directly to Jerusalem; took up his Habitation in the Palace; sent for the King's Officers, Military and Civil, demanding their Books and their Keys: But they were ty'd-up, they said, by the Orders of Archelaus to keep All things till his Return, in the same State they received them, for the Use and Service of Cæsar.

He takes his Mother and Prolomey to his Assistance.

No Man so great with him as Irenæus.

At the same time, Antipas, one of the Sons of Herod, took a Voyage to Rome, in Hope of getting the Kingdom to Himself. Salome did her part to put him upon it, under the Colour of a Prior Right to the Succession by an Antecedent Will; and suggesting that the First Will ought to stand. He took with him his Mother, and Ptolemey, the Brother of Nicolaus; a Particular Friend of Herod's, of a long Standing, and ever well-affected to his Party. But the Man above all the rest that Fix'd him at last in his Ambitious Undertaking, and had the Greatest Stroke with him, was Irenæus; a Man of a Notable Smooth Tongue, and one that had been much, and long in the King's Bus'ness. He was advised by others to Consider the Seniority of Archelaus, as Elder Brother, and the Pretence he had to the Succession by the Will of his Dead Father; but the Credit of Irenæus, and the Incentive of his own Ambition, carry'd it from all other Conſiderations. To Rome, in fine, he went; and upon his Arrival there, his Kindred came all over to him; not ſo much out of any Kindneſs to Himſelf, as an Averſion they had to Archelaus; their Heads being altogether ſet upon Liberty, and a Roman Governour: Or they phancy'd however, in Caſe of the Worſt, that Antipas would be the Eaſier to them of the Two; and for theſe Reaſons they Employ'd their Intereſt that way.

Antipas had a Strong Party.

Sabinus had now ſent an Information to Cæſar againſt Archelaus; and Archelaus, by the Hand of Ptolemey, preſented Auguſtus with a Memorial of what he had to Offer in his own Defence, containing the Ground of his Claim; a Recital of his Father's Will; an Account of what Monys he left; together with the Ring that Seal'd them up: Remitting himſelf upon the whole to Cæſar's Good Pleaſure. When Cæſar had Peruſed Theſe Writings, with the Letters alſo of Varus and Sabinus; what Mony Herod had left behind him; and the yearly Revenue of the Government, and what Antipas Himſelf had ſuggeſted in his own Right, he call'd a Council of his Friends to Adviſe upon the whole, and ſo gave Audience to the Competitors: Caius the Son of Agrippa by his Daughter Julia, whom he had adopted, ſitting Preſident. Antipater the Son of Salome ſtood up firſt; (an Excellent Speaker, and a Bitter Enemy to Archelaus) delivering himſelf in Terms to This Effect.

It ſeems a ſtrange Thing to me, ſays Antipater, that Archelaus ſhould be now Formalizing about his Title to a Kingdom, after ſo abſolute an Exerciſe of Sovereign Power over it already; and not ſo much as troubling his Head neither for Cæſar's Ratification, or Aſſent. I ſpeak of his Late Maſſacre of ſo many Jews upon One of their Feſtivals: Or ſuppoſing the Puniſhment it ſelf never ſo Reaſonable, That which would have been an Act of Juſtice in a Lawful Prince, was yet a Murder in an Uſurper. If he acted as a King without the Emperor's Approbation, it was an Affront to Cæſar: If he pretended to exerciſe Acts of Authority in the Capacity of a Private Man, it was yet Worſe. So that he could not reaſonably expect the Benefit of a Derivative Power from Cæſar, in his Favour, after what he had done to ſupplant it in the Original. He charg'd him likewiſe with Changing Officers of the Army at his Own Will and Pleaſure; Placing himſelf upon the Royal Throne, and Hearing Cauſes there in the Quality of a Sovereign Prince; Receiving, and Anſwering Publique Addreſſes and Petitions, and doing All Thoſe Things, in fine, without any Warrant, which Cæſar Himſelf could have enabled him to do; Taking upon himſelf, in his Own Name alſo, to Diſcharge thoſe that were Committed to the Circus. He ſtarted, upon the whole, a Great many Objections againſt him; ſome Actually True; and others, conſidering the Heat and Ambition of a Young Man, raiſed on a ſudden to ſuch a Pitch of Dignity and Power, not altogether Improbable: Beſide the Ill-natur'd Extravagance of Revelling Entertainment he made the very Night after the Death of his Father: which the People look'd upon with ſo much Horror for the Unnatural Ingratitude of it, toward ſo Indulgent a Parent, that they were ready to break out into an Uproar, to ſee how he Impos'd upon the World with a Perſonated Affection of Sorrow in the Day-time, and ſpending the whole Night in Luxury and Riot. How can Cæſar imagine that This Hard, Perverſe Man will ever be more Thankful for a Crown to the Emperor, then he has ſhew'd himſelf to ſo Tender a Father? What can be more Inhumane then to Sing, Feaſt, Dance, and Rejoyce at the Death of a Parent, as if it were for the Deſtruction of an Enemy! With what Face now ſhall This Man deſire Cæſar to make him a King, that has already taken upon him to make Himſelf one, even without Cæſar! But the Great Aggravation of the Wickedneſs in the Temple, was the Horridneſs of the Murder in that Sacred Place; and the Doing it upon a Solemn Feſtival, where both Citizens and Strangers promiſcuouſly were Slaughter'd like Sacrifices; The Holy Place fill'd with Carcaſſes; and this Violence not Committed by a Stranger neither, but by an Uſurper under the Countenance of Royal Power, the better to Colour his Tyrannical, and Barbarous Cruelties. His Father knew his Temper ſo very well, that he never ſo much as dreamt of him for a Succeſſor, ſo long as he was in his Right Senſes; but Antipas was the Man he Pitch'd upon, in his Former Teſtament, while he was as yet in his Wits, and in ſound Health, both of Body and Mind; or putting the Caſe that Herod's Opinion of Archelaus might have been the ſame upon the making of his Firſt Will, as it was afterward; has he not done enough ſince that time to ſhew what a King he is like to make, in Aſſuming to Act by a ſelf-created Power, and in the Circumſtances of a Private Man, to cut Throats in the very Temple. Antipater, upon Theſe Words, appeal'd to ſeveral of his Relations that were there Preſent for Witneſſes to the Truth of what he had deliver'd, and ſo made an End of his Diſcourſe.

Uſurpation Charged upon him.

Exerciſe of Arbitrary Power.

Antipater appeals upon the Matter of Fact.

Nicolaus argu'd on the behalf of Archelaus, that the Blood of Thoſe that were Kill'd in the Temple reſted upon their Own Heads; and that they had carry'd the Tumult ſo far, there was no other way of Suppreſſing it. The Inſolence, 'tis true, may ſeem to Point at Archelaus; but the Affront ſtruck at the Authority of Cæſar himſelf in the Murder of Thoſe Men, contrary to the Laws of God and Nations, and without any Reſpect to the Sacredneſs credneſs of the Place, or Occaſion, that were ſent in an Orderly way to Quiet the Mutineers. Now Theſe are the People that Antipater ſtands up for, without either Honeſty or Shame, provided he may but Gratify the Rancour of his Spleen to Archelaus. The Fault was in the Aggreſſors; and not in Thoſe that were both Provoked and Neceſſitated to take up Arms in their own Defence. As for the reſt of the Articles that were charg'd upon Archelaus, they were all retorted upon the Accuſers Themſelves, who were all Conſenting to the very Action they complain'd of: Beſide that they made the Thing a great deal worſe then it was, out of Spite to the Menager, though a Near Relation, and one that had deſerved highly well of the Father, and done many Good Offices to the Family. As to the Authority of the King's Teſtament, he was not only in Perfect Senſe and Memory when he wrote it; but Second Wills, as well as Second Thoughts are commonly Beſt. And for a Further Proof that it was written with Conſideration, he ſubmitted the Validity of it to the Good Pleaſure of Cæſar. But Cæſar, ſays he, is too Generous to Encourage Ungrateful Examples in Favour of a ſort of People, that, after the Higheſt Obligations imaginable to Herod in his Life-time, take ſuch Pains to overthrow his Will now he is Dead. Cæſar will rather Exerciſe his Goodneſs in favour of a Faithful Friend and Ally, that lays himſelf at his Feet, and not ſuffer his Imperial Dignity and Juſtice that have made him ſo Famous over the Face of the Earth, to be Impos'd upon by Envy and Calumny. Will Antipater have Herod's to be the Will of a Mad-man, becauſe it Deſigns ſo Dutiful a Son for a Succeſſor? Or is it a Sign of Madneſs to pay ſo Abſolute a Deference to the Liking and Authority of Cæſar? It would be hard to Conceive, how Herod ſhould be ſo Miſtaken in the Perſon, and at the ſame time ſo Right in the Prudential part of the Method and Direction.

Archelaus caſts himſelf at Cæſar's Feet, who does him Great Honour.

When Nicolaus had now finiſh'd his Speech, Archelaus threw himſelf at Cæſar's Feet; who preſently taking him up with Great Humanity, paſs'd This Judgment upon him, that he was Worthy of a Crown, which was underſtood for a kind of Owning his Authority. Cæſar finding the Young Prince ſo well ſatisfied, Diſcharg'd the Meeting without coming to any Final Reſolution at preſent, and ſo took time to bethink himſelf whether he ſhould ſettle the Government upon Archelaus Alone, or in Partition upon the whole Family, in regard that they all depended upon him alike.

BEfore This Affair could be ſettled, Marthace the Mother of Archelaus fell Sick, and Dy'd; and News was brought from Varus the Governour of Syria, that the Jews were Revolted, having been very Mutinous and Troubleſome ever ſince the Departure of Archelaus. But Varus falling upon them with his Troups before they could well gather to a Head, made Examples of the Ringleaders, and ſo having broken the Neck of the Sedition, went back again to Antioch; leaving only One Legion in Jeruſalem to prevent Tumults.

this while advancing his Own Private Ends of Gain and Booty. The Feaſt of the Paſſover; (which is the Name of the moſt Celebrated Feſtival we have;) That Feſtival, I ſay, now drawing-on, brought-up to Jeruſalem Thouſands and Thouſands of the Jews from All Quarters; ſome for Worſhip and Devotion, and others out of pure Spite and Revenge. Theſe Numbers Gather'd together, not only from Judæa, where the Outrage fell Heavieſt, but from Galilee, Idumea, Jericho, and from the Towns beyond Jordan; being all Unanimouſly reſolved to call Sabinus to a Severe Account. They divided their Troups into Three Bodies; One of them took Poſſeſſion of the Circus; Another was Poſted upon the North and Eaſt-ſide of the Temple; the Third upon the Weſt, where the King's Palace ſtood. When they had thus Begirt, and Hemmed-in the Romans, they made ready for the Aſſault. Sabinus was not a little ſurpriz'd at the Boldneſs of theſe People, and finding that they were deſperately Reſolved either to Conquer or Die, he ſent with all ſpeed to Varus for Immediate Relief, for the Legion that he had left there would undoubtedly be cut to pieces elſe. He himſelf, in the mean time, got up to the Top of a High Turret belonging to the Caſtle of Phaſael, which was Erected in Memory of Herod's Brother who was ſlain by the Parthians, and from thence gave the Sign with his Hand to the Romans to ſally-out upon the Jews; Expecting that Others ſhould Expoſe their Lives to Gratify his Avarice, at the ſame time when He himſelf durſt not ſo much as ſhew his Head among his Friends. But the Romans put it to the Venture however, and had a Sharp Encounter of it; for though the Soldiers did all that was poſſible for Brave Men to do, the Jews kept-up their Hearts yet, notwithſtanding a Great Loſs of their People. They poſſeſs'd themſelves after This, of ſome of the Outward Galleries of the Temple, whence they gall'd the Romans from above, with Stones and Arrows from their Slingers and Archers, as Spectators rather then Actors, in That Part of the Combat; for the Romans Below, were out of Diſtance of reaching their Enemies. The Fight continu'd a Long time upon This Diſadvantage, till in the End the Romans ſet Fire to the Timber-Work under the Galleries, and ply'd it ſo hard, that the Flame ſhot-up to the Roof in a Moment, and laying hold of the Pitch, Wax, and Oyls that were Employ'd upon the Ornament and Guilding, put all into ſo furious a Blaze, that it was certain Death, ſo much as to Attempt a Relief: for what with Thoſe that were Cruſh'd to Death with the Fall of the Building, and Thoſe that were put to the Sword upon the Ground, there was not ſo much as one Man ſcap'd of Thoſe that had poſſeſs'd the Galleries; ſeveral of them in Deſpair or Aſtoniſhment, leapt into the Flames in a Fright; others caſt themſelves upon the Points of their Swords: and for thoſe that thought to ſave themſelves in Holes, and Hiding Places, they were all cut-off by the Soldiers; for what could their Courage avail them without Arms! As the Fire ſlacken'd, the Romans preſs'd thorough the Ruins up to the very Repoſitory of the Holy Treaſure, whereof a conſiderable Part was Pilfer'd, and Embezel'd by the Soldiers, and not above Four Hundred Talents, (as Sabinus pretended) that was brought to him. The Jews were now in a Double Diſtreſs; partly for the Loſs of ſo many of their Dear Friends, and partly for the Sacrilegious Robbery Committed upon their Temple: But however, in This Fit of Deſperation, they got a Body together of the moſt Reſolute Men they had, and beſet the Palace with them; Menacing immediately to ſet Fire to it, and to put every Man to the Sword that ſhould ſcape the Flames, if they did not in That Inſtant Quit the Place and Depart; with a Promiſe of Impunity to Sabinus, and All his People, if they went away preſently; The Greater part of the Court being alſo on their ſide. Rufus and Gratus with Three Thouſand of Herod's Choiceſt Men, went over to the Romans, together with the Horſe that were under Rufus's Command, which was a Seaſonable and a Conſiderable Enforcement, but the Jews ply'd their Work yet nevertheleſs, Mining the Walls, Menacing and Adviſing the Enemy to be gone, while they might, without putting a People to the laſt Extremity of Deſperation that were Reſolv'd at all Hazzards to maintain their Liberties, with the Laws and Cuſtoms of their Forefathers. Sabinus was willing enough to have comply'd; but being Conſcious to himſelf of what he had deſerv'd from the Jews, he durſt not venture himſelf upon their Promiſe: Beſide that the Conditions were too Advantageous to be made Good, he thought, and ſo he determin'd to venture the holding of it out, in the Hope and Expectation of Succour from Varus.

While Matters at Jeruſalem were in This Poſture, there were ſeveral other Inſurrections alſo up and dow in Judæa elſewhere, upon the Inſtigation either of Profit or of a Vindictive Malice. There was a Matter of Two Thouſand of Herod's Disbanded Men gather'd together upon This Occaſion into a Body, with a Reſolution to Encounter a Party of the King's under the Command of Ahiab, Herod's Nephew; but Ahiab knowing the People he had to do withal to be Old Soldiers, and Try'd Men, he kept off from Fighting all that was poſſible, by ſhifting into Faſtneſſes, and Defilees, where there was no coming at them.

Several Rebellions.

On

Judas the Notorious Robber haraſſes the King's Country.

On the Other Hand, there was Judas the Son of Ezekias, the Famous Rover that held Herod formerly ſo long in Play, though at laſt he Worſted him. This ſame Judas with a Band of Deſperate Men that he had gotten about him at Sephoris, a City of Galilee, made an Inroad into the King's Country; ſeiz'd his Magazines, and Military Stores; Arm'd all his People to a Man, took the King's Monys; made himſelf Formidable to the Inhabitants; Pillaging and Spoiling wherever he came, and Aſpiring, in fine, to the Government it ſelf; not by any Arts and Ways of Honour, (for he had no skill that way) but upon the Encouragement of doing what Miſchief he pleas'd, Gratis.

Simon, once a Servant of Herod's, ſets up for King.

While Things were in this Confuſion, there was one Simon, formerly a Servant of King Herod's; but a Man mightily celebrated for his Prodigious Strength; the Gracefulneſs and the Goodlineſs of his Perſon, and Stature: This Man had the Vanity and Confidence to venture at the Crown; took his Guards about him, and was ſaluted every where by the Mad Multitude, with Acclamations of God ſave the King, and look'd upon himſelf, in fine, to be the Fitteſt Man in the whole World for the Command: and for a Prologue to his Greatneſs, he began with the Burning and the Rifling of the Palace at Jericho, making the ſame Havock in other of the King's Houſes; ſtill allowing his Followers the Advantage of the Booty. And he would not have ſtopt there neither, if he had not been ſeaſonably prevented; but Gratus, one of the King's Captains, and at that time taking part with the Romans, advanced with his Troups againſt Simon, and there paſs'd a very Sharp, and an Obſtinate Fight betwixt them: But Simon's People that came from the other ſide of Jordan, Menaging the Action with more Courage, then Skill, were totally Routed and Cut to pieces, and Simon himſelf being taken Priſoner in his Flight over certain difficult Paſſes; Gratus ordered his Head to be ſtruck-off.

A ſharp Fight betwixt Simon and Gratus.

Simon Routed, Taken, and his Head ſtruck-off

This Humour of the Common People was up every where; for the Royal Palace at Amatha by the River Jordan, was burnt to the Ground too by ſuch another ſort of Rabble as Thoſe that follow'd Simon. This Rage was little better then an Epidemical Madneſs; and all for want of their own King, by Good Reaſon, and Diſcipline, to keep the People in their Duty. But upon the bringing-in of Foreigners to Reclaim them, what with their Intolerable Pride and Avarice, the People were only the Worſe for't.

There was one Athronges too, a Man neither of Birth, Virtue, nor Fortune; but one of the meaneſt even of Shepherds, only a Huge Bulk of Body, and a Brutal Strength of Limbs. With theſe Qualifications, he put-in for a Pretence to the Government, with a Reſolution to venture his Life for the obtaining of a Prerogative to do Miſchief at Will and Pleaſure. This Athronges had Four Brothers, as Strong, and as Gigantick as himſelf, and each of them a Troup of Soldiers under his Command, which they look'd upon as a Foundation ſufficient toward the Gaining of their Point. There were vaſt Multitudes of People that came-in to theſe Five Brothers; and Athronges made uſe of his Four Brethren to go upon Parties, and to act as his Lieutenants, while he himſelf ſat in Counſel with a Crown upon his Head, giving Orders and Reſolutions in Affairs of State. This Pageantry continu'd for ſome time, and the Royal Stile and Title did not ſeem altogether Idle neither; for they did what he would, and there was no diſputing of his Commands: Unmercifully Cruel, whenever either the Romans, or the King's Soldiers fell into his Power; for he hated them both alike; The One for the Liberties they had taken under Herod; and the other, for Injuries of Freſher Date. The Animoſity grew every day ſo much more Mortal and Implacable then other, that betwixt the Havock they made for Profit and Booty, and the Cruelties they committed, even for Cruelty's ſake, and to keep their Hands in Ure, there was no Creature ſafe. They fell upon a Roman Convoy out of an Ambuſh near Emmaus, with Corn and Arms for the Camp; Kill'd the Commander Arius, with Forty of his Soldiers, All Brave Men, upon the Place; and the reſt muſt have expected the ſame Fate too, if Gratus had not brought them off with a Party juſt in the Nick, leaving their Dead behind them. They kept-on Skirmiſhing at this rate for a Long time, to the Great Trouble of the Romans, but a much Greater to Themſelves; for in the Concluſion they were all taken; One in an Encounter with Gratus; Another by Ptolemey. The Eldeſt fell into the Hands of Archelaus, and the Laſt finding the Caſe Deſperate; their Men ſpent with Toyl and Sickneſs, and no Hope of Recruits, or Redreſs, yielded himſelf to Archelaus upon his Oath and Honour for the Performance of Conditions. But this was ſome time after.

All taken and ſuppreſs'd.

In this Licence of Robbery and Confuſion, Every New Band of Mutineers would be ſetting-up New Kings; which tore the Commonwealth to Pieces: the Jews eſpecially, that were ſtill ſplitting into Fewds and Factions among Themſelves; but the Romans all this while came off better Cheap.

The

The News that Varus had received from Sabinus of the Danger he was in, put him into ſo great an Apprehenſion for the Third Legion (which was the whole Number they had in Syria) that he took the Other Two, and Four Troups of Horſe, with the Auxiliaries of the King's, and the Tetrarch's, and haſten'd away into Judæa to the Relief of the Beſieged; appointing the Rendezvous at Ptolemais, and taking Fifteen Hundred Men along with him from Berytus by the way. There was alſo Aretas the Petræan (he that went over to the Romans out of a Pique to Herod) who ſupply'd him with a conſiderable Enforcement both of Horſe and Foot; but when the Army was drawn all into a Body at Ptolemais, Verus gave the Command of part of it to his Son, and one of his Particular Friends, with Order to March into Galilee, which is not far from Ptolemais. Upon This Inroad into the Country, he carry'd all before him wherever he met with any Oppoſition; took Sephoris; laid the City in Aſhes, and ſold the People for Slaves at an Outcry. Varus himſelf advanced with his Army toward Samaria, but there was no Damage done to the City becauſe he knew them to be well Affected; and in their own Diſpoſition, Peaceable enough. But he Encamped in a Village call'd Arus, which belong'd to Ptolemy. This Village the Arabians Burnt, in Revenge to the very Friends of Herod, for Herod's ſake. The Army advanced afterward to Sampho, which the ſame Arabians Rifled, though a ſtrong Place, and afterward ſet it a-fire: But, in ſhort, there was nothing ſcap'd them, That whole Expedition, but all at the Mercy of Fire and Sword. Emmaus was Burnt by the Order of Varus, in Revenge of his Soldiers that were ſlain there; but the Inhabitants had quitted it firſt. Upon his Approach from thence toward Jeruſalem, the Jews that had Beſieg'd the Legion upon that Quarter, immediately upon the Sight of the Army, Abandon'd their Poſt, and in a Fright brake up to Shift for themſelves. Varus fell very ſeverely upon the Jeruſalem-Jews for This Scandalous Uproar; but they had this to ſay in their Excuſe, that falling out in a time when there was ſo vaſt a Recourſe of People to Jeruſalem, it was the Strangers made the War, not the Inhabitants; and that They did not only not oppoſe the Romans, but ran the very Riſque with them in the Fate of the ſame Siege. As for Sabinus, Varus could never get Sight of him, but he withdrew himſelf out of the City toward the Sea.

Varus, upon This, ſent up and down all over the Country to Inform himſelf of the Ring-leaders of the Revolt; and upon clear Proofs againſt them, ſome he puniſh'd; others he pardon'd and let go, Crucifying a Matter of Two Thouſand upon this Occaſion. Varus's People had done a great many Ill Things much againſt his Will, in the Heat and Rage of a Military Licence; ſo that finding no further Occaſion for his Army, he ſent it away: But hearing afterward that Ten Thouſand of the Jews were got into a Body, he Order'd-out a ſtrong Detachment to fall upon them in their Quarters, but without a Blow Striking, they deliver'd themſelves up to Ahiab Priſoners at Diſcretion. Varus ſet the Common People at Liberty; ſent the Heads of the Riot to Cæſar, and forgave all the reſt, ſaving only ſome Relations of Herod that had ſo little Honour or Conſcience, as without any Regard to Affinity, or Juſtice, to Engage in ſo Wicked a War. Matters being thus Compos'd, Varus left the ſame Legions ſtill in Garriſon at Jeruſalem, and went back to Antioch.

This Difficulty was no ſooner over in Judæa, but Archelaus was Encounter'd with Another at Rome, that happen'd as follows. The Jews with the Permiſſion of Varus, ſent an Embaſſy to Auguſtus, for leave to Menage and Converſe among themſelves, according to their own Laws. There were Fifty Jews joyn'd in the Commiſſion, and upward of Eight Thouſand more of the City, that Preſented themſelves to Second them. Cæſar hereupon, appointed a Select Number of his Friends, and Others of the Firſt Rank in the City, to attend him in the Temple of Apollo, a moſt Magnificent Structure of his own Erecting. Thither came the Embaſſadors alſo with a long Train of Jews after them, and Archelaus, with his Friends likewiſe. But the King's Relations could not tell which way to turn themſelves: for on the One Hand, they abhorr'd Archelaus, and therefore could not ſide with him; and on the Other hand, if they ſhould have Clos'd with the Embaſſadors, they muſt have betray'd themſelves to the King for Enemies to a Prince of their own Blood. There was alſo Philip the Brother too, that came out of Syria by the Advice of Varus in the Proſpect of Aſſiſting Archelaus, for whom he had a Particular Tenderneſs and Reſpect. But yet Philip all this while was not without Hope, that if the Embaſſadors ſhould gain their End, and the Dignity come to be divided among Herod's Children, he might come to put-in for a Part in the Kingdom himſelf.

The Jews ſend an Embaſſy to Cæſar.

Cæſar gives them Audience in the Temple of Apollo.

The Firſt Thing the Ambaſſadors inſiſted upon in their Addreſs, was an Earneſt Requeſt that they might be no longer under the Power of Kings; and they began with the Hiſtory of the Miſgovernment and Iniquity of Herod. He was a King, they ſaid, only in Name; but in the Exerciſe of his Power, a Tyrant; and not only vers'd in the Common Arts of Oppreſſion, but Fruitful in Inventions of his own, to improve the Myſtery. It would be to no Purpoſe to reckon up how many Lives he has taken away, when the Survivors were yet more Miſerable then thoſe he Deſtroy'd; for they liv'd in perpetual Danger and Terror, under ſo Mercyleſs, and Rapacious a Maſter, and as much at Mercy in their Fortunes as in their Perſons. What was all the Pomp and Vanity of his Expences upon Strangers for? the Repairing, Rebuilding, Beautifying, and Enriching of their Cities; but a Singular way he had found-out by Himſelf of Dreyning and Beggaring his own People at Home, to Gratify his Vanity Abroad; and of Turning a Flouriſhing and a Plentiful Country into a Deſert? How many of the Nobility has he put to death, upon Falſe, Frivolous Pretences, without any Colour of Law or Juſtice, and purely for the Benefit of their Forfeited Eſtates! And how many Others has he Neceſſitated to Compound for their Lives, with the Loſs of their Fortune! And ſo in the Matter of Tributes, and ordinary Taxes, it was not enough for every Man to pay according to his Aſſeſſment, and Proportion, without Bribes, and Preſents over and above, to Court-Minions, Collectors, and other Raking Officers and Servants, to prevent further Vexation. We ſhall ſay nothing of his Brutal Practices, both upon Virgins and Matrons, but paſs them over in Silence, for the Honour of thoſe Innocent Names that ſuffer'd the Abuſe: But, in ſhort, ſays he, if the Fierceſt Beaſt in the Forreſt had been ſet over us, he would have Govern'd us juſt as Herod did: And of all the Miſeries that ever This Nation Endur'd, the Calamity of his Reign was Incomparably the Greateſt: Wherefore the People might well be allow'd to Complement Archelaus upon the Death of his Father, for they were ſure beforehand, they could never have a Worſe in his Place. They were as Frankly forward alſo, out of a reſpect to the Son, in Promoting the Funeral Honours of the Father, and ſo in Other Offices of Deference, and Good Manners, which they thought might gain upon the Good Will of the Succeſſor: But Archelaus quickly gave the People to Underſtand, that he was his Father's own Son; and they might ſee even before he was in the Seat, what might after wardbe expected from him, whenever he came to Govern. His whole Fortune was as yet at the Mercy of Cæſar; and to give his New Subjects ſome Taſte beforehand of hir Virtue, Modeſty, and Juſtice, he Sacrificed Three Thouſand Citizens of his own Tribe to the Honour of God, in the very Temple, with as Little Regret, as if they had been but ſo many Common Victims. Let the World judge Now of the Confidence of This Odious Man, that can have the Face, after the Committing of ſo Execrable an Outrage himſelf, to Charge the Crime upon Others, and at the ſame time to lay claim to the Government. The Embaſſadors, in fine, ſumm'd-up their whole Bus'neſs in a ſhort Requeſt to Cæſar, to Change the Form of their Government, and deliver them from the Oppreſſion of a Monarchy; Annexing them to Syria under ſuch Rulers as Cæſar ſhould think fit to appoint: And it would then appear whether they were a People that delighted in Broils and Innovations, or Men of Order and Obedience, under the Authority of Lawful Governours.

An Invective againſt Archelaus.

The Embaſſadors having now deliver'd what they had to ſay, Nicolaus ſtood-up in the Defence, both of Herod, and Archelaus. Pray under favour, how came it (ſays he) if Herod was Guilty of all This, that he ſhould never be call'd to an Account for it in his Life-time, when they might have appeal'd to the Juſtice of Auguſtus for Remedy, and Satisfaction. As for the Caſe of Archelaus, it was not properly his Act, but an Abſolute Force put upon him by the Contumacy of a Faction that firſt Trampled upon the Laws in a Seditious Tumult; and then with Swords and Stones, Cut the Throats, and beat out the Brains of thoſe that were ſent to quiet them. And what was Archelaus's Crime now, but the ſuppreſſing of an Outrageous Inſurrection by a ſtronger Power? But, ſays he, turning to the Accuſers: ſo long as this Spirit of Anarchy Reigns, there is never any Peace to be expected; for nothing will ever ſatisfy theſe People, if they may not be their Own Judges, and Carvers.

Cæſar's Generoſity in Favour of Herod. The Portion of the Sons of Herod.

WHEN Cæſar had heard both ſides, he diſmiſs'd the Aſſembly, and after ſome few days declared Archelaus Succeſſor to the one Moiety of Herod's Juriſdiction, but under the Title of an Ethnarch, not of a King, with a Promiſe yet of the Kingdom too, whenever he ſhould make himſelf Worthy of that Honour. The other half was divided betwixt the Two Sons of Herod, Philip, and That Antipas who had the Diſpute with Archelaus about the Entire Succeſſion. This Antipas had for his ſhare, Galilee, with the Country beyond Jordan, and Two Hundred Talents a Year in Revenue. Philip's Portion was Batanæa Trachonitis, and Auranitis; and part of the Palace of Zenodorus, (as they call'd it) and a Hundred Talents in Yearly Revenue. Archelaus had Judæa, Idumæa, and likewiſe Samaria; which was diſcharg'd by Cæſar of a Fourth part of the Duty, for ſtanding Loyal when the reſt were in Rebellion.

There fell to his Lot alſo the Tower of Straton, Sebaſte, Joppa, and Jeruſalem: For Gaza, Gadara, and Hippon, living in a Conformity to the Greek Cuſtoms and Manners, were no longer [a] Dependencies upon the Kingdom, but Annexed by Auguſtus to Syria. The Revenue of Archelaus upon the whole, was Six Hundred Talents.

Thus ſtood the Patrimony of the Sons of Herod. And for Salome; beſide the Cities of Jamnia, Azotus, and Phaſaelis, and Five Hundred Thouſand Pieces of Minted Mony, which her Brother had given her by Will, Auguſtus gave her alſo a Palace in Aſcalon, within the Dominion of Archelaus; and her Income was reckon'd at Six Hundred Talents a Year: All the other Legacies to the reſt of the King's Relations being made Good alſo, according to the Will of Herod. Auguſtus beſtow'd likewiſe upon Herod's Two Virgin-Daughters, over and above what their Father left them, Two Hundred and Fifty Thouſand Pieces of Silver, each, and Marry'd them to the Two Sons of Pheroras. Nay, and what was yet more Magnificent, and Generous then all the reſt, he divided his own Legacies among the Sons of Herod too; ſome few pieces of Plate excepted which he kept to himſelf; not for the Value of the Thing, but for the Memory of the Donor.

THE Bus'neſs of the Will, and the Legacies being now over, there was a Certain Young Man, by Nation a Jew, and trained-up at Sydon, with a Freeman of Rome, who had ſo ſtrange a Reſemblance of Alexander the Son of Herod, who was put to death by his Father, that it was almoſt Impoſſible to have diſtinguiſh'd the One from the Other. This Jew took the Hint by the Right Handle, and letting fall ſome Words pointing at the Relation he had to That Family, he Inſinuated, by this Glancing way, ſome Remote Pretenſion that he might have to the Crown. While This Phancy was in his Head, he conferr'd Notes with a Cunning Fellow of his own Tribe and Way: One that had run thorough all the Cabals, and Intrigues of the Court; and a Man made for Plots and Miſchief. Upon laying their Heads together, it was This Sharper's Advice, that the Young Man ſhould ſet-up for that very Alexander that was ſaid to be Dead; and the Story, in ſhort, was to run thus. That the Perſon Entruſted with the Execution of the Two Brothers, (Alexander and Ariſtobulus) had ſet-up Two other Bodies in their Places, and ſo preſerv'd them both. The Impoſtor was not only tickled himſelf with the Conceit of the Part he had to play; but the Cheat paſs'd as Current upon other People too; inſomuch that coming to Crete, and after that, to the Iſle of Melos, the Jews all ſwallow'd it ſo whole, that he took up ſeveral Sums of Mony among them, upon the Credit of his Bloud Royal. The Maggot had wrought ſo far by this time, that he began now to Build Caſtles in the Air, and to dream of Principalities and Powers; what Favorites he would raiſe, and to what Places and Preferments. With theſe Crotchets in his Crown, away he went for Rome, with a Fair Troup of his New Courtiers and Diſciples at his Heels. When he came to Puteoli, he had no ſooner ſet Foot a Shore there, but all the Jews, every Man of them that ever had any Friendſhip, or Acquaintance with Herod, gather'd about him, and receiv'd him as their King: People being naturally Curious, and Credulous, where they have ſuch Reſemblances and Preſumptions to work upon: For this Perſon was ſo very like the Prince, that ſeveral of his Intimate Friends did not only Affirm, but Swear, upon the Sight of him; that this was Alexander himſelf, and could be no Other. The Rumour of This Diſcovery coming to Rome, brought all the Jews out of that Quarter to Meet him upon the Way; with Praiſes and Thankſgivings in their Mouths, for the Bleſſing of ſo Wonderful, and ſo ſurprizing a Deliverance. He was carry'd in a Litter with a Princely Pomp, and Equipage, (his Friends ſparing for no Coſt) follow'd with Multitudes of People; Loud Acclamations, Prayers, and Good Wiſhes, as we ſee commonly in ſuch Extraordinary Caſes. But the Great Honour they did him was for the ſake of his ſuppoſed Mother Marianne. Now Cæſar looking upon Herod as a Man not to be eaſily impos'd upon, in a Matter of This Importance, would not believe One Syllable of the Story; but yet for Sureneſs ſake, he ſent a Freeman of his, one Celadus, a Contemporary and Companion of the Two Brothers, to fetch This New Alexander, that he might have a Sight of of him, which he did; and Celadus was Impoſed upon as well as the Reſt. But Cæſar after this, was not to be ſo eaſily put upon; for though they were as like, as like could be upon the Main, yet if a Man look'd narrowly he might find ſome Particular Diſagreements too. As the Hands of the Falſe Alexander were Callous, and Harden'd with Working; the Grain of his Skin, courſer then Theirs are commonly that are brought-up in Delicacy and Pleaſure. Cæſar obſerving alſo how exactly the Maſter and the Scholar agreed in the ſame Tale, and that it was all but a made-Story, asked him what was become of Ariſtobulus; and ſince they were both Deliver'd together, how it came to paſs they did not both appear together, and put in for their Pretenſions to their Inheritance. The Impoſtor made Anſwer, that Ariſtobulus ſtay'd at Cyprus for fear of the Danger of the Seas; for if they ſhould both have miſcarry'd together, the whole Race of Mariamne would have been Extinct, and ſo care was taken for Ariſtobulus, in caſe of the Worſt. The Falſe Alexander affirming this, and the Contriver of the Story joyning exactly with him in the Concert, Cæſar took the Young Man aſide. Look ye, ſays he, put none of your Tricks upon me at your own Peril. Speak Truth now, and I'll give you Your Life. Wherefore tell me immediately what you are for a Man, and who it was that put you upon this Practice; for you have not Years enow upon your Back to be ſo Malicious, without ſome other Inſtigation. When the Fellow found himſelf driven to the Wall, and that there was no Shifting, he told Auguſtus the whole Hiſtory, with the Author of the Invention, and the Manner of the Proceeding. So Cæſar was as good as his Word to the Counterfeit, and Condemn'd him only to the Gallyes, being of a Robuſt Conſtitution of Body, and Proper for that Service. His Adviſer was put to Death; and as for the Jews of Melos, they were ſufficiently puniſh'd in the Expence they had been at for the Honour of ſuch a Piece of Pageantry: And we are now come to the Infamous End of a Raſh and a bold Impoſtor.

The Hiſtory of Archelaus in his Ethnarchy. Archelaus baniſh'd, and his Goods Confiſcate. A Foreboding Dream of Archelaus's. Simon, an Eſſene, expounds it. Glaphyra's Dream of her Firſt Husband.

The Hiſtory of Archelaus in his Ethnarchy.

ARCHELAUS being now returned to Judæa, and in poſſeſſion of his Ethnarchy, removed Joazar the Son of Boethus from the Pontificat, for having taken part (as was pretended) with a Seditious Faction; and ſo Conferr'd the Dignity upon Eleazar his Brother. He Rebuilt the Palace at Jericho, at a moſt Magnificent Expence, and drew down one half of the Stream that water'd the Village of Neara, to a Grove of Palm-Trees that he had lately planted in the Field below. He built alſo a New Village, which he called Archelais, after his own Name; and without any regard to the Laws of his Country, he took Glaphyra to Wife, the Daughter of King Archelaus, and the Widow of his Brother Alexander; by whom he had ſeveral Children; though ſuch Marriages with Brother's Wives are expreſly forbidden by the Jewiſh Law; neither had Eleazar any long Joy of his Dignity; but Jeſus the Son of Sias was put into his Office while he was yet Living.

In the Tenth Year of the Government of Archelaus, the Head-Men of the Jews and Samaritans were ſo Diſguſted at the Tyrannical way of his Adminiſtration, that they Joyn'd in a Complaint againſt him to Cæſar. And they proceeded in it with the more Confidence, becauſe they knew that Extreme Severity to be directly Contrary to the Order and Good liking of Auguſtus; who had expreſly charged him to Govern his People with Tenderneſs, Impartiality and Juſtice. Upon the Hearing of this Clamour, he ſent for Archelaus, who was his Agent at Rome, to come to him immediately, and bad him go preſently and fetch the other Archelaus to him; without Vouchſafing him a Letter. Archelaus poſted away all he could into Judæa; where he found the other Archelaus making Merry with his Friends; ſhew'd him Cæſar's Order, and call'd upon him to Haſten away. Upon his Arrival at Rome, Cæſar heard both Charge and Defence; paſſed a Sentence of Baniſhment upon Archelaus, with Confiſcation of all his Goods, and ſo ſent him away to Vienna, a City in Gaul.

Archelaus Baniſh'd, and his Goods Confiſcated.

This Archelaus, a little before the Calling of him away to Rome, had this Following Dream, as he told it himſelf to ſeveral of his Friends. He phancy'd that he ſaw Ten Ears of Wheat, all Ripe and Full, and the Oxen eating them. This Viſion, upon Waking, ran in his Head ſo far, that he Conſulted ſeveral Men of Reputation for their skill that way, about the Meaning of it: But the Interpreters being divided, one Simon an Eſſene, with leave of the reſt, gave his Opinion upon the Signification of that Dream, which was, that it foreboded ſome Misfortune to Archelaus; for the Dreaming of Oxen, a Creature design'd for Labour, and Slavery, seems to Import a Misery; and a change of Affairs beside, because upon their Turning-up of the Ground, every thing chang'd it's Place and Figure. By the Ten Years of Corn is intimated the same Definite Number of Years, which take their Revolutions in Course, and the Reign of Archelaus seem'd to be now near an End. This was his Interpretation of the Dream: and upon the Fifth Day after this Vision, Archelaus, Cæsar's Agent came into Judæa by the Order of Cæsar, to bring Archelaus to Augustus.

His Wife Glaphyra, the Daughter of King Archelaus, had also an Odd kind of a Dream. This Glaphyra (as we have said before) had for her First Husband, Alexander, the Son of Herod, and the Brother of Archelaus. Her Second Husband, after the putting of the First to Death by his Father, was Juba the King of Mauritania; and after his Death, living a Widow with her Father in Cappadocia, Archelaus turn'd off his Former Wife Mariamne; and falling passionately in love with Glaphyra, he Marry'd her. During the time of her Cohabiting with Archelaus, she had this Dream. She phancy'd that she saw her First Husband Alexander coming toward her; and that when she thought to receive him into her Arms, with all possible Joy and Kindness, he enter'd with her into this Manner of Expostulation. Glaphyra, says he, thou hast made good the Old saying, that there's no Trusting to Women. Was not I the Husband of your Virginity? And had we not Children betwixt us, the Pledges of that Love? How could you forget that Obligation so far, as to Engage your self in a Second Marriage? and after that, into a Third; and so, shamelessly to break into my Family and take my Brother Archelaus for your Husband? But, says he, That Ancient Kindness shall never be Forgotten, and it shall be my Care to deliver thee from This Reproche. She told this Dream to several of her She-Friends; and within a few Days after departed this Life. Glaphyra's Dream of her First Husband.

Having had Occasion in this Place to Discourse of these Princes, I thought it might do well enough to Mention this Circumstance: Beside that the very Example is very well Worth the Consideration; beside that it is Instructive also, with a respect to the Divinity of the Soul, and to the Wisdom of Divine Providence. He that will not believe this, is at liberty to think what he pleases, provided that others may be left to their Freedom too, in making a Moral use of these Discourses. As to the Lands of Archelaus, Cæsar laid them to Syria, and Cæsar sent Cyrenius, a Man of Consular Authority, to Tax the Province, and to dispose of the Palace of Archelaus.

CYRENIUS was at this time sent Governour by Cæsar into Syria. He was a Man of Eminent Fame; a Roman Senator, and one that had pass'd through all the Degrees and Offices of Honour, up to the Dignity of a Consul. Coponius, who commanded the Horse, went along with him, as Governour of Judæa; but Judæa being already annexed to Syria, it was Cyrenius's Province to Tax and Sesse those People, and to make Seizure of the Monies and Moveables of Archelaus.

The Jews Grumbled at this way of Assessing at first; but betwixt the Persuasion and Authority of the High-Priest Joazar, the Son of Boethus, they were prevail'd upon to Submit and Comply, without any further Trouble. There came in Play soon after this, one Judas, a Gaulanite, of the City of Gamala; who together with one Saddock a Pharisee, Inveigled the People into a Revolt. Taxes, they said, were only Marks of Slavery, and therefore the whole Nation should do well to stand up for an Universal Liberty; and one lucky Hit would make them Free and Easy, for ever, and advance them in their Reputation, as well as secure them in their Possessions.

This was enough said to put the Multitude in tune for any sort of Mischief; and it is not to be expres's'd, the Havock these Turbulent Incendiaries made in the Nation: what with Murders, Robberies, Depredations, without Distinction of Friend or Foe; Assassinates, Massacres, and what not? under a Pretext all this while, of advancing the Common Good of Liberty and Property; and nothing at last but Passion and Private Interest in the Bottom. And at the same time, while the Citizens were tearing one another to pieces at Home with a Civil War in their own Bowels; a Foreign War upon them from abroad, and a Terrible Famine to Encounter over and above, Nothing could yet put a Stop to the Outrageous Course they were in, of Bloud and Desolation; till the Fire, in the Conclusion, laid hold of the Holy Temple it self.

This was the Fruit of Hankering after New Laws, and Customs, and quitting Establisht Foundations. And it was all long of Judas, and Saddock, that out of a Capricious Singularity of Humour, would needs be superadding a Fourth Sect to the Three Former; by which bait of Innovation, they drew-in a Mighty Party to them; and not only prov'd the Occasion of a Present Confusion, but laid the Foundation of Greater Mischiefs to come. Wherefore it will not be amiss to say somewhat in this Place of those Pernicious Opinions and Principles that have wrought us all this Woe.

CHAP. II.

The Phariſees Practices and Opinions. Men of Great Reputation with the People. The way of the Sadducees. The Eſſenes; their Doctrine, Courſe of Life, and Government. A Fourth-Sect for Abſolute Liberty, that owns no Superior but God.

THere were of old Three Famous Sects of [a] Religion among the Jews. The Eſſenes, the Sadducees, and thoſe that they call'd Phariſees. I have Touch'd upon them already, in the Second Book of my Wars of the Jews; but it will be Proper enough to ſay ſomewhat further of them alſo in this Place.

The Phariſees Practices and Opinions.

The Phariſees Manner of Life is Simple, and Auſtere, without any Luxurious Delicacyes. They make a Conſcience of keeping cloſe to the Dictates of their Reaſon, and pay ſuch a Veneration to the Counſels of their Elders, that they Hearken to them without any Contradiction or Controul. They Aſcribe all things to Fate; but not ſo, as Abſolutely to exclude Free Will neither. For though all Things are done, they ſay, by God's Order, and Appointment; This does not yet hinder the Concurrence of the Will, in Caſes that have a Regard either to Good or Evil. They believe the Immortality of the Soul, and a Future State of Reward and Puniſhment, in another World. The wicked to be condemn'd to Perpetual Chains, and Darkneſs, and the Good to Riſe again with Comfort. By theſe Doctrines they have advanced themſelves to a mighty Reputation among the People: and all things are done in the Solemn Offices of Prayer, and Divine Worſhip, according to their Senſe and Preſcription: Such is the Veneration the People have for the Wiſdom, Temperance, and Integrity of theſe Men.

Men of Great Reputation with the People.

The Way of the Sadducees.

The Sadducees, on the other hand, hold that our Bodies and Souls Dye together; and that we have no other Obligation upon us then to Obſerve the Law: Inſomuch, that they value themſelves upon a Right they have to Diſpute the Higheſt Points with their Teachers. Theſe People are not many in Number, but for the moſt part Men of Quality, and Matters go ſeldom their way; for when they come once to bear Offices, how Unwillingly ſoever, they are forc'd to go over in a Conformity to the Phariſees, for the Common People will not ſuffer it to be otherwiſe.

The Eſſenes. Their Opinions, Courſe of Life, and Government.

The Eſſenes aſcribe the Government of the World to God's Providence, without any Exception. They hold the Immortality of the Soul; and Celebrate Juſtice, both in Practice and Doctrine, as the Sovereign-Virtue. They ſend their Gifts to the Temple, without going thither themſelves; for they offer their Sacrifices apart, in a Peculiar way of Worſhip, and with more Religious Ceremonies. As to their Converſation, they are Men of Excellent Morals; and their whole Bus'neſs in the World, is Husbandry. They are Eminent for their Juſtice, beyond either Greeks, or Barbarians, as a Virtue that hath been a long time their Application and Study. Their Goods are all in Common, without any Diſtinction of Rich and Poor among them. They have neither Wives, nor Servants; for they look upon the one as an Encroachment upon the Natural Liberty of Mankind, and the other as a Circumſtance that carries Trouble and Uneaſyneſs along with it: So that they chuſe rather by a Mutual Exchange of Good Offices to help one another. This is their way of Life, and they reckon themſelves to be upward of Four Thouſand Souls in this Society. Their Treaſurers and Commiſſaries are Men of Integrity, choſen from among their Prieſts, and it is their Care to make Proviſion out of the Fruits of the Earth for the Feeding and Maintaining of the Whole Body. They live, upon the main, much at the rate of the Pliſti among the Dacians.

A Fourth Sect for Abſolute Liberty. They own no King or Maſter but God.

The Founder of the Fourth Sect of [b] Religion was Judas Galilæus, and this was much the ſame with that of the Phariſees, ſaving only in the Maxim of an Uncontroulable Liberty; for they own no other Lord and Superior then God himſelf, and will rather expoſe Themſelves, and their Deareſt Relations to the moſt Exquiſite of Torments, then call any Man by the Name of Maſter. But this is ſo known a Truth upon every Day's Obſervation and Experience, that it will need no further Comfirmation; beſide that all that can be ſaid of it will fall infinitely ſhort of expreſſing the Invincible Conſtancy of theſe People, in the Contempt of Pain: and this Animoſity was yet farther Inflamed, by the Inſupportable Cruelties of Geſſius Florus, the Governour of Judæa, which ended at laſt in a Downright Revolt from the Romans. And this is all I have to ſay of their Sects.

a So I chuſe to render the word Φιλοσοφία, which is ſometimes taken for Piety or Religion, both in ſacred and profane Writers.

Cyrenius ſells Archelaus's Eſtate.

AFter Cyrenius had made Sale of the Forfeited Goods and Eſtate of Archelaus, and ſettled a Tax according to his Order; which happen'd in the 37th Year after the Battle of Actium, wherein Cæſar got the Better of Anthony, the People brake out into a Tumult againſt Joazar the High Prieſt, and Cyrenius depos'd him from his Dignity, ſubſtituting Ananus, the Son of Seth, to ſucceed in his Place.

A Tumult againſt Joazar. Cyrenius puts him out, and advances Ananus.

Herod and Philip ſettled in their Tetrarchy.

Herod and Philip, being now ſettled in their Tetrarchies, put all things in the beſt Order they could. The Former began with the Fortifying and Walling-in of Sephoris, which he made the Bullwark, and the Capital of all Galilee; and after that, he Fortify'd another Town alſo, which at that time was called Betaramphtha; but he changed the Name afterward to Julias, in Honour of the Empreſs. Philip, for His part, Beautify'd and Enlarged Paleas at the Head of the River Jordan, and gave it the Name of Cæſarea; and ſo for the Village of Bethſaida upon the Blank of the Lake of Genezareth; he Built it up to the Bulk and Appearance of a Magnificent City; Rich, and Populous, and giving it the Name alſo of Julias, out of a reſpect to Julia, the Daughter of Cæſar.

Herod fortifies Sephoris and Betaramphtha.

Herod Beautifies Paleas, and calls it Cæſarea.

He enlarges Bethſaida, and calls it Julias

In the Time of Coponius, the Samaritans prophane the Holy Temple.

As for Coponius, that was ſent (as we ſaid) with Cyrenius into Judæa, there happen'd this Diſorder while he was there in his Government. It is Uſual for the Prieſts upon the Feaſt of Unleavened Bread, or as we call it, the Paſcal Feaſt, to open the Doors of the Temple after Midnight. Now there was a Company of Samaritans that ſlipt Privately into Jeruſalem; and waiting for the Opening of the Doors, ſtept immediately into the Temple, and threw Dead Men's Bones about, into the Galleries, and every where up and down. The Prieſt took this Inſolence for a warning; and after that, kept a better Guard.

Coponius a little after this, returning to Rome, Marcus [a] Ambivius ſucceeded him to the Government: in whoſe time dy'd Salome the Siſter of Herod, and left to Julia over and above her Toparchy, the City of Jamnia, Phaſaelis upon the Plain, and Archelais, with ſeveral Plantations of Palm-Trees, that bear ſuch Excellent Fruit.

Salome dies, and leaves a vaſt Eſtate to Julia.

Annius Rufus ſucceeds Ambivius.

Annius Rufus ſucceeded Ambivius; and in his Time, Auguſtus departed this Life. He was the Second of the Roman Emperours, and Ruled the Commonwealth Fifty Seven Years, Six Months, and Two Days; having been for Fourteen Years of the Time a Partner and Companion with Anthony in the Government; and upon the whole, his Age was Seventy Seven Years.

The Death of Auguſtus.

Tiberius Nero ſucceeds him.

Tiberius Nero, his Son-in-law, and the Son of Livia his Wife, ſucceeded Auguſtus, being the Third Emperour of the Romans; and ſent Valerius Gratus, [b] to be Governour of Judæa inſtead of Annius Rufus. He remov'd Ananus from the Pontificat, and put Iſrael the Son of Fabius in his Place; who was ſoon after Depos'd, and the Honour Transferr'd to Eleazar the Son of Ananus the High-Prieſt: And it was taken from him in one Year more too, and given to Simon the Son of Camith; who, after another Year, was Commanded to deliver it up to Joſeph, whoſe Surname was Caiaphas. Gratus having been now Eleven Years in his Government, went back to Rome, and Pontius Pilate ſucceeded him.

He builds a City and calls it Tiberias;

Herod the Tetrarch was now in Great Favour with Tiberius, and Erected a City to his Honour by the Name of Tiberias. He Built it upon the beſt Spot of Ground in all Galilee, on the Bank of the Lake of Genezareth, and not far from the Hot Baths at Emmaus. This City was Peopled, partly by Strangers, partly by Galileans: Some were fain to live there upon Force, and ſeveral of the Better ſort took up their Habitation There upon Choice. And for the Peopling of it ſo much the ſooner, there came a Multitude thither from all Quarters, and of all ſorts, even down to Men of the Meaneſt Condition; and ſeveral of them ſuſpected to be Slaves: But for their Greater Encouragement to Fix, and ſettle there, he gave them very Conſiderable Privileges and Immunities; Houſes to ſome, and Lands to others, to make the Violation of the Laws go down ſo much the better; for the Place being full of Sepulchres, and Polluted with Dead Bodies, the Inhabitants are accounted Unclean for Seven Days after.

Encourages the Peopling of it.

Phraates, the King of the Parthians was at this time Treacherouſly murder'd by his Son [a] Phraataces: and the manner of it was This. Phraates, among other Preſents that were ſent him by Cæſar, had an Italian Woman, for One, whoſe Name was Themuſa. He took her at firſt in the Quality of a Concubine, but came in time to be ſo charm'd with her Beauty and Converſation, that having one Son by her whoſe Name was Phraataces, he took her to his Lawful Bed, having other Legitimate Children of his own already. This Thermuſa had a Deſign in her Head to put her Son in a Way to be King of Parthia; but there was nothing to be done, ſhe ſaw, without firſt ſending the Legitimate Sons out of the way: So ſhe mov'd her Husband in it, and it was done for the Asking; ſo Abſolute was the Dominion ſhe had over the Spirit of that Man. The Young Men being ſent away to Rome for Hoſtages, Phraataces was train'd up at home alone to an Expectancy of the Kingdom. But it was ſo Tedious a thing, he thought, for him to wait for a Crown in Reverſion, that he enter'd into a Conſpiracy with his Mother to ſhorten the Bus'neſs, by taking away the Life of his Father, which was accordingly done; and he more then ſuſpected alſo of an Inceſtuous Familiarity with that Lewd Woman: But Phraataces made himſelf ſo Odious to the People, both for the Parricide and for the Inceſt, that before he could come to Enter upon the Government, he was driven-out by a Tumult, and ſo Periſh'd.

Phraates murder'd by his Son Phraataces.

The Son deſtroy'd by a Tumult.

Now the Parthian Nobility, conſidering that there was no Living for them without a King, and Reſolving with themſelves not to ſet any Prince upon the Throne, but of the Family of the Arſacidæ (the Bloud of Phraates being already ſufficiently Teynted by the Luſts of this Beaſtly Woman) they ſent Embaſſadors with an Invitation to Herod; who was, 'tis true, of the Royal Line; but ſo Hateful withal to the Multitude, for the Untractable Outrageous Cruelty of his Nature, that a Band of Conſpirators ſet upon him, and kill'd him; the Parthians never going without their Swords. Some ſay the Execution was done at a Sacrifice, on a Banquet; but the moſt received Account is, that he was kill'd a Hunting.

The Parthians deſire Herod to take the Government.

Herod cut off by a Conſpiracy.

Upon this, they ſent an Embaſſy to Rome, deſiring one of the Parthian Hoſtages for their King, to ſupply the Preſent Vacancy; and making choice of Vonones before the reſt of the Brothers. He was recommended as a Prince Worthy of the Honour that was now offer'd him, in the Command of Two of the moſt Glorious Empires upon the Face of the Earth, (the Roman, that is, and the Parthian.) But the Parthians being naturally Fickle, and Haughty, quickly repented of their Choice. Their Stomacks were too Big to Truckle to a Slave, they ſaid, for ſo they Tranſlated the Word Hoſtage, and twitted him at every turn with the Reproche of that Application: for this was not a King, they ſaid, Impos'd upon them by any Law of Arms; but a Scandalous Condition of a Shameful Peace. In this Heat of Indignation, they ſent for Artabanus who was then King of the Medes, and of the Bloud of the Arſacidæ, who was eaſily prevail'd upon, and came preſently with a conſiderable Army; Vonones Encounter'd him, and beat him back again into Media; the Generality of the Parthians ſtanding as yet Firm to their Duty; but Artabanus being in a ſhort time Reinforced, gave a Notable Overthrow to Vonones in a Second Battle, ſo that he had much ado with ſome few Horſe to ſave himſelf in Seleucia. Artabanus, taking advantage of the Conſternation the Barbarians were in, preſs'd upon the Purſuit with a Terrible Slaughter, and ſo betook himſelf to Cteſiphon with his Conquering Army. This Action put him in Poſſeſſion of the Kingdom of Parthia. Vonones in the mean time fled into Armenia, with a Project in his Head to make himſelf Maſter there; ſolliciting Cæſar alſo, at the ſame time by an Embaſſy to Aſſiſt him in his Deſign; but whether it was that the Emperour ſuſpected his Courage; or that he himſelf was afraid of Diſobliging the Parthians, who then threaten'd a War upon him, Tiberius abſolutely ſtood off, and would not meddle in the Matter. This Repulſe brake the Neck of all Vonones's Hopes; eſpecially finding that the Great Men of Armenia that border'd upon Niphates, ſided all with Artabanus. So that in the Concluſion, he deliver'd himſelf up to Syllanus the Governour of Syria, who out of a reſpect to Former Acquaintance with him at Rome,

There happen'd about that time, upon the Death of Antiochus King of Comagena, a Controverſy betwixt the Lords and Commons, the Former were for Reducing the Kingdom into the State of a Province; and the other for being under a King ſtill, as they were before. Upon this Diſpute, Germanicus was order'd away into the Eaſt by a Decree of the Senate for the Compoſing of this Difference, and Fortune Improv'd this Occaſion to the Ruin of that Excellent Prince: For after he had ſettled, and Quieted Affairs in Syria, he was Poyſon'd by the Practice of Piſo, as we ſhall ſet forth Elſewhere.

Standards ſet up in Jeruſalem with Cæſar's Image upon them.

Pilate the Governour of Judæa, upon the Removal of Certain Troups from Cæſarea to their Winter-Quarters in Jeruſalem, brought ſeveral Standards into the City with the Image of Cæſar upon them, to the Scandal of the Jewiſh Laws, which expreſly prohibit the uſe of ſuch Figures; and for this Reaſon it was that no Former Governours ever brought Colours with Pictures upon them into the City before. Pilate was the Firſt that ever Tranſgreſs'd This Rule; and they were brought into the Town by Stealth too, and there Planted in the Dead of the Night, when no body was aware of them. But when the Citizens came to take notice of them the Next morning, they Gather'd together in Great Multitudes, and went their way to Pilate at Cæſarea, with a Petition for the Removal of thoſe Images to ſome other Place. After ſeveral Days waiting, and Pilate ſtill refuſing, upon a Pretext that it was a Requeſt not to be Granted without an Affront to Cæſar, they ſtill perſiſted in their Importunities; but the Governour, at laſt, upon the Seventh Day of the Jews Attendance, commanded a party of Soldiers to be privately ready in their Arms, where he appointed them, and thereupon mounted a Tribunal that he had cauſed to be Erected in the Circus, as a Place the moſt Commodious for a Surprize; the People preſſing him over and over ſtill, about the ſame Bus'neſs, till Pilate at laſt gave a Signal to the Soldiers to come out, and order'd them immediately to cut all their Throats; if in that Inſtant they ſhould not Every Man depart to his Own Home and be Quiet: But the Jews caſt themſelves all Flat upon the Ground, and Stretching out their Necks, gave to underſtand that their very Lives were not ſo Dear to them as the Laws of their Country. This Wonderful Conſtancy wrought ſo far upon Pilate, that he preſently cauſed the Images to be carry'd back again from Jeruſalem to Cæſarea.

Pilate being now upon a Deſign of bringing an Aquæduct to Jeruſalem, ſome Two Hundred Furlongs off from the City, demanded Mony out of the Holy Treaſury to defray the Charge of the Work. The People took this ſo Heinouſly, that they got ſeveral Thouſands of them in a Body together, to try what might be done by Multitudes, and Clamour, to divert him from his Purpoſe. Some there were in this Rabble (as it falls out commonly in Popular Confuſions) that gave Pilate Perſonal Provocations, with Foul Language: Inſomuch that he order'd a Certain Number of Soldiers to put themſelves in a Ring about the Multitude, with Clubs under their Coats, in the Habit of Country-Fellows; telling them what they were to do, upon his giving the Word, in caſe of any further Reviling, or Reproche. The Rabble went on with their Ribaldry; and the Word being given, the Soldiers fell on with their Clubs, and went in truth beyond their Commiſſion too; for the Innocent ſcap'd no better then the Guilty. The Encounter, in fine, was ſo Unequal, betwixt Men with Weapons on the one ſide, and naked Men on the other, that the Jews were ſome kilPilate demands Mony out of the Holy Treaſury for an Aquæduct.

led; others Wounded and Diſpers'd, and ſo an End put to the Tumult.

At the same time there was one Jesus; a Wiseman, if at least a MAN he may be call'd. He was a great Worker of Miracles, and a Teacher of those that were Curious, and Desirous to learn the Truth, and he had a Great many Followers, both Jews and Gentiles. This was the Christ that was accused by the Princes and great Men of our Nation. Pilate deliver'd him up to the Cross; and all this notwithstanding, those that lov'd him at first did not Forsake him. He was seen alive again the third Day after his Crucifixion, as had been foretold by several Prophets; with other Wonders that he wrought; and there are a sort of People that to this Day bear the Name of Christians, as owning him for their Head. The Author's Testimony of Jesus Christ.

About the same time there was Another Misfortune befel the Jews, and likewise a most Scandalous Passage discover'd at Rome, upon Occasion of a Sacrifice to Isis; but I shall begin with this, and proceed afterward to what concerns the Jews. There was at Rome one Paulina, a Woman not less Eminent for her Virtue then she was for her Birth; Rich, Lovely, and in the very Flower of her Beauty; and withal of a Modesty beyond Exception. She was marry'd to one Saturninus, a Husband Worthy of such a Wife; and one Decius Mundus, a Roman Knight, and in the Prime of his Age, was fall'n desperately in Love with her. This Paulina being a Person above the Temptation of Mony or Presents, the Young Man was the more Enflam'd by the Despair of Gaining her; but proceeded so far however as to offer her Two Hundred Thousand Drachma's for only One Nights Lodging. When he found this would not do; and that the Rage of his Love grew more and more Intolerable, he took up a Resolution of putting an End both to his Passion, and to his Life together, by starving Himself. There was one Ide, a Free'd Woman belonging to the Father of Mundus, a Cunning Gipsy, and one that understood more Tricks then were for her Credit. This Woman saw what he was about; and finding that there was no taking of him off by the Force of Argument or Reason, she went Another way to Work by Wheedling and Heartening him up to Hope the Best; for she did not yet despair, she said, of putting Paulina into his Arms; and that she believ'd a Present of Fifty Thousand Drachma's might do the Work. Mundus was abundantly satisfy'd with the Proposal, and gave her the Mony she desir'd; but that was not the Way she knew to deal with Paulina: So that Reflecting upon it, how Passionate a Reverence she had for the Goddess Isis, she had Recourse to this Invention. She got together several of the Priests of Isis, and having first sworn them to Secrecy; and which is more, secur'd them of a Reward of Twenty Five Thousand Drachma's down in hand, and as many more when the Work was done, she told them the Bus'ness of the Amour, and most Earnestly beg'd their Assistance toward the bringing of the Young Man and his Mistress together. The Temptation was Strong, and Flesh and Bloud weak, so that they promis'd Fair; and the Eldest of the Company went presently upon the Errand to Paulina, where he told her in a Private Audience, that he came with a Message from the God Anubis, who was fall'n Extremely in Love with her, and she must needs give him a Visit. She made the Messenger very Welcome; and laid the Honour so to Heart, that she could not forbear Talking of it up and down among her She-Companions, how Great a Kindness the God Anubis had for her. She told her Husband as much too; and that the Assignation was already pass'd for them to Eat, and Lye together: which the Good-Man was well enough pleas'd withal, considering the Proofs he had of his Wife's Insuperable, and Inviolable Virtue. Paulina, in pursuance of this Phancy, went into the Temple; where, after Supper, about Sleeping time, she was Lock'd-up by one of the Priests, and in the Dark stumbled it seems upon Mundus instead of Anubis, and they Two were Bed-fellows for that Night; making no doubt all the While, but she had spent her time in the Embraces of a God. Mundus went his way the Next Morning before the Priests got up that were of the Plot, and Paulina went back in the Morning to her Husband, big with the Story of this Divine Encounter; and the Women after that, had the Second Part of it in most Magnificent Terms. The Case was so Extraordinary that they could hardly Believe it; and yet Paulina's Modesty on the other Hand, was so Untainted that they knew not how to doubt it neither. Upon the Third day after this Night of Miracles, it was Mundus's Hap to meet his Mistress. Oh Paulina! says he, how much am I Beholden to you for saving me the Two Hundred Thousand Drachma's that I would have given you, and yet do the same Bus'ness at last for Nothing. What do I care whether you love Mundus, or no, so long as you will do the same Thing for me in the Name of Anubis! With these Words he went his Way. When the Woman came now to Reflect upon it, how she was Trepann'd, she tore her Garments; carry'd the whole History to her Husband, and beg'd him, as ever he had any Love for her, not to suffer so Impious an Indignity to pass Unpunish'd. The Husband represented the Matter to Tiberius; who, upon a Full Inquiry and Information, caus'd those Holy Impostors to Let this ſuffice for the Story of Iſis; and I ſhall come now to what I promis'd, of the Miſerable Calamities of the Jews that liv'd at Rome in that Revolution.

THere was a Certain Jew, one of the Wickedeſt Wretches upon the Face of the Earth, that was forc'd to fly his Country to avoid the Stroke of Publique Juſtice. This Man paſs'd at Rome in thoſe days for a kind of Rabbi, in Concert with Three more of the ſame Stamp and Cabal: and Theſe Four held forth for Readers and Expoſitors upon the Laws of Moſes. By this Pretence, they gain'd ſeveral Diſciples, and among Others, one Fulvia, a Woman of Quality and Conſcience, and Judaical by Profeſſion. This Woman having deliver'd her ſelf up to their Authority, and Diſcipline, was by them prevail'd upon to ſend Oblations of Gold and Purple to the Holy Temple at Jeruſalem, which from time to time they Converted to their Own Uſe, as they ever intended it. When This Abuſe came to be made known to Tiberius, by his Friend Saturninus, in a Complaint againſt them, by the [a] Inſtigation of his Wife Fulvia, he commanded All the Jews forthwith to depart the City. There were Four Thouſand Soldiers enter'd upon the Conſul's Roll, and ſent away for Sardinia; beſide a vaſt Number of thoſe that made a Conſcience of bearing Arms, becauſe of their Religion; and Theſe were put to Grievous Torments: So that for the ſake of Four Flagitious Hypocrites, the Jews were all baniſh'd to a Man.

The Jews are all Baniſht upon't.

And the Samaritans were not without their Troubles too; for there was at That Time a Certain Impoſtor that was never without Lies, and Phantaſtical Stories to draw the Rabble together; and this Fellow gave it out, that if the People would but meet at the Mountain Garizin, a Sacred Place in the Eſteem of the Country thereabouts, he would undertake to ſhew them the Holy Veſſels which Moſes had cauſed to be Bury'd there ſo long ſince. Theſe Credulous Fools betook themſelves to their Arms, and Beſieged Tirathaba, waiting for others to come in, and joyn them, and ſo to March up the Mountain together with a Conſiderable Army. But Pilate was too Early for them, and with a ſtrong Body of Horſe and Foot Prepoſſeſs'd the Mountain, whence they made a Charge among the Samaritans that were gotten together about the Village; Routed and Kill'd Great Numbers of them; took, and carry'd away a Multitude of Priſoners; and for thoſe among them that were of Intereſt, or Quality, Pilate ſtruck-off their Heads. The Principal Men of the Samaritans, apply'd themſelves upon This Defeat to Vitellius, a Perſon of Conſular Dignity, and at that time Governour of Syria, with a Complaint againſt Pilate; and charging him with Murder. For they inſiſted upon it, that their Meeting at Tirathaba, was no Defection from the Romans, but the ſeeking for a Refuge for themſelves againſt the Violence of Pilate. Vitellius, upon this, ſent his Friend Marcellus to take charge of the Government of Judæa, and order'd Pilate to Rome, to anſwer before Cæſar the Accuſations that were Exhibited againſt him. He had now been Ten Years in his Government; and upon This Order put himſelf upon a Journy to Rome; but Tiberius dy'd before he got thither.

VITELLIUS went into Judæa, and ſo to Jeruſalem, (This being at the Feaſt of the Paſſover, as we call it) where he was received with great Honour; and very Graciouſly Remitted to the Inhabitants, the whole Duty upon Fruits. He reſtor'd to the Prieſts alſo the Keeping of the Pontifical Robes, and Habits in the Temple again, as they had them of Old, being as then Depoſited in the Caſtle of Antonia upon This Occaſion.

He remitts ſeveral Duties to them; Puts the Prieſts in Poſſeſſion of the Pontifical Robes, as formerly.

Hyrcanus the High-Prieſt, and the Firſt of that Name, having Built himſelf a Tower near the Temple, ſpent the Greateſt part of his Time there; keeping in his Own Cuſtody, the Pontifical Stole and Ornaments, that no body was to Uſe but Himſelf: And upon Changing of his Habit, he ſtill laid up his Sacred Veſtments in that Caſtle, as his Succeſſors for a long time after did the like. But Herod, upon his coming to the Crown, was ſo well pleas'd with the Situation of this Fort, both for Strength and Beauty, that he put himſelf to a mighty Expence for the Further Improvement of it, and call'd it by the Name of Antonia, in Honour of Anthony his Particular Friend. In this Caſtle he found the Holy Stole, and there he kept it, upon an Opinion, that the having That in his Poſſeſſion, would keep the Jews in Awe. Archelaus, his Son and Succeſſor, did the ſame Thing too, and upon the ſame Conſideration; and ſo did the Romans alſo, after the Reduction of the Kingdom into a Province; and theſe Pontifical Veſts were laid-up in a Cabinet that was made on purpoſe for that Wardrobe, under the Seal of the Prieſts, and the Keepers of the Holy Treaſury; the Governour of the Caſtle being obliged to have a Lamp ſtill Burning before the Place. Upon the Seventh Day, preceding the Three Solemn Feſtivals, he ſtill deliver'd out the Stole to the High-Prieſt; who having gotten it well Purg'd and Cleans'd, did the Holy Office in it afterward in Courſe, and the next day return'd it to the Place where it was before; and this was done upon Three Feſtivals every Year, and upon the Solemn Faſt.

Hyrcanus builds a Caſtle, and lays them up there.

Herod gives This Caſtle the Name of Antonia.

He found the Holy Stole there, and kept it there.

But Vitellius was now pleaſed, in Favour of the Jews, to give up all the Pontifical Habits into the Poſſeſſion of the Prieſts again, and to diſcharge the Governour from being any further Anſwerable what became of them. After this, he took away the High-Prieſthood from Joſeph call'd Caiphas, and gave it to Jonathan the Son of the High-Prieſt Ananus, and ſo went his way back to Antioch.

Caiphas removed, and Jonathan put in his place.

At the ſame time he receiv'd Letters of Direction from Tiberius, to make a League with Artabanus; for he was afraid, if he ſhould make himſelf Maſter of Armenia, that it might be Dangerous to the Empire: But this to be done only upon Condition of one of the King's Sons for an Hoſtage. This put Vitellius upon Tampering with the Kings of Iberia, and Alania, by Great Sums of Mony to Engage them immediately in a War with Artabanus. The Iberians could not be prevail'd upon any further, then to leave the Alanians a Free Paſſage thorough their City, and ſo by the Caſpian Mountains, to open them an Inroad into the Kingdom of Artabanus. Upon This Irruption, the Parthians preſently loſt Armenia; and that Blow was follow'd with ſo Deſperate a Ravage upon their own Country, that the Nobility was almoſt Entirely Cut-off; together with the King's Son, and ſo many Thouſands of the Common People, that they were in a Manner Un-peopled by This Invaſion. Artabanus found by this time, that he was betray'd under his own Roof, and that his very Friends and Relations were brib'd into a Plot with Vitellius to Deſtroy him: So that not knowing whom to Truſt, for fear of Treachery under the Maſque of Friendſhip, and being Convinc'd that Men of the Firſt Rate and Quality were in the Practice, he made his Eſcape out-of-hand into the Upper Provinces, where he was not only Protected, but Reinforc'd with ſo Conſiderable an Army of the Dahi, and Saci, that he not only Overthrew his Enemies, but Recover'd his Kingdom.

Vitellius order'd by Tiberius to make a League with Artabanus.

But Vitellius Tampers with the Iberians and Alanians againſt him.

The Alanians break in upon Artabanus.

Armenia totally loſt.

Artabanus finds himſelf betray'd.

Upon this Turn of Affairs, Tiberius propos'd an Allyance with Artabanus, and they met by Conſent to Treat about it, (the King, and Vitellius, with their Guards) upon on the Middle of a Bridge over the River Euphrates. At the Concluſion of the Treaty, Herod the Tetrarch gave them both a very Splendid and Magnificent Treat, in a Tent that he had Erected at a Great Expence upon the ſame River; and Artabanus ſent his Son Darius not long after, as an Hoſtage to Tiberius, with variety of Preſents; and one among the reſt was a Man of Seven Cubits in Height, and by Profeſſion a Jew, whom they called Eleazar the Gyant. Vitellius, after This, return'd to Antioch, and Artabanus to Babylon.

Herod had a great Mind to be the Firſt Author of the Good News of This Agreement about the Hoſtages, and ſo Diſpatch'd away a Meſſenger with all Poſſible Speed, with every Particular of the Treaty, to Tiberius, which was ſo Circumſtantially Exact, that there was nothing left for Vitellius, a Conſular Governour, to ſay further; ſo that Cæſar, upon the Receipt of a Later Intelligence from Vitellius, return'd only This ſhort Anſwer, that he had ſent him no News; for Herod had told him as much as that came to before. Vitellius took this Officious Anticipation very Ill, but ſmother'd his Reſentment of it till Caius came to the Government.

Philip the Brother of Herod dy'd alſo at the ſame time in the [a] Twentieth Year of Tiberius, and when he himſelf had been Thirty Seven Years in the Tetrarchy of Trachonitis, Gaulanitis and Batanæa: A Man of Great Moderation, and a Lover of his Eaſe and Quiet; for he ſpent his whole Life within the Compaſs of his own Juriſdiction. He hardly ever went abroad but in Company with ſome few of his Select Friends, with a Chair after him; which upon ſeveral Occaſions he made Uſe of as a Seat of Juſtice. And if he happen'd to meet any body upon the Way that had need of his Aſſiſtance, he betook himſelf ſtill, without delay, to the Examination of his Cauſe, and either Condemn'd, or Acquitted him, as he found him Guilty or Innocent. He dy'd at Julias, and was bury'd with Great Pomp and Expence in a Monument of his own Preparing for himſelf: But dying without Iſſue, Tyberius annexed his Eſtate to Syria, upon Condition that the Tributes to be Rais'd in that Tetrarchy ſhould not go out of the Country.

A War betwixt Herod and Aretas.

THere happen'd a War, at This time, betwixt Herod and Aretas the King of Petra, upon this Ground: Herod the Tetrarch Marry'd the Daughter of Aretas, and they had now liv'd a long time together; but being call'd afterward to Rome, he took Herod his Brother-in-Law in his way; (the Son of the Daughter of Simon the High-Prieſt) where he fell ſo Paſſionately in Love with [b] Herodias, his Brother's Wife, and the Daughter of Ariſtobulus, their Brother, who was alſo the Siſter of Agrippa, afterwards King; that he had the Confidence to make a Propoſal of Marriage to her upon his Return from Rome, and as parting with his Wife, the Daughter of Aretas; which was agreed to on both ſides, as the Condition of their Marriage. After This, he Proſecuted his Voyage for Rome: and ſo ſoon as he had Diſpatch'd the Bus'neſs he went about, he Return'd Home again. His Wife having by this time gotten Intelligence of his Intrigue with Herodias, was telling him ſlily once, ſo that there was no Gueſſing at the Myſtery, how glad ſhe ſhould be if he would but let her go to Machærus a little; (a Caſtle upon the Borders of Aretas's Dominions.) Herod, without Imagining the Matter, gave way to her Going. Now Machærus being a Place at her Father's Devotion, every thing was there in readineſs for her Journy; ſo that the Governour of the Place furniſh'd her immediately upon her Arrival with Arabian Guards that conducted her from Stage to Stage, with all Imaginable Speed, to her Father's Palace: Where ſhe gave him at large the Hiſtory of Herod's New Amour. This begot a Heart-Burning, and there being a Controverſy a-foot at that time about the Bounds and Abuttals of ſome Lands in Gamala, and Two Armies ready in the Field to diſpute the Queſtion, they laid hold of this Pretence, and by their Deputies brought it to a Battle, where Herod was utterly Routed by the Treachery of a certain Band of Refugees, that came over from Philip, and were at that time in Herod's Pay. This Prince had no ſooner given Tiberius Intelligence of the Diſaſter, but he preſently in a Rage Order'd Vitellius to make War upon Aretas, for this Inſolence; and either to bring him alive to Rome, or to ſend his Head.

Herod routed by Aretas.

Tiberius orders Vitellius to make War upon Aretas.

Now the Generality of the Jews were of Opinion that this was only a Juſt Judgment of God upon Herod, and his Army, for the Bus'neſs of John ſurnamed the Baptiſt, which Excellent Man this Tetrarch Murder'd. And what was his Crime, but only his Exhorting the Jews to the Love and Practice of Virtue; and in the Firſt place, of Piety and Juſtice, and to a Regeneration by Baptiſm, and a New Life, not by Abſtaining from This or That Particular Sin, but by an Habitual Purity of Mind, as well as of Body! Now ſo Great was the Credit, and the Authority of this Holy Man, as appear'd by the Multitude of his Diſciples, and the Veneration they had for his Doctrine; (for he could do what he would with them) that Herod did not know how far the Reputation of a Man of his Spirit might Influence the People toward a Revolt. So that for fear of the Worſt, he choſe rather to take him out of the Way in Time before any Hurt was done, then to put it to the Hazzard of an Unprofitable Repentance when it ſhould be too late. Wherefore he ſent him away bound, to Machærus, (the Place before Mentioned) with order to have him put to death, which was accordingly executed; and that Impious Fact was follow'd with a Divine Vengeance upon Herod, for the Blood of that Juſt Man, as the Jews reaſonably enough perſuaded themſelves.

Vitellius was now preparing for the Arabian War; and upon his March toward Petra with Two Legions, and all the Auxiliaries, Horſe and Foot of the Roman Allies. When he was advanced as far as Ptolemais, and thinking to take his Paſſage a-croſs Judæa; the Great Men of the Country met him upon the Way with Earneſt Supplications that he would ſteer ſome other Courſe; for the Images the Romans carry commonly in their Colours, were a Great Scandal and Offence to the Jewiſh Laws and Religion. The General was prevail'd upon, and ſo ſent his Army about by the Compaſs of a Great Plain; while he himſelf, with Herod the Tetrarch, and his Friends, went up to Jeruſalem to Worſhip upon a Publique Feſtival that was then at hand. His Entertainment was with as much Honour and Reſpect as poſſible, and he made Three-days-ſtay there; in which time, he Transferr'd the High-Prieſthood from Jonathan to his Brother Theophilus. Upon the Fourth Day came Letters to him of the Death of Tiberius; upon which Intelligence he made the People Swear Allegeance to Caius Caligula, the Succeſſor, call'd back his Troups, and order'd them into Winter Quarters; putting a Stop to the War upon This Change in the Government.

The Pontificat transferr'd from Jonathan to Theophilus.

On the Fourth day comes News of Tiberius's Death.

Vitellius ſwears the People to Caius Caligula, and calls back the Army.

The Wizzards foretel the Event of This Undertaking.

Vitellius goes back to Antioch.

There goes a Report that upon the News of This Expedition of Vitellius, Aretas conſulted the Wizzards and Diviners about the Event of this Undertaking; who gave him This Reſolution; That the Army now upon their March, ſhould never come up to Petra; for either One of the Princes ſhould Die; or he that Commanded the War; or He that executed that Command, or the Perſon againſt whom it was carry'd on. And ſo Vitellius went back to Antioch.

Agrippa the Son of Ariſtobulus, had been now a Year at Rome, attending Cæſar about ſome Important Affair. But it will be more to my Preſent Purpoſe to ſay ſomewhat in the Firſt place of Herod, and his Family, who was certainly a Remarkable Inſtance of the Power and Wiſdom of Divine Providence. For what ſignify the Bleſſings of a Plentiful Iſſue; Royal Dignity, and Power, or a Splendid Fortune, without Piety and Juſtice? As we find it in Herod's Caſe here, who in a Hundred Years time had hardly any Remains left of ſo Numerous a Family. This may ſerve for a Check to the Arrogant Pretenſions of Vain Fleſh and Bloud, and to the Raiſing of a Sober Man's Conſideration upon the Wonderful Advance of Agrippa out of a Private Fortune, and beyond all Men's Expectation, to ſo Glorious a Degree of Power.

We have Touch'd upon This formerly in Groſs, but we ſhall now be a little more Particular. Herod the Great had by Mariamne the Daughter of Hyrcanus, Two Daughters; Salampſo, the One, who Marry'd Phaſael the Son of Phaſael, the King's Elder Brother, with the Father's Conſent. The Other's Name was Cypros, who Marry'd Antipater, the Nephew of Herod by his Siſter Salome.

Phaſael had by Salampſo, Five Children; Antipater, Herod, Alexander; and Two Daughters, Alexandra, and Cypros; who Marry'd Agrippa the Son of Ariſtobulus; but Alexandra was Marry'd to one Timius a Nobleman of the Iſle of Cyprus, who dy'd without Children. Agrippa had by Cypros, Two Sons, and Three Daughters. The Daughters were Berenice, Mariamne, and Druſilla: The Sons were Agrippa and Druſus; the Latter dying in his Minority. Agrippa the Father was brought-up under the Grandfather Herod the Great; together with his Brothers Herod, and Ariſtobulus; and ſo ſo was Berenice alſo, the Daughter of Salome and Coſtobarus. The Children of Ariſtobulus were at that time Infants, when their Father and his Brother Alexander (as we have ſaid before) were put to Death by Herod. But after they grew-up, This Herod the Brother of Agrippa Marry'd Mariamne, the Daughter of Olympias, (who was King Herod's Daughter) and of Joſeph, Herod's Brother, by whom he had Ariſtobulus. Now Ariſtobulus, the Third Brother of Agrippa Marry'd Jotape the Daughter of [a] Sampſigeram King of the Emeſenes, by whom he had a Daughter that bare her Mother's Name, and was born Deaf. Theſe were the Children of the Three Brothers; but Herodias, their Siſter, Marry'd Herod, the Son of Herod the Great, whom he had by Mariamne, the Daughter of Simon the High-Prieſt, and from thence came Salome; after whoſe Birth, Herodias made no Scruple, in defyance of all Law and Conſcience, to take Herod the Tetrarch of Galilee for her Second Husband, though her Husband's Brother by the Father's ſide; having alſo Abandon'd a Former Husband that was yet Living. Salome the Daughter Marry'd Philip the Son of Herod the Tetrarch of Trachonitis, who dy'd without Children, and then ſhe Marry'd Ariſtobulus the Son of Herod and the Brother of Agrippa, by whom ſhe had Three Sons, Herod, Agrippa, and Ariſtobulus. Let this ſuffice as to the Family of Phaſael and Salampſo.

Cypros had by Antipater, a Daughter, of the Mother's Name, who was Marry'd to Alexas Selcius the Son of Alexas, and by her he had One Daughter, Cypros. But Herod, and Alexander, who (as I told you) were the Brothers of Antipater, dy'd without Iſſue. Now Alexander the Son of King Herod, that was put to death by his Father, had by Glaphyra the Daughter of Archelaus, King of Cappadocia, Alexander, and Tigranes. This Tigranes was that King of Armenia that had an Accuſation brought againſt him by the Romans, and dy'd without Children. Alexander had a Son Tigranes alſo, after the Name of his Uncle, whom Nero advanc'd to be King of Armenia, and had a Son Alexander, who Marry'd Jotape, the Daughter of Antiochus King of Commagenæ, and was made King of [b] Leſis in Cilicia by Veſpaſian. The Race of Alexander quickly declin'd from the Jewiſh Laws and Diſcipline to the Religion of the Greeks; and the other Daughters of Herod the Great left no Children behind them.

Having now run thorough the Poſterity of this Prince, as far as to the Reign of Agrippa, I ſhall now Trace the Hiſtory of Agrippa himſelf, and the Wonderful Variety of Accidents in his Fortune, that brought him in the End to ſo Glorious a Degree of Dignity and Power.

ſus,

ſus, and ſo likewiſe in the Good Graces of Antonia, the Wife of Druſus the Elder, by the Means of his Mother Berenice, for whom, Antonia had a ſingular Value. He was naturally Generous and Free-Hearted; but while his Mother liv'd, kept within Compaſs, for fear of the main Chance: till coming at laſt, by her Death, to be left to himſelf, what with Expenſive Treats, and Extravagant Bounties and Profuſions; Eſpecially among the Creatures and Domeſtiques of the Court, (where he made his chief Intereſt) he had run himſelf ſo Deſperately in Debt, that he durſt not ſhew his Head any longer in Rome. Tiberius, at the ſame time alſo, loſing his Son, would not endure any of Druſus's Favourites ſo much as in his ſight, to Mind him of his Loſs.

His vaſt Profuſions.

When he had thus ſquander'd away his Mony and his Reputation, by Ill Menage; his Creditors alſo preſſing hard upon him, and no Means of Satisfaction, away he went back to Judæa, and partly out of Deſpair of Retrieving his Fortune; partly out of Shame for ſo Inconſiderate a Folly, he Retired to Malatha, a Caſtle in Idumæa, with a Reſolution, ſome way or other, there, to put an End to his Miſerable Life. Cypros finding her Husband deſperately out of Humour, and that his Melancholy grew ſtill more and more Dangerous, ſhe try'd all Ways in the World to prevent Miſchief, and in particular, wrote to her Siſter Herodias about it, with a very Punctual Account of his Neceſſitous Condition; adjuring her by all the Tyes of Honour, and Affinity of Bloud, to give him ſome Aſſiſtance. She did what ſhe could, her ſelf, ſhe ſaid, and Deſired her Siſter to follow her Example. This wrought ſo far upon Herodias, that both She and her Husband ſent away preſently to fetch Agrippa to them; gave him a Penſion in Mony, and the Command of Tiberias for his Preſent Subſiſtance: But Herod did not long hold in This Mind; and Agrippa, on the other hand, was not thoroughly ſatisfy'd neither: Inſomuch that being in their Cups once at Tyre, Herod Contemptuouſly Reflected upon Agrippa for his Poverty, and caſt it in his Teeth, that it was his Purſe that maintain'd him.

He retires to Malatha.

Cypros writes to Herodias on his behalf.

Herodias gets him a Penſion, and the Command of Tiberias.

Herod in his Cups twits Agrippa with his Poverty.

Agrippa could not Digeſt This Indignity, and ſo he betook himſelf to Flaccus, an Antient Friend and Acquaintance of his at Rome, and at that time, Governour of Syria. He gave him a Frank Reception and Entertainment, having Ariſtobulus with him in the Houſe before, who, though Agrippa's Brother, was yet his Enemy; But This Animoſity betwixt the Brothers did not hinder Flaccus from dividing his Favours and Civilities Indifferently betwixt them. Ariſtobulus however kept up the Grudge, and would never be Quiet till he had wrought Flaccus into an ill Opinion of Agrippa; which was Thus brought about. There was a Diſpute betwixt the People of Damaſcus, and thoſe of Sydon, about the Limits of their Territory. The Cauſe was to be try'd before Flaccus; and the People of Damaſcus being told that Agrippa and he were all one; they could not do better, they thought, then to Engage Agrippa for a Sum of Mony in their Intereſt. They ſtruck the Bargain, and Promiſes paſs'd on both ſides: So that Agrippa was Tooth and Nail for Damaſcus againſt Sydon. Ariſtobulus, finding it out to be a Mony-Buſineſs, went and Complain'd of his Brother to the Governour; who upon Examination and Proof of the Matter caſt-off Agrippa, and left him in his Extreme Neceſſity to Shift for himſelf in the Wide World again: ſo that he return'd to Ptolemais, with a Reſolution for pure want of Bread, to go back again into Italy. In this Extremity he put Marſyas, a Freeman of his, upon it to take up a Sum of Mony of the Brokers, upon any Terms to ſupply his Preſent Occaſions. So he went to Protus a Freeman of Berenice the Mother of Agrippa, and his late Patroneſs, that in her Laſt Will and Teſtament, had recommended him to the Service of Antonia; and ſo propounded the Matter to him for the Lending of a Sum of Mony to Agrippa, upon his Bond. The other told him that he was in his Books already: But yet for all this, he ſqueezed out of Protus Twenty Thouſand Attick Drachma's upon Bond: That is to ſay juſt Seventeen Thouſand Five Hundred Pieces; Diſcounting the other Two Thouſand Five Hundred to Himſelf, for Procuration-Mony; which Agrippa was not in Condition to Diſpute. Upon the Receipt of the Mony, Agrippa went to Anthedon, where he met with a Ship for his Purpoſe, and prepar'd himſelf to put to Sea. But this coming to the Ear of Herennius Capito, the Procurator of Tamnia, he ſent Soldiers to him to Demand Payment of a Debt of Three Hundred Thouſand Pieces of Silver, that he borrow'd of the King's Mony when he was at Rome. This Rub in the way put ſome little ſtop to his Journy; but Agrippa however promis'd them Fair, and ſo ſoon as it was Dark, cut his Cable, and put to the Sea, ſtanding his Courſe for Alexandria. When he came thither, he deſir'd Alexander the Head Officer about the Revenue, to furniſh him with Two Hundred Thouſand Pieces upon his Security. As for your own part, ſays the Officer, I will not truſt you with ſuch a Sum; but your Wife ſeems to be an Excellent Perſon, and a very Good Woman; and if ſhe will ſtand Bound for the Mony, ſhe ſhall have it. So it was, in fine, that upon the Security of Cypros, Alexander ſupply'd Agrippa with Five Talents at Alexandria, and Letters of Credit for the reſt at Puteoli; for he was not willing to venture the whole Sum in his Hands together for fear of Miſpending it. Cypros found by this time, that there was no Hindering her Husband's Journy; ſo that ſhe and her Children went back again to Judæa by Land.

Agrippa goes forward for Rome, and Cypros back to Judæa.

Agrippa, upon his coming to Puteoli, gave Tiberius Cæſar to underſtand by a Letter, being Then at Capreæ, that he was come ſo far to pay him his Duty, and deſir'd leave to wait upon him. Tiberius without any delay ſent him back the kindeſt Anſwer in the World, and that he ſhould be Heartily Welcome to Capreæ: and upon his Arrival, Cæſar took him with Great Tenderneſs into his Arms, and into his Palace, and ſeconded the Frankneſs of his Invitation with the Generoſity of his Reception, and Entertainment; but on the Day following, Cæſar receiv'd Letters of Complaint from Herennius againſt Agrippa; ſetting forth, that being Three Hundred Thouſand Pieces in the Emperour's Debt, and the Mony long ſince due, he had only demanded Satisfaction on the Bond, and Agrippa gave him the Slip upon it: So that Cæſar was now in danger to loſe his Mony. Tiberius took this ſo Heinouſly, that he Order'd the Officers of his Bed-Chamber not to open a Door to Agrippa till he had paid the Debt. Agrippa, on the other had, took no notice of the Emperour's Diſpleaſure, but went away to Antonia, the Mother both of Germanicus, and of Claudius, who came afterwards to the Empire; and telling her the Story of the Pinch he was in, and how he was like to loſe Cæſar's Favour for want of Three Hundred Thouſand Pieces, as aforeſaid, ſhe lent him the Mony in Honour to the Memory of Berenice, and of the Friendſhip that had ever paſs'd betwixt them; beſide that Agrippa and her Son Claudius had been brought up together from Children, as Play-Fellows and Companions. With this Mony Agrippa Diſcharg'd the Debt; and without any further Obſtacle, or Contradiction, ſet himſelf Right again with the Emperour. This way of Menage gain'd ſo far upon Cæſar, that he Committed his Grand-Child Tiberius Nero, the Son of Druſus, to Agrippa's Government and Care; deſiring him to be ſtill about him, and watchful Over him. Agrippa was ſo Senſible of the Obligations he had to Antonia, that he made his Court in the Firſt place however, to her Grandchild Caius, whom all People had a Great Honour and Eſteem for, both for his own ſake, and for the Reverence they bare to the Memory of Germanicus, his Father. There was at that time a Freeman of Cæſar's, a Samaritan, who gave Agrippa Credit for a Million of Pieces, part of it went to the Payment of Antonia, and the reſt toward the Expence of his Entertainment in his Attendances upon Caius, who had now taken him into the Greateſt Confidence and Friendſhip imaginable.

Agrippa, Caius's Favourite.

As they were one day together in a Chariot, They Two Alone, there happen'd to be ſome Occaſion of mentioning Tiberius. Ay, ſays Agrippa, I could wiſh with all my Heart it would pleaſe the Heavens that Caius were in his Place. Theſe Words were over-heard by Eutychus, Agrippa's Freeman, and at that time driving the Chariot; but for the Preſent he made no Words of it. This Coachman was charg'd not long after This, with Robbing his Patron, and running away with ſome of his Cloaths; which in Effect was True, and the Men taken-up upon it, and carry'd to Piſo the Governour of the Place, to be Examin'd about it. Piſo, upon the Examination, ask'd him what made him run away. He made Anſwer that Cæſar's Life was in Danger, and that he was going to make a Diſcovery of the Plot. Eutychus, upon this, was ſent Bound to Capreæ, and there kept in Chains by Tiberius, who was in all ſuch Caſes the moſt unſetled Dilatory Man that ever was born, either Prince, or Uſurper. He would not ſo much as admit Embaſſadors, without Delay, nor ſupply Vacancies in Governments of Provinces, till the Former Deputies or Governours were certainly Dead. He had a way of letting Priſoners lie a Long time Unheard too; and he gave his Friends theſe Reaſons for it, If I ſhould give Embaſſadors (ſays he) too Quick, and too Eaſy Admittance, the ſooner they are Receiv'd the ſooner they are Diſmiſs'd; and the ſooner New ones would be ſent in their Places; ſo that I ſhould have nothing elſe to do at this rate, but to give Audiences back and forward, and ſpend my whole time in admitting and Diſcharging Embaſſadors. As for Officers, when Places are once fill'd, it is Eaſyer to the Subject to keep them ſo then to change them; for all Magiſtrates are naturally Covetous; and Eſpecially where they are upon the Behaviour for the keeping of their Employments; for the Leſs Aſſurance they have to continue in an Office, the more Haſte they make to grow Rich upon it; and to this Purpoſe he made Application of an Old Fable. As a Poor Man, ſays he, lay wounded upon the the Way, hardly in Condition to help himſelf, and Swarms of Flies upon his Sores, Sucking and Tearing him, a Compaſſionate Good Natur'd Creature happening to paſs by, Offer'd him his Service to drive them away, and Eaſe him of his Tormentors. No no, ſays he, Pray let them alone; for Theſe Flies, now their Bellies are full are not near ſo ſharp upon me as New-Comers will be that are Starv'd and Empty. This is the Caſe, ſays he, betwixt Subjects and Freſh Magiſtrates; which are but new Tormenters. That This Eutychus overhears Dangerous Words betwixt Agrippa and Caius.

He Informs Piſo, and is ſent Bound to Tiberius.

The Dilatory Humour of Tiberius:

and his Reaſons for't.

This is a True Character of Tiberius, needs no other Proof then that in Two and Twenty Years time of his Reign, he ſent only Two Governours into Judæa; that is to ſay, Gratus, and his Succeſſor, Pilate; and that he proceeded at the ſame Rate in all other Parts of the Empire. The Reaſon he gave alſo for the Delay of bringing Priſoners to their Tryal, was to keep them the longer in Pain, and to Puniſh them for their paſt Crimes, by a Ling'ring Torment worſe then Death it ſelf.

This was the True Cauſe of Eutychus being kept ſo long in Chains before Cæſar would Vouchſafe to Hear him; but Tiberius, after ſome time coming from Capreæ to Tuſculanum, about a Hundred Furlong from Rome, Agrippa deſired Antonia to move for Eutychus, that he might have a Hearing, to the End it might be known once, what he had to Object againſt his Patron. Now Tiberius had a very great Honour for Antonia, partly for nearneſs of Bloud, as being his Siſter-in-law, and the Widow of Druſus, and partly for the Reputation of her Modeſty and Virtue in the Refuſal of a Second Marriage, though ſhe was earneſtly put upon it by Auguſtus Himſelf; and this in the Prime of her Years too: Her whole Converſation, in ſhort, being Exemplary, without the leaſt Blemiſh or Scandal. Now Tiberius, over and above all other Reſpects, had Perſonal Obligations alſo to Antonia never to be forgotten. For if it had not been for her Sagacity, Faith, and Induſtry, That deſperate Plot of his Minion Sejanus, had certainly coſt him his Life; for he was a Man of Power and Credit; the Captain of his Guards, and had engag'd ſeveral Conſiderable Men of the Senators; divers of Cæſar's Freemen; Court-Favourites, and Military Officers in the Conſpiracy. In ſhort, he ſcap'd narrowly at laſt, and it was Antonia's Vigilance, and Reſolution that defeated the Treaſon, and brought him off; for ſo ſoon as ever ſhe heard of ſuch a Practice a-foot, ſhe took Minutes of every particular of the Contrivance, and ſent them away from time to time to Capreæ, to Tiberius by the Means of Pallas, a try'd Servant and Confident of Tiberius. By Virtue of This Diſcovery, both the Confederacy it ſelf, and the Actors in it were laid Open, and Juſtice done upon Sejanus and his Complices. If Antonia had a Great hand with Tiberius before this mighty piece of Service, her Power muſt be certainly much Greater after it. So that upon the Importunity of Agrippa, ſhe preſs'd Tiberius yet over and over to give Eutychus a Hearing. Well! ſays Tiberius, if this Fellow has Bely'd Agrippa in any thing, let him content himſelf with the Puniſhment he has ſuffer'd already; but let him have a Care how he carries the Proſecution too far, for fear the Miſchief he deſigns to Eutychus ſhould, upon a full Examination of the Matter, come at laſt Home to himſelf. Antonia gave him this Caution; and the more ſhe inclin'd to Moderation, the more Eager was he to bring it to a Scrutiny: Inſomuch that Antonia, when ſhe ſaw he would not be ſaid Nay, took her Opportunity as Tiberius was paſſing by in a Chair after Dinner; Caius and Agrippa marching before him, to Advance directly up to Tiberius; with a Requeſt over and over, that Eutychus might be Call'd and Hear'd; to which Tiberius gave her this Anſwer. I do here call the Gods to Witneſs, ſays he, that what I am now about to do, I do unwillingly, and only to Gratify your Deſire. With theſe Words, he Commanded Macro the Succeſſor to Sejanus in his Commiſſion for the Guards, to cauſe Eutychus to be brought thither. And immediately upon his coming; Cæſar put this Queſtion to him. What have you to ſay, ſays he, againſt your Patron Agrippa, that gave you your Freedom? Sir, ſays Eutychus, as I was driving Caius and Agrippa one day in my Chariot, and ſitting at their Feet to do my Office, I overheard ſeveral Diſcourſes that paſs'd betwixt them, and among other Paſſages, Agrippa, I remember, ſpake theſe Words to Caius. Ah, ſays he, that we could but ſee the Old Man's Head laid once, and you left Maſter of the World; for when he's gone, his Grandchild Tiberius would be nothing in your Hands; and over and above the Univerſal Comfort it would bring to Mankind, I my ſelf might hope to come in for a part of the Bleſſing. Tiberius was apt enough to Believe this Information, for it ſtuck terribly in his Stomach, that when he had ſo Expreſly recommended Tiberius, his Grandchild by Druſus, to the Particular Care and Kindneſs of Agrippa, he ſhould never ſo much as look after him; but Dedicate himſelf wholly to the Service of Caius. Tiberius, upon this, turning to Macro, put him in Chains, ſays he; but Macro not underſtanding of whom he ſpake (for he could not Imagine any ſuch thing of Agrippa) made a little Pauſe to be better Informed in his Meaning. Cæſar, in the mean time, after a Turn or Two in the Circus, ſeeing Agrippa ſtill at Liberty, call'd to Macro again: Did not I Order, ſays he, That Man to be put in Chains? Which Man? ſays Macro: That Man, Agrippa, ſaid Tiberius. Agrippa then betook himſelf to Prayers and Supplications; Adjuring Tiberius by the Tenderneſs he had for the Memory of his Son, with whom he had the Honour to be ſo well acquainted, and for the ſake of the Services he had been ſo Happy as to render to his Grandſon Tiberius, to vouchſafe him his Pardon: but all to no Purpoſe, for the Guards dragg'd him away to Priſon in his Robes of Honour, as they found him. The Weather being extremely Hot, and Agrippa ready to Periſh with a Burning Raging

Agrippa puts Antonia upon preſſing Tiberius to bring it to a Hearing.

Cæſar at laſt yields to it, though Unwillingly.

Macro brings Eutychus to Cæſar.

Eutychus delivers his Information.

Cæſar commands Macro to put Agrippa in Chains.

The Guards drag him to Priſon in his Robes.

Raging Draught, for want of Drink, he ſpy'd one Thaumaſtus, a Servant of Caius, with a Pitcher of Water in his Hand, and call'd to him for a Soup of it to Quench his parching Thirſt. He gave it him readily, and when he had taken a Hearty Draught of it: Well! Thaumaſtus (ſays he) Since you have been ſo Kind as to do me this Service in my Bonds, with the ſame Frankneſs you formerly ſerv'd me in my Better Fortunes, depend upon it that you ſhall never repent this Good Office; for ſo ſoon as ever I get over this Difficulty, I will be Anſwerable to you that Caius ſhall give you your Liberty; and he was afterward as good as his word; for ſo ſoon as ever he came to the Crown, he begg'd Thaumaſtus of Caius, and made him Free; entruſting him alſo with the Menage of his Eſtate, and at his Death recommended him to his Son Agrippa, and to Berenice his Daughter, to continue him in that Charge, wherein he acquitted himſelf with Great Honour and Eſteem all the Remainder of his Life.

An Owl perches over Agrippa's Head.

As Agrippa was ſtanding in his Chains before the Palace, with other of his Fellow-Priſoners in the ſame Condition, and leaning in a Melancholique Poſture upon a Tree, there came an Owl, and Percht upon it. A German that was there in Bonds taking notice of it, enquir'd of one of the Soldiers what that Man there in the Purple was; and being given to underſtand that he was a Jew of the Firſt Quality, from an Honourable Extraction, he deſir'd the Soldier to let him come a little nearer him; for he had a Great mind to learn ſomething from him of his Country. This being Granted, and an Interpreter allow'd him, the German ſpake to him after this Manner. Young Man, ſays he, This Sudden and Surprizing Change of your Fortune makes you ſad I perceive, and you will not Eaſily Believe how near you are to your Deliveranee under the Favour and Protection of a Divine Providence that watches over you. I call all the Gods to Witneſs, both of Yours, and Ours, by whoſe Permiſſion it is that we are here in Bonds, that I do not ſpeak this to Amuſe and Flatter you with vain Hopes; for I know very well that Prognoſtiques of this kind, if the Event does not anſwer the Prediction, do a great deal more Hurt then Good, But I reckon it my Duty, at what Hazzard ſoever, to tell you, that you ſhall ſee ſuch a Turn of Times and Things, as ſhall advance you out of this Calamitous Condition, to the moſt Glorious height of Honour and Power, and render you the Envy of thoſe, that either Deſpis'd, or Pity'd you before. The Remainder of your Days ſhall be Happy, and you ſhall leave Children behind you to ſucceed to your Good Fortunes. But now remember what I tell you further, Whenever you come to ſee this Bird again; the Fifth Day after it, will be your Laſt. This is the ſhort ſum of what Heaven gives you to underſtand by this Good Omen. My Revelation is Certain, and I deliver you the Truth of the matter, to ſupport you in your Preſent Trouble, with the Hope of Better Things to come. And I am now to beſeech you further, that when you find all this come to paſs, you will not forget your Fellow Sufferers; but Conſult the Deliverance of thoſe you leave behind you. This German's Propheey appear'd as Ridiculous to Agrippa upon the Telling of it, as it was afterwards Wonderful in the Accompliſhment. Antonia all this while laid the Hard Uſage of her Friend Extremely to Heart; but taking for granted that Tiberius was not to be wrought upon, and conſequently that all Applications and Interceſſions would be but ſo much time caſt away, ſhe had no more to do, then by the Means of Macro, to try if ſhe could make his Priſon Eaſier to him, by getting Civil and Good-natur'd Soldiers about him, and leave to Eat at the Table with the Officer that had him in Cuſtody; allowing him the Uſe of the Bath every Day, and the Acceſs of his Friends and Freemen to viſit him: All which was granted accordingly; inſomuch that Silas, his Friend, and Marſias, and Stichus, Two of his Freemen, brought him the Dyet ſtill that he loved Beſt, and Blankets (under a Pretence of expoſing them to Sale) to lay under him in the Night; the Soldiers giving way to it, according to the Hints they had from Macro.

A German's Prediction upon it.

Tiberius Inexorable. Antonia prevails with Macro to make Agrippa's Condition eaſy to him.

When Agrippa had been a Priſoner upon theſe Terms for a Matter of Six Months; Tiberius returning from Caprea, was taken at his firſt coming back with a Faint Indiſpoſition, which by Degrees grew Worſe and Worſe, till he was quite given over. And now perceiving his Caſe Deſperate, he ſent Evodus his Favourite-Freeman to fetch his Children to him early the Next Morning, to take the laſt leave of their Dying Father. I ſpake of his Adopted Children; for he had none of his Own: Druſus, his only Son being Dead and Gone. But Druſus's Son, Tiberius, ſurnamed Gemellus, was yet Alive; and ſo was Caius the Son of his Brother Germanicus, who was now at Man's Eſtate; a Young Man of Letters, and excellently Qualify'd for all Honourable Purpoſes: Beſide, that he was the Darling of the People, upon the Account of the very Reverence they had for the Memory of his Father's Virtues; a Prince of a Wonderful Modeſty in his Manners, and Gentleneſs in his Converſation, without Arrogating any thing to himſelf above others. By the Reputation of this Illuſtrious Character, he did not only gain the Favour of the Senate, and People, but of the Provinces in General, whom he obliged with all manner of Good Offices and Reſpects. His Death, in fine, was not

Celebrated

Celebrated ſo much with Pomp, and Shew, as with Tears of Tenderneſs and Truth, and an Inward Sorrow of Heart: for the whole Body of the People lamented the Death of their Prince, as if every Particular Man had loſt his Own Father. The Reputation of Germanicus was of Great Advantage every way to his Son Caius; but eſpecially among the Soldiers, that were all ready to lay down their Lives at his Feet to ſerve him.

Tiberius, after this, order'd Evodus to have his Sons come to him Early the next Morning, and put up a Prayer to the Gods of his Country to direct him by ſome Particular Token, which of the Two he ſhould chuſe for his Succeſſor, wiſhing with all his Heart that the Lot might fall upon Tiberius; but he durſt not venture however, to Prejudge and Determine ſo High a Point, without conſulting his Oracle. And ſo he Propoſed to Govern himſelf by this Token, that he of the Two that came firſt to him in the Morning, ſhould be his Succeſſor. This Reſolution being taken, he gave it in Charge to his Granchild's Tutor, to be ſure to bring his Pupil to him by break of Day, taking for Granted, that Heaven would Declare it ſelf in favour of Tiberius: But it fell out Otherwiſe; for upon the Emperour's ſending out Evodus by Peep of Day next Morning to look for his Sons at the Door, and to bring him in firſt that he ſaw firſt, he found only Caius there, and told him that he muſt come to his Father, and ſo took him in along with him. Tiberius, it ſeems, not Imagining his Grandfathers's Buſineſs, ſlipt his time by ſtaying to take his Breakfaſt. The Emperour was not a little ſtartled at the Sight of Caius, to conſider how Providence had Defeated him in his Deſign of Diſpoſing of the Government, by ſettling it Contrary to his Inclination: And the Croſſing of his Will was not the Worſt of the Caſe neither; for he was more Concerned for the Perſonal Safety of his Grandchild, then for the Loſs of the Empire. For where Dominion is the Queſtion, the longer Sword carries it; Ambition knows no Kindred; and among Rivals for Power, the One can never think himſelf ſafe, but in the Ruin of the Other. Tiberius was moſt Superſtitiouſly ddicted to Fortune-Tellers, Judicial Aſtrologers, and that ſort of People; and Govern'd his Life in a great Meaſure by their Advice and Direction. As he happen'd to caſt his Eye upon Galba once, turning to ſome Particular Friends about him: That Man, ſays he, will be Emperour of Rome. Upon the whole Matter, none of the Emperour's had ever ſo much Faith in Wizzards and Diviners as Tiberius, and ſome of his Phancies were not altogether Idle neither. But nothing ſtruck him deeper then this Foreboding Encounter of the Two Competitors; which wrought ſo ſenſibly upon him, that he gave his Grandchild already for a Dead Man, and no body to Blame neither, but Himſelf, for Troubling his Head with theſe Inquiſitive Freakes, when he might have liv'd Free and Eaſy, without preſſing into the Secrets of God's Hidden Councels, and Blaſting the Peace of his Life with Unwarrantable Hankerings after the Knowledge of Things to come; and this Itch of Preſcience was the Plague he labour'd under. This Unexpected Diſappointment of the Succeſſion, put his Head quite out of Tune for Speeches, but yet ſomewhat or other was to be ſaid, though never ſo much againſt Stomach, upon this Occaſion; So that he deliver'd himſelf to this Effect. I ſhall not need to tell you, My Son Caius, ſays he, that Tiberius is the Nearer to me in Bloud, of you Two; but yet upon Conſulting the Good Pleaſure of the Immortal Gods, and my Own Reaſon, I do here Transfer the Rule of the Roman Empire into your Hands: But I do likewiſe adjure you, that in the Exerciſe of this Power, you do never forget the Obligation you have to him from whom you Receiv'd it; and that you ſhew your Gratitude to your Patron, by all Demonſtrations of Love and Friendſhip to your Brother Tiberius. I ask nothing more, in return for the Dignity I have now conferr'd upon you; (for next to the Gods, you owe it all to me) then that you be not wanting in any thing to Him, whom Nature it ſelf hath made almoſt Inſeparable from me. And I am to mind you further alſo, that it is as much your Intereſt, as your Duty, to do what I adviſe you to: for the Security and Splendor of your own Fortune depends in a great Meaſure upon the Life and Well-Being of your Brother; and the Day of his Death will be the Eve to That of your Miſery. Sovereignty is a giddy and a Slippery Height, and it is a Dangerous Place for a Man to ſtand Alone upon; beſide that Sins againſt the Tyes and Inſtincts of Conſanguinity, and Nature, never fail of being follow'd by a Divine Vengeance. Theſe were the Laſt Words of Tiberius to Caius, who promis'd him a Punctual Obedience from point to point to all his Orders, but never intended it. For ſo ſoon as ever he was poſſeſs'd of his Command, he put his Brother to Death, according to the Preſage of Tiberius, and he himſelf was Aſſaſſinated ſome Years after.

Tiberius dy'd within a few Days; Declaring Caius his Succeſſor, in the Two and Twentieth Year of his Reign five Months and Thriteen Days. Caius came after him, and the Fourth in the Roll of the Emperours. The Rumour of the Death of Tiberius was Joyful News to the Romans; but they durſt not build too much upon the Truth of it; not that they did not wiſh it true with all their Hearts, and would have given all all the World long ſince to have had it ſo, but they were afraid of being over-Credulous, and of Diſcovering the Satisfaction they conceiv'd upon it before they were ſure of the Thing it ſelf; for there were ſo many Spies and Informers up and down, that ſuch a miſtake would have been certain Death. He was Fierce, and Implacable, to the Higheſt Degree; Never any Man ſo Tyrannically Rigorous to the Nobility. He had his Inexorable Averſions upon no other Ground then Freak and Humour; and ſo Brutally Cruel in his very Inclination, that as he order'd it, Death was a Mercy from him. Wherefore it concern'd the People to be Cautious how they ſeem'd pleas'd with the News, conſidering the Mortal Danger of it if it ſhould be found a Miſtake. The Tidings of this Emperour's Death were no ſooner come to Marſias, Agrippa's Freeman, but he poſted away immediately to carry the Bleſſed News to his Patron, whom he found going into a Bath, and Whiſper'd him in Hebrew, theſe Words; The Lyon, ſays he, is Dead. Agrippa underſtood the Myſtery preſently, and in a kind of Extaſy of Joy: Well! ſays he, How ſhall I ever be able to Requite thee for this, and ſeveral other Good Offices that thou haſt render'd me, if it be as thou ſayſt? The Captain that had him in Cuſtody, obſerving what haſte Marſias made to deliver his Errand, and how well pleas'd Agrippa was with what he had told him, he made no doubt but there was ſomething more then Ordinary in the Matter, and ſo deſired Agrippa to tell him the Buſ'neſs, who made ſome Difficulty at firſt, but upon preſſing him further, Agrippa, in a kind of Confidence, told him the whole Story. The Officer joy'd him of the Good News, and treated him with a Splendid Supper. But as they were in the middle of their Jollity and Cups, comes a Meſſenger with Intelligence that Tiberius was paſt Danger, and would come ſuddenly to Town. Theſe Words went to the very Heart of the Captain, who being Conſcious to Himſelf that he had forfeited his Head for making merry with a Priſoner, upon the News of Cæſar's Death, puſh'd Agrippa in a rage from his Seat, and in a Menacing Tone: Do you think to come off thus with your Lyes, and your Tricks? ſays he; and could you find no body but me to put your Sham-Stories upon, of the Death of Cæſar? No no, ſays he, This Saucyneſs of your Tongue ſhall coſt you Dear: and ſo he call'd to have him put in Chains again, and kept Stricter then before. When Agrippa had paſs'd the whole Night in this Condition, the Report of Cæſar's Death came on again the next Day: Every body talking of it publiquely, and People offering up Sacrifices for Joy. Soon after this, there came Two Letters from Caius; one to the Senate, to inform them that Tiberius had declar'd him his Succeſſor; and the other to Piſo, the Governour of the City to the ſame Purpoſe; appointing alſo that Agrippa ſhould be Diſcharg'd of the Priſon, and allow'd the Liberty of the Houſe wherein he liv'd before; ſo that he was now out of all Danger and Apprehenſion; for though he was ſtill in Cuſtody, he was in all other reſpects in a State of Freedom. Upon the Return of Caius to Rome, and the Body of Tiberius along with him, the Funerals were Celebrated with all Magnificence and Solemnity. The Emperour would have diſcharg'd Agrippa the ſame Day; but Antonia was againſt it, not for want of Good Will to the Man, but it would be an Indecency ſhe thought to do it in ſuch Poſt Haſte; and a kind of Diſreſpect to Tiberius, to ſet looſe a Priſoner of his Committing all in a Hurry. But it was not many days after this, however, that he took him Home; had him ſhav'd, ſhifted, and Dreſs'd up, and a Crown put upon his Head, as Succeſſor to the Tetrarchy that Philip had; created him King, with an Addition to him of the Tetrarchy of Lyſania; and beſtowing upon him a Golden Chain of the ſame weight with the Iron one he had before; ſending alſo Marcellus Governour into Judæa.

It was a Wonderful ſuprize to them, to ſee Agrippa with a Crown upon his Head; a Remarkable Inſtance of the Inſtability of Fortune, and the Uncertainty of Humane Affairs, in this change of his Condition from one Exceſs to Another: Some look'd upon him to be a Wiſe and a Happy Man, and ſtanding ſo Firm againſt all Diſcouragements; but others were ſo Amaz'd at the Circumſtances of this Revolution, that they could hardly believe what they ſaw.

IT was ſo Intolerable a Mortification to Herodias, (the Siſter of Agrippa, and the Wife of Herod the Tetrarch of Galilee and Peræa,) the Country beyond Jordan,) to ſee her Brother, that was forc'd but the other Day to run away from his Creditors, now upon his Return ſo much advanced above her Husband in Splendor, Dignity and Power, that the Haughtineſs of her Spirit was not able to brook it; Eſpecially to ſee him in the Pomp of his Royal State and Robes, ſhewing himſelf to the People, and the Multitude crouding about him. The Envy that this Thought and Spectacle gave her, was ſo Inſupportable, that in the violence of her Paſſion, nothing would ſerve her, but her Husband muſt immediately away to Rome, and never leave Cæſar till he had got the like Honour and Preferment for himſelf. It would be the breaking of her Heart, ſhe ſaid, to ſee her Husband that was the Son of a King, and ſo fair both in the Affections of the People, and in his own Reaſonable Pretenſions, to ſucceed him, ſtand tamely looking on like a Private, Contented Wretch; and at the ſame time the Son of Ariſtobulus; a Bankrupt, and a Criminal that had ſuffer'd under the Hands of Juſtice, advanced to a Throne: But my Dear Husband, ſays ſhe, if you have had the Patience hitherto, to live below the Birth and Quality of your Father's Son, it is certainly High time now however to bethink your ſelf of doing ſome ſort of Right, both to your Credit, and to your Family, without Truckling to a Miſerable Creature that owes his very Bread, to your Charity. Never let it be ſaid that Agrippa, under the Preſſure of his Scandalous Neceſſities, got the Start of Herod toward the making of his Fortune, with all the Advantages of Reputation and Plenty on his ſide. It will not ſtand with your Dignity, ever to own that Man for your Superior, that you your ſelf have kept from Starving. Wherefore, without any more ado, let us ſpare for neither Mony, nor Pains, but away to Rome together; for Gold and Silver is not Valuable barely for it ſelf; but for the Power and Satisfaction it brings us upon the Well-diſpoſing of it.

She preſſes him away to Rome to beg ſomething for himſelf.

Herod was a Great Lover of his Eaſe; beſide that he had no great Opinion of the Court of Rome: So that he try'd all manner of Ways to keep his Wife off, and ſleep in a whole Skin; but the more Earneſt he was one way, the more Eager was Herodias the other; having taken up an Uncontroulable Reſolution to Purſue her Point at any rate. She follow'd him ſo cloſe, in fine, that he was wrought upon at laſt, even in his own Defence to comply with her Importunities, and ſo away they went to Rome together; Herod, and Herodias, with an Equipage ſuitable enough to the Occaſion. Agrippa being aware all this while of every thing that paſs'd, bethought himſelf of this way of Countermining them. He kept his Free-man Fortunatus in readineſs with Letters and Preſents for the Emperour; who, ſo ſoon as ever Herod ſhould ſet Sail for Rome, was to put to Sea after him, with Particular Inſtructions how to behave himſelf when he came there. Fortunatus had a quick Paſſage, and Arriv'd at Puteoli juſt with Herod; but Caius happen'd to be at that time at the Baiæ, a little Town in Campagne, about five Furlongs from Puteoli; a Place Famous for Royal Palaces; the Emperours that frequented the Hot Baths there, ſome for their Pleaſure, others for their Health, ſtriving to out-do one another in the State and Curioſity of their Buildings. Upon coming to this Place, Herod made his Reverence to the Emperour, and Fortunatus within one Minute after Preſented him his Letters. Caius, upon the Peruſal, found them to be a Point-blank Accuſation of Herod: Firſt, for being a Party to the Conſpiracy of Sejanus againſt Tiberius; and now again for Siding with Artabanus the Parthian againſt Caius; offering this for a Proof againſt him, that he had at that Inſtant a Magazine of Arms for Seventy Thouſand Men. Cæſar preſently in a Paſſion, demanded of Herod whether he had ſuch a Proviſion of Arms or not? The Thing was ſo Plain and Evident, that he could not deny it: So that the Emperour never look'd further for any Proof of the Treaſon; but took away his Government and gave it to Agrippa, with his Mony alſo, as a Reward for his Diſcovery. As for Herod, he ſentenc'd him to a Perpetual Exile, and a Confinement in Lyons, a Famous City in France; but for Herodias, whom he knew to be Agrippa's Siſter, he gave her the Command of what whatever belong'd to her, and without making her a Partaker of her Husband's Calamity, he promis'd to Treat her favourably for her Brother's ſake; whereupon ſhe told him: Sir, ſays ſhe, you ſpeak like a Great Emperour, and pray give me leave to behave my ſelf like an Indulgent Wife. I am not in a Condition to Enjoy the Benefit of this Bounty; for I do not think it Reaſonable, or Honeſt, after the Share I have had in my Huſband's Better Fortunes, now to Abandon him in his Adverſity. This Greatneſs of mind in a Woman gave ſuch an Offence to Caius, that upon the Senſe of this Indignity he Baniſh'd, Confiſcated, and Confined Herodias, together with her Husband. And this was the Vengeance that God brought upon Herodias for the Malignity of her Envy to the Succeſs of her Brother; and likewiſe the Puniſhment that God inflicted upon Herod for being ſo eaſily over-ruled by a Spiteful, Impetuous Woman.

THere happen'd at Alexandria, betwixt the Jews and the Greeks, an Unhappy Difference, and Six Embaſſadors, Three of each ſide, were ſent to Caius about it; of which, Appion and Philo, were the Chief. Among other things that Appion objected againſt the Jews, this was the Main; That whereas Temples and Altars were erected all over the World to Caius elſewhere; and the ſame Adoration paid to the Emperour, as to the reſt of the Gods: only the Jews ſtood out, and abſolutely refus'd either to Dedicate Images to Cæſar, *or to Swear by his Holy Name. Caius takes himſelf to be affronted.

He ſends Petronius to Judæa, to ſet up his Statue in the Temple there.

Petronius follows his Orders.

CAIUS took it for ſuch an Affront, to find that the Jews were the only People in the World which ſtood in defyance of his Orders, that he preſently ſent away Petronius into Syria, in the Place of Vitellius, with Orders to Enter Judæa with a Strong Army, and ſet up his Statue in the Temple there. If they ſubmitted to it, Well and Good! but in caſe of Refuſal, his Orders were to force it upon them by Dint of Arms. Petronius took upon himſelf the Adminiſtration, and made what haſte he could toward the putting of Cæſar's Commands in Execution: That is to ſay, he got a Body of Auxiliaries together, and Two Roman Legions, which he put into Winter-Quarters

Quarters in Ptolemais, to be ready to March early the next Spring. Caius had an Account of his Proceedings from time to time, and gave him Thanks for his Induſtry; bidding him go on Boldly, for he was reſolved, he ſaid, to bring down the Contumacy of that ſtubborn People.

The Jews beg of Petronius at Ptolemais not to preſs them in it. They Expoſtulate with Petronius.

There came at this time vaſt Multitudes of Jews to Petronius at Ptolemais, begging of him for Heavens ſake not to preſs them upon any thing againſt their Conſciences, and the Rules of their Profeſſion. Or if it was of Neceſſity that a Statue muſt be ſet up in their Temple, they had no more to do but to take away their Lives firſt, and they might do afterward what they pleas'd. But ſo long as they had Breath in their Bodies, they could never ſuffer the Violation of thoſe Laws and Precepts that had been handed down to them thorough ſo many Generations from their Famous Progenitors. Petronius reply'd quick upon them, This that you Say might perhaps work upon me, ſays he, if I were at my own Liberty; but being under Cæſar's Command, I muſt Obey Cæſar's Order, and I dare do no Other. The Jews turn'd it again upon Petronius, that if he could not depart from His Maſter's Orders, neither could they from Theirs; and that by the Grace of God they were reſolved to tread in the Steps of their Forefathers, as they had ever hitherto done. We are not ſo Mean, ſaid they, as for the ſaving of a Miſerable Temporary Life to Hazzard the Forfeiture of a Bleſſed Eternity, by Prevaricating with the Laws of God. No no Sir, let but our Laws and our Religion be ſafe, and what becomes of our Carcaſs, and our Fortunes, we matter not. Our Truſt is in God, and in the Aſſurance of his Providence and Protection, we are reſolved to abide all Hazzards, whether we ſhall rather chuſe to Incur a Perpetual Infamy by our Cowardiſe, on the one Hand, or the Wrath of God by our Diſobedience on the other. And in ſhort; whether we ſhall obey the Voice of Heaven, or the Voice of Caius; and which of the Two, be you the Judge.

Petronius, gathering from This Diſcourſe the Inflexible Stiffneſs of theſe People; and that there was no Gaining their Point upon them for the ſetting up of Cæſar's Statue, but the laſt Extremity of Bloud and Slaughter, he took ſome of his Friends and Domeſtiques about him, and away they went to Tiberias to be within diſtance of being more particularly Inform'd in the Manners, Cuſtoms and Affairs of the People he had to deal with. This Approach of the Romans put the Jews in a Great Dread of a War; but in a Greater, for fear of an Invaſion upon their Cuſtoms and Religion. So that upon this Alarum, ſeveral Thouſands of them in a Body went directly to Petronius, deſiring him with moſt Paſſionate Inſtances, not to drive the Multitude upon Deſperate Neceſſities, by offering to Prophane their Holy Temple with Forbidden Images. What? ſays Petronius, and will you Fight with Cæſar then Hand over Head, without ſo much as conſidering either his Strength, or your Own Weakneſs? They told Petronius, No: They did not propoſe to Fight, but rather to Die Themſelves then to Sacrifice their Laws; caſting themſelves down upon the Ground at the ſame time, and Baring their Necks, as who ſhould ſay; Strike when you will, we are ready for you. They were at this paſs for a Matter of Forty Days without either Ploughing or Sowing, or attending any Office of Husbandry, though the Seaſon of the Year requir'd it: for they were all Unanimouſly agreed upon it, rather to Die then to admit the Statue.

Petronius Informs himſelf in the Jewiſh Cuſtoms. The Jews draw into a Body, and deſire Petronius to deſiſt. They Reaſon the Caſe with Petronius; and in the mean time neglect their Tillage.

While Matters were in This State, Ariſtobulus the Brother of King Agrippa, and Elcias ſurnamed The Great, with ſeveral Noblemen of the Family, and others of the Firſt Quality among the Jews, apply'd themſelves to Petronius; deſiring him to conſider, that they were a Rugged ſort of People he had to do withal, and how Dangerous it might be to Hurry them into a Deſpair: But their Advice was for him to poſſeſs Caius of the Difficulties of the Caſe; the Stubbornneſs of the Party, how they had left all their Lands Fallow, not with any Thought of a Rebellion, but in a Determination rather to Die, then to Blaſt the Integrity of their Religion; that this Neglect of their Husbandry muſt of Neceſſity expoſe the Country to Robberies and Rapines, and Diſable them from paying their Taxes. They ſuggeſted that poſſibly this might make Cæſar Relent, and conſequently remove all Colour for a Rebellion. Or if nothing could divert him from carrying on the War, that might be done at laſt as well as before. Thus far went Ariſtobulus.

Ariſtobulus and ſeveral Eminent Jews ſide with them. They deſire Petronius to lay the Caſe before Cæſar.

Petronius was no Stranger to the Intemperate and Revengeful Humour of Caius; eſpecially where any Stop or Delay was put to the Execution of his Commands; but yet ſuch was the Awe and Reverence he had for God, and his Own Conſcience, and ſuch the Horror he had to think of Sacrificing ſo many Lives to the Fury of a Madman, that what with theſe Conſiderations, together with the Credit of the Interceſſor, the Importance of the Affair, and the Danger of Tranſporting an Obſtinate ſort of People into Deſperation, he came to a Reſolution of writing plainly to Caius all the Difficulties of the Caſe, at what Hazzard ſoever; for he thought thus with himſelf. What if all This ſhould do no Good now? What if inſtead of Reaſoning him into a Better Mind, theſe Trifling Expoſtulations ſhould rather Provoke and Enflame him, and bring the Storm upon my own Head, that I am now labouring to Avert from Others! I ſhall have Petronius deliberates upon the Matter.

This Comfort yet at the Worſt, either that I dye in the Poſt of an Honeſt Man, or at leaſt that I did not decline the Expoſing of my Life, even to an Appearing Certainty of Ruine, in the Diſcharge of a Publique Duty, and for the Common Safety of an Innocent People.

He Summons the Jews to Tiberias.

Petronius, upon this Deliberation, Summon'd a Meeting of the Jews at Tiberias, where they attended in Prodigious Numbers; and that which he had to ſay to them was this. It is not of my own Head, ſays he, that I have undertaken This Expedition; but upon the Command of Cæſar. I ſhall not need to tell you the Danger of deferring the Execution of my Orders, for Sovereign Powers will not be Trifled with: To ſay nothing of the Equity and Reaſon of the Thing, in my ſubmitting to the Authority of a Prince that has been the Raiſing and the Making of me. But yet after all this now, as the Caſe ſtands, I do not ſo much conſider my own Perſonal Security, or my Credit with my Maſter, as I do the Welfare and Preſervation of a Conſciencious People in the Warrantable Defence of their Worſhip and Laws. Neither do I approve of the Prophaning of God's Holy Houſe at the Pleaſure of Lawleſs Princes. Wherefore I am now ſending Expreſs to Caius, to let him know your Final Reſolution about the Statue. And it ſhall be none of my Fault neither, if the Emperour does not comply with you in every thing elſe that you can honeſtly deſire. May the Divine Providence that over-rules all Humane Powers and Purpoſes, preſerve your Religion Sacred and Inviolate, and grant that the Emperour's Exceſſive Affection of Glory in this Particular, may never be Charg'd to his Account. As for my Own part, if it ſhall be my Lot to fall under his Diſpleaſure for this Liberty; though to the Loſs of Life and Fortune, I am prepared for it: provided only, that I may never live to ſee ſo many Good Men deſtroy'd only for Well-doing. Wherefore let every Man betake himſelf to his own Home and Buſ'neſs. Go to your Lands and Tillage again, and leave me to Menage with the Emperour. I am juſt now ſending away to him; and you may depend upon it, that nothing ſhall be wanting to your Satisfaction, that I my ſelf and my Friends are able to do for you. With theſe Words, he diſmiſs'd the Aſſembly; bad them hope the Beſt, and take Care of their Husbandry. Petronius had no ſooner made an End of ſpeaking theſe Comfortable Things to the Jews, but the Goodneſs of God appeared in ſo Extraordinary a Providence, that every Body look'd upon it as a Manifeſt Declaration from Heaven, in Favour of what Petronius was now a doing; for ſo ſoon as ever the Words were out of his Mouth, there fell a Shower to the Admiration of all People, in as Clear a Day as ever Shin'd, and without one Cloud to be ſeen. This happen'd after ſo long a Drought, that they were almoſt out of Hope of having any more Rain, and tho' now and then they ſaw perhaps a Flying Cloud, it blew over yet without any Effect. This Wonderful Relief, beyond all Thought and Expectation, was look'd upon by the Jews as a Bleſſing upon Petronius's Prayers, and as an Earneſt of more to come: neither was any Body more Senſible of it then Petronius Himſelf; either of the Prodigy, or of the Interpretation of it: For it was ſo Convincing an Evidence from Heaven in Favour of the Jews, that it would not bear the leaſt Doubt or Contradiction. Petronius was very particular in his Report to the Emperour in this whole Affair, and laid all the Neceſſary Points before him: As what might be the Conſequence of purſuing ſuch a Multitude of ſtubborn People to Extremities, and making ſo many Thouſand Men Deſperate; For nothing but abſolute Force could ever make them quit their Hold: Beſide that in the Violent Proſecution of them, Caius would but ſink his Own Revenue, and Puniſh himſelf, which would turn afterwards to his Eternal Reproach: Subjoyning likewiſe to all the reſt, that the Jews were a People acceptable to God, who had given many wonderful Inſtances of his Peculiar Care over them.

'A ſtrange Providence in favour of Petronius's Diſcourſ.

Petronius's Letter to Cæſar.

Agrippa at Rome when Cæſar receiv'd it.

King Agrippa happen'd to be at Rome when Petronius wrote to Cæſar, and every Day more and more in the Good Graces of the Emperour; a Kindneſs that he Cultivated by all the Study and Application imaginable. As in particular, he made Caius one Treat, that for Expence, Variety, Curioſity, Delicacy, Order, and Contrivance, out-did all that ever was heard of before him; not excepting the moſt Splendid Entertainments even of Cæſar himſelf. Caius was ſo taken with the Generous Magnificence of this Collation, and with the Hearty Good Will of it too; (for Agrippa had ſtrain'd hard to come up to it) that the Emperour took a Phancy in his Head to Enter into a kind of Competition, and to Vye Good Offices with him. When the Wine had a little Warm'd him, the Humour took him in the Head, to put Agrippa upon the Merry Pin too, and ſo he call'd out to him. Agrippa, ſays he, This is not the firſt Proof I have had of your Friendſhip and Affection. In the Days of Tiberius I had many Evidences of it to your Hazzard; and you have now oblig'd me to your Coſt; and in ſo Exceſſive a Manner too, that you have Conſulted my Honour and Pleaſure, more then your Own Convenience. It would be a Baſe Thing for me now to ſuffer my ſelf to be overcome by Benefits, and therefore I am reſolved at preſent to make you ſome amends for any thing that I ever fell ſhort in Before; and the Addition that I intend to my Former Bounty, ſhall be ſuch as will very much advance the Condition of your Life and Fortune for the Future.

Agrippa preſents Cæſar with a Splendid Treat.

Cæſar promiſes him a Large Requital.

Caius

Caius expected, upon This Frank and Unlimited Promiſe, that Agrippa ſhould preſently have begg'd Lands, Commiſſions, nay whole Provinces, and Ample Revenues; while Cæſar was in the Giving Mood. But Agrippa, on the other ſide, though prepar'd beforehand what to Ask, ſuſpended the Declaring of it a while, till it might fall-in afterward with the better Grace, as by the By. Sir, ſays he, as I had no Private Ends of my own, in the little Services I did you in the time of Tiberius; ſo I propoſe nothing more to my ſelf at preſent, then the Comfort of your Favour. You have done more for me already then I could reaſonably either Hope, or ſo much as Wiſh for; and though I very well underſtand that you have Greater Things yet in your Power; give me leave however to make This Profeſſion with Acknowledgments for what I have receiv'd, that I neither Deſerve, nor ſeek for any thing further. Caius was ſo amazed at the Modeſty, and the Moderation of the Man, that nothing would ſerve his turn at laſt, but Agrippa muſt ask him ſome Boon or other, and let it be what it would, it ſhould never be deny'd him. Well Sir, ſays Agrippa, ſince you are ſo Generous as to lay This kind Command upon me, I ſhall preſume to offer you one Requeſt; and it ſhall be neither Wealth, nor Honour; for by your Favour, ſays he, I have enough of both already: but the granting of That which I have to deſire will eſtabliſh you in the Favour both of God and Man; and it will be to my own Immortal Glory too, if I may but Obtain This Conceſſion, after ſo many others, to Crown all the reſt. My Deſire is only this, that you will recall your Order to Petronius for ſetting up your Statue in the Temple of the Jews. Agrippa knew well enough that This Propoſal was like the Chance of a Die, for Life or Death, as That was the Hazzard of croſſing any of Caius's Decrees; but yet however, betwixt the Obliging Influence of the Treat, and the Shame of refuſing a Requeſt that he himſelf had ſo Publiquely Extorted, together with a juſt Deference to the Virtue of a Man that ſet a Higher Value upon the Comfort of a Good Conſcience, and the Peace of his Country, then upon the Splendid Vanities of Wealth and Power; the Emperour granted him his Asking, and ſo wrote to Petronius; approving all he had done in drawing his Troups together, and Obſerving his Orders. And as for the Statue, ſays he, if it be ſet up already, let it ſtand; and if it be not, trouble your ſelf no further about it; but diſcharge your Army, and go back again to Syria. I am Content to Remit This Diſobedience for Agrippa's ſake, for whom I have ſo Great an Honour and Reſpect that I can deny him nothing. This was the Subſtance of the Emperour's Letter to Petronius, which was written before there was any Inkling of an Inſurrection intended among the Jews: But Caius, being a Man without either Honeſty, or Shame; and ſo Abandon'd to the Extravagant Liberties of a Furious Choler, that he accounted it a Mark of Dignity and Greatneſs to be Swaggering and Outrageous; This Man, I ſay, upon the Rumour of a Commotion among the Jews that follow'd ſoon after, brake out into ſuch a Paſſion to ſee his Authority ſo affronted by that Rebellious People, that he immediately chang'd his Stile, and wrote a Second Letter to Petronius to this Effect. Since you have thought fit to do more for the Jews Mony, then for my Commands, as appears by your Neglecting the One to Gratify the Other, be you your ſelf the Judge what you are to Expect now from my Indignation and Juſtice. I am reſolv'd to make an Example of you, both to the Preſent Age, and to Poſterity, to give the World to underſtand that Sovereign Power is not to be Play'd withal. This Letter was ſent to the Preſident while Cæſar was yet Alive, but not Delivered till afterwards; the Bearer of it having a ſlow Paſſage: So that the Death of Caius came firſt to Petronius, to whom God was infinitely Merciful and Gracious, in conſideration of the Zeal he ſhew'd, and the Dangers he underwent, for his Honour, and for the Religion of his People the Jews: But Caius, being cut-off in the Career of his Blaſphemous Vanity, for uſurping to himſelf Divine Honours, Petronius had the Thanks of the Romans, as well as of the Provinicials, for his Eminent Services to the Publique upon that Occaſion; and more eſpecially the Acknowledgments of the Prime Men of the Senate, whom Caius took a Pride as well as a Delight to Torment, and Trample upon, in a more Particular way of Inſolence and Scorn. He dy'd ſoon after that Denouncing Letter to Petronius: But as to the Ground of the Conſpiracy, and the Manner of Executing it, we ſhall ſet it forth in another Place. The News of the Emperour's Death to Petronius was follow'd with the Letter that brought him the Menace of his Own: and as he could not under Thoſe Circumſtances but rejoyce at the Former; ſo neither could he but Magnify and Admire the Goodneſs and Providence of God, that in the ſame Inſtant rewarded the Veneration he had paid to the Honour of his Holy Temple, and likewiſe deliver'd the Jews out of their Diſtreſs. By this wondeful Providence was the Life of Petronius preſerv'd.

The Jews of Meſopotamia and Babylon, Miſerable People.

THE Jews of Meſopotamia and Babylon were at This time in ſo Miſerable a State of Calamity and Confuſion, that we read of nothing like it in any of their Former Hiſtories: But This Story is not to be Written exactly (which I propound to do) without tracing it down in a Line from the Original. There is in the Province of Babylon, a City they call [a] Nearda, a Place wonderfully Populous, and the Soil Fruitful enough to maintain the Inhabitants. The Town is well Wall'd and Fortify'd, with the River Euphrates about it, and not far from it, Another Strong City call'd Niſibis, upon the ſame River. There was no Fear or Danger of any Enemy breaking in upon This Quarter: So that the Jews laid-up in theſe Two Places the Common Stock of their Holy Treaſure, as it was Dedicated and Brought-in from time time according to Cuſtom. From hence it was Tranſmitted to Jeruſalem in the Proper Seaſon, under ſtrong Convoys, for fear of the Parthians upon the Road, who were then Maſters of Babylon. There were among the Jews of Nearda, Two Brothers; Aſinæus, and Anilæus: Their Father was Dead, and their Mother had put them out to the Weaving Trade, of learning to make Sail-Cloth, which is accounted no Diſparagement among thoſe People where the Men are us'd to Card and Spin. Theſe Brothers coming one day late to Work, their Maſter gave them Correction for it, which they took ſo Heinouſly, that they preſently Arm'd themſelves with what came next in the Houſe, and ſo away to a Place upon the Parting of the River, where was great Plenty of Corn, Graſs, Fruit, and all manner of Proviſions for a Winter-ſtore. While they lay in this Retreat, there gather'd about them a Neceſſitous Crew of Bold Luſty Young Fellows, that Armed and Liſted themſelves under their Command; no Creature daring to Controul them. With the Aſſiſtance of this Party they Erected an Impregnable Fort, and then ſent out their Emiſſaries and Collectors up and down the Neighbourhood to raiſe Contributions: with Ample Aſſurances of Friendſhip and Protection to thoſe that comply'd, againſt all Oppoſers whatſoever, and Menacing both Man and Beaſt in caſe of a Refuſal: So that the People were under a kind of Neceſſity of doing whatever they would have them; being by This Time grown ſo Numerous, and Powerful, that they were not able to Reſiſt them: Inſomuch that the King of Parthia was ſtartled at This Commotion.

When he was advanced, by Defilees, and By-Ways, to the Skirts of a Mooriſh Piece of Ground, he made an Halt; and depending upon it, that the next Day, being the Sabbath, they would not venture a Battle, he moved gently forward; propounding to fall upon them at Unawares, and make ſure of a Victory. While Aſinæus was at this time Lazing upon a Bank with his Companions about him, and his Arms lying by: Heark ye, Fellow-Soldiers, ſays he, Methinks I hear the Neighing of Horſes: not ſuch a Neighing, as if they had a Mare in the Wind, but the Neighing of Horſes preſſing to a Battle. Nay I phancy I hear the Champing of their Bits too; and we had beſt have a Care we be not Circumvented: Wherefore for Certainty ſake, let ſome body go out This Inſtant for Diſcovery: and I wiſh I may find my ſelf miſtaken. Scouts were ſent out accordingly, and in a very little time came back again upon the Spur, with News that Aſinæus was in the Right, for the Enemy was at Hand; and upon the very Point of Executing their Revenge. They have Horſes enow, ſays the Scout, to Over-run and Trample us all under Foot: Beſide, ſays he, that we are but ſo many Naked Men, and forbidden by the very Laws of our Religion to Prophane the Sabbath with any ſort of Reſiſtance. But Aſinæus was quite of another Opinion, and told them it was an Unreaſonable thing for them to ſtand ſtill, and have their Throats Cut only to Gratify a Barbarous Enemy. No, my Lads, ſays he, Conſult your Courage, and the Sovereign Law of all Laws, your Preſent Neceſſity. Wherefore follow my Example, that at the Worſt we may not fall unreveng'd, and ſo let us commit the reſt to Providence. Upon This Exhortation and Incouragement he betook himſelf to his Arms, and led his Companions on to the Combat, where finding the Enemy Careleſs, and Secure, and in a Poſture, rather to take Poſſeſſion of a Victory, then to diſpute it, they took them Unprovided; made a Gleat Slaughter upon the Place, and put the reſt to Flight.

Aſinæus hears the Neighing of Horſes.

The Scouts give Notice of an Enemy at hand.

The Law of Neceſſity is a Diſpenſation to That of the Sabbath.

Aſinæus falls on, and gives the Enemy a Great Overthrow.

The Bravery of the Two Brothers gave the King of Parthia, upon the News of This Defeat, ſuch a Curioſity and Impatience to have an Interview, and to Exchange ſome Diſcourſe with them, that he ſent them one of his Guards that he moſt Confided in, with This Meſſage. I have a Commiſſion from Artabanus the King of Parthia to tell you, ſays he, that though you have been very Hard upon him in making this Inroad into his Dominions, he is yet ready to Bury all paſt Controverſies in the Eſteem he has for the Character he hath heard of your Perſons. And I am further to acquaint you in my Maſter's Name, that without any Fraud, or Indirect Meaning, he deſires to Joyn in a League of Friendſhip with you. And I am likewiſe to offer you upon his Faith and Honour, all Aſſurances that you your ſelves can deſire for your ſafe Paſſage, and Security, in your Journy back and forward. You will find the King a Munificent, and a Generous Prince, and ready upon all Occaſions to give you further Proofs of his Gracious Inclination and Bounty. Aſinæus was not over fond of the Journy, notwithſtanding the Frankneſs of the Invitation; but he ſent his Brother Anilæus however upon the Complement, with ſuch Preſents, as he was able to furniſh. Upon his coming to the King, he found his Acceſs Open and Eaſy; but Artabanus taking notice that he came alone, ask'd him what the Meaning of it was, that he did not bring his Brother along with him: So Anilæus gave the King to underſtand, that he was Safe in the Bog where he was, and not willing to truſt himſef any where elſe at Mercy. The King finding where the Buſineſs ſtuck, ſwore by his Gods, that not a Hair of Either of their Heads ſhould be Touch'd: And for a Ratification of his Oath, he gave Anilæus his Right-Hand upon it; which, with the Barbarians, is the moſt Sacred Tye of Good Faith that can be given: For after that Ceremony paſt, they are ſo far from any Apprehenſion of being Deceiv'd, that there's no room after it, even for Jealouſy it ſelf, or the very Suſpicion of Falſe Dealing. Artabanus, upon This Aſſurance, ſent Anilæus back again to bring his Brother; in Contemplation of the Services They Two might do him by keeping Thoſe Provinces in Awe, that were wavering toward a Revolt in the King's Abſence, by the Aſſiſtance of the Party they brought along with them. And he did not know neither, but that when he himſelf was Imploy'd in the Suppreſſing of a Rebellion on the One Hand, Aſinæus might be Fortifying himſelf with Men and Strong Forts, and doing Miſchief about Babylon on the Other. This was the Reaſon of the King's ſending for Aſinæus.

Artabanus Courts the Two Brothers to an Allyance.

Aſinæus ſends his Brother on the Errand.

Anilæus, on the King's Oath, fetches his Brother.

Now Aſinæus underſtanding by the Report of his Brother, how Great a Tenderneſs Artabanus had expreſs'd for them both, and with what Earneſtneſs of Oaths and Proteſtations he confirmed the Sincerity of all his Profeſſions, was eaſily prevail'd upon to wait upon the King with Anilæus, and ſo they went together. Artabanus received them with Great Eaſineſs and Good Will; but upon comparing the Dignity of Aſinæus's Mind with the Simple Appearance, and in truth the Diſagreeable Figure of his Perſon, he was not a little ſurpriz'd at the Diſproportion; and would be ſaying to ſome of his Friends, that the Soul of that Man was never made for his Body. He took Occaſion one day as he was at the Table to ſpeak of him to Abdagaſus, his General, of his Martial Performances, and Feats of Arms, very much, in fine, to his Advantage. Abdagaſus made no other Reply, but only to beg his Majeſty's Leave to Cut his Throat in Revenge for the Affront he had put upon the Parthians. No, ſays the King, I ſhall

The Two Brothers go to the King together.

Abdagaſus the General, asks Artabanus leave to cut Aſinæus's Throat.

The King Oppoſes it.

I ſhall never ſuffer ſuch a Thing as that certainly to a Man that has committed himſelf to my Honour, and whom I am bound both by Oath and Contract to Protect. But, ſays he, if you have ſuch a mind to exerciſe your Courage, you may find a way of Vindicating the Parthians without making me forſworn, You have no more to do, ſays he, then to attacque him in his Return without making me Privy to Your Purpoſe. The next Morning early the King call'd for Aſinæus again. It is Time Young Man, ſays he, for you to go home again, before the Animoſity of my Officers run too High, for you may have Miſchief done you, and not in my Power perhaps to Prevent it. Pray let me Commend Babylon to your Care, and do what you can to maintain Peace there, and preſerve the Province from Robberies. Once for all, You have committed your Life into my Hands, and your Safety ſhall be to me as that of my Own Heart: And ſo with thoſe Words, and a Competency of Honourable Preſents, the King diſpatch'd him away to take Charge of his Command, where he apply'd himſelf inſtantly to the Bus'neſs of his Commiſſion, in Building of Forts; Repairing and For ifying as he ſaw Occaſion; acquitting himſelf in fine to ſo Univerſal a Satisfaction, that never any Man before him arrived at ſuch a degree of Reputation and Power in ſo ſhort a Time, and from ſo ſlender a Beginning: And this, not only among the great Men of Babylon, but the Parthian Governours and Commanders had likewiſe the ſame Eſteem for him; his Authority all this while Encreaſing with the Strength of his Arms and Party: Inſomuch that Meſopotamia was as good as Entirely under his Direction.

Artabanus adviſes Aſinæus to be gone, and gives him the Command of Babylon.

Aſinæus departs, and betakes himſelf to the Buſineſs of his Commiſſion. The Brothers gain a General Eſteem.

Things went on in this Proſperous way with the Two Brothers, for a matter of Fifteen Years, highly to the Satisfaction of the World, and their Own Glory. But when they came once to Decline in their Piety and Manners, and Abandoning the Study of Virtue, and the Diſcipline and Precepts of their Forefathers, to give themſelves up to Senſual Pleaſures and Forreign Innovations; they ſunk then in their Credit too. As for Example. There happen'd to come into theſe Provinces a Certain Parthian Governour, and his Wife along with him: a Miracle of a Woman, as well for her Admirable Qualities as for the Charms of her Perſon and Beauty. This Woman (whether upon Fame, or upon Sight, uncertain) Anilæus fell deſperately in Love withal; and in the Impotency of his Paſſion, having no other way to compaſs his End, he made War upon her Husband; kill'd him upon the Firſt Encounter; got poſſeſſion of the Woman, and ſo took her to his Bed. This Adventure was the Source of the Terrible Calamities that befell them afterward. This Woman, whether ſhe was at Home or Abroad, had conſtantly about her certain Images of Barbarian Gods. She was now a Widow and a Priſoner, and having privately conceal'd ſome of theſe Idols, ſhe took her Opportunity of Worſhipping them for a while, only by Stealth. But upon Anilæus's taking her to himſelf, and owning her publiquely for his Wife, ſhe did as publiquely own the Exerciſe of her Religion too, without carrying the Bus'neſs any longer as a Secret. The Beſt Friends that the Two Brothers had, were moſt horridly Diſguſted at the Licence of this Abominable Practice in the Marrying of a Barbarous Woman, and an Idolatreſs, in ſo Audacious a Defyance of the Rites, Laws and Cuſtoms of the Jews. Let this ſerve for a Caution to Princes in time to come, how they depart from their Duty to God, to Gratify their Carnal Pleaſures. But there was no room left here for the Good Offices of Reaſon or wholeſome Councel; for one of the moſt Eminent Adviſers was Stabb'd to Death upon the Place, only for the Honeſt Liberty of Diſcharging his Conſcience; Breathing out his Laſt with this Prophetical Imprecation in his Mouth againſt the Brothers and their Complices. May a Vengeance fall upon them, ſays he, for the Indignities they have commited both againſt Religion and againſt Friendſhip; May their Enemies repay them with the ſame Meaſure they have meted to others: The Brethren, as the Capital Authors of this Violence; the Reſt, for Aſſiſting toward the Barbarous Murder of the Patron of their Laws, and Liberties, whom they ought to have defended. Not but that they were all extremely afflicted for the Death of this Good Man, but the Paſt Kindneſſes of the Brothers, and the Senſe they had of an Obligation to them for the Advantage of their Preſent Condition, atton'd for All. They kept however for a while within ſome Tolerable Bounds, till at laſt the Barefac'd and Impudent Profeſſion of Idolatry put the Affront paſt all Sufferance: Inſomuch that the People, upon that Scandal, came open-mouth in Crouds and Tumults to Aſinæus, with Complaints againſt his Brother; telling him plainly, that though it had been better let alone at firſt, yet ſince the Thing was done, he ſhould do well to take ſome ſevere Courſe in time to prevent further Miſchief: for it would certainly put all in a Flame elſe. The Marriage, they ſaid, was ſo Manifeſt an Uſurpation upon their Religion, that no Creature could approve it; and then for the Idolatrous Practice of this Lewd Woman, it was as Groſs an Encroachment upon the Worſhip of the True God. Aſinæus could not but own himſelf to be fully Convinc'd of the Dangerous Conſequences both to himſelf, and to his People, of this Wickedneſs of his Brothers;

Anilæus falls in love with a Parthian Lady.

He kills the Husband, and takes the Woman to his Bed.

He marries a Barbarian, and an Idolatreſs.

A Bitter Curſe.

But upon falling off from their Religion and Manners they loſe it again.

This Defection comes at laſt to a downright Profeſſion of Idolatry.

The People clamour at it to Aſinæus.

Brothers; but what with the Tenderneſs of ſo near a Relation in the Caſe, and what with an Allowance for Humane Frailty, in ſo Invincible an Affection, he palliated the Matter, without proceeding to any Exemplary Severity upon it. But finding himſelf day after day more and more Perſecuted and Clamour'd at, he was ſo Plain with his Brother, as to Check him for what was paſt, and to Caution him for the future; charging him without any more ado, to ſend the Woman home to her Friends again: But this wrought nothing upon him; for the Woman finding the Mutinous Humour of the People to Increaſe, and conſequently, fearing that ſome Miſchief might befall Anilæus for her ſake, ſhe poyſon'd Aſinæus, making no doubt of coming off well enough her ſelf, when a Doting Husband ſhould be her Judge.

Aſinæus chides his Brother, and bids him ſend his Wife back again.

The Woman Poyſons Aſinæus.

Anilæus, having now gotten the whole Power into his Own Hands, made an Incurſion with his Army into the Country of Mithridates, a Perſon of Prime Quality among the Parthians, and the Son-in-law of Artabanus. He found Mony, Slaves, and Cattle there in Abundance, beſide other Rich Booty that he carry'd away, to a Prodigious Value. Mithridates was not far off at that time, and hearing of this Inroad and Ravage, and how it was menaged, not only without any ſort of Provocation; but in a Contemptuous Freak of Inſolence and Scorn, he drew together a Body of his choiceſt Troups, and ſo march'd away with his Army to give Anilæus Battle. The next day, being the Jews Sabbath, which they moſt Religiouſly celebrate for a Day of Reſt, he ſtopt ſhort at a Village that Night, with an Intent to fall upon them by ſurprize on the Day following. A Syrian that liv'd there in the Neighbourhood, gave Anilæus Intelligence of the Deſign, and particularly where Mithridates was to be that Night, at a Solemn Entertainment. Anilæus, upon this Advice, order'd his People to go to Supper, marching afterward that Night up to the Enemy, to take them at Unawares: wherein he ſucceeded to his Wiſh, for about the Fourth Watch, he fell into their Quarters, and ſome he took aſleep; others in a Conſternation were put to ſhift for Themſelves in the Dark. Mithridates alſo was taken Alive, and a Priſoner, and mounted Naked upon an Aſs; which the Parthians look upon as an Ignominy, to the Higheſt Degree. When they had carry'd him thus into a certain Wood, ſeveral of Anilæus's Friends were for killing him out of hand; but he himſelf was againſt it, and gave his Reaſons for his Opinion. This Perſon, ſays he, is one of the Greateſt Men of the whole Country, and Match'd you ſee into the Royal Family. Give him his Life now you have him at Mercy, and you may depend upon it, that he will forgive all paſt Affronts, and never forget the Obligation: Beſide the Preſerving of an Intereſt, that in caſe of the Worſt, will be able to procure an Accommodation. And on the other hand, if you put Mithridates to Extremities, you may be ſure the King will never reſt till he has avenged his Bloud upon all the Jews in Babylon: And thoſe are a People whom we ought to be Tender of, both for Affinity's ſake, and in point of Common Prudence: for the Chance of War is Uncertain; and it is good, even in caſe of any Diſaſter, to make ſure of a Retreat. The whole Multitude, in fine, were of the ſame mind, Unanimouſly, with Anilæus: So that Mithridates, by conſent, was ſet at Liberty, and Diſcharg'd. But his Wife perceiving at his coming back, upon what Terms he was return'd, welcom'd him home with a Thouſand Reproaches. You, ſays ſhe, the Son-in-Law of a King! after ſo many Notorious Battles, and Diſgraces put upon you by the Jews, and now at laſt their Priſoner, to have ſo Mean a Soul as but to own a Life upon the Title of their Charity! Either reedeem your Honour, ſays ſhe, or by thoſe Powers I ſwear that Guard the Thrones of Kings, I'll have no more to do with you. Now ſo it was, that betwixt the Bitterneſs of theſe Daily Taunts, and the Apprehenſion that this High Spirited Woman would proceed to a Divorce, he put himſelf, how Unwillingly ſoever in the Head of an Army; but with this Conviction upon him, that the Parthian did not in truth deſerve to Live that would Truckle to a Jew. So ſoon as Anilæus heard that Mithridates was marching towards him, he made a Point of Honour of it, not to take Advantage of the Faſtneſſes he was poſſeſs'd of, but rather to put it to the Iſſue of a Battle in the Plain Field: So that Anilæus marched forward to meet the Enemy, in the Head of a Body of Men that ſcarce knew what it was to be Worſted; for over and above their Veterane Troups, they were joyn'd alſo by ſeveral Inforcements that fell in with them for the Booty: and upon the whole matter, they reckon'd the Day as good as their own, before ever they came to ſtrike a Stroke. In this Confidence, they travell'd a matter of Fourſcore Furlongs into a Dry Sandy Country; and when they were now ſo ſpent with the Drought of the Place, the Fatigue of the March, and the Heat of the Day, that they were hardly able to ſtand upon their Legs, Mithridates fell upon them with Freſh Men; put them to a Total Rout, and cut-off ſeveral Thouſands of them upon the Chace. Anilæus, with thoſe that got off making to a Forreſt there near hand, in the Greateſt Confuſion imaginable, and leaving Mithridates in the Happy Poſſeſſion of an Abſolute Victory. There came in to Anilæus, after this Defeat, ſuch Multitudes of Looſe Deſperado's, that his Army Anilæus makes an Inroad upon Mithridates, and carries off a vaſt Booty.

But puts it off till next day, being the Sabbath.

His Wife teizes him into a War.

Mithridates gives Anilæus a Total defeat.

Anilæus recruits, and falls into Babylon.

Army was not long a Recruiting up to it's Former Number; but they were Raw, Undiſciplin'd Men, and not Comparable for Valour to thoſe that fell. With theſe Men however he March'd into the Babylonians Quarters, and laid all Waſte. Hereupon, the Babylonians ſent to the Jews at Neerda to deliver up Anilæus to Juſtice; but This could not be obtained, for, in truth, the Man was not in their Power. The next Propoſal was to invite him to a Peace, or at leaſt to a Treaty, to try if they could Accommodate Matters upon Terms. This they agreed to, and ſent Commiſſioners on both ſides, Jews, as well as Babylonians, to menage the Debate. The Babylonians taking ſtrict Notice of the Place where Anilæus and her Companions were together, brake in upon them in the Dead of the Night by Surprize; and finding them Drunk and Drowſy, they kill'd all in their way without any Oppoſition, and Anilæus himſelf among the reſt.

The Jews and Babylonians treat about an Allyance.

Anilæus, and his People ſurpriz'd, and put to the Sword.

The Babylonians and the Jews were perpetually at Variance one with another of Old, upon the Subject of Differing Rites, Cuſtoms, and ways of Living; and ſome time One would get the Better of it, otherwhile the Other: So that the Controverſy ended commonly in a kind of drawn-Battle. But the Babylonians, that were kept in ſome ſort of Awe while Anilæus was yet Living, and his Complices about him, took Heart now upon This Riddance and Execution, to affront the Jews at every Turn, and made them Weary of their Lives: Inſomuch that they forced them by their Intolerable Inſolencies to quit their Habitations, and to withdraw themſelves to Seleucia the Capital City of that Province; and ſo called from Seleucus Nicanor the Founder of it, being a Place of Liberty, where Macedonians, Greeks and Syrians liv'd promiſcuouſly together in abundance. The Jews were Quiet and Eaſy enough here for the Firſt Five Years; but the Plague breaking out at Babylon in the Sixth, they were forced to withdraw more and more to Seleucia, which prov'd the Occaſion of the Greateſt Miſery they had felt yet, as ſhall be made appear in few Words. The Greeks and the Syrians in this City could never agree; but in all their Bickerings the Greeks had ſtill the Advantage, till upon the coming-in of the Jews, being a Bold and a Warlike People, the Syrians with their Aſſiſtance got the Upper-Hand. The Greeks finding themſelves run down, and their Condition wholly Deſperate, unleſs they could break This Amity betwixt the Syrians and the Jews; they dealt underhand with ſome Particular Friends and Acquaintances they had among the Syrians to think of ſome way of Accommodation, and how they might bring Matters to a better Underſtanding betwixt them. This Propoſition was well enough receiv'd, and the Conſideration of it referr'd to ſome Leading Men on both ſides to adviſe upon the Expedient: Who without much Difficulty put an End to the Controverſy, upon this Condition, that the Greeks and Syrians ſhould joyn in a League Offenſive and Defenſive againſt the Jews. In purſuance of This Agreement, they fell upon the Jews by Surprize, and kill'd them upward of Fifty Thouſand, not a Soul Scaping; but thoſe that were Sav'd and Protected by ſome Neighbour or Friend. The Miſerable Remainder withdrew to Cteſiphon, a Greek City near Seleucia, where the King of Parthia commonly keeps his Reſidence in the Winter, and the Greatet part of his Rich Furniture. In this Place they took-up their Abode, not doubting of their Security within the Verge of the King's Court and Palace; but the Jews were under ſuch a Terror from both Babylonians and Seleucians over and above the Conſpiracy of the Syrians againſt them, that the greater Part of them betook themſelves to Neerda and Niſibis, depending upon the Strength of the Places, and the Bravery of the Men that were to defend them. This was the State of the Jews Matters at that time in Babylon.

The Jews are forced into Seleucia.

Perpetual Bickerings betwixt the Greeks and the Syrians.

The Greeks and Syrians in a League againſt the Jews.

Upward of 50000 Jews kill'd by Surprize.

The Remainder withdraws to Cteſiphon; and thence to Neerda and Niſibis.

The Barbarous Outrages of Caius upon the Jews.

THE Barbarous and Inhumane Outrages of the Emperour Caius upon the Jews, were not Confin'd to Jeruſalem alone, and the Neighbouring Provinces, but moſt induſtriouſly Propagated over Sea and Land, from one End of the Roman Empire to the Other; and with ſuch deliberate Cruelties as were never heard of in Story before. Neither did any Place ſuffer more under his Savage Brutalities then Rome it ſelf; the Senators and Patricians, Eſpecially; and the reſt of the Nobility: Thoſe alſo that they call'd the Equites, or Knights; a Degree of Men for Wealth and Dignity next under the Senators; the Senators Themſelves being likewiſe choſen out of that Order. What Delight did he take to Torment thoſe People with all Manner of Indignities, Contumelies, Baniſhments, Murders, Confiſcations! making it Death to have any thing to loſe. He took upon himſelf the Majeſty and Appellation of a God; and nothing leſs would ſerve him from his Subjects then Divine Adoration. He had the Confidence, in the Capitol it ſelf, which is the moſt Celebrated of all the Temples in Rome, in reſpect of the Dedication of it, to ſalute Jupiter by the Name of Brother, and he was as Vain and Mad to a Thouſand other Purpoſes. He had a Deſign once to paſs from Puteoli, a City of Campania to Miſenum, a Sea-Town on the other ſide of the Water, and looking upon it as a Derogation to his Dignity to croſs it in a Gally, he laid a Bridge over from one Promontory to the other, and ſo Paſs'd and Repaſs'd in his Chariot, Triumphing that he had Subjected the Sea as well as the Land, in a Way becoming the Greatneſs of his Divinity.

His Extravagant Pride and Vanity; challenging Adoration and the Majeſty of a God.

He calls himſelf Jupiter's Brother.

He lays a Bridge from Puteoli to Miſenum.

There was not ſo much as One Temple in Greece, that he did not Rifle of all the Curious Paintings, Sculptures, and other Precious Donatives and Dedications; with Orders for the Tranſporting of the Spoil to his Palaces, Gardens, and Houſes of Pleaſure: For where, ſays he, ſhould the Choiceſt Rarities in the World be depoſited, but in the moſt Glorious City or Cabinet in the Univerſe? Nay he had the Confidence to ſend to Memmius Regulus for the Statue of the Olympian Jupiter, to have it brought to Rome: That Admirable Piece of Phidias, the Famous Athenian Statuary, and ſo called from the Place in Greece, where it is ſo much Adored. But this was not yet done; for the Great Maſters told Memmius Regulus, to whom the Care of doing it was committed, that it was Impoſſible to move the Image out of the Place without Spoiling it; and there goes a Tradition too, that while Memmius had it under Conſideration, he was Frighted from the doing of it by an Incredible Prodigy or Viſion; and that this made him delay it, as he gave Caius to underſtand in a Letter by way of Excuſe: but that Excuſe would have coſt him his Head, if the Death of the Emperour Himſelf had not prevented it.

He Orders Memmius Regulus to ſend the Olympian Jupiter's Statue to Rome.

He was puff'd up, in fine, to that Degree of a beſotted Madneſs, that upon the Birth of a Daughter, he had the Child carry'd into the Capitol, and placed upon the Knee of Jupiter, as if Jupiter and Caius had been Partners in the Girl; and expoſing himſelf to the Company to Judge, which was the more Honourable Father of the Two.

His Girl is ſet upon Jupiter's Knee in the Capitol.

Theſe Extravagant, Nonſenſical Freaks were ſo Rank and Groſs, that all People ſaw thorough them, and yet how tamely they ſubmitted to them! He did not only give Slaves leave, but Encouragement, to Accuſe their Maſters, of what Crimes they thought fit; and which is yet Worſe, they had both his Authority, and his Thanks for ſo doing. As Claudius was charged with a Capital Crime by his Bondman Pollux, and Caius upon the Bench to Countenance the Accuſation, againſt the Life of his own Uncle: Nay and with a Reſolution to have taken it away too, if he could have carry'd it.

His Uncle Claudius accuſed by his Bondman, and Caius upon the Bench to Encourage it.

By this Licence that he gave to Calumniators, Sycophants, and Informers, in the Advancing of Slaves above their Patrons, he did but provoke the ſame Practices againſt Himſelf that he countenanc'd againſt Others. For People fell to Plotting againſt him on all Hands; ſome to be Reveng'd for Injuries Receiv'd; Others by way of Precaution to prevent Miſchiefs to come. For there was no longer any ſuch thing left as Law, or Juſtice. Corruption and Power carry'd all before it; and it was come to that Critical Point, in fine, that either Caius muſt ſink, or the Commonwealth: The Jews Eſpecially; who, by the Seaſonable Death of this Man, were moſt Miraculouſly reſcu'd from the very Jaws of Ruine. It will be Matter of Uſe now, and Edification, as well as of Curioſity, to be very Particular in this part of my Story; for over and above the Concurrence of ſo many Wonderful Providences in the Diſpoſition of Things, it will ſerve for an Inſtructive Conſolation to Good Men, never to Deſpair in what Extremity ſoever, of God's Infinite Power and Mercy: and ſo likewiſe for a Leſſon of Caution to the Great ones of this World, not to Build their Hopes upon Falſe Foundations, or ſet their Hearts upon Tranſitory Enjoyments, that lead only to Miſery, and Diſappointment in the End; but on the contrary, to contain themſelves within the Bounds of Modeſty and Virtue.

There were Three Famous Conſpiracies a-foot againſt the Life of this Beaſtly Man, and every One of them had a Perſon of Eminent Note in the Head of it. Æmilius Regulus, a Spaniard of Corduba, commanded one Party, and he had a Troup of Reſolute Fellows about him to aſſiſt in the Enterprize. Caſſius Chæreas, the Tribunes had another Detachment; and ſo [a] Annius Minucianus had another Gang; and they were all Reſolutely bent upon the Deſtruction of this Tyrant; for they all lookt upon Caius, as a moſt Abominable Monſter. Regulus hated him, purely out of a Natural Averſion to all Manner of Iniquity; being a Perſon naturally Generous, and one that had the Soul of a Man of Honour. Minucianus was his Enemy, partly in Revenge for the Death of Lepidus his Singular Friend, and a Citizen of a moſt Unſpotted Reputation, whom Caius moſt barbarouſly put to Death: and he was partly inſtigated to this Practice, for fear Caius ſhould begin with him Firſt; for he knew This Tyrant's Hatred to be mortal, wherever it fell. It ſtuck in the Stomach of Chæreas to find himſelf Twitted by Caius for his Effeminacy, and Unmanlineſs, upon ſeveral Occaſions: Beſide the Perpetual Danger his Life was in, by the Relation he had to the Service of a Violent Furious Maſter, ſo near his Perſon: So that laying Things together, he was in a Manner forc'd to do what he did in his Own Defence. But after all theſe Particular Grudges, they agreed all Three in This One Common End of Delivering their Country, and the World, from the Outrages of ſo Bloudy a Tyrant; for they reckon'd upon it, that the Succeſs of This Deſign would be the Saving of the Publique: and that it was but the Duty of a Loyal Patriot to lay down his Life for his Country.

Three Conſpiracies againſt the Life of Caius Æmilius Regulus, Caſſius Chæreas, and Annius Minucianus.

But

But none ſo Hot upon the Exploit as Chæreas, partly out of the Ambition of Acquiring to himſelf a Great Name, and partly out of the Advantage he had above Others (being Tribune) of Executing his Purpoſe by a Freedom of Acceſs to his Maſter's Perſon. They were now in the Solemnity of their Circus-Games, and Exerciſes; an Entertainment that the People of Rome are Wonderfully delighted with. Now it having been formerly the Cuſtom, for the Multitude to come thronging into the Place, and to Petition the Emperour, at Liberty, for what they thought fit, and hardly ever receiving a Denyal, they came now Open-Mouth, in Crouds, praying to be Eas'd of their Tributes and Taxes. Caius was ſo Enraged, both at the Requeſt, and at the Clamour, that he commanded his Guards immediately to ſeize the People that made the Outcry, and put them to death; and This Order coſt many a Man his Life. The People patiently ſuffer'd all This, and made no more Noiſe; taking it for a Warning not to Venture their Lives to ſave their Mony, ſeeing how many had ſuffer'd for it already. Theſe Horrible Barbarities animated Chæreas more and more, to Haſten the Attempt, and ſo put an End to the Bloudy Rage of This Brute of a Man. Chæreas had it many times in his Thought to Diſpatch him at the Table; but ſtill put it off from time to time, not upon any Change of Mind, but only to wait for an Opportunity of ſtriking ſure, without any Danger of a Miſcarriage. He had been Captain of the Guards along time already, and being now in Commiſſion for the Collecting and Receiving of Monies about the Revenue, he fell under Cæſar's Diſpleaſure for not being ſo quick upon thoſe that were in Arrear, (how Poor and Inſolvent ſoever) as Caius would have had him, who caſt it in his Teeth, that he was a Pitiful Fellow, and had not the Courage to Inforce the Payment it. And this was not all neither, for when he came at any time to him for the Word, he would ſtill be giving him ſome Word or Other, that skew'd upon him for a Woman-Hearted Cowardly Creature, though Caius at the ſame time made no Difficulty himſelf to Dreſs, Curle, Powder, and in one Word, to play a Woman's part in all the Formalities of a Diſguiſe.

Caius reproches Chæreas with Cowardiſe;

This Enraged Chæreas the more, to ſee himſelf made Ridiculous to the reſt of the Officers; for he never brought them the Word from Cæſar, but it ſet them a Laughing; and they expected ſome ſuch thing they ſaid beforehand. This was ſo Unpardonable a Provocation, and ſo Juſt an Incitement to a Revenge, that Chæreas could not any longer forbear the taking of ſome Friends and Confidents into the Secret; and Popedius for one, a Member of the Bench of Senators; One that had Gradually gone thorough all his Degrees of Honour: And as to the reſt, a Diſciple of Epicurus, and a Lover of his Eaſe. This Popedius had been accuſed of Scandalous and Dangerous Words againſt Caius. His Accuſer was his Profeſs'd Enemy, Timidius; and the Accuſation founded upon the Pretended Teſtimony of Quintilia, a very Beautiful Perſon of a Woman, and a Comedian: This Quintilia being generally belov'd, had the Fortune to be highly in the Good Graces alſo of Popedius, among the reſt. The Charge being a Contrivance, and Quintilia refuſing to take away the Life of her Lover by a Falſe Evidence, Timidius call'd out to have her put to the Torture, and Caius at next Word commanded Chæreas to ſee it done immediately; making Choice of him the rather for thoſe Butcherly Services, in Hope that it might Inſtigate him to a more Unmerciful Cruelty, to ſhew that he was not ſo Hen-Hearted a Wretch as he was taken to be. As they were carrying out Quintilia to the Torment, ſhe ſet her Foot upon the Toe of one of the Conſpirators in her Paſſage, giving him to underſtand by that Hint, that he was ſafe, and that She would confeſs Nothing. It was much againſt the Inclination of Chæreas to Execute that Office, but lying under ſuch a Neceſſity, he was forc'd to Torment her with Great Severity. But finding that ſhe ſtood it out, he Conducted her to the Preſence of Cæſar miſerably Torn and Diſfigur'd: even to ſuch a Degree, that the Emperour himſelf had a Compaſſion for her, and Diſcharg'd Popedius upon it; Preſenting the Woman alſo with a conſiderable Sum of Mony to Comfort her in ſome Meaſure for the Calamity ſhe had ſo Reſolutely, and ſo Happily undergone.

who Meditates a Revenge, and tells Popedius of it.

Popedius accuſed by Timidius, upon the Evidence of Quintilia.

Quintilia put to the Torture, and Chæreas to Execute it.

She ſtands it out, and Popedius is acquitted.

This Tenderneſs of Caius was yet a Further Aggravation to the Affliction of Chæreas, to think of the Scandal it had brought upon Him, in being the Inſtrument of ſo Mercyleſs a Cruelty as the Emperor Himſelf relented at. When Things were come to this Point, Chæreas could hold no longer, but brake his Mind to Clemens, and Papinius; the Latter of them a Tribune as well as Himſelf, and the Other a Captain of the City-Troups. Clemens, ſays he, it is well known that You and I were never wanting in our Duty to the Emperour; and that it has been our Care and Buſ'neſs, to Diſcover, and to Defeat ſeveral Conſpirators againſt him. Some we have put to death; Others to Tortures, till he himſelf hath pity'd them: But are theſe Commiſſions for Soldiers, and Men of Honour, or for Butchers? Clemens reply'd not one Word, but betray'd in his Countenance the Confuſion of his Soul, for miniſtring in ſo Infamous a Drudgery, contrary to his Conſci-ence, though without daring ſo much as to Open his Mouth in One Syllable againſt Cæſar. Chæreas however took a little Heart upon this breaking of the Ice, and followʼd his Diſcourſe, I ſhall not need, ſays he, to run thorough the Hiſtory of the Miſeries, either of the City, or of the Empire. They are too Notorious to be Conceal'd, and Common Fame makes Caius to be the Author of them; but if a Body may ſpeak the Truth of the Matter, I my ſelf am effectually the Cauſe of all this Miſchief; and Papinius here, and You, Clement, before us Both. We are the Men that have brought this Ruine upon Rome, and upon Mankind, in the Execution of other Peoples Orders. And then when we might put an End to theſe Outrages, both upon the Citizens, and upon the reſt of the Subjects, if we had but a Hearty Mind to it, we Proſtitute our ſelves to the Meaneſt of Servile Officers, fitter for Hangmen, then Sword-men. And we do not ſtand up neither for the Roman Empire, or Liberty; but in the Defence of Thoſe that bring us both Bodies and Souls into Slavery. And what's our Bus'neſs, but to do the Journy-work of a Tyrant, in Committing Bloudy Murders, and Inflicting Execrable Torments upon Others, till ſome body elſe ſhall take the Office out of our Hands, and do as much for Us! For This Abject Reſignation of our ſelves, is look'd upon as an Act, not of Kindneſs, but of Fear and Force, and conſequently renders us rather ſuſpected then Beloved. He is ſo wonted to Humane Bloud, that he never conſults the Reaſon of Things, but acts according to the Extravagance of his Preſent Humour, and the Crime is the Leaſt part of the Queſtion. We are all to be deſtroy'd one after another, and our Own Turn will probably be next, if we do not provide in time for the Securing both of our Own Lives, and the Common Liberty.

A Generous and a Bold Diſcourſe of Chæreas.

Clemens, though he could not but approve of the Opinion and Reſolution of Chæreas, charm'd him yet to Secrecy; for the leaſt Word of the Plot, before it came to Execution, would be the Death of Every Man concern'd in't. But, ſays he, Time and Patience bring forth Opportunities. As for my Own part, my Scuffling Days are over, and the ſafeſt Counſels are Beſt; but Honeſter I am ſure you can never take. Clemens with Theſe Words went his Way Home, turning every thing over in his own Thoughts that he had both Heard, and Said.

Chæreas ſuſpects Clemens, and poſts away to Sabinus.

This Coldneſs of Clemens made Chæreas begin to ſuſpect that he was not in ſafe Hands, and ſo he Poſted away preſently to Cornelius Sabinus, his Brother-Tribune, whom he knew to be a Man of Value; an Aſſertor of his Country's Liberty, and as much unſatisfy'd as any Man with the Preſent State of Things. He made no doubt, either of his Integrity, or of his Judgment in the Caſe, and ſo Reſolv'd to Conſult him upon the whole Affair. He had ſome Jealouſy, as I told you, of Clemens, and therefore preſs'd the Bus'neſs to a Diſpatch, without any more Delay. When he found that Sabinus and himſelf were both of a Mind, as to the Main, ſaving only that he kept the Secret to himſelf, there was no need, he ſaid, of Deliberating what to do with a Man that was come to a Reſolution upon the Matter beforehand: Inſomuch that Sabinus promis'd him, not only Good Faith, and Privacy, but his Helping-Hand too, which more and more Confirmed Chæreas in his Purpoſe.

Sabinus promiſes to ſtand by him.

Chæreas and Sabinus confer with Minucianus.

They were both of Opinion for puſhing it immediately to an Iſſue, and ſo went to Minucianus together, a Man of their Own Make and Temper, both for Greatneſs of Mind, and a Severe Love and Reverence for Virtue. Caius had alſo a Jealouſy of him upon Account of the Death of Lepidus, his moſt Intimate Friend: beſide the Hatred he bare him, as a Perſon of Honour, and Quality, which was a Quarrel he had in Common to all Men of that Character. They did effectually know one another's Minds beforehand, by ſeveral Words they let fall that lookt askew upon the Government, though they did not think fit to make Proclamation of their Diſguſt at the preſent Menage of Affairs: But ſo it was, in fine, that they underſtood, and Lov'd one another, by a kind of Inſtinct, for the ſake of the ſame Inclination and Cauſe. Now ſuch was the Reſpect that Chæreas and Sabinus had for the Eminent Dignity, Virtue and Merit of Minucianus, that as they formerly paid him all Deference upon Other Occaſions, ſo they deſir'd him upon this Meeting alſo, to break the Ice, and open them the way into their Bus'neſs. Well then, ſays Minucianus to Chæreas, what was the Word the Emperour gave you to day? (for it was in every Body's Mouth, how Caius would ſtill be making Sport with Chæreas upon that Occaſion.) Chæreas laid hold of the Hint: and ſpeaking with all Liberty, having the Honour of Minucianus for his Security: Whatever the Emperour's Word was, ſays he, let Yours be LIBERTY; and I give you a Thouſand Thanks for putting it into my Head to attempt to do the Thing I had ſo great a Mind to do. It is Encouragement Sufficient to me, to find that you and I agree in the ſame Thought, and that we did ſo even before we met. This Single Sword of Mine, ſays he, will ſerve us Both; wherefore let us about our Bus'neſs, and be you pleaſed only with your Prudence and Courage to Lead the Way; with This Aſſurance, that whatever you Command me ſhall be moſt Heartily and Readily obey'd. A Brave Soul never wants Arms, but it ſelf rather ſupplys them; for 'tis not the Weapon, but the Hand, and the Will, that does does the Execution. All time is loſt methinks till we are in Action; and for the Event, whether I ſtand or fall in the Attempt, the Care is taken. For I have ſomewhat elſe to think of, and to do, then to ſtand Calculating and Computing upon my Particular Safety or Fortune, when the Laws of my Country, and the Lives and Liberties of ſo many Worthy Men are in Danger to be ſwallow'd up by this Mercyleſs Tyrant. And I hope you will not Envy Chæreas the Honour of a Part at leaſt, if not That of ſtriking the Blow it ſelf, in an Exploit that has the Warrant of your Approbation. Upon this Frank and Generous Declaration, Minucianus took him into his Arms; bidding him go on, and Proſper, and ſo wirh an Interchange of mutual Aſſurances, they Embrac'd, and Parted. They agree; Embrace, and Part.

We have a Story of a Wonderful Paſſage in Confirmation of the Conſpirators in their Deſign. There was a Voice heard among the People, they ſay, as Chæreas was Entring into the Palace, calling out to him to go-on in God's Name with what he had Undertaken. It gave Chæreas a Jealouſy at firſt, that he was Betray'd, but he found it afterward to be either an Animating Hint from ſome of the Complices, or elſe a Providential Declaration from Heaven in Favour of his Purpoſe. A Voice heard, bidding them go on in God's Name.

There was at this time gather'd together ſome of all ſorts that were Well-Willers to the Deſign; as Senators, Knights, Soldiers, and in Truth who not; for all Mortals were agreed in this, that either Caius muſt Periſh, or the Commonwealth: So that every Man wrought for himſelf in a kind of Competition who ſhould do moſt, either by Word or by Deed, toward the ſaving of his Country; or, which was all One, toward the Deſtruction of Caius: Nay Calliſtus himſelf, Caius's Freeman and Favourite, made one of the Party. This Man had a Mighty Power with the Emperour, which he abuſed to ſuch a Degree, that all People equally Hated and Dreaded him; for he behaved himſelf liker a Partner of the Government, then a Subject. He was grown vaſtly Rich, upon Corruption, and Bribes; but with all This, he could not think himſelf ſafe under that Prince, for he knew him to be Fickle and Implacable; and when he had any Miſchief in his Head, never to be Mov'd. He was in Danger upon many Accounts, but moſt of all for his Wealth, which in thoſe days was a Temptation hardly to be Reſiſted. This Calliſtus finding Caius ſo Slippery and Uncertain, thought he could not do better then make a Friend in time of the Next Succeſſor, and in that Proſpect to Ingratiate himſelf with Claudius: So that over he went privately into that Intereſt; telling him in Confidence, how Caius had been, ſeveral times putting him upon it to Poyſon him; but that he ſtill found out ſome Device or Other to ſhift it off. Now for my Own part, I ſhould rather take This for an Invention of Calliſtus's to curry Favour with his New Patron, then any Real Matter of Truth and Fact: for if Caius had had a Mind to Murder his Uncle, Calliſtus's Excuſe would never have brought him off; and Calliſtus himſelf ſhould never have ſcap'd neither for being ſo Remiſs and Dilatory in the Diſcharge of his Duty; but Claudius look'd upon him however as the Inſtrument of Providence for his Deliverance, and very Thankful to him he was for juſt Nothing at all.

The Confederates, all this while, were ſo Slow and Heavy, that the Main Execution was ſtill put off from Day to Day, though much againſt the Will of Chæreas; for he was of Opinion that no Opportunity was to be loſt for the doing of a Thing ſo Neceſſary to be done. He would not have wiſh'd a Better Time or Place, he ſaid, then the Capitol it ſelf, when he was Sacrificing for his Daughter: or to have Pitch'd him Headlong from the Battlements of his Palace at any time, when he was Scattering his Donatives among the People: Or he might as well have been taken off he thought, upon any Solemnity, at his own Private Ceremonies. For Caius was Secure and Careleſs to Admiration, when at the ſame time, his Domeſtiques, and the People about him were almoſt all Traytors in their Hearts. Chæreas was ſo Impatient of theſe Delays for fear of Slipping his time, and loſing all at laſt, that he Upbraided the Confederates by way of Reproach; telling them that if they made any Difficulty of going thorough with the Work, upon a Superſtitious Opinion that there was any thing Sacred in the Perſon of Caius, he would take the Diſpach of it upon himſelf in his Own Single Perſon, and be Anſwerable for the Doing of it even without a Weapon. His Aſſociates could not but highly approve of his Zeal for the Common Cauſe, but they were yet for putting it off a little longer, till the Celebration of the Games that were Inſtituted in Honour of Auguſtus: He that firſt took the Sovereign Power from the People into his Own Hands. There was a Theatre Erected before the Palace, for the Roman Nobility, with their Wives and Children, in the preſence of the Emperour Himſelf. Upon this Occaſion, there would be ſo many Thouſands of People Crouded into ſo Narrow a Compaſs, that the Thing might be Done, they thought, with all the eaſe in the World, and the Guards not get in time enough to the Reſcue, though they had never ſo much a Mind to't; Whereas upon an Attempt at a Venture, there would be the Riſque of a Miſcarriage; the City in an Uproar upon it, and betwixt Searches and Soldiers, the whole whole Party ſeiz'd and cut-off, and the Contrivance finally Diſappointed. Chæreas agreed to the Matter; ſo that a Reſolution was taken to do the Deed on the Firſt Day of the Publique Shews: but Fortune over-rul'd in the Caſe, and put it off to the Third, which was the Laſt Day of the Spectacles. And they would have had much ado to get over it then too, if Chæreas had not call'd his Companions together, and put New Mettle into them, with an inflaming Speech to this Purpoſe. We are here met together (ſays he) in a Righteous Cauſe, and upon a very Honeſt and an Honourable Occaſion; but betwixt Cowardiſe and Lazyneſs, to our ſhame be it ſpoken, without Advancing one Step in our Bus'neſs. Here's a Great deal of time loſt, and that's not All neither, but our Country, our Lives, Liberties, and Fortunes are all in danger to be Betray'd and Ruin'd, beyond all Recovery by this Delay, and all to ſet up Caius more Triumphant then ever: and What's the Fruit now of this Faint-Heartedneſs, but Loſs of Liberty, and Encreaſe of Tyranny? whereas we ſhould attend our Own Security in the Firſt Place, the Welfare of the Publique in the Next, and Immortal Glory to our ſelves in the Concluſion. After this Diſcourſe, he gave them ſome time to Conſider upon it; but there did they ſtand as if they were Mope'd, without one Word ſpeaking, either of Contradiction, or Reply. So that to Rowze them up once again. Hark ye, My Maſters, ſays he, What do you mean by theſe Heſitations and Put-off's, one after another thus? Do you not know that this Meeting is upon the very point of Breaking-up, and that Caius is going for Alexandria to take the Tower of Ægypt ſo ſoon as it is over? Would it not be to our Eternal Honour do you think, to part with this Scandal of Mankind out of our Hands, as if we had ſent him all over the World to make Publication what Slaves the Romans are, and to have ſome Free-Spirited Ægyptian do that Right to Mankind upon this Bloudy Oppreſſor, that we were afraid to do our Selves? Come, come, my Friends, 'tis paſt Deliberation-time of Day, and I'll expect no longer, but do the part of a Man, and put it to an Immediate Iſſue; for I will not allow any Fleſh living to Diſpute with me the Glory of ſubduing this Monſter.

The Day for the Execution, off and on.

Chæreas animates his Companions.

A Final Reſolution.

These Words ſet them all on Fire to have the Deed done immediately, and Chæreas himſelf in the ſame Heat, put on his Sword and went to Court, as the Tribunes uſually do in the like Caſes, it being his turn that Day in courſe, as Captain of the Guard, to go to the Emperour for the Word. The People were now preſſing in mighty Multitudes toward the Palace, Crouding, Thruſting, and Juſtling one another to get Places; and Caius himſelf not a little pleas'd with the ſight of this Scuffle and Confuſion, for here were no Seats or Benches kept apart for Senators, Knights, or other degrees of People, according to their Qualities; but Men and Women, Maſters and Slaves ſat all promiſcuouſly together, and firſt come firſt ſerved. This Solemnity being Dedicated to the Honour of Auguſtus, Caius went now, and offer'd-up a Sacrifice to the Imperial Patron: and it ſo happen'd, that upon, the Fall of the Victim, ſome of the Bloud ſpringing out, dropt upon the Robe of Aſprenas, one of the Senators. Caius made himſelf merry with the Omen, but others were Troubled at it; and it was his Lot, purſuant to that Foreboding, to be ſlain in the Following Tumult. It was much taken notice of, and wonder'd at, that Caius was in better Humour this day then Ordinary. So ſoon as the Sacrifice was over, he took his Friends about him, and went to the Theatre, which was only a Frame of Wood-work to be taken to pieces and put together again as it was every Year upon this Occaſion. It had Two Gates to it; one toward the Open Court, and the other over againſt the Paſſage, for the Actors to go in and out by, without troubling the Spectators: and near at hand there was a kind of Box, or Partition, for the Players and the Muſique. When the Multitude had now taken their Places, and Chæreas with the reſt of the Tribunes, not far from Cæſar, who ſat upon the Right Wing of the Theatre; Bathybius a Senator and a Military Man, asked Cluvitus ſoftly in his Ear, a Man of Conſular Dignity that ſat next him, if he had heard any News or not; he told him, none at all. Why then, ſays the other, I am to tell you that the Tragedy of the Tyrant is to be Plaid to Day. Cluvitus bad him in a Verſe out of Homer, Have a care that none of the Græcians over-heard him. They came then to the Frolique of Throwing Apples, Birds, and other Vulgar Curioſities down to the People for them to Scratch and Scramble; which Cæſar was much delighted with. And after This there follow'd Two Circumſtances that had the Countenance of an Uulucky Preſage; the one was the Repreſentation of a Lewd, and a Corrupt Judge brought to Publique Juſtice; and the other was the Tragedy of Cynira, wherein ſhe her ſelf and her Daughter [a] Myrrha were both Kill'd, and a great deal of Bloud Spilt for the Decorum of the Action, both about the Gibbet and about Cynira: And this, they ſay, was upon the Anniverſary to the Day whereupon Philip the Son of Amintas, King of Macedonia, was Kill'd by his Friend Pauſanias upon Entring the Theatre.

Chæreas goes to Cæſar for the Word.

Caius Sacrifices, and then goes to the Theatre.

A Deſcription of the Theatre.

Now this being the Laſt Day of the Spectacle, Caius was in ſome diſpute within himſelf whether he ſhould ſtay it out while he was there, or go-off for a While to [a] See Sam. Petiti Leges Atticæ, p. 248.

Waſh

Waſh and Eat, and ſo come back again. Minucianus taking his Place near Caius, and ſeeing Chæreas go forth, roſe from his Seat to Incourage him in his Reſolution for fear of loſing the Preſent Opportunity; but Caius taking him gently by the Skirt, asked him in a Friendly Way, Whither is this Good Man a going? So Minucianus ſat him down again, but a while after roſe once more under the Former Apprehenſion, and Caius let him go, not knowing what Neceſſary Bus'neſs it might be that call'd him aſide. Aſprenas, upon this, being all along Privy, and Aſſiſting to the Plot, propoſed it to Cæſar to go out, and Waſh, and Eat, and Refreſh himſelf, as he was uſed to do, and afterward to Return.

The Conſpirators Poſted.

Chæreas, having by this Time Poſted the Conſpirators in their Proper Stations, and given them their Neceſſary Inſtructions, was ſo Impatient of any longer Delay, being already paſt Three in the Afternoon, that he was for going back to the Theatre again, and Aſſaulting Cæſar as he ſat, though he knew very well that it muſt of Neceſſity coſt the Lives of a Great many Knights and Senators to go thorough with it: But he reckon'd upon the Deliverance of the Publique to be a Benefit infinitely more Valuable then the Loſs of ſo many Particular Men's Lives. As Chæreas was Marching toward the Theatre, the Word was given in the Croud that Cæſar was up, and Returning to his Palace. The Conſpirators call'd out to make the Emperour Way, as if it had been by Order and Direction; but in truth to get themſelves more Elbow-Room for the Execution of the Enterprize. Claudius, the Uncle went firſt, and then Marcus Minucianus, the Husband of his Siſter, and Valerius Aſiaticus; Perſons, whoſe Quality gave them a Privilege of Precedency without any Interruption: Caius himſelf with Paulus Aruntius following them. When he came at laſt to Enter the Palace, he left the Ordinary way, which Claudius and the reſt had taken before him, and where his Officers and Servants attended to receive him, and ſo turn'd off into a By-Way leading to the Baths to ſee ſome Boys there that were ſent him out of Aſia for their Skill in the Singing and Compoſing of Holy Hymns, and in the Pyrrhique way of Dancing. In This Narrow Paſſage, Chæreas came-up to Caius for the Word; which was ſo Foul and Beaſtly, (at the Old rate) that the Tribune return'd the Indignity with Language in his Own way; and upon That, a Terrible Cut with his Sword, but the Wound yet not Mortal: Some will have it to be done on purpoſe to make his Death the more Miſerable, and Tormenting, by the Repetition of the Blows; but this ſeems to me very Unlikely, for this was not an Action to be drawn out at length: Or if Chæreas had any ſuch thing in his Thought, or Intention, he muſt have been the Greateſt Fool certainly in Nature, to prefer the gratifying of a Wild, and an Intemperate Paſſion, by ſo Dangerous a Delay, when he might have Secur'd both Himſelf, and his Complices, by the Diſpatch; for ſo long as Caius had Life in him, ſo long had his Guards and his Friends time to conſider of Succouring him: So that he Endanger'd himſelf and his Companions more then Caius, by neglecting the Means of Withdrawing both Himſelf and Them out of the reach of Revenge. So that the Loſs of Time would in all probability be the Loſs of Himſelf. But This is a Caſe wherein all People are at Liberty to Think their Pleaſure. The Wound, in ſhort, was betwixt the Neck and the Shoulder, where it Chopt upon a Bone that ſtopt it from going further. He made no Outcry upon the Receiving of it, nor call'd to any of his Friends for Help; either out of Pride of Stomach, or that he knew not whom to Truſt. He gave a Groan however, and made an Attempt to get away, but Cornelius Sabinus prevented it by a Blow that brought him to his Knees: And that being follow'd by an Unanimous Outcry of [Down with him, Diſpatch him,] they cut him to Pieces. It was Aquila, they ſay, that gave him his Death's Wound; but all People aſcrib'd the Glory of the Action to Chæreas. He had his Aſſociates, 'tis true; but the Propoſal of it was Originally His; and ſo was the Contrivance, and the Manner of bringing it about. He was the Firſt, that had the Heart to Adviſe and Communicate upon it, and that by his Great Wiſdom and Reſolution, when he found how it took, Formed and United the Confederacy; Animated and Supported the Courage of his Friends; and when it came at laſt to the Pinch, he was the Firſt that ſtruck the Blow; and by his own Bravery, laid the Pride of this Tyrant in the Duſt. So that whatſoever was done by Others to the Promoting of this Exploit, muſt be attributed to the Prudence, Induſtry, and Virtue of Chæreas. This was the End of Caius, who dy'd by many Hands, and by many Wounds.

The Manner of the Execution.

The Glory of the Action aſcrib'd to Chæreas.

But the Great Difficulty was yet behind; that is to ſay, how Chæreas and his Companions ſhould get off again, after the Finiſhing of this mighty Work; beſide the Aſtoniſhment they were in upon ſuch an Atchievement. They had the Outrage of a Wild, and a Seditious Multitude to Encounter, for the Death of a Popular Prince; the Fury, and Revenge of the Soldiery: The Ways Narrow where the Fact was Committed, and Cover'd with Officers and Guards that were there upon Duty. So that finding there was no getting back again by the Way they came; they ſtruck-off to the the Houſe of Germanicus; the Father of Caius whom they had newly Butcher'd. This Quarter Borders upon the Palace-Royal, and the whole Pile is ſo far all of a Piece, as the Beautifying of it with Additional Buildings by ſeveral Emperors from time to time, could make it: and all thoſe Pieces bear the Names of their Reſpective Founders to this very day: Being now clear of the Rabble, they were ſafe enough at preſent, ſo long as the Death of Cæſar could be conceal'd.

The German Guards raging mad upon it.

The German Guards of the Body, known by the Name of the Celtique Legion, were the Firſt that got Inteligence of it; Men naturally Fierce and Cholerique, and like other Barbarians, that for the moſt part underſtand little of what they do. They are Strong-body'd Men that will ſtand any Shock; Bold, and Forward to Attaque; and taking Number for Number, hardly to be Beaten. Theſe Bluſtering Fellows were Raging mad upon the News of the Emperour's Death, not for the Loſs ſo much of the Man, as of their Profit; for they had a Bountiful Maſter of him, and he kept himſelf in Credit with them by the Force of Frequent Donatives, and Rewards. Theſe People, under the Command of Sabinus, Originally a Gladiator, and preferr'd purely for a Brutal Sturdineſs of Body, without the leaſt Pretence of Title to it, by the Virtue, either of himſelf, or of his Anceſtors: Theſe People, I ſay, under this Commander, ran up and down with Drawn Swords from Houſe to Houſe, hunting after the Murderers of Cæſar. The Firſt Man they met with was Aſprenas, that had his Robe ſtain'd with the Bloud of the Sacrifice, as I told you before; a moſt Unlucky Token, and him they tore to Pieces. The Next they Seized was Norbanus, of the Firſt Quality of the City, and one that had the Bloud of ſeveral Eminent Generals in his Veins. But finding that the Dignity of his Extraction wrought nothing upon the Barbarous Fury of thoſe Brutal Ruffians, he Diſarmed the Firſt Man that Aſſaulted him; and being a Perſon of a Wonderful Strength, and Courage, would never have dy'd Unreveng'd, if he had not been Oppreſs'd by Numbers. The Third that had the ſame hard Fortune with the Former, to fall into the Hands of the Germans, was Anteius; with ſome few Others: who was drawn out with a Curioſity to ſee the Dead Body of Caius, a Perſon whom he Hated for his Father's Sake, of the ſame Name; whom he not only Baniſh'd, but afterwards caus'd him to be put to Death by his Order. This Anteius came out upon this Occaſion, to Entertain Himſelf with This Grateful Spectacle; but as he was Endeavouring to ſhift for himſelf in the Hurry of a Tumult, the Germans found him out; and without any Diſtinction of Guilty or Innocent, cut all to Pieces that they Encounter'd in their Way. And This was the Unhappy End of theſe Miſerable Men.

Aſprenas, Norbanus, and Anteius cut to pieces.

When the News of Cæſar's Death was brought to the Theatre, the Wonder and Aſtoniſhment it met with was more then the Credit; for though People would be well enough Content to hear of what they had ſo long, and ſo often Wiſh'd for, many were afraid yet of Believing it, for fear it ſhould prove Falſe, and Others as loth to Believe it, becauſe they were afraid of finding it True. But ſome again ſtumbled at it as a Thing equally Ridiculous to Attempt, and Impoſſible to Compaſs. Now Theſe for the moſt part were Women and Children, Slaves, and a certain ſort of Soldiers too, that making a Double Advantage of their Services, both by Pay, and what they got by Oppreſſion, as the Miniſters of Pride and Tyranny, aſſiſted in the Perſecution of Good Men, and became Sharers in the Booty. As for the Women, the Children, and the Common People, they were Cajol'd with fine Sights, Spectacles, Prizes, Doles, and Largeſſes, and other Amuſements of that kind, under a Pretext of making the People Eaſy; but in Truth, to Gratify the Bloud-thirſty Vanity of the Oppreſſor. The Bondmen, they were Indulged in the Licence allow'd them of Controuling and Affronting their Patrons, and Caius their Friend to ſtand by them in all theſe Controverſies. Neither was there any Difficulty at all of making good any Accuſation whatſoever, where the Servant had no more to do toward the gaining of his Liberty and the making of his Fortune, but to Diſcover where his Maſter's Mony was; the Law it ſelf Entitling the Informer to an Eighth part of the Value of the Confiſcation.

As for thoſe Perſons of Condition, to whom the Report might appear Credible, either as Privy to the Plot perhaps, or as Well-Willers to it, or as having ſome Reaſon more then Ordinary perchance to gueſs at it, they were ſo far from Rejoycing at the Rumour, that they made as if they knew nothing at all of the Matter. For they were afraid of Betraying their Good Will by their very Looks, if they ſhould but enter upon the Diſcourſe. The Deeper, in fine, that they were in the Conſpiracy, the more Ignorant they appear'd to be, for it was Death without Mercy to be but ſo much as ſuſpected.

The Story of Caius reported ſeveral Ways.

The Story in the mean time went about Several Ways. Some had it that Caius was Wounded indeed, and under the Care of the Surgeons, but not Kill'd. Now it was not proper for People under Theſe Circumſtances to Declare themſelves one way or other;

other; for either the Reporters were of Caius's Faction, and conſequently under a Suſpicion of Partiality on That Hand; or if they were Enemies, it was not ſafe on the other ſide to be too Forward in the Believing and Publiſhing of Ill News to be True, as if they wiſh'd it ſo: But there was ſtarted at the ſame time another Invention that damp'd the Hearts of the Nobility more then all the reſt: which was that Cæſar, upon the receiving of his Wounds, ran preſently into the Market-place; and without ſtaying to be Dreſs'd, All Bloudy as he was, made his Appeal there in a Declamatory Way to the People. This Variety, and Uncertainty of Reports put all Men to their Wit's End what to Think, Do, or Say. But ſtir they durſt not for fear of Calumny, and Miſconſtruction; for the Queſtion was not ſo much what they intended, as how the Judges and Informers would underſtand it.

The German Soldiers beſet the Theatre;

In This Diſtraction, the Germans with Sword in Hand Beſet the Theatre, every Man there giving himſelf for Loſt upon the Firſt Sight of them, and expecting to have his Throat Cut immediately upon the Place. While they ſtood trembling in the Anxiety of a Suſpence, whether to go or ſtay, for there was Danger both ways, the Soldiers breaking-in upon them, put the whole Theatre into a Frightful Clamour, with a Thouſand Supplications, Submiſſions, Deprecations, Proteſtations and Excuſes, accompany'd with Tears, Groans and Invocations upon all the Gods to atteſt their Innocence. A Conſpiracy or no Conſpiracy, they could ſay nothing to it, they ſaid, neither did they Omit any thing in their Preſent Extremity, that the Senſe of their Danger might put into their Mouths to ſave their Lives. This Diſmal Spectacle drew Compaſſion from the Hard Hearts, even of the Germans Themſelves, and put a ſtop to the Further Progreſs of their Fury, having done already what they were in ſome Meaſure aſham'd of, as Inhumane as they were, in their Butchery upon Aſprenas and his Companions, and then carrying their Heads up and down in Oſtentation, for a Shew, till in the End they were Depoſited upon the Altar. What could be more Afflicting to their Friends, conſidering the Dignity of the Men, and the Inſolent Barbarity of the Triumph, then this Horrid Action. And they were not a little Solicitous for themſelves too, for their Own Danger was not yet over. Nay the Greateſt Enemies that Caius left behind him, could not rejoyce heartily at his Death, for the Danger they themſelves were in, not long to Survive him.

All in a Fright, and Confuſion.

But while Things were in This Confuſion, there was one Aruncius, a Publique Cryer; a Man of an Eſtate, and of ſo Great Power and Credit with the People, that he did what he would with them. This Aruncius came into the Theatre in a Deep Mourning, like a Noble-Man of Rome; and with all the Formalities of Sorrow and Lamentation that are Cuſtomary upon the Loſs of our Neareſt Relations; where he made Proclamation with a Loud Voice, that the Emperour was Dead; upon this the Germans Relented, and the Officers Commanded the Soldiers to put-up their Swords; whereupon the whole Uproar was Quieted. This was moſt certainly the ſaving of the People's Lives that were Coopt-up in the Theatre, and of all others whatſoever that might have fall'n into the Power of the Germans; for ſo long as they could have Flatter'd themſelves with any Hope of the Emperour's being Alive, they would never have ſtuck at any manner of Miſchief. They had ſo Great an Affection for Caius, that they would have Redeem'd his Life, even with the Loſs of their Own, and without any Regard to the Miſerable State of the Common Wealth. But now upon the Certainty of the Thing, That Impetuous Deſire of Revenge fell of it ſelf; when there could be no longer any Occaſion for the Conferring of Obligations on the one ſide, or for Returning Acknowledgments on the Other: Beſide the Apprehenſion they had of the Power of the Senate upon continuing their Violence, in caſe That Government ſhould come in Play again. Thus was the Rage of the Celtique Legion appeaſed.

The Death of Cæſar publiſh'd by Proclamation.

Chæreas all this while, being exceedingly in pain for fear Minutianus ſhould fall into the Hands of the Germans, took as many of the Soldiers one by one as he could Truſt, to try if they could tell any News of him; and with Earneſt Entreaties recommending him to their Care, if it might fall in their Way to ſerve him. By this Means Chæreas and Clemens were brought to him; and Minutianus applying himſelf to Chæreas, told him that he could not but infinitely Honour him for ſo Generous a Reſolution and Undertaking; and that he would take upon himſelf to give him Thanks, in the Name of the Commonwealth, for ſo publique a Service; and as well for his Conduct in the Menage of his Undertaking, as for his Courage in the Execution of it. This, ſays he, may ſerve to ſhew us the Condition, and the Fate of Tyranny, that never fails, after the Short Pleaſure of a Lawleſs Domination, to Terminate in an Unhappy and a Shameful Concluſion, that renders the Oppreſſor Hateful to all Good Men: As This was Cæſar's Caſe, who made way for this Conſpiracy by a Violation of the Laws, and an Outrageous Courſe of Intolerable Inſolence and Injuſtice, upon his beſt Friends: who upon Theſe Provocations became his Enemies, and ſo the Inſtruments of his Minutianus, Clemens, and Chæreas brought together.

Deſtruction; but he himſelf all this while, was the Author, and the Firſt moving Cauſe of his Own Ruine. The Guards being now withdrawn, the People in the Theatre were all Riſing in a Hurry to ſhift for themſelves. The Occaſion of it was This. Arcyon a Phyſician was call'd away to look after ſome Wounded Men, and ſent away ſeveral about him, under a Pretence of going to provide Remedies; but, in truth, to put them out of Harms way.

The Senate, in the mean time, met in the Palace, where the Multitude preſt-in upon them in Throngs, to demand Juſtice upon the Murderers of the Emperour. The People were in Earneſt, but the Senate only held fair with them for a Countenance. While the Rabble was in this Fit of Storming and Hunting up and down after the Aſſaſſins, Valerius Aſiaticus a Conſular Man, put himſelf among them in the Heat of their Outcries and Clamours, to know what was become of the Murderers of Caius, and who was the Villain that Kill'd him. Would I had been the Man My ſelf, ſays Valerius, and ſo he went his way.

The Senate meets, and Orders the Soldiers and People to depart:

The Senate proceeded then to a Decree, in Condemnation of Caius, and paſs'd an Order for both People and Soldiers to depart Quietly to their own Homes and Quarters, with Promiſes of certain Exemptions and Privileges to the one, and of Rewards and Gratuities to the other, if they demean'd themſelves Peaceably as they ought to do. By this Means there was a Seaſonable Stop put to the Uproar, which otherwiſe might have broken out into Freſh Tumults, Sacrilegious Violences, Rapine, and all manner of Confuſion. The whole Bench of Senators being now met, and Thoſe Eſpecially that were of the Plot, they began to have ſome Thoughts of taking the Power into their own Hands, and ſetting-up for themſelves again.

The Senate inclining to ſet-up for it ſelf.

The Senators and Soldiers divided about the Form of Government.

WHile the Senators were Debating on the One Hand, the Soldiers were at Work in a Counſel of War on the Other, upon the Queſtion, whether a Popular, or an Imperial Government; and came to this Reſolution, that the Former was neither Good for the whole Body, nor for themſelves; for the People, they ſaid, could never Anſwer ſo many Preſſing Neceſſities of the State: Neither was it for their Own Intereſt, either to be put quite out of Play by a Wrong Choice, or to have ſo many Maſters, having been rather the Companions then the Servants of the Former Adminiſtrator: ſo that they were of Opinion in this Unſettled State of Affairs, to chuſe Claudius Emperour, being the Uncle of the Deceas'd, and much Superiour, both for his Birth, Princely Qualities, and Education, to any of the Senators that were then gotten together; not making any doubt but he would remember thoſe that rais'd him, and oblige all People according to their Deſerts. This was the Senſe of the whole Counſel: So that Claudius was immediately fetch'd away from his Houſe by the Soldiers, and Declar'd Emperour. This was carry'd preſently to the Senate-Houſe to Cnæus Sentius Saturninus, who finding Matters upon ſuch a Pinch that Now or Never the Buſ'neſs was to be done, he ſtood up with a Speech in his Mouth; partly being put upon it, and partly by Inclination, and deliver'd his Thoughts upon This Occaſion, in Terms Worthy of ſo Generous a Patriot, and Speaker, and of ſo Publique-Spirited an Auditory. The Tenor of it was to this Effect.

The Soldiers for an Imperial Government, and Claudius the Man.

They ſet him up, and Declare him Emperour. The News carry'd to Saturninus in the Senate-Houſe.

Saturninus in Favour with the Popular State.

Who would have thought, ſays he, my Noble Countrymen, and Fellow-Citizens, after ſo long an Interruption of our Natural Freedom, that we ſhould ever have liv'd to draw one Breath of Liberty after it! And yet through the Goodneſs of the Divine Providence in whoſe Power it is to Give, or to Take, we are at this very Day and Hour, Freemen in ſome Degree yet once again. How long it will laſt we know not! But let the Event be what it will, and the Comfort of it never ſo ſhort, a ſhort Comfort is yet a Comfort ſtill. Shall we account count it as nothing now, for a Freeman to Live Free, in a Free Country, and to have yet some Reliſh of the Sweets of our Ancient Liberties in the Flouriſhing Condition of our once Free Common-Wealth; even though we were to Enjoy the Satisfaction of it but for one ſingle Hour. I can ſay little, 'tis true, to the Liberty of Former Times, that was Dead and Gone before ever I came into the World; but I have a great Kindneſs, I muſt Confeſs, for the Preſerving and Improving of that Liberty, ſuch as it is, which we Enjoy at preſent: and I cannot but Eſteem thoſe Men to have been exceedingly Happy, whoſe Lot it was to fall into an Age that aſſerted the Common Liberty of Mankind, and the Study of Virtue. But the Perſons of all Others that in my Opinion deſerve the moſt to be Honour'd, next to the Immortal Gods Themſelves, are thoſe Heroical Spirits that have had the Courage to give us yet ſome Taſt of it, how late ſoever, even in This Abandon'd State of the World: a Bleſſing, which I wiſh with all my Soul, may be Perpetuated to our Poſterity. For as to what Concerns our ſelves, one Day's Experience is aboundantly ſufficient for our Comfort and Inſtruction, both Young and Old. Thoſe that are in Years will leave the World with leſs Regret, when they ſhall better Underſtand the Advantages that attend Liberty; and for thoſe that are growing-up, the very Example will Inflame them with a Virtuous Æmulation of Treading in the Steps of their Famous Anceſtors. Virtue, in ſhort, is the main Buſ'neſs of Humane Life; and ſo it ought to be, for in truth, Virtue is Liberty it ſelf: That is to ſay, the Liberty of the Mind, whatever becomes of the Body. Now I do not take upon me all this while to ſpeak of Things before my time, any further then upon the Grounds of Hearſay and Tradition. But when I come to the Subject of Tyranny, and the Calamitous Conſequences that attend it, I ſhall ſay no more upon that Topique then what I can make Good in what I have ſeen and felt, and upon the Infallible Certainty of Woful and Miſerable Experience. It confounds the Order of Government, and of all Civil Communities. Great Minds, Generous Diſpoſitions, and Glorious Actions, are Diſcountenanc'd and Suppreſs'd. It makes Men's Souls as Servile as their Carcaſſes; Quenches all Honourable Æmulations, and accommodates all Rules of Law and Equity, by Fear, and Flattery, to the Arbitrary Freak of Ambitious and Phantaſtical Princes. If we look back to the Uſurpation of Julius Cæſar, upon the Power of the People, and the [a] Trampling of their Laws, Liberties and Government under foot, in the Erecting of a Tyrannical Monarchy upon the Ruines of that Commonwealth: And all this only to Gratify the Heat of his Ambitious Luſts, what a Train of Miſeries has that Impotent and Inſatiable Affectation of Dominion drawn after it, both upon the Government, and the Nation! What has the Succeſſion been but a kind of a Violent Competition betwixt the Predeceſſor and the Next Comer, who ſhould do moſt Miſchief, either in the Subverting of the Laws, or in the Depopulating of the City at leaſt; by the ſuppreſſing of all Men of Honour and Virtue in it, and by all ſorts of Perſecution, even to the Degree of Death it ſelf: For they could not be ſafe but in the Hands of Wicked Inſtruments, that had Abandon'd themſelves to all ſorts of Iniquity, without either Shame or Conſcience. And not one ſingle Creature in the Number of Theſe Imperious Maſters, that had not done the part of a moſt Barbarous Oppreſſor. But the Tyrant Caius, who hath This Day received his Fate; He perhaps has out-done all the reſt in the Licentious Rage of a Brutal, and an Ungovernable Fury; ſparing neither Citizens, Friends, nor Relations, in a Defyance, at the ſame time, both of Humanity and Juſtice, and of all the Laws both of God and Man. For it is not enough for Tyrants to give themſelves up to their Vanity, and their Pleaſures, Rapines, Adulteries, and Extravagant Appetites, for Theſe are only Humane Frailties; but their Satisfaction lies in the Diabolical Practices of Rooting-out whole Families, Entitling Children and Infants to their Fathers Quarrel, and not One jot Quieter After their Revenge then they were Before: for being Conſcious to themſelves of the Indignities they Multiply upon their Subjects, and that let them bear them never ſo Patiently, the Spite of a Shrewd Turn is not ſo ſoon Forgotten, they find no Security at laſt but in the Death of thoſe they have Wrong'd, and in the ſeaſonable Removal of them out of the Way. But ſince ſo it is, that we have now ſhak'd off the Yoke, and recover'd the Poſſeſſion of our Primitive Freedom: all that we have to do for the Preſerving of Unity among our ſelves, and Providing for our Future Safety, is to joyn in Repairing the Ruines of our Ancient Glory, and reſtoring the Commonwealth unto it's Original State of Union and Integrity. We are now at Liberty to Propoſe, and to Debate, and to Like, or Diſlike, at pleaſure, without any Superiour Power over our Heads to Controul, and call us to an Account. For what was it that gave Birth and Growth to the Unbounded Progreſs of the Late Tyranny, but the Dull Drowſy Patience of a Beſotted People, that had not the Hearts to make head againſt it? Men, Slaves to their Pleaſures; and Men that otherwiſe Acted, and Liv'd like Slaves: Theſe were the People that chuſing rather to lead a Mean, Inglorious Life, then Venture an Honourable Death, caſt the City into Thoſe Inſupportable Miſeries, of which we our ſelves have been both Eye, and Ear-Witneſſes. But let me recommend it to you in the Firſt Place now, to do Right to Chæreas in conferring upon him the Honours he deſerves for ridding the World, and the Commonwealth of this Abominable Monſter. For it was His Counſel, and His Hand, by the Impulse of a Divine Assistance, that wrought our Liberty; and it is but Reason that he that procur'd us our Freedom with the Hazzard of his Life should receive Acknowledgments and Rewards from the Persons he Redeem'd, answerable to the Quality of the Obligation. It is the Part, and the Duty of an Honest Man to be Thankful to his Benefactor; Especially to such a Benefactor as this, who has involv'd us all in One Common Debt. The Action of Brutus and Cassius upon Julius Cæsar, was Great and Glorious; but Chæreas over and above the Emulation of their Bravery, hath in This Respect gone much beyond it. Their Exploit was follow'd with a Civil War, that ran thorough and Ravaged the whole Roman Empire, but Chæreas cut-off the Tyranny it self, together with the Tyrant, and Deliver'd the whole World at one Blow.

A Caius Head in a Ring upon his Finger all this while.

This Discourse of Saturninus was mightily to the Satisfaction of the whole Body of the Senate; but he was so Intent upon Caius, one way, that he Forgot him, Another; for he had at that time a Stone in a Ring upon his Finger, with a Caius's Head in't, which he never thought of: But Trebellius Maximus observing it, started up, and got it off from his Finger, and it was Order'd to be Broken.

Chæreas goes to the Consuls for the Word, and they give him LIBERTY.

It was now toward Night, and Chæreas went to the Consuls for the Watch-Word, who gave him for the Word, [LIBERTY.] The Face of Things was so strangely alter'd now all on a sudden, that People could hardly believe what they saw: This being the First Act of Authority that the Senate had ever appeared in, since the time they were deposed: for the Soldiers had their Orders from the Consuls still, in Former Times, till the Cæsars took it out of their Hands. Chæreas, upon the Receiving of the Word, deliver'd it again in Course to the Troups that sided with the Senate. That is to say, to Four Companies of them that stood Well-Affected to the Lawful Government, and Declared themselves against the Usurpation. These Men went away presently with their Officers, and soon after them, went the People, overjoy'd with the Thought of the Present Change, and in Hopes that the Ancient Glory of the Commonwealth was now coming about again; and all agreeing in the same Note, that Chæreas was their Deliverer. Now Chæreas thinking it might be Dangerous after the Death of Caius, to leave his Wife and Daughter to survive him, he sent Julius Lupus, one of the Tribunes, with a Command to kill them both; singling out him the rather for that Commission, both as Clement's Kinsman, and as a Reasonable Thing, for a Man that was so Deep in the Conspiracy, to have his part in the Execution. But there were several yet of the Confederates that look'd upon it as an Unmanly Cruelty, to commit so Barbarous an Outrage upon the Person of a Woman; for she had no Hand, they said, in Caius's Enslaving the City, or in the Execrable Barbarities he committed on the Flower of the Nobility; but it was all of his Own Head, and nothing else but the Pure Malice of his Own Ill Nature. Others again laid the Load upon the Woman, for a Philtre she gave him, that took his Brain, and made him stark Mad: and so Interpreted this Poysonous Potion as the Act of This Lewd Woman, to be the Ruine of the Commonwealth. The Latter Opinion carry'd it, and so Julius Lupus posted away immediately about his Bus'ness, out of a Zeal to the Publique in the Dispatch of his Duty. Upon his coming into the Palace, he found Cesonia laid at her length upon the Ground with her Daughter, by the Body of her Husband, and in want of all those Necessary Decencies that naturally belong to the Dead, all Besmear'd with the Bloud of his Wounds; and in this Affliction, nothing to be gotten from her but Exclamations against Caius for not Hearkening to the Advice of so Affectionate a Wife, that told him over and over beforehand, she said, what this would come to in the End. These Words lay so open to a Double-Meaning, that from that Day to This, People have been divided how to understand them. They that took them in the more Favourable Sense, would have it that she spake of the Counsels she had given him from time to time, not to behave himself so like a Mad-Man; but to contain himself within the Bounds of Sobriety, and Moderation; for if he went on in that Provoking Way of Cruelty, and Oppression, he would Incur the Hatred of his People, and draw the Bloud of his Subjects upon his own Head. But those that made Another Construction of it, would have it to be as who should say. If this Man would have been Rul'd by Me, and consulted his own Security in time, as I would have had him, this should never have been. How often did I Press him to rid his Hands of all Suspected Persons, every Man of them, the First thing he did? Proof, or no Proof, it matter'd not; for where the Life of a Prince was at stake, a Just Ground of Suspicion would have been sufficient to Proceed upon. In This Latitude, the Interpretation lay fair enough both ways. Lupus being now come within Sight of Cesonia, as she was Tormenting her self in the Bitterness of her Anguish and Distress; the Princess begg'd of him with Tears, and Passionate Lamentations, only to draw near, and take a View of that Miserable Spectacle of her Mangled Husband. But quickly gathering from his Countenance what his Fatal Bus'ness was, and from his Words afterward, over and above, ſhe was no further concern'd at what he ſaid, then after a ſhort Ejaculation upon the Miſery of her Condition, immediately to preſent her Bare Throat to the Execution; preſſing him to diſpatch what he had undertaken, and to Finiſh the Tragedy that his Companions had begun. She Encounter'd the Stroke with a Wonderful Conſtancy of Mind, and her Daughter, an Infant, dy'd by the ſame Hand with her; and the Tidings of it ſent away to Chæreas ſo ſoon as the Work was done.

Ceſonia dies with Great Conſtancy.

This was the End of Caius, in the Fourth Year of his Reign; a Man Brutal and Malicious to the higheſt Degree, even in his Private Condition; Senſual in his Appetites; a Patron of Calumniators and Informers; a Coward in all Caſes of Danger, and Conſequently Bloudy. He valu'd Dominion for nothing more then that it put it in his Power to oppreſs the Innocent, and to make way to Confiſcations, and Forfeitures by Murders and Rapines. He valu'd himſelf upon the Slaviſh Flatteries and Adorations of the Common People; and nothing leſs then Temples and Altars to his Honour, would ſatisfy his Frantique and Extravagant Ambition. He hated all Reſtraints of Law, as well as of Virtue, and would not ſpare the beſt Friend he had in the World upon the leaſt Freak of a Pique or a Revenge. He was an Enemy to all Good Men, and Impatient of Contradiction in whatſoever he had a Mind to; even to the Degree of Whoring his Own Siſter, which made the People abhor him. For Inceſt was a Brutality ſo Abominable in thoſe Days, that it was almoſt Incredible; and a Scandal that had not been ſo much as heard of among them for many Ages. I do not know where he ever Did, or ſo much as Attempted any thing truly Magnificent and Royal, and for the Honour of the Empire, or the Common Good of Mankind; ſaving only the Harbours, and the Store-Houſes, that he Built about Rhegium, and near Sicily for the Convenience of the Corn-Ships out of Ægypt. And That, without all Diſpute, was a Noble Work, and of Publique Uſe and Advantage. And he did not go thorough with it neither at laſt, but gave it over at Half-way, partly by the Lazyneſs and Neglect of his Agents and Overſeers, and partly by the Unſteadyneſs of his own Humour; for his Head ran altogether upon Unprofitable Whimſies, and he Thought his Mony better Imploy'd upon his own Private Pleaſures, then either upon the Ornament, or the Improvement of the Publique. But all this while he was an Excellent Orator, and a Great Maſter, both of Latin, and Greek. He had a Wonderful Preſence of Mind, and an Admirable Faculty in Speaking off-hand upon any Subject: Beſide that he had a Talent Peculiar to himſelf of Gaining upon the Judgments, as well as the Affections of Men, in Affairs even of the Greateſt Moment; a Felicity which was half Nature to him, and half Practice. For being train'd-up in the Emulation, both of his Father Germanicus, and of his Uncle Tiberius, his Predeceſſor, Two Perſons ſo Illuſtrious for This ſort of Excellency, he made it ſome Point of Honour not to Degenerate from the Dignity, either of his Birth, or of his Inſtitution. But what ſignifies an Ingenuous and a Virtuous Education, to thoſe that ſo ſoon as they get at Liberty, pervert the Advantages of it to their Ruine? So hard a Thing it is for Men that may do what they pleaſe without Danger, to do what they ought to do, for the pure ſake of Honeſty and Virtue. At his Firſt Entrance upon the Government, he made an Excellent Choice of Men of Honour and Underſtanding for his Friends and Miniſters, by which he gain'd himſelf a Mighty Reputation with the People. But as he came by little and little to take another Biaſs, he turn'd them off with Inſolence and Scorn, and by Inſupportable Provocations, forced his Subjects upon Thoſe Outrageous Extremities of Deſpair and Revenge, that afterwards coſt him his Life.

The Death and Character of Caius.

But Claudius, as we ſaid before, hearing of the Death of Caius, and the Uproar the whole Court was in upon that Diſaſter, crept into a Private Hole to ſave himſelf, though in no Danger at all, unleſs perhaps for the ſake of his Bloud and Quality. For his Phancy lay ever to a Retir'd Life; his Behaviour Temperate, and Modeſt: A Lover of Letters, Greek eſpecially, and an utter Enemy to the Noiſe, and Hurry of Bus'neſs.

Claudius hides himſelf.

The Multitude being now at their Wits End; the Palace Throng'd with Soldiers running up and down like mad, in a Furious Conſternation, and the Common People Hurrying from place to place at a Venture, without any regard to the Order or Authority of Government: the Guards, in This Tumultuary Confuſion, being Men of the beſt Credit among the Soldiers, found it high Time now to bethink themſelves what was to be done: and Their Trouble was not ſo much the Death of the Prince, who they thought ſuffer'd according to his Deſert, as how to provide for the ſettling of their own Affairs. And then the Rage of the Germans againſt the Murderers had more in it of a Private Intereſt, then of any Reſpect or Good Will for the Publique. Theſe Things, all together, did but further Increaſe the Apprehenſion of Claudius, eſpecially upon the ſight of the Heads of Aſprenas and his Companions, that were carry'd ry'd up and down in Triumph. Claudius was gotten into a Place where there was no coming to him but by certain Blind Steps; and there he ſtood to conceal himſelf in the Dark. Gratus, one of the Emperour's Guards, got the Glimps of a Man there in a Corner, that had a Mind to lie cloſe; but not being able to diſcern what he was, he went up to him, though the other deſir'd him to forbear; and upon drawing him out, found that he knew him, calling aloud to the People that follow'd him, This is Germanicus, and no Man fitter to fill the Vacancy of the Empire. Upon Theſe Words, the Soldiers were ready to lay hold of him; and Claudius, for fear they ſhould put him to Death for Caius's ſake, earneſtly beſought them to ſpare him, making Proteſtation of his Innocence upon the whole Matter. Gratus, upon This, took him by the Right Hand with a Countenance Well-pleas'd, and deſir'd him not to Trouble himſelf with any ſort of Apprehenſion for his Safety, but rather to Diſpoſe his Thoughts toward the Receiving of the Empire; which the Gods, ſays he, have taken from Caius, and do now offer to Claudius by the Hands of Gratus, for the Relief and Preſervation of Mankind, that hath been Groaning thus long under the Burden of ſo many Oppreſſions: Wherefore, in Heaven's Name, get up Sir, ſays he, and take poſſeſſion of the Throne of your Anceſtors. So they Mounted Claudius upon their Shoulders; who in truth, betwixt the Surprizes of Joy and Fear, was not able to ſtand upon his Legs before. While this was a Saying and a Doing, the Guards gather'd together about Gratus in Greater Numbers, and fell to Muttering among themſelves what Pity it was for the Poor Innocent Claudius, a Perſon that had liv'd ſo Private and ſo Quiet, and had run ſo many Hazzards for Caius himſelf, to be hurry'd away thus out of his Life? for they took all This Buſtle to be for the carrying of Claudius to his Execution, while others were for appealing to the Conſuls. But as the Soldiers Crouded-in more and more, the People that had no Arms, ſhifted ſeveral Ways for themſelves. This put a ſtop to Claudius's Progreſs; for he was not in Condition to March a-foot, and his Bearers had given him the Slip upon the Former Miſtake, for fear of running the ſame Fate with their Maſter. So that the Military Men being now poſſeſs'd of the Palace; (that Part of the City, which they ſay was firſt Inhabited) their Numbers Increaſing, and having a Clear Stage to themſelves, they took it into Conſideration upon this Juncture, how they might ſettle the Commonwealth. The Soldiers were glad at Heart to ſee Claudius there; and One and All for the advancing of him to the Empire; partly in Honour to his Brother Germanicus, for whoſe Memory all the World had an Infinite Veneration, and partly to keep off other Ambitious and Troubleſome Pretenders among the Senate; who having formerly Embroil'd the State, would in all Likelyhood do as much Miſchief over again, if it lay in their Power. They look'd upon the Republican Form of Government to be gone paſt Recovery; and therefore ſince an Emperour was of Neceſſity to be choſen, it would concern them to take care they Thought, that no Perſon whatever ſhould be advanced to that Dignity without being beholden to them for his Preferment. Upon which Conſideration, they could not do better then to Pitch upon Claudius for the Man, and by that Means to Engroſs the Merit of the Obligation entirely to themſelves. The whole Body of the Soldiery was ſo Abſolutely ſatisfy'd with this way of Reaſoning and Diſcourſe, that upon Conferring one with another, they all immediately Joyn'd in the ſame Reſolution; and taking up Claudius upon their Shoulders, carry'd him away to the Camp, there to Finiſh what they had begun, and the whole Army along with him for his Guard.

Claudius diſcover'd by Gratus in a Corner.

Gratus puts him into poſſeſſion of the Empire.

The Soldiers Unanimouſly for Claudius.

They carry him to the Camp, and ſo finiſh the work.

While this was a-foot, there happen'd a Miſunderſtanding betwixt the Senate, and the Common People. The Former were for the Re-eſtabliſhing of the Commonwealth in its Ancient Glory, and for the Vindicating of their Authority from Tyrannical Uſurpations: The Other, out of an Envy to the Power the Senate aim'd at, deſir'd nothing more then an Imperial Check upon the Proud and Covetous Senators, and a Secure Appeal for themſelves to a Higher Court from Republican Oppreſſions. So that the People were overjoy'd at the Elevation of Claudius, in hope, that under his Protection they might be Preſerv'd from Civil Wars, and the Diſmal Confuſions over again of the War betwixt Pompey and Cæſar.

The Senate and the Common People divided about a Monarchy and a Commonwealth.

The Senate were no ſooner Inform'd of the Soldiers Tranſporting Claudius to the Army, but they diſpatch'd away a certain Number of Choice Men of their own Order, with Inſtructions to admoniſh Claudius, not to attempt the Aſſuming of the Government to himſelf by Violence, but rather to Content himſelf in the Station of one of the Senators, and to leave the Care of the Publique to that Body, who were Qualify'd by the Laws to Menage by themſelves, and by their Direction, all the Offices of Adminiſtration. They were alſo to Mind him how Tyranically the People had been Treated by Former Maſters, and even by Caius himſelf, and of the Part likewiſe that he himſelf had in the Common Danger from that Tyrant: and how Ill it would become any Man that Condemn'd Tyranny in another, other, to ſet-up the Practice of it Himſelf. But if he would ſubmit to the Senate, and return to his Former Courſe of Life and Principles, he ſhould be Crown'd with Honours by a Free and a Powerful People, and gain the Reputation of a Wiſe, and a Good Man, by Contenting himſelf to take his Lot in the Courſe of Things in this World, whether it be Higher or Lower, as the Law and Providence ſhall appoint: But if he ſhould go on in his Purpoſe after this Judicial Example upon Caius, they muſt certainly oppoſe him in his Deſign; for they wanted neither Soldiers, nor Arms, they ſaid, nor Numbers, nor any other Neceſſaries, for ſuch an Undertaking: But after all, that their main Dependance was upon the Power and Juſtice of the Gods in favour of ſo Honeſt and Righteous a Cauſe, as the Defence of the Liberty of their Country.

The Senate ſends Veranius and Brouchus, with a menacing Meſſage to Claudius.

When Veranius and Brouchus had acquitted themſelves of their Commiſſion to Claudius in Words to this Effect, they caſt themſelves at his Feet with moſt Earneſt Supplications, not to do any thing that might hazzard the Embroiling of the People in a Civil War. But finding Claudius ſo beſet with Military Men; and that the Power of the Conſuls was nothing in Compariſon to that of the Soldiers, theſe Envoys made him only This ſhort Requeſt, that if he were Reſolv'd upon the Sovereignty, he ſhould rather accept it from the Senate, and take it upon him without Violence; which would be much Fairer and more Auſpicious, to Receive it with the Good Will of the People, then to Raviſh it from them by Force.

Claudius ſticks to his Pretenſions.

CLAUDIUS was no Stranger to the Haughtineſs of the People he had to do withal, and ſo gave their Deputies as Fair an Anſwer for the Preſent as he could diſcreetly do, without laying himſelf at Mercy. But what with the Temptation it ſelf; the Advice, and Importunity of the Soldiers; the Inſtigation of Agrippa, and their Promiſes to ſtand by him in the Aſſerting of his Pretenſions, Claudius was over-rul'd into a Reſolution not to let go his Hold in the Right he had to the Dignity, which they had Voluntarily Conferr'd upon him. When Agrippa had decently Diſpos'd of the Dead Body of his Friend Caius that ſet the Crown upon his Head, and put every thing in as good Order as the Caſe would then bear, he went preſently to his Guards, and gave it out that Caius, in truth, was not Dead, but Miſerably Ill of his Wounds; and that he was going to get ſome Phyſicians to him. But being told ſoon after, that Claudius was taken-up, and carry'd away by the Soldiers, Agrippa preſs'd after him immediately through the Croud, and with much ado found him out at laſt; but in ſo Frightful a Confuſion of Thoughts, that he was juſt upon the Point of delivering up all to the Senate: Only in that point of Time, Agrippa gave him a Word of Comfort that fix'd him in a Reſolution to keep what he had got, and ſo he went his Way. Soon after this Agrippa was invited to take his Place in the Senate, and thither he went, (pretending Ignorance to all Purpoſes) but as Finical and Spruce as if he had come from a Ball, or a Miſtreſs. Being now in the Court, he put the Queſtion to the Senators, what was become of Claudius: So they told him the very Truth of the Story, and then put it to him what he thought of the Preſent State of Things. Agrippa made Anſwer, that there was nothing ſo Dear to him in this World, that he was not ready to Sacrifice to the Honour of the Senate; and yet I could wiſh, ſaid he, that People would rather attend the Subſtantial Good and Service of the Commonwealth, then the Speaking of Pleaſing Things to Tickle the Itching Ears of the Vulgar: For moſt certain it is, that without a Competent Proviſion of Arms, Men, and Monies, for a Foundation to Proceed upon, there is no Good to be done in Competitions for Dominion and Power. Their Anſwer was, that for Thoſe Neceſſary Preliminaries, they had of them abundantly, and to ſpare: And for the Matter of Numbers; they had Slaves enow to do their their Work, that would be glad of their Freedom for their Wages. This is very well, ſays Agrippa, and with Submiſſion to your Grave Wiſdoms, I wiſh every Thing may ſucceed to your Liking. But with your Leave for one Word more. You know very well that the People Claudius has about him, are all Veteran Soldiers, and Men of Diſcipline, and Experience: whereas on the Other hand, we have only a Raw, and an Untractable Rabble of Servile Wretches, that hardly ever ſaw a Naked Sword in their Lives; to Encounter ſo many Expert Men of War withal; and therefore with reſpect to your Prudence, I ſhould rather propoſe the ſending of ſome Body to Claudius to try if he might not be wrought upon to let fall his Claim; and rather then fail, I would make one my ſelf to go upon the Errand. The Senate found the Propoſal Reaſonable, and Diſpatch'd away Agrippa, with ſome others upon the Commiſſion. But Agrippa ſo order'd it, that upon a Private Meeting with Claudius beforehand, he told them what a Twitter the Senate was in, and then put Words in his Mouth for an Anſwer to the Deputies, every way becoming the Majeſty of an Imperial Prince. I do not wonder, ſays Claudius, to find the Senate ſo Averſe to the Government of a ſingle Perſon, conſidering what they Themſelves have ſuffer'd under the Tyranny of ſome late Princes; but for my own part, ſays he, I propoſe nothing more to my ſelf then to make the Subjects Eaſy and Happy in their Perſons, Liberties, and Fortunes; and in the Impartial Adminiſtration of Juſtice; for my Buſ'neſs is only under the Name of a Prince, to Rule with the Common Advice and Conſent of the People. And for the Good Faith of my Intentions, I ſhall refer my ſelf to the Proof I have given the Senate of my Moderation and Integrity, even in the worſt of Times. He ſaid no more upon this Occaſion, but Diſcharging the Deputies with this Speech, he Entertained his Military Men with Another Harangue; gave them an Oath of Fidelity, and Five Hundred Drachma's a Man for a Gratuity; and after the ſame Proportion, to his Officers; with Promiſes of the like to the Soldiers that were Abſent.

Agrippa ſends to Claudius to lay down his Claim.

Claudius's Anſwer.

He gives the Soldiers an Oath of Fidelity.

Upon This, the Senators ſummon'd a Court, who met the Next Morning before Day in the Temple of Jupiter Capitolinus. Some that diſcern'd what Miſchief was a Brewing, and had no Mind to be there, kept out of the way in the City, while others ſlipt out of Town; chuſing rather to be Slaves in a whole Skin, then to run the Riſque of all they had left, by an unſeaſonable Conteſt for the Recovery of what they had already Loſt. There were gotten together not above a Hundred of them at moſt.

The Senate meets before Day in the Temple of Jupiter Capitolinus.

While they were in the middle of a Debate, upon the Matter in Hand, there was an Outcry of Soldiers at the Door all on a ſudden, to the Senators to appoint them ſome One Man to Govern them, for Many Heads they ſaw did but breed Confuſion; and for the Fitneſs of the Perſon, they left that to the Senate. This Overture was ſuch a Snare, that they knew not which way to turn themſelves; for inſtead of the Liberty they promis'd themſelves from Claudius, they found him now to be the Perſon they had the moſt Reaſon to Fear: not that they wanted Men among Themſelves, that for the Honour of their Extraction, and their Relation to Cæſar, might well enough pretend to ſet up for the Dignity: As there was Marcus Minutianus, a Man of the Firſt Quality, and Marry'd into the Family of the Cæſars; as Julia, Caius's Siſter. This Perſon offer'd himſelf for One; but the Conſuls were willing to Wave it, and ſo put it off with one Thing after Another, as by the By. Valerius Aſiaticus would have put in for a Pretender too, if Another Minutianus, one of the Conſpirators againſt Caius, had not interpoſed and hinder'd it; for if any Man had ſtood up for a Competitor with Claudius it would have been the Bloudieſt Diſpute that ever was heard of; for they had there at Hand, whole Troups of Gladiators; Military Men of all ſorts, and a World of Watermen, and other Raſcally ſorts of People that were there Gather'd together, to be at hand, in Caſe of a Pinch. This Deſperate Confuſion diverted ſeveral from appearing, that intended otherwiſe to have ſtood; foreſeeing the Miſchief that would certainly Enſue upon it, both to the Publique and Themſelves.

The Soldiers cry out to the Senate for an Emperour.

In caſe of a Pinch they had their Gladiators, and Ruffians at hand.

It was now toward Break of Day, when up comes Chæreas with his People about him, and gives the Soldiers to underſtand by a Sign he made for Silence, that he had ſomewhat to ſay, and deſir'd a Hearing. But their Buſ'neſs was (they cry'd) to Demand the Choice of an Emperour without any more ado; and ſo they ſtopt his Mouth with Noiſe, and Clamour. The Senate found that this was not a Time to think of ſettling the Government, when their Authority was run down at this rate by Swordmen, and the Dignity of that Noble Order ſubjected to the Inſolence, Scorn, and Mockery of a Company of Ruffians. This put the Conſpirators out of all Patience; inſomuch that Chæreas told them in the Concluſion, if nothing but an Emperour would ſerve their turn, he'd give them One, if they would but fetch him an Order from Eutychus to Juſtify him in what he did. Now This Eutychus was a Favourite-Charioteer of Caius's, and an Infamous Wretch, that ſerv'd his Maſter in all manner of baſe Offices. Chæreas follow'd This Scandal with a Thouſand other Reproaches, declaring that he would rather rather bring them the Head of Claudius, then ever own him for an Emperour. What! ſays he, have we not had enough already of a Madman, but we muſt now make Choice of a Fool? But this was only ſo much Breath loſt; for the Soldiers, without minding what he ſaid, immediately drew their Swords, and Marched with their Colours to find out Claudius, and to joyn in the ſame Oath that the other had taken before.

The Soldiers March away to fetch Claudius.

Thus was the Senate abandon'd by thoſe that ſhould have Defended it, and the Conſuls reduced to the Condition of little more then Private Men, while all People were at their Wits End, in Grief and Aſtoniſhment, to think what would become of them after the putting of Theſe Indignities upon Claudius: Every Man ſlipping his Own Neck out of the Collar, upon Theſe Diſappointments, and laying the Blame upon his Fellow. In the Heat of this Squabble, out-ſtep'd Sabinus, one of the Confederates, in a Fury, with a Proteſtation, that he would Stab every Man before him rather then ever ſubmit to the Acknowledging of Claudius for his Maſter; or ſo much as to ſee him poſſeſs'd of the Empire, and ſo to become a Slave by his Own Conſent. And now Chæreas what have you to ſay for your ſelf too? You that were the the Firſt Aſſerter of the Common Liberty againſt Caius, and now to Shrink, and Flinch from That Generous Reſolution, for the baſe Fear of Death: as if any Brave Man could be Happy that is not Maſter of himſelf. No no, ſays Chæreas, I am Unchangeably reſolv'd not to out-live my Liberty; but I ſhould be glad however in the mean time to find how Claudius ſtands affected.

Sabinus proteſts againſt Claudius.

While Matters were in this Diſorderly way of Agitation, People came thronging into the Camp from all Quarters, to make their Court to Claudius, and among the reſt, one of the Conſuls, Quintus Pompeius, whom the Soldiers Hated ſo much the more, for Incouraging the Senate to ſtand up in the Defence of their Liberties. Upon his Advancing, they aſſaulted him with their Drawn Swords; and had undoubtedly kill'd him, if Claudius had not taken him into his Protection, and plac'd him by his own ſide. But the reſt of the Senators that came along with him, did not come off ſo Well; for Divers of them were kept back with Blows, as they preſs'd forward to ſalute him. Aponius went away wounded, and not a Man of them but was in Great Danger. At the Inſtance however of King Agrippa, Claudius was prevail'd upon to Treat the Senators and Men of Quality, with Gentleneſs and Reſpect; for, ſays he, when theſe are gone you will have no Subjects left you, but what you will be aſham'd to Own. Claudius took his Advice, and order'd them to meet him at the Palace, whither he himſelf was carry'd in his Litter, croſs the Town with a Guard of Soldiers to Clear the Paſſage.

All the Court made to Claudius.
Quintus Pompeius aſſaulted.

At the ſame time, Chæreas and Sabinus, Two of the moſt Eminent of the Confederates, ſhew'd themſelves in Publique, expreſly againſt the Order of Pollio, whom Claudius had made Captain of the Guards but a little before. Claudius being now brought into the Palace, and his Friends about him, Pronounc'd a Sentence of Death upon Chæreas. Not but that they Themſelves look'd upon the Exploit as a Glorious Action; yet for the Treachery ſake, and for an Example that might lead to the Security of Princes in time to come, he was led to the Place of Execution, with Lupus, and ſeveral others of the Conſpirators. He dy'd, they ſay, in a Wonderful Conſtancy of Mind; no Change of Countenance at all, nor any Geſture or Action below the Glory of a Great Mind. Lupus indeed behav'd himſelf Wretchedly, and Chæreas took Notice of it with Contempt. Upon the Stripping of him, he complain'd of Cold; and Chæreas had This Conceit upon it, that Wolves felt no Cold, alluding to the Conceit of Lupus the Wolf, and Lupus the Man. When the Executioner was to do his Office, he asked him if he was his Craft's Maſter at the Trade of Cutting Throats, and if his Sword had a Good Edge; and to conclude, deſir'd him to make uſe of the ſame Weapon that he kill'd Caius with. The Soldier did his Duty, in fine, and at one Blow Diſpatcht his Bus'neſs: But Lupus that lay Wriggling and Turning for fear of the Stroak, was Hackt and Mangled at ſeveral Repeated Blows before the Officer could do his Work. Some few days after, upon the Feſtival of the People's Expiatory Oblations to the Ghoſts of their Dead Friends, they pay'd the ſame Honour to Chæreas as to the Reſt, by caſting their Offerings into the Fire according to the Uſual Ceremony, and begging his Forgiveneſs for the Paſt Ingratitude. This was the End of Chæreas.

Chæreas, Lupus, &c put to death.
Lupus dies as Wretchedly.

As for Sabinus, Claudius did not only Pardon him, but continu'd him in the ſame Command he had before, upon a Generous Conſideration, that even in his Treachery he was yet True to his Truſt. But Sabinus, after all, made no further Uſe of his Clemency then to deliver himſelf from a Life he was weary of, upon the Point of his Own Sword, and with his Own Hand.

Claudius pardons Sabinus.
Sabinus kills himſelf.

CHAP. IV.

Claudius kind to Agrippa. A Sedition betwixt the Jews and the Greeks. Claudius's Edict in Favour of the Alexandrian Jews. An Edict in Favour of All the Jews.

Claudius kind to Agrippa.

THE First Thing that Claudius did after his Eſtabliſhment, was to clear his Army of All Suſpected Perſons; and That being done, he Confirmed Agrippa by an Edict, in the Poſſeſſion of the Kingdom formerly Conferr'd upon him by Caius, aſcribing very much to Agrippa's Addreſs and Induſtry in his Service. He caſt in over and above, Judæa and Samaria, as formerly belonging to the Kingdom of his Grandfather Herod. And This he look'd upon as only an Act of Reſtitution, and a kind of Due to his Family. But for Abela, and the Bordering Lands upon Mount Libanus, which formerly belong'd to Lyſanias, This he caſt in to the Bounty out of his Own. The Articles of Allyance betwixt this King, and the People of Rome, were Graven in a Copper-Plate, and ſet up in the Middle of the Great Market-Place of the City, for a Memorial to Poſterity.

He Diſcharg'd his Old Friend Alexander; Syſimachus, the Great Cuſtom-Officer, that Caius had clapt up in a Rage; and one that formerly Menag'd for his Mother Antonia. He likewiſe gave Berenice, the Daughter of Agrippa, in Contract to his Son Marcus; but the Young Man dying before the Conſummation of the Marriage, Agrippa Marry'd the Virgin to his Brother Herod, and Claudius beſtow'd the Kingdom of Chalcis upon him at Agrippa's Requeſt.

A Sedition betwixt the Jews and the Greeks.

The Jews, that had been terribly Perſecuted and Oppreſs'd by the Alexandrians in the Reign of Caius, began now to get Heart again, and in a ſhort Time betook themſelves to Arms, which was the Beginning of a Sedition betwixt Them and the Greeks. Claudius, upon the Firſt Tidings of This Commotion, wrote away to the Governour of Ægypt to take all poſſible Care to Quiet it: and at the Inſtance of the Two Kings, Agrippa, and Herod, ſent an Edict to Alexandria, and into Syria, in Subſtance as follows.

Tiberius, Claudius, Cæſar, Auguſtus, Germanicus, Tribune and Prince of the Senate, Greeting.

An Edict of Claudius in favour of the Jews of Alexandria.

Whereas we are given to underſtand that the Jews of Alexandria have ever from time to time Enjoy'd the ſame Freedoms, and Privileges from Former Kings of Ægypt in Common with the reſt of the Inhabitants, as appears by ſeveral Royal Decrees, and Inſtruments of Record at This Day Extant in Confirmation thereof: And likewiſe that Thoſe Rights and Benefits have been Continu'd to them ever ſince the Annexing of that City by Auguſtus to our Empire; and ſo Tranſmitted, Uncontroverted thorough Aquila's Days; and all the Governours of Alexandria, ſucceſſively, that have been ſent thither; having Liberty granted them alſo by the ſame Auguſtus upon the Death of their Ethnarch, to ſubſtitute Another in his Stead; Enjoying the Free Exerciſe of their Religion and Diſcipline without any Moleſtation or Controul.

Now foraſmuch as Caius Cæſar in a Blaſphemous Exceſs of Madneſs hath rigorouſly preſſed upon the Jews to Worſhip Him as a God, contrary to the Good Faith and Honour of the Imperial Grant, and in a Manifeſt Violence upon their Conſciences; and breaking into Outrages againſt the Refuſers, Irritated a Party of his Own Faction in Alexandria againſt the Jews, their Fellow-Citizens: This is now to Declare all thoſe Proceedings of Caius, Null and Void, and the ſaid Privileges of the Jews to remain ſtill in full Force and Virtue; Requiring, and Commanding, both the One, and the Other, by This our Sovereign Authority, to Live, as far as is poſſible in a Right Underſtanding together, without Troubling the Publique Peace. Theſe are the Contents of the Edict; and after This, in particular for Alexandria, there was Another ſent abroad by the ſame Prince, in Favour of the Jews, all over the Empire, in the following Terms.

Tiberius Claudius Cæſar Auguſtus Germanicus, High-Prieſt, Tribune of the People, and the Second time Conſul Elect, giveth to Underſtand, that,

An Edict in favour of all the Jews.

Upon the Requeſt of the Kings, Agrippa and Herod, our Singular Good Friends, for the ſame Liberty to the Jews all over the Empire, in their Ways and Worſhip that we have already Granted them in Alexandria, we do heartily Comply with them in their Deſire, not only for the Sake of the Advocates, but out of a Reſpect alſo to the Merits of the People, in Acknowledgment of the Friendſhip and Good Offices they have ever render'd to the State of Rome. Wherefore we judge it Reaſonable to have them admitted to a Share of the Common Rights and Benefits of all our Cities, as well Greek, as Other, and to Enjoy them in as Ample a Manner as they did in the Reign of Auguſtus of Bleſſed Memory: And we do likewiſe Ordain for the Future, that wherever they ſhall happen to be Diſpers'd within the Dominion of our Empire, they ſhall be allow'd to Govern themſelves by their own Laws, without any Lett or Interruption, provided that they make a Modeſt Uſe of This our Grace and Favour, without Envying Other People the Free Exerciſe of Their Opinion, ſo long as they Themſelves are allow'd to Enjoy the Liberty of their Own.

This is what we have thought fit to declare: And it is our Will and Command that This our Proclamation may be duly notify'd in all our Citys, Plantations, Towns Corporate, and all other Parts reſpectively of our Dominions, as well within Italy as without, and Copies thereof Tranſmitted to all Kings, Princes, and Governours under our Juriſdiction, and to ſtand Poſted-up and Expos'd for the Space of Thirty Days to the View of all People.

CHAP. V.

Agrippa ſent away to his Government. He dedicates his Golden Chain to God. Theophilus depoſed from the High Prieſtood, and Simon preferr'd. Sylas, General of the Army. A Statue dedicated to Cæſar in the Jews Synagogue. Agrippa complains of it to Petronius.

CLAUDIUS Cæſar gave to underſtand by theſe Two Edicts, how Affectionate an Eſteem he had for the Jews: And the Next Thing he did, was to Order King Agrippa away to his Government; Crowning him ſtill with more and more Honours, over and above ſeveral Letters of Special Recommendation to all the Governours and Intendents of the Provinces where he was to paſs. He made a Quick, and a Happy Diſpatch of his Bus'neſs; and ſo ſoon as ever that was over, Haſten'd away to Jeruſalem, where he acquitted himſelf of all his Holy Vows, and offer'd Sacrifices according to the Punctual Formalities of the Law: Cauſing Great Numbers of the Nazarenes to cut their Hair. Tiberius having formerly Manacled Agrippa with Iron-Chains, Caius gave him a Gold-Chain in Exchange, juſt of the ſame Weight with the Iron One. This Chain Agrippa dedicated to God, and cauſed it to be hung up in the Veſtry over the Box of the Holy Treaſure, as a Monumental Memorial of the Power and Goodneſs of Providence, in relieving Men when they are at the Loweſt; and for an Inſtruction to Mankind, that the ſame God that caſts us down, is able to raiſe us up again. This Conſecrated Chain repreſented, at the ſame View, a Prince made the Sport of Fortune, and a Priſoner in Irons: and then in the Turn of a Hand again, his Fetters knock'd-off, and a Greater Prince then ever he was. Now this is but according to the Nature, and to ſhew the Viciſſitude of Humane Affairs, for Things to fall when they are at the Higheſt; and to Riſe again when they are at the Bottom.

Agrippa ſent away to his Government.

He dedicates his Golden Chain to God.

So ſoon as Agrippa had paid his Duty to God, he depoſed Theophilus the Son of Ananus from the Pontificat, and Subſtituted Simon the Son of Boethus, whoſe Surname was Canthara, in his Stead. This Simon had Two Brothers that had been High-Prieſts too, and Boethus the Father, whoſe Daughter King Herod Marry'd, as we have ſaid already. This happen'd to be the Caſe of the Three Sons of Simon the High-Prieſt, the Son of Onias in the time of the Macedonian Government, of which we have ſpoken formerly.

Theophilus dépos'd from the Pontificat, and Simon preferr'd.

The Office of the Pontificat being ſettled, the King made it his Firſt Bus'neſs to pay his Reſpects and Acknowledgments to the People of Jeruſalem for the Honour and Good Will that they had ſhew'd him, by remitting the Tax upon Houſes that they had formerly paid: a Point of Generous Emulation not to be Out-done in Courteſy. He made Sylas General of his Army, in remembrance of the many Difficulties and Hazzards they had run together.

Sylas, General of the Army.

A while after This, there was a Gang of Raſh Heady Young Fellows of Doris got together, who, under a Colour of Religion, dedicated a Statue to Cæſar in the Jews Synagogue, which tranſported Agrippa to the Higheſt Degree, as the Ready way to make their Religion Deſpicable, and to bring all to Ruine. Wherefore Agrippa without any Delay, went and Complain'd to Petronius the Governour of Syria, of This Horrible Outrage; who declar'd himſelf with as much Indignation as the Other, and wrote a Sharp Letter to the Innovators, as follows.

A Statue dedicated to Cæſar in the Jews Synagogue, by ſome Hot-Headed Fellows of Doris.

Agrippa Complains of it to Petronius.

Petronius rebukes the Offenders. Simon removed, with an Intent to reſtore Jonathan; who declines it, and Recommends his Brother Matthias. Petronius diſmiſſed, and Marcus ſucceeds him.

Publius Petronius, Governour of Syria, by the Appointment of Tiberius Claudius Cæſar Auguſtus Germanicus, to the Magiſtrates of Doris, Greeting.

Petronius gives the Offenders a ſharp Rebuke.

WHereas I have received certain Information, that, notwithſtanding a full Liberty Granted to the Jews by an Edict of Claudius Cæſar Auguſtus Germanicus, to live according to the Rules and Preſcriptions of their Own Laws; ſome of your People have been ſo Audacious, as, in Contempt of the ſaid Imperial Edict, to Prophane their Synagogue by ſetting up Cæſar's Statue there, to the Scandal and Affront of their Religion, being not only an Uſurpation upon the Freedom Cæſar hath permitted them, and a Violence upon their Conſciences, but an Indignity alſo to the Divinity of Cæſar himſelf; for his Image ſhould have been rather ſet up in his Own Temple, then in Another; eſpecially in the Synagogue, ſince the Emperour Himſelf hath found it Meet and Juſt to leave every Man Maſter within himſelf. I ſhall ſay nothing of my Own Orders in this Affair, after ſuch an Affront put upon the Authority of my Maſter, who has not only Indulged the Jews in the Matter of their Religion, but Granted them all the Privileges of Freemen likewiſe, in the Cities where they Inhabit, in Common with the Greeks. Now ſince ſo it is, that This Outrage hath moſt certainly been Committed, and the Majeſty of Cæſar inſolently Deſpis'd; and that you your ſelves Diſown any Hand in the Thing, and ſo turn it off to the Licence of a Riotous Rabble; This is to Will and Require you, that you ſend by my Officer Vitellius Proculus, ſome of the Guilty Perſons, to anſwer before me for what they have done; or at leaſt to tell him who they are; for you your ſelves will be otherwiſe ſuſpected for Parties to the Fact. In the mean time, have a care of the Publique Peace, and of thoſe Seditious Spirits that would put all into a Flame. But as for my Dear Maſter and my ſelf, there is nothing we lay ſo much to Heart, as to keep clear of giving the Jews any Occaſion or Pretext of being Troubleſome in their Own Defence; and now for your better Satisfaction what Opinion the Emperour himſelf hath of this Matter, I ſend you hereunto annexed a Copy of his Edict to the Alexandrians; which my Deareſt Prince Agrippa ſhew'd me (though every Body knew it already) as I was ſitting upon the Tribunal, poſitively requiring that all Cæſar's Conceſſions to the Jews ſhould be made good. Wherefore I do now Charge, and Require it of you, for the Future, to Forbear all manner of Seditious Controverſies, and leave them to Worſhip their God Quietly in their Own Way. Petronius, in fine, ſo order'd this Affair, that he ſet all Right again that had been done Amiſs, and made them Cautious not to do the ſame thing again in time to come.

Simon remov'd, with an Intent to reſtore Jonathan. Jonathan declines it;

King Agrippa, after This, removed Simon Canthara from the High-Prieſthood, with with an Intent to Reſtore it to Jonathan the Son of Ananus, as a Perſon better deſerving ſuch a Dignity: But he declin'd the Acceptance of it, with an Acknowledgment of the Honour the King deſign'd him: and withal told him, that ſince God had not found him worthy of holding it, he ſhould content himſelf with the Bleſſing of having once Worn that Sacred Habit; for he could better Juſtify his Entrance into that Holy Order at Firſt, then he could now the taking of it up again: But Sir, ſays he, If you inſiſt ſo much upon the Worthyneſs of the Perſon, pray give me leave to recommend a Brother of Mine to your Majeſty; a Man Untainted with the Vanities of the World; Innocent, and Inoffenſive, before God and Man, and Conſequently better Qualify'd for the Function. The King was ſo delighted with the Man's Candour and Modeſty, that he laid the Thought of Jonathan aſide, and according to his Advice, transferr'd the Pontificat to his Brother Matthias. It was not long after This, that Petronius was Diſmiſs'd from his Government of Syria; and Marcus ſucceeded him.

SILAS, Agrippa's General, valuing himſelf upon his Fidelity to the King; the Perſonal Hazzards he had run with him; the Labours and Difficulties he had undergone for his Service; Reckon'd upon it, that as they had been Familiar Friends, and Partners in the Dangers of the War, ſo it was but Reaſonable, that they ſhould go Shares in the Dignity, and Prerogatives of the Government: And theſe Things conſider'd, he accounted himſelf to ſtand upon the ſame Level with the King himſelf; and took Liberties with him to the Degree of Sawcineſs. He was extremely Bold and Troubleſome in his Common Diſcourſes; One while Boaſting of his Own Merits; Other whiles Minding the King of the Deſpicable Condition of his former Fortunes; and at every turn making Oſtentation of the Good Offices he had done him; the Deſperate Adventures he had Engag'd in, and what Pains he had taken for his Service. Theſe Nauſeous, Endleſs Repetitions were ſo Reproachful, and Wearyſome, that the King began to be Sick of this Intemperate Freedom; for a Man that has formerly been Low, does not love to be Minded of it when he is in a better Condition, and it is a Fooliſh, as well as a Mean Humour, to be perpetually Hitting a Man in the Teeth with an Obligation. Silas went on ſo far, that the King would bear it no longer; but in the Heat of a Paſſion, he not only ſtript him of his Commiſſion, but ſent him away Bound into his own Country. When he came afterward to his Right Wits again, and to bethink himſelf how ſevere he had been upon a Perſon that had done and ſuffer'd ſo much for him, the Anniverſary of his Birth-day now coming on, and all People diſpoſing themſelves for Mirth, and Jollity, his Heart began to Soften, and he ſent for Silas to make one at the Royal Feſtival. Now he being a Blunt Plain Fellow, and one that could not Diſſemble his Indignation, where he thought he had Reaſon on his Side, he call'd out aloud to the People that brought him the Invitation. Heark ye, my Maſters, ſays he, you ſee the Honour the King does me; but This Fit of Good Humour will not laſt long; and it is but the ſame thing over again that he has done before. He has taken away as much as in him lies, my Reputation, as well as my Charge, and does he think, after all This, that my Tongue is to be Ty'd-up from Speaking Honourable and Neceſſary Truths? Or that any thing ſhall ever ſtop my Mouth, ſo long as I have the Conſcience of an Honeſt Man for my Support? No, no. The World ſhall know from what Diſtreſſes I have Redeem'd him; The Difficulties, and the Dangers I have Encounter'd for his Safety, and Glory: And what's my Reward now for all Theſe Labours, and Hazzards, but a Dungeon and a Chain? Theſe are not Injuries to Sleep, either Forgotten, or Unrevenged, Living or Dead. Go, ſays he, (Raiſing his Voice) and carry your King this Anſwer. Agrippa, by this time, found the Freak to be Incurable, and ſo Remanded him to Priſon.

His Vanity and Sawcineſs.

Agrippa takes away his Commiſſion, and claps him up; but ſends for him to Court a while after.

Sylas Reproaches him for it;

and is remanded to Priſon.

The King turn'd his Thoughts now to the Care of the City, and Fortify'd the Walls of the New Town, as they call it, at a Publique Charge; making them much Stronger, Thicker, and Higher, then they were before, and would in the End have made Jeruſalem abſolutely Impregnable, if Marcus the Governour of Syria had not given Claudius Cæſar a Cautionary Notice of it, for fear there might be ſome Further Deſign: Whereupon Claudius wrote immediately to Agrippa, to go no further in it, and this put a ſtop to the Work.

Agrippa Fortifies Jeruſalem.

Claudius puts a ſtop to the Work.

The King of the Jews was naturally ſo Generous and Obliging, that he made himſelf Famous by his Magnificent Bounties, taking no Greater Delight in any thing then in Honourable Occaſions to ſhew the Munificence of a Large Soul. There was a Great Difference betwixt him, and Herod, his Predeceſſor; the Latter being Falſe, Harſh-Natur'd, and Implacably Cruel, over and above that he was Notoriouſly Partial tial to the Greeks, in Preference to the Jews: Witneſs his vaſt Profuſion of Treaſure upon Forreign Works, both in Structure and Ornament; as Bathing-Houſes, Theatres, Temples, Galleries, Places of Parade, and the like; whereas he was never known to put himſelf to any Memorable Expence in any Publique Works whatſoever, to the Honour of the Jews. But Agrippa on the other ſide, was a Perſon Humane, and Gentle, to the Higheſt Degree; a Common Friend and Patron to all Strangers, and in truth to all Mankind; but Bountiful, Good-natur'd, and Compaſſionate, to thoſe of his Own Country and Profeſſion in the Firſt Place. Wherefore he made Choice of Jeruſalem for his Conſtant Reſidence; No Man ſtricter in the Rules and Formalities of his Religion, without the Corruption of any Prophane or Superſtitious Mixture; and not a Day paſs'd over his Head without a Sacrifice. There was, among others, one very Particular Inſtance of a Generous Goodneſs in him.

Agrippa happen'd to be once at Cæſarea; and in his Abſence, one Simon, a Lawyer, reflected upon him in a Publique Aſſembly, for a Man of a Looſe Life; and one that in Juſtice deſerv'd to be Puniſhed for it; according to the Practice of the Church in that Caſe. The Governour ſent the King Word of This Accuſation, who immediately Diſpatch'd an Order for Simon to come to him; who went accordingly, and the King at that time happen'd to be in the Theatre. So Agrippa call'd him to him, and after a little Pauſe, in a Gentle Tone and Faſhion, he put This Queſtion to him. Friend, ſays he, if you know any thing by me that you do not like, I would have you declare it here. The Man had nothing to ſay for Himſelf; but in a Confuſion, begg'd his Pardon, and the King Granted it immediately, beyond all People's Expectation, and not without ſome Inſtance of his Bounty too, over and above a bare Reconciliation; Valuing himſelf more upon the Exerciſe of Clemency, then upon the Power of taking his Revenge, and accounting it a more Kingly Quality to be Mercyful, then Imperious.

An Inſtance of Agrippa's Generoſity.

All Places wherever he came, or had to do, had ſome Taſt, more or leſs, of his Magnificence and Bounty; but Berytus above the reſt. For there, at a moſt Prodigious Expence, he erected a Stately Theatre, and likewiſe an Amphitheatre, not Inferior to it; ſeveral Bagno's, and Arched Walks; ſparing no Coſt for the Beautifying of every thing to the Higheſt Point of Perfection. The Pomp of the Dedication of theſe Illuſtrious Works, was very Extraordinary upon many Accounts; as the Variety of Shows exhibited in the Theatre; All ſorts of Muſique, and Diverſities of other Entertainments and Pleaſures. In the Amphitheatre were expos'd ſeveral Combats of Gladiators, Man to Man; and after That, whole Troups of Condemn'd Malefactors, to the Number of Seven Hundred of a ſide, being only an Execution of Juſtice in the Form of a Battle, and Improving the Puniſhment of the Criminals to the Pleaſure of the Spectators; for they were all deſtroy'd to the laſt Man.

The Magnificence of his Bounties at Berytus.

Agrippa, after This, paſs'd from Berytus to Tiberias, a City of Galilee, where he was Complemented by ſeveral Kings. There was Antiochus, the King of Comagena; Sampſigeran, the King of the Emeſenes; Cotys, King of the Leſſer Armenia; Polemon, a little Prince of Pontus: and beſide all theſe, Herod the Brother of Agrippa, and the King of Chalcis; who were all receiv'd with ſo Royal a Freedom of Hoſpitality, that it was every way Anſwerable to the Dignity both of the Treater, and of the Gueſts; and much to the Honour of Agrippa, to be found Worthy of ſo many Royal Viſits. While they were yet together, Marſus, the Governour of Syria, came over to him; and Agrippa, out of a Reverence to the Sovereignty of the Empire, went out of Town Seven Miles to Receive him, which proved the Occaſion (as it fell out) of a Miſunderſtanding berwixt them; for Marſus finding ſo many Kings together, and ſuch an Agreement betwixt them, he did not know how it might ſtand with the Publique Safety to Countenance ſo Powerful, and ſo Dangerous a Correſpondence; and therefore ſent Meſſages to them one by one, to depart immediately; which gave Agrippa ſuch a Diſguſt, that he hated him for ever after.

Agrippa complements Marſus the Governour of Syria.

Marſus is Jealous of the Meeting.

This Prince then took away the Pontificat from Matthias, and gave it to Elioneus the Son of Citheus. He was now in the Third Year of his Reign over all Judæa, when he came to Cæſarea, formerly call'd the Tower of Straton; where he Celebrated a Solemnity of Games and Shows to the Honour of Cæſar; which drew together a World of the Nobility, and Men of Quality from all parts of the Province. Upon the Second Day of This Feſtival, Agrippa went early in the Morning to the Theatre in a Silver Stuff ſo Wonderfully Rich and Curious, that the Beams of the Riſing-Sun ſtriking upon it, Peoples Eyes were Dazzled with the Reflexion from his Habit. The Sparkling of the Light ſeemed to have ſomething Divine in it, that mov'd the Spectators at the ſame time with Veneration and Horror. Inſomuch that a Proſtitute Crew of Fawning Paraſites, Cry'd him up as a God: Beſeeching him, in Form, to forgive them the Sins of their Ignorance, when they took him only for Fleſh and Bloud like

Another Man; but they were now Convinc'd, they ſaid, of an Excellency in his Nature, that was more then Humane. This Impious, Nauſeous Flattery paſs'd upon him without either Check or Repulſe; but while he was in the Huff and Vanity of this Contemplation, lifting up his Eyes, he ſaw an Owl in the Air over his Head ſitting upon a Rope, which he found ſoon after to be the Preſage of Miſchief to him, as it had been before of Good Luck. For he fell immediately into a violent Paſſion of the Heart, with Terrible Gripes and Torments of the Guts: In which Agony, directing his Speech to ſome Friends about him, Look ye, ſays he, your God is now Condemn'd to Die; and by This Fatal Neceſſity, I am about to prove all my Flatterers a company of Profligate Lyars, and to Convince the World by Dying that I am not Immortal. But God's Will be done. In the Life that I have led, I have had no Reaſon to Envy the Happyneſs of any Prince under the Heavens; but I muſt ſtill be aſpiring to be Greater and Greater. At theſe Words his Pains increaſing upon him, he was preſently remov'd into the Palace; and it was all over the Town in a Moment that the King was given over, and at the very Point of Death. Upon This Rumour, all the People, Men, Women, and Children cover'd themſelves with Sackcloth, according to Cuſtom, Joyning in Prayers and Outcries to God for Agrippa's Recovery. The King in the mean time looking down from his Apartment near the top of the Palace, could not forbear Weeping at the Sight of the Mourners that lay Below Proſtrate upon the Pavement. This Extremity of Pain held him from that time forward without any Manner of Abatement, and at the End of Five Days it carry'd him off: in the 54th Year of his Age and the 7th of his Reign. He govern'd for the Firſt Four Years of his Reign under the Emperour Caius: The Three Former of them under the Tetrarchy of Philip; the Fourth in that of Herod too; and the Other Three under Claudius, who over and beſide that of Judæa, gave him the Command alſo of Samaria and Cæſarea. His Yearly Revenue was Computed at One Thouſand Two Hundred Myriads. And This did not ſerve his Turn neither, without Borrowing, for he was ſo Profuſely Liberal, that his Income did not Anſwer his Expence. Chelcias the General of his Troups, and Herod the Prince of Chalcis; Both of them Bitter Enemies to Silas, ſent Ariſton to Kill him in Priſon, as by the King's Order, before the Certainty of his Death could be Generally known.

In the Height of his Vanity an Owl Perches over his Head.

He falls immediately into Gripes and Torments; Reproves his Flatterers, and Confeſſes his own Frailty.

At the End of Five Days he Dies.

His Revenue.

This was the End of King Agrippa, who left behind him a Son of his Own Name of Seventeen Years of Age, and Three Daughters. Berenice the Eldeſt, being Marry'd at about Sixteen to his Uncle Herod; the Other Two Virgins, Mariamne, and Druſilla; the Former being Ten Year Old, and the Other Six. Mariamne the Elder was Contracted to Julius Archelaus the Son of Chelcias; the Younger to Epiphanes the Son of Antiochus, King of Comagena.

Agrippa's Children.

So ſoon as the News of Agrippa's Death came to be Publiquely known, the People of Cæſarea and Sebaſte were ſo far from doing Right to the Obligations he had laid upon them, that on the Contrary, they Beſpatter'd his Name and Memory with the Lewdeſt Calumnies that could be Invented. And to aſſiſt the Scandal, there happen'd to be a Rabble of Soldiers there at that time, that in a Multitude lugg'd away the Statues of his Three Daughters out of the Palace, and carry'd them in Triumph into Publique Bawdy-Houſes, Reviling them, after their Brutal Barbarous Way, in Terms not to be Repeated, Feaſting and Buffooning in the Streets, with Flowers and Garlands upon their Heads; Oyntments and Perfumes, as upon a Sacrifice to Charon, and Drinking Thankſgiving Cups for the Death of their King. This was their Entertainment without ever ſo much as thinking of the Good Offices they had ſo lately receiv'd from Agrippa, or of thoſe of Former Days from his Grandfather Herod, the Founder of thoſe Magnificent Cities, and of the Ports and Temples belonging to them.

Cæſarea and Sebaſte Ungrateful to the Memory of Agrippa.

Scandalous and Brutal Affronts

Agrippa, the Son of the Deceaſed, was at this time at Rome, and train'd-up in the Court of Claudius: who had no ſooner heard of the Death of the Father, and the Inhumane Indignities that thoſe Ungrateful Wretches of Cæſarea and Sebaſte had put upon his Memory, but Expreſſing as Great a Sorrow for the Loſs of Agrippa, as an Indignation for the Ingratitude of the Other, he took up a Reſolution within himſelf, immediately to ſend away the Son to take Poſſeſſion of the Kingdom of his Father; which was but Purſuant to an Oath he had taken, as well as Agreeable to the very Equity and Reaſon of the Thing. But upon the Diſſuaſion of the Favourite-People he had about him, he was eaſily Diverted from his purpoſe. They told him it was not ſafe to venture ſo Great a Truſt in the Hands of a Raw Young Man; for it was ſo Nice a Commiſſion; that the beſt Head he had in the Empire would find enough to do to Menage it.

Claudius propoſes the Son to ſucceed his Father; but he is diverted from it by his Favourites.

Upon This Plauſible Inſinuation, Claudius chang'd his Mind, and gave the whole Command to Cuſpius Fadus, but with This Proviſional Deference to the Memory of the the Dead, that he ſhould not upon any Terms take Marcus into his Government, in regard that he had been a Profeſs'd Enemy to Agrippa. And he Charged him yet more Expreſly, to Puniſh the People of Cæſarea and Sebaſte very ſeverely, for the Barbarous Affronts they had put upon the Honour of Agrippa and his Daughters: Commanding him alſo to ſend away the Five Cohorts, and the reſt of the Troups that were in Thoſe Two Towns, to Pontus; and to Detach a Body of Choice-Men out of the Roman Legions in Syria, to ſupply their Places. But this laſt Order was not obſerv'd; for Claudius was prevail'd with, upon an Humble Application, to Continue thoſe Troups ſtill in Judæa. This gave the Riſe to the Miſerable Calamities that the Jews ſuffer'd afterward; and prov'd the very Seminary of the Following Wars under the Government of Florus: Inſomuch that Veſpaſian, though the Conquerour, was fain to Tranſport them out of that Country.

CHAP. I.

Claudius gives Marsus's Commission to Cassius Longinus. A Quarrel betwixt the Jews and the Philadelphians. Three of the Ringleaders punished. Ptolomæus put to Death. Cæsar orders the Holy Robes to be deposited in Antonia, as formerly; upon certain Conditions. Agrippa moves in their Favour, and the Request is Granted. Claudius to the Senate. Canthara remov'd from the High-Priesthood, and Joseph put in his Place.

AFter the Death of Agrippa, (as in the Former Book) the Emperour took away Marsus's Commission for Syria, and gave it to Cassius Longinus, out of a Respect to the Memory of his Friend the Late King, who in his Life-time had Written several Letters to Claudius, to remove This Marsus from his Government.

Claudius takes away Marsus's Commission, and gives it Cassius-Longinus.

Cuspius Fadus, coming at the same time to Enter upon his Command in Judæa, found the Jews beyond Jordan, and the Philadelphians, together by the Ears about the Bounds of a Small Village called Mias: a Bold and a Warlike People. The Beyond-Jordan-Men had taken-up Arms it seems upon their Own Heads, without any Colour of Authority from their Superiors, and kill'd several of the Philadelphians. Fadus took This Seditious Insolence so Heinously, that he caused Three of the Chief Ring-leaders, Annibas, Amaram, and Eleazar, to be laid in Chains; the First to be put to Death; and the Other Two Banish'd. If they thought, says he, that the Philadelphians had wrong'd them, Why had not I the Hearing of the Cause? But for them to presume to make War upon it, and to be their Own Judges and Carvers, was an Affront (he said) utterly Intolerable.

The Jews beyond Jordan and the Philadelphians together by the Ears.

The 3 Ringleaders Punished; Annibas put to Death, Amaram, and Eleazar Banish'd.

Soon after This, the Famous Captain of the Robbers, Tholomeus, that had made such Havock in Idumæa and Arabia, was brought to him Bound; and he Sentenc'd him to Death, doing all that was to be done also to Clear the Country of that sort of Vermin. He sent after this, to the Priests and Rulers of Jerusalem, and shew'd them Cæsar's Mandate, requiring the Sacred Robe, and the Sacerdotal Stool, (Vestments peculiarly belonging to the High-Priest) to be deposited in the Castle of Antonia, and there to Remain in the Custody of the Romans as they had been in Former Times. They durst not dispute the Order, and so chose rather to make a Respectful Application to Fadus, and Longinus, (who had their Troups about them too, for fear of the Worst) only for leave to move Claudius upon that Point, and so to Respite the Proceeding till they might receive the Emperour's Answer. This Request was granted them, upon Condition of delivering up their Children for Hostages, in the mean time, which they readily agreed to, and so their Deputies went their way. Agrippa, being at that time at Rome, and in Cæsar's Court, as we said before; having seasonable Notice both of their Arrival and their Bus'ness, Petitioned Cæsar on the Behalf of the Jews, that the Holy Stool might remain in their Own Keeping; and that he would vouchsafe to signify his Pleasure to Fadus by an Order to that Purpose. Claudius, upon This, had the Commissioners call'd, and telling them that he had Granted what they came for, bad them thank Agrippa for the Grace he had shew'd them; to which Answer he added this Following Letter.

Tholomeus the Chief Robber put to death.

Cæsar Orders the Sacred Robes to be deposited in Antonia, as formerly.

They get leave of Fadus and Longinus to move Cæsar in it upon giving up their Children for Hostages.

Agrippa moves in their Favour, and the Request is Granted.

Claudius Cæsar Germanicus, Tribune of the People; The Fifth time Consul Elect; the Fourth time Emperour; and the Father of his Country the Tenth time; to the Senate, the People of Jerusalem, and the whole Nation of the Jews, Greeting.

Claudius to the Senate, &c.

Whereas we are given to understand by our Dearly Beloved Agrippa, whom we have Train'd-up, and Tender as our Own Child, that you have sent us your Deputies, (which Deputies he hath also presented to us) with Acknowledgments of our Constant Cares for the Good of your People, and likewise with your Earnest Desire of having the Pontifical Robes and Ornaments in your own Custody; we do freely grant ye your Request, in such Manner, as was formerly allow'd yon in the Days of that Excellent Person, Vitellius, our very Dear Friend. And be it further known unto you, that we have descended to these Concessions, partly out of a Motion of Piety, it seeming unto us a Reasonable Thing for all Men freely to Enjoy the Religion of their Country: and partly to Gratify King Herod and the Young Aristobulus, whose Friendship we have a Great Value for, upon the certain Knowledge of the Friendship they both have for Us.

We have written to our Lieutenant Cuspius Fadus about This Matter, by Cornelius the Son of Ceron; Tryphon, the Son of Theudion; Dorotheus, the Son of Nathanael; and John the Son of John, Dated the 4th of the Calends of July: Rufus, and Pompeius Sylvanus, Consuls.

Canthara remov'd from the Pontificat, and Joseph set-up in his Place.

Herod the Prince of Chalcis, and the Brother of Agrippa the Deceas'd, begg'd of Claudius the Charge of the Temple, and the Holy Treasure, with the Privilege of Chusing the High-Priest, which was all Granted him, and the Power continu'd in the Family till the End of the Jewish War. This Prince remov'd Canthara from the Pontificat, and set-up Joseph the Son of Caneus in his stead.

Theudas, a False Prophet, pretends to Work Miracles. The People follow him; but Fadus scatters them, and cuts-off Theudas's Head.

MUch about this time, Helen the Queen of Adiabena, and [a] Izates her Son, came over to the Religion of the Jews, by this Occaſion. Monobazus, otherwiſe called Bazeus, the King of Adiabena, fell in love with his Siſter Helen, and Marry'd her. It happen'd one Night, as they were both aſleep in Bed together, the Husband's Hand reſting upon the Wife's Belly, and ſhe with Child, he phancy'd he heard a Voice that bad him take away his Hand for fear of Hurting the Child; for Providence had begun a Work with a Great Bleſſing, that would be Crowned with a Greater yet in the End. The Voice ſtartled him, and when he was well Awake, he told his Wife the Story. When this Conception came to light, it proved to be a Male, and the Father gave it the Name of Izates. Now he had had another Son before this, by the ſame Princeſs, which he call'd after his own Name, and he had ſeveral other Sons likewiſe by other Wives. But Izates, in fine, carry'd it from them all.

He has 2 Sons by Helen; Monobazus and Izates.

The King's Partiality in this Preference was ſo Notorious, that it put the reſt of the Brothers into an Outrageous Jealouſy and Envy, to ſee themſelves appear ſo Mean and Deſpicable. The King took Notice of their Ill Humour, but was yet willing to perſuade himſelf, that the Diſguſt might be only an Innocent Æmulation at the Bottom, which of the Brothers ſhould be the Favourite, without any Deliberate Malice in the Caſe: but finding however that Things look'd every day Worſe then Other, he thought it his Beſt Courſe, for ſureneſs ſake, to Diſpoſe of Izates out of Harm's way: And ſo he Diſpatch'd him out of Hand, with a moſt Particular Recommendation, and Magnificent Preſents, to King Abennerigus, at the Fort of Spaſinus; where he was received with ſo much Tenderneſs and Eſteem, that he gave him his Own Daughter Samachas in Marriage, with a Portion of Land by Way of Dower, to a Conſiderable Value.

Monobazus, being now far gone in Years, and drawing near his End, had a Great Mind to ſee his Son yet once again before he dy'd. So he had him ſent for, and then Embracing him with Infinite Affection, he gave him the Province of [b] Cæron; a Country Famous for Aromatick Plants; and patticularly for the Reliques of Noah's Ark that ſcap'd the Deluge, and are there expos'd to View. Izates took up his Habitation in this place, during the Life of his Father. Queen Helen, upon the very Day of the King's Deceaſe, call'd her Miniſters, Great Officers, and Commanders, all about her, and ſpake to them after this Manner. I need not tell you, ſays ſhe, that the Late King my Husband deſigned Izates for his Succeſſor, as the Perſon, of all his Children, that he judg'd beſt Qualify'd for the Honour. But however, ſays ſhe, I ſhall be glad to have your Advice along with me; for One Body's Opinion is not ſufficient to make a Prince Happy, without the Joynt Conſent and Good-Will of the People. She caſt this Complement among them, only to try how the Council ſtood affected. The Queen making a Pauſe after theſe Words, the Miniſters, with a Profound Reverence, according to the Cuſtom of the Country, declar'd themſelves Unanimouſly for the Promoting of Izates to the Crown; being fully ſatisfy'd that it was his Father's Will it ſhould be ſo; as the Perſon of his Family whom he look'd upon to be beſt fitted for that Dignity. The People, they ſaid, were all for him, and they Themſelves ready to acknowledge him for their Sovereign: Or in Caſe of any Danger from his Brothers or Relations, to croſs him in his Pretenſion, they offer'd their Service to remove all thoſe Rubs out of the Way; and to cut him out a Safe, and an Eaſy Paſſage to the Throne. The Queen gave them Thanks for this Expreſſion of their Zeal; but could not agree, ſhe ſaid, to have any Bloud Spilt, till Izates ſhould come himſelf to Order the Matter as he thought fit. When the Council found that the Queen would not be prevail'd upon to take away their Lives, they preſs'd it however, that in the mean time, for the better Security of the New King, they might be kept in ſafe Cuſtody, and ſome other Perſon that the Queen ſhould beſt approve of, Entruſted with the Adminiſtration in his Abſence. The Queen found the Propoſal Reaſonable, and pitch'd upon Monobazus, the Elder Brother, for the Viceroy; ſet the Crown upon his Head; gave him his Father's Signet-Ring, with the Royal Robe, (or the Sampſera as they call it) and committed the Menage of the Government into his Hands, till his Brother ſhould come to take it himſelf. Izates was not long a coming, after he heard of his Father's Death; and immediately upon his Arrival, Monobazus, of his own Accord, deliver'd up his Truſt.

Theſe Women brought the Merchant to the Knowledge of Izates; who Converted him likewiſe to the ſame Perſwaſion, and upon Great Importunities, kept him Company in his Journy to Adiabena, whither his Father ſent to ſee him before he dy'd. It came to paſs alſo at the ſame time, that Queen Helen her ſelf was Converted to our Profeſſion by Another Jew. Izates, at his return to Adiabena, was not a little troubled to ſee his Brothers, and Others of his Kindred Priſoners there. He could not in Conſcience, either put them to Death, or keep them in Chains; and then he thought it might be Dangerous on the other Hand, to ſet them at Liberty, under ſuch a Provocation to a Revenge: ſo that he ſteer'd a middle Courſe, and ſent them away for Hoſtages, Father, Children and all; ſome to Rome, to Claudius Cæſar; others to Artabanus, the King of Parthia.

Izates troubled to ſee his Relations Priſoners. He ſends them away for Hoſtages: Some to Cæſar; others to Artabanus.

When Izates began to find how much his Mother was Delighted with the Jewiſh Way of Worſhip, and Government, he reckon'd it now high time for himſelf to make Profeſſion of what he was; and accounting upon the whole Matter, that he could not be a Thorough-Jew, without being Circumciſed, he reſolved to Perfect the Work by Initiating himſelf with that Ceremony. His Mother taking notice of it, did what ſhe could to divert him from it, for fear of the Dangerous Conſequences that would follow upon it; For, ſays ſhe, your Subjects will all fall off from their Allegeance, ſo ſoon as they hear their King is gone over to another Religion, for they will never Endure a Jew upon the Throne. This Diſſuaſion of his Mother, put ſome Reſpite to the Execution of his Purpoſe: And in the mean time, the King adviſed upon the Point with Ananias, who told him that he was abſolutely of his Mother's Opinion, and threaten'd to leave him, if he went on with that Deſign: For, ſays he, ſo ſoon as ever this ſhall come to be known abroad, I my ſelf ſhall be the Firſt, and the Greateſt Sufferer, as the Author of This Change, and fall under the Notion of a Publique Enemy, and a Seducer. Beſide that Religion being an Act of the Heart, God may be Worſhipt as he ought to be, without the External Ceremony of Circumciſion; upon Condition of an Abſolute Reſignation to the Precepts of Moſes, for that is the Acceptable Worſhip; The other being but a Formal Reſpect of the Body, and God will diſpenſe with that Puntillo in a Caſe of ſo Abſolute a Neceſſity, when the Peace and Safety of your Dominions will be Endanger'd by the Obſervance of it. This way of Reaſoning wrought upon the King as the other wiſh'd it might.

Izates reſolves to be Circumciſed.

His Mother and the Merchant againſt it.

Ananias deſtants upon the Scruple of the Caſe.

But it fell out that a while after, there came Another Jew out of Galilee, Eleazar by Name. He was a Learned, well-read Man in the Moſaique Laws, and a Perſon deſign'd it ſeems for the Final Determination of this Queſtion: For the King's Scruples were not quite out of his Head yet. This Eleazar was brought to Izates, whom he found Poring upon the Books of Moſes. Sir, ſays he, you do not know all this while how Great an Injury you do to the Law, and conſequently to God; for it is not enough to know his Holy Will, without Obeying his Commandments. How long do you intend to Continue in a State of Uncircumciſion? If you have not as yet met with the Law that requires it, pray Read it now, to the End that you may know how Great a Sin you have to Anſwer for, in the Omitting of it. The King was ſo thoroughly poſſeſs'd with what he ſaid, that without any more delay, he retir'd into a Withdrawing-Room, and ſent for a Surgeon, that did the Office immediately. The Mother, and Ananias the Directer, were call'd to take Notice of what was done, and never People in ſo Frightful a Confuſion, For the King's Government, and Perſon; the Publique Peace, and their Own Heads (as the Adviſers) were all at Stake, they ſaid, if the People ſhould but get the Leaſt Inkling of it; for they would never Endure a Prince of Another Religion. But God in his Mercy provided better for them, by delivering, not only Izates himſelf out of Great Perplexities, and in truth, Deſperate Extremities; to ſhew that Piety and Virtue ſhall never paſs Unrewarded; and that God will never forſake Thoſe that caſt themſelves wholly upon his Providence and Goodneſs. But we ſhall have Occaſion to ſpeak more of This hereafter.

The Mother, and Ananias at their Wits End about it.

When the Queen had ſtay'd long enough to ſee her Son ſettled in a Peaceable Poſſeſſion of his Government, and to have the Reputation both at Home and Abroad, of a Prince highly in Favour both with God and Man, ſhe had a Mighty Mind to make a Viſit to Jeruſalem, for the ſake of the Famous Temple There that ſhe had heard ſo much Talk of, and to Worſhip God, and Offer-up Sacrifices in it, according to the Rules, and Uſage of the Place. Her Son was ſo far from being againſt it, that he furniſh'd her with a Vaſt Proviſion of Mony, and all other Neceſſaries for her Voyage, and conducted her ſome days Journy upon her way. The Queen's coming to Jeruſalem was in a Happy Hour for the Citizens; for there was ſo Pinching a Famine in the Town, that the People periſh'd for want of Bread. Their Diſtreſs was no ſooner made known to this Charitable Queen, but ſhe preſently ſent away ſeveral of her Train; ſome to One Place, ſome to Another, to look about for Relief: So that in a ſhort time there were brought in Great Quantities of Wheat from Alexandria; Dry'd Figs from Cyprus, and the like, which ſhe cauſed immediately to be Diſtributed to the Poor, and got her ſelf Immortal Honour by ſo doing. Her Son Izates alſo, upon Intelligence of this Terrible Dearth, ſent Prodigious Charities in Mony, to the Artabanus, the King of Parthia, had to do with a Powerful, and a Factious Nobility; and finding the Conſpirators ſo Strong, and the Plot ſo far advanc'd againſt him, that he durſt not Truſt himſelf any longer in his Own Kingdom, he reſolv'd to apply himſelf to Izates, both for Advice, and Aſſiſtance, if it might ſtand with his Liking, and Convenience. So he drew together, of his Acquaintance and Relations, a Matter of a Thouſand Perſons, and met Izates upon the way: That is to ſay, he judg'd it to be Izates, by the Magnificence of his Train, and Equipage, for he did not know his Face. Upon advancing near him, he firſt ſaluted him after the Manner of the Country, with a Reverence which they call Adoration; and then made himſelf, and his Condition known to him in Words to this Effect. Behold, ſays he, Great Prince, your Humble Supplicant, and do not Deſpiſe an Object of your Generous Compaſſion. It hath been my Fortune to be caſt down from a Throne of Majeſty, into a Private, and an Obſcure State, which hath forced me to have Recourſe now to your Goodneſs for Succour, which I cannot Deſpair of from a Prince that ſo well underſtands the Viciſſitudes of Humane Affairs, and how ſoon my Preſent Caſe may come to be your Own, as your Preſent Degree of Elevation was formerly mine. Beſide the Common Intereſt of all Princes in helping one another; for the Succeſs of one Rebellion paſſes for a Preſident, and an Encouragement to more, when People are Emboldened by Succeſs. Theſe Words were accompany'd with Dejected Looks, and Tears. Izates came by this time to underſtand that his Petitioner was no leſs then Artabanus; and ſo Leaping down to him from his Horſe, he bad him Recollect his Spirits, and Comfort himſelf with This Aſſurance, that the Wound was not Incurable; and that Providence would put a Speedy End to his Preſent Diſtreſs. Prince, ſays he, you may depend upon it, that you ſhall find a more Conſiderable Friend and Ally then perhaps you are aware of; for I will either ſee you Reſtor'd to your Crown, or I will give you my Own. Upon theſe Words, Izates Mounted Artabanus upon his Own Horſe, and walk'd a-foot by his Side, in Acknowledgment of a Duty he ought to the Great King. But Artabanus was ſo aſham'd of the Complement that he ſwore by all the Hopes he had of Recovering his Fortune and Dignity, that he would Diſmount unleſs the other would get up again, and go before him. Izates then in Complyance with his Reſolution, took Horſe again, and Conducted him into his Palace, with all the Honour and Deference that it was poſſible for one Prince to pay to another. He gave him the Precedence in all Caſes, Private and Publique, and at all Collations, and Meetings; with a Regard ſtill to his Former Greatneſs and Glory, and without any Abatement for his Change of Fortune: Conſidering that only as the Common Lot of Mortals, and that what was One Man's Hap to day might be Another Man's to Morrow.

A Conſpiracy againſt Artabanus.

He applys himſelf to Izates for Protection and Succour.

And treats him with all poſſible Honour, and Reſpect.

His Thoughts being now wholly taken up how to ſerve Artabanus, he wrote a Preſſing and an Effectual Letter to the Parthians, to call their King Home again: Offering to Engage himſelf upon his Honour for their Indemnity, and that all paſt Injuries ſhould be Forgiven and Forgotten. Their Anſwer was rather an Excuſe then a Refuſal, for they had given the Crown to another; One Cinnamus, they ſaid, ſo that it was out of their Power to receive him: Beſide that the very Attempt of ſuch a Revocation would put all in a Flame. Now this ſame Cinnamus, being a Perſon very Generous, Juſt, and Grateful, in his Nature; and having received his Education under the Care and Direction of Artabanus, felt the Pulſes of the Nobility, and gave this Anſwer, that let Artabanus come back when he would; He himſelf would become Anſwerable for his Security and Reception. Artabanus made no Difficulty at all of venturing himſelf upon this Aſſurance, and ſo went back again. Cinnamus met him upon the Way; did his Reverence in Form; and Saluting him in the Style of KING, took the Crown off from his Own Head, and Placed it upon the Head of Artabanus. This was the Manner of his being Reſtor'd to his Kingdom, by the Means of Izates, after he had been forc'd out of it by a Faction of his own People. Artabanus expreſs'd his Gratitude to his Benefactor, by a Return of all Honourable Duties and Reſpects. He gave him the Privilege of Wearing ſuch a Tiara, and of ſuch a ſort of Bed, as only the Kings of Parthia had a Peculiar Right to Uſe. He Beſtow'd upon him the Country of Niſibis, formerly belonging to the Kings of Armenia; a Large, and a Fruitful Territory; and Famous, for the Ancient City of Antioch; afterwards called Mygdonia, that the Macedonians Erected there. Theſe were the Acknowledgments that Izates received from Artabanus, in Conſideration of the Good Offices he had render'd him.

Artabanus dying ſome ſhort time after, left his Son Vardanes to ſucceed him in his Kingdom, who went preſently to Izates to try if he could Engage him in a War with him againſt the Romans: But Izates was too Well acquainted with the Strength and Con-

Conduct of thoſe People, to be drawn into a League againſt ſo Powerful an Enemy: beſide that having Five Sons train'd-up among them to learn their Language, and Diſcipline, and his Mother a Conſtant Woman at her Devotions in the Holy Temple, he had ſome ſort of Tye upon him, even of Honour, as well as Diſcretion, not to Meddle. Now as he was utterly againſt it himſelf, he did what he could alſo to take off Vardanes, by Harping perpetually upon the Topique of the Wonderful Strength, Courage, and Exploits of the Romans, in hope to deter him from his Purpoſe by theſe Frightful, Bluſtering-Stories: But ſo far was the Parthian from being Diſcourag'd by Big Words, that on the Contrary, he made War immediately upon Izates. But as Providence was pleas'd to Order the Matter, for the Humbling of his Vanity, it had been much better for him to have let that Enterprize alone. For when the Parthians came to find Vardanes ſo ſet upon a War with the Romans, they took their Opportunity to cut him off, and Committed the Government to his Brother Gotarza, who a little while after was taken-off by Treachery Himſelf too, and his Brother [a] Vologeſes ſucceeded him, who divided the Government betwixt his Two Brothers by the Fathers ſide: Pacorus the Elder had Media; and Tiridates, the Younger, had Armenia. Monobazus the Brother of the King, together with the reſt of the Kin'red, taking notice of the Exemplary Piety of Izates, with a reſpect to God and his Worſhip, and the Bleſſings that attended it; and of the Reputation he had gain'd in the World upon the Account both of a Virtuous Life, and of a Man Happy to all other Purpoſes, they began to bethink themſelves of quitting the Religion of their Country too, after his Example, and of betaking themſelves to the Obſervance of the Jewiſh Manners and Cuſtoms. When the Great Men of the Kingdom had got this in the Wind, they Stomach'd it ſufficiently, but kept their Malice to Themſelves, to wait for an Opportunity of taking their Revenge. So they wrote to Abias, the King of Arabia, and tempted him with large Promiſes of Mony to make War upon their Prince, with an Aſſurance, that upon the Firſt Encounter they would leave the King in the Plain Field. He had abandon'd the Religion of his Country, they ſaid, and he ſhould not carry it off Unpuniſh'd. Upon this, they ſtruck a League with the Arabian, and Preſs'd him to ſet about it immediately, without any more Delay. Abias did as they deſir'd, and forthwith March'd away with a Conſiderable Army againſt Izates. The main Bodies were no ſooner come within Sight of one another, but Izates's Men according to their Agreement, betook themſelves to their Heels as in a kind of Pannick Conſternation, and without ever Striking a Stroke. By this time Izates found himſelf evidently Betray'd; but made his Retreat however without any Confuſion or Diſorder, into his Camp: where, upon a Strict Inquiry into the Myſtery of this Deſertion, he diſcover'd it manifeſtly to be a Treaſon Concerted betwixt his People and the Enemy; detected ſome of the Conſpirators, and Puniſh'd them according to their Deſerts. On the Day following he Fought Abias, and Routed him; made a Great Slaughter of one part of the Army, and put the reſt to Flight, following the King Himſelf upon the Heel up to the Caſtle of Arſamus, which he took by Storm; Rifled it; and carrying off a vaſt Booty, return'd in Triumph to Adiabena. Abias prevented his being taken Alive by laying Violent Hands upon himſelf.

But the Great Men of Adiabena, notwithſtanding this Diſappointment; and that Providence had laid them at the King's Mercy, would not give it over yet; but in a Supplicatory Letter to Vologeſes, the King of the Parthians, begg'd of him to find ſome way to rid them of Izates, by taking them into his Own Protection, and appointing whom he thought fit of his Own Nation to Rule over them; for the King, they ſaid, was an Apoſtate from the Religion they were brought-up in, and all the People Hated him for it. This put the Parthian upon picking a Quarrel with Izates, though without any Colourable Pretence in the World. The Firſt thing he did toward the Execution of his Purpoſe, was a Revocation of all the Honours and Advantages which his Own Father had Conferr'd upon him, together with the Menace of an Immediate War, if he ſhould but dare in any ſort to Diſpute his Pleaſure. This Meſſage gave Izates a Great deal of Trouble upon ſeveral Accounts. It would have been a Mean Thing, he thought, to be Frighted into a Reſignation of the Privileges he was ſo duly poſſeſs'd of, and had ſo well Deſerv'd: And then he knew very well again on the other Hand, that even in Caſe of a Complyance, That Submiſſion would not avail him any thing. So that ſetting One thing againſt Another, he came in the End to This Poſitive Reſolution, that he would commit all to Providence; and in a full Dependence upon God's Aſſiſtance, he would caſt Life, Honour and Fortune upon the Iſſue of a Battle. In this Determination, he ſecur'd his Wives and his Children in a Strong Caſtle; laid-up Great Magazines and Stores of Corn, and other Neceſſaries in the Beſt Forts he had; Burnt and Deſtroy'd all the Forrage and Hay round about him, and ſo ſtood Firm, and in a Poſture to Receive the Enemy. With this Return he diſpatch'd away the Herald; and Proſtrating himſelf upon the Ground; his Head Cover'd with Aſhes, and himſelf, his Wives, and his Children, Faſting and Praying, he called upon God as follows. Bleſſed Lord, ſays he, whom never any Creature Lov'd and Serv'd in Vain; Vouchſafe in Mercy to look down upon thy Servant that hath now wholly caſt himſelf upon thy Almighty Power, and Infinite Goodneſs, and deliver him out of the Hands of his Enemies; Repreſs their Preſumptuous Boldneſs; and not ſo much for my ſake, as for the Vindication of thine Own Honour, Avenge thy ſelf upon them for their Blaſphemous Outrages againſt Thy Almighty Power. The Prayers and Humiliations of this Good Man were ſo Remarkably Heard and Accepted, that upon Intelligence the very ſame Night, of the Dahæ, and the Sacæ (People of Scythia) falling into Parthia with a Strong Army, and Ravaging the Country now in the King's Abſence, Vologeſus was fain to draw off his Army, and leave his Work undone, to Encounter this Diverſion; which was a moſt Evident Indication of a Divine Providence in Izates's Favour.

Tiberius Alexander ſucceeded Fadus, the Son of that Alexander who Executed the Office of [a] Alabarcha at Alexandria: the Richeſt Citizen of his Time, and much a Better Man then his Son ſeem'd to be, who Apoſtatiz'd from his Religion. The Great Famine in Judæa that we have ſpoken of before, when the Charitable Queen Hellen put her ſelf to ſo Vaſt an Expence for Corn out of Ægypt for their Relief, happened in his time. And it was at the ſame time alſo, that Alexander cauſed to be Crucify'd, James, and Simon, the Sons of Judas of Galilee; who, while Cyrenius was Taxing Galilee, lay tampering of the Jews into a Defection from the Romans.

Under the Administration of Cumanus, there fell out a Sedition at Jerusalem, that cost a Great many Jews their Lives, upon this Occasion, as follows.

The Feast of the Passover brings up vast Multitudes to Jerusalem : so that Cumanus set a Guard upon the Temple to prevent Tumults. A Brutal Affront of a Soldier upon the Temple; imputed to Cumanus. The Army Order'd into Castle-Antonia. The People take a Fright, and Twenty Thousand smother'd together in the Crowd. Cumanus *takes his Revenge. The Paschal Feast. THE Paschal Feast, or the Jews Feast of Unleavened Bread, deing now at Hand, brought up vast Multitudes of People to the Solemnity. Cumanus thought it Good Discretion, for fear of any Disturbance, to set a Company of Soldiers for a Guard upon the Temple; sufficient to Quiet a Tumult, if any Disorder should happen: which was no more then what had been done by his Predecessors on the like Occasion. Upon the Fourth Day of the Festival, a Soldier expos'd himself to the People quite Naked, which put them into an Outrageous Exclamation against the Beastly Insolence of the Affront; not so much upon Them, as upon God Himself, to whose Honour This Feast was Dedicated. And some among them that were Bolder then the rest, Rail'd at Cumanus, as if the Soldier would never have done it of himself without his Encouragement. Cumanus was Anger'd at the Heart, to ly under so Scandalous a Reproach: But however, desiring them in Fair Words, not to do any thing, at such a Time and Place that might look like Sedition. But he quickly found that Gentleness would do no Good; for instead of being Quieter, they fell harder upon him then before. He commanded the whole Army into the Castle of Antonia, which, as we have said before, overlooks the Temple. The Common People took such a Fright upon the Advance of these Soldiers, that they shifted away as fast as they could; and pressing One upon Another thorough several Streight and Narrow Passages, so many of them were thrown down, and Trod under Foot by their own People, taking it to be the Pursuit of the Enemy, that there were Twenty Thousand Persons Smother'd, and Trampled to Death in the Croud: which turn'd the Festival into a Day of Mourning; and quitting their Prayers and their Sacrifices, they gave themselves up wholly to Outcries, and Lamentations. And all this Mischief from the Impudence of one Bestial Soldier.

This Calamity was hardly over, but it was follow'd upon the Heel with Another. For some of those that had scap'd Squeezing in the Press, and got a Matter of a Hundred Furlong from the Town, finding a Certain Domestique of the Emperour's Travelling upon the High-Way, whose Name was Stephen; they assaulted him, stript him, and took away all he had. The Report of this Robbery coming to Cumanus, he presently sent away Soldiers to the Place where it was Committed, with Orders to Rifle all the Villages thereabouts, and to bring away some of the Principal Inhabitants Prisoners. In the Heat of the Pillage, and Havock, there was a Soldier there had the Fortune to light upon the Books of Moses, among other Plunder. He brought them out, and when he had Storm'd and Rag'd like a Madman, against, both the Laws Themselves, and the Whole Nation of the Jews, he tore them all to pieces in the Face of the People. The Story of this Insolence and Contempt, was no sooner brought to the Jews, but they immediately gather'd together in Multitudes, and went with their Complaint to Cumanus, who was then at Cæsarea, desiring him to do them Right upon the Rioters, not as in a Private Injury, but in the Cause of God himself. The Governour durst not deny them Justice, for fear of a Popular Revolt; but upon Advice with her Friends, had the Criminal's Head struck-off for the Violation of the Law, and so put a stop to the Progress of another Tumult.

A Quarrel betwixt the Jews and the Samaritans of Nais.

AFter this was over, there was another Controverſy ſtarted betwixt the Samaritans and the Jews; and upon this Occaſion. It being Uſual for the Galileans to Travel by the way of Samaria to Jeruſalem, upon the Celebration of their Feſtivals, they happen'd to paſs one time by a Village called Nais, under the Juriſdiction of Samaria, and ſituated in the Great Plain, where there fell out a Quarrel betwixt the Paſſengers, and the Villagers, and ſeveral of the Galileans were Slain. Some of the Chief among them took this Affront in ſuch Indignation, that they animated the Jews to take up Arms, and with Sword in Hand to Aſſert their Liberties. Slavery, they told them, was at Beſt, Scandalous, and Troubleſome; but when that Servitude is accompany'd with Arbitrary Injuſtice, it becomes altogether Intolerable. The Magiſtrates did what the could to make Things Smooth and Eaſy, and undertook ſo far for Cumanus, that he ſhould give them Satisfaction upon the Authors of this Tumult. But the People were Deaf to all Terms of Pacification: Nothing but Arms would ſerve their Turn, and they made Choice of Eleazar, the Son of Dinæus, to Head them. This Eleazar had been for ſeveral Years a Mountaineer; and one that made it his Profeſſion to live upon the Spoil, particularly Ravaging up and down in Samaria with Fire and Sword. Cumanus, being given to underſtand the preſent Poſture of Affairs, drew out ſome Squadrons of Horſe from Sebaſte, and Four Companies of Foot, with a Body of the Samaritans in Arms, and ſo advanc'd upon the Jews; Kill'd them a Great many Men, and took more Priſoners.

Several Galileans ſlain.

The Jews animated to take up Arms.

They chuſe Eleazar for their Leader.

Cumanus puts the Mutineers to the Rout.

This Condition was now ſo Hopeleſs, and Forlorn, that the Beſt Men among them, for Sobriety, Senſe, and Quality, betook themſelves to Prayer and Humiliation in Sack-Cloth and Aſhes, for the Averting of thoſe Dreadful Judgments that hung over their Heads: not omitting, at the ſame time, ſuch Popular Arts and Arguments, as were moſt likely to bring the Multitude to better Reaſon. As for Example. They ſet before them the Deſolation of their Country; the Burning and Demoliſhing of their Temple; the Enſlaving of their Wives and Children, to Prophane Nations; and begging of them upon the whole Matter, as ever they lov'd their Country, their Lives, Liberties, Families, Laws, and Religion, to betake themſelves to more Moderate Councils for the Future; and fairly to go back again to their Own Houſes; lay down their Arms, and be Quiet. This way of Reaſoning brought them ſo far to their Wits again, that the Common People ſlipt away, and the Tumult Diſſolv'd; The Rovers returning to their Old Quarters and Trade again; from which time forward Judæa became a Neſt of Thieves.

The Multitude Unruly, and all Arts us'd to Pacify them.

The Heads of Samaria went now in a Body to [a] Numidius Quadratus, the Governour of nour of Syria, (being then at Tyre) with a Complaint againſt the Jews for Firing and Rifling their Villages: which they were not ſo much Troubled at, they ſaid, upon their own Account, as for the Encroachment upon the Sovereign Authority of Rome, which had ſingly and ſolely the Cognizance of Caſes of that Quality: But theſe People, they ſaid, ran Burning and Rifling up and down, and took upon Themſelves to be their Own Judges, as if the Roman Magiſtracy had been no more then a Cypher. This was their Caſe, they ſaid, and they came to their Governour only for Juſtice. When the Samaritans had told their Tale, and ſet forth their Grievance, the Jews on the other ſide, turn'd the whole Blame, both of the Riot, and of the Combat, upon the Plaintiffs; but laying the Main Streſs of the Charge upon Cumanus, who had been Brib'd, they ſaid, into a Connivance at a moſt Notorious Murder. Quadratus, upon this Accuſation, and Reply, adjourn'd the Hearing; telling both Parties, that he would go into Judæa himſelf, and upon a Perfect Knowledge of the whole Truth, paſs Judgment Accordingly; ſo that there was nothing more done at this time. Quadratus went a little after this, into Samaria, and upon hearing the Cauſe, found the Samaritans Guilty of the Riot. He was Informed likewiſe of a Practice among the Jews to raiſe a Commotion, and cauſed ſeveral Priſoners that Cumanus had taken into Cuſtody, to be put to Death. He went from thence to Lydda, a Burrough that might paſs for a Conſiderable City; where he heard the Samaritans Caſe once over again; and underſtanding from a Certain Samaritan that one Dortus, an Eminent Jew, with Four more of his Own Tribe, had Incourag'd the People to an Inſurrection, he cauſed them all to be put to Death: But as for Ananias, the High-Prieſt, and Ananus the Captain, he ſent them Bound to Rome, to Anſwer for themſelves before Cæſar. He ſent alſo into Italy, the Chief of the Samaritans, and the Jews, with Cumanus the Governour, and Celer, a Tribune, in Order to the Deciſion of all their Controverſies before the Emperour. After this, he went to Jeruſalem for fear of New Broils there; but finding all things in Peace and Quiet, and the Jews ſo wholly Intent upon their Worſhip and Sacrifices, that they minded nothing elſe, he let them alone in the Free Exerciſe of their Profeſſion, and went back to Antioch.

This Agrippa, finding the Jews in danger to be Oppreſs'd by Power, made Application to Agrippina the Wife of Claudius, with Earneſt Importunities to preſs her Husband for a Fair, and an Indifferent Hearing; and for Juſtice upon the Criminals whoever they ſhould be found to be. Claudius was ſo far prevail'd upon by this Interceſſion, that he heard both ſides in Form; and finding upon the whole Matter that the Samaritans began the Tumult, Judgment paſs'd againſt the Plaintiffs: So that they were Condemn'd to Die; Cumanus to be Baniſh'd, and Celer the Tribune, to be carry'd to Jeruſalem, and Dragg'd to Death thorough the Streets, in the Face of all the People. Claudius Felix, the Brother of Pallas, was then ſent Governour into Judæa.

This Young Man, after all theſe Grants and Bounties, conferr'd upon him by Cæſar, Marry'd his Siſter Druſilla to Azizus, King of the Emeſenes, who was now become a Jew. She had been promiſed before to Epiphanes, the Son of Antiochus, upon his Promiſe to Embrace the Jewiſh Religion: but upon his Refuſal to come over, the Match brake-off. As for Mariamne, another of the Siſters, he Marry'd her to Archelaus the Son of Chelcias, to whom ſhe had been Contracted ſome time before, by her Father Agrippa; and he had by this Lady, a Daughter called Berenice.

So he call'd Simon his Particular Friend to him (a Jew of Cyprus, and one that had the Reputation of a Famous Magician) and gave him in Confidence the Story of his Amour, with Inſtructions to try if he could get her off from her Other Husband to Marry him, who would certainly make her the Happieſt Creature under the Heavens. Druſilla, finding her ſelf very Uneaſy under the Reſtleſs Importunities of her Siſter Berenice, unadviſedly entertained the Propoſition; renouncing her Religion as well as her Husband, and Marry'd Felix, by whom ſhe had a Son called Agrippa, who, in Agrippa and his Wife bury'd under Vesuvius.

As for Berenice, she liv'd a Widow some Considerable time after the Death of Herod; who was both her Husband, and her Uncle, but falling under a Scandalous Report of an Incestuous Familiarity with her Brother, she bethought her self of the most Decent way how to Wipe-off that slander, which was by getting Polemon the King of Cilicia to turn Jew, and take her to his Wife, which would pass for a Confutation of the Rumour. Polemon swallow'd the Bait, and for the Fortune's sake, Marry'd the Woman. But Berenice being a Lady that did not love to have her Appetite Restrain'd, quickly parted with her Husband; and he, at the same time, with his Religion. Mariamne grew as weary of Archelaus too, and Chang'd her Bedfellow for Demetrius, the most Eminent Jew of Alexandria, as well for Extraction, as Estate; and at that time [a] Alabarcha of this Place. Her First Husband was Domitius Ænobarbus, one of the Greatest Men in Rome, who Deceased and left her a Widow; in which State she continued a good while, till Claudius Marry'd her. She had a Son by Domitius, that was called after his Father's Name, which was afterwards chang'd for Nero, upon Claudius's Adopting him into his Family. This Emperour had a Former Wife, whose Name was Messalina, by whom he had Children, [b] Britanicus, and Octavia. This Messalina he put to death upon a Jealousy; but for his Daughter Antonia, whom he had by Petronia, a Former Wife, and the Eldest Child he had, he Marry'd her to Nero, which was the Name he gave to his Adopted Son.

He put his Wife Octavia to Death, and Divers Persons of the First Rank for Integrity and Honour, upon Senseless and Fictitious Pretences of Plots against his Person. But we have had the History of Nero over and over so often already, that there needs no more be said upon the Subject: Some are as Extravagant in the Fulsome Extreme of Panegyrique, and Flattery, as others in the Contrary Excess of Rage, and Prejudice; and the Truth lost betwixt them, which is an Intemperance not to be endur'd in an Historian: But I do not so much wonder at these Falsities in the Case of Nero, when I consider that betwixt Partiality, and Prepossession, without any Interest in the Good or Bad of the Story, the World hath as little heeded the Matter of Fact in the Lives of his Predecessors. But for those People that do not care what they Write, let them write what they think fit, since that Liberty pleases them. Judæa infeſted with Robbers, Impoſtors, and Seducers.

THings went every day worſe and worſe now in Judæa; and the Land was quite over-run with Robbers, Impoſtors, and Seducers, that drew the People after them in Shoals, though there hardly paſs'd a Day but Felix truſs'd-up ſome or other of the Gang; as Eleazar, the Son of Dinæus, and a Captain of a Conſiderable Band among them, for one, whom he got Alive into his Hands by downright Breach of Faith; for Felix gave him a Solemn Invitation to come over to him upon the Parole of a Man of Honour, that he ſhould be Safe and Free to all Manner of Purpoſes; but the Thief Truſted the Governour, and the Governour Betray'd the Thief; for he ſent him away preſently in Chains to Rome. Felix could not endure Jonathan the High-Prieſt, for he would be ſtill minding him of his Male-Adminiſtration, and that all Publique Miſcarriages would be laid at his Door; beſide the Diſobliging of his Friends that recommended him to the Government. Felix took all Good Counſel of this kind for Reproach, and therefore caſt about with himſelf how he might get quit of theſe Ungrateful Importunities; for Wicked Men do not love to hear often of their Faults.

Felix breaks his Parole, and ſeizes Eleazar

Dora of Jeruſalem much in Credit with Jonathan.

As he was thus bethinking himſelf, it came in his Head that there was one Dora of Jeruſalem, a Man that was look'd upon to be much in Credit with Jonathan: So he tempted this Dora with the Promiſe of a Conſiderable Sum of Mony, if he could get Jonathan Diſpatch'd out of the Way; as there were Bravo's enow to be had for ſuch an Exploit. Dora undertook the Commiſſion, and by this Means the Bus'neſs was brought about. There was a certain Crew of Ruffians with Privy Daggers under their Coats, that went up to Jeruſalem, as ſo many Pilgrims, or at leaſt under pretence of Devotion. Theſe Blades Intermixing themſelves in Company with Jonathan's Train, took their Opportunity, and ſtabb'd the High-Prieſt in the Croud, and ſo came off without ever being call'd to an Account for That Sacrilegious Murder. This Impunity prov'd ſuch an Encouragement to other Villanies of the Like kind, that the ſame Pretence and Diſguiſe was made uſe of afterward, upon ſuch Feſtival Occaſions, for the Cutting of Throats, whether for Mony or for Private Revenge, or upon what other Conſideration ſoever; and this not only up and down in ſeveral Parts of the City, but in the very Temple it ſelf, as if the Holyneſs of the Place were to be a Protection to ſo Execrable an Impiety. And now what wonder is it, after the Practice and Sufferance of ſuch Abominable Prophanations and Pollutions, for God in his Wrath to Deliver up his City, and his Own Houſe into the Hands of the Romans, to be Purged with Expiatory Flames! The Whole Nation of the Jews, with their Wives and Children to be Condemned to Miſery and Bondage, to bring them to a Right Application of the Providence, and ſo to Sanctify the Affliction to them!

Nero agrees with Dora to have him made away.

Jonathan ſtabbed by Ruffians in diſguiſe of Pilgrims.

This Method of Villany brought into Preſident.

Thieves and Murderers at work in one place; Magicians and Impoſtors in Another.

While the Thieves and Murderers were at Work in One Place, there were Magicians and Impoſtors as Buſy in Another, the Multitude following them in Droves, into Solitudes and Deſerts, to ſee the Signs and Miracles they promiſed them; but they paid dear for their Curioſity, for they were preſently taken-up by the Order of Felix, and Divers of them put to death. There came at the ſame time a certain Perſon out of Ægypt to Jeruſalem, ſetting up for a Prophet, and inviting the Common People to follow him up to the Top of Mount Olivet, ſome Five Furlong from the City; for when he came thither he would but ſay the Word, he ſaid, and they ſhould ſee the Walls of Jeruſalem fall flat to the Ground, and make way for them to Enter the City thorough the Ruins. When Felix came to hear of this Adventure, he made his Soldiers ſtand to their Arms; and breaking in upon them with Horſe and Foot, Routed the Rabble, Kill'd Four Hundred upon the Place; Took Two Hundred Alive; but the Ægyptian that led them was not to be found.

A Falſe Prophet inveigles the People up to Mount Olivet; under Pretence, that they ſhould ſee the Walls of Jeruſalem fall to the Ground.

Felix Routs the Rabble: but the Prophet ſcapes.

The Thieves were now tampering the People yet once again into a Rebellion againſt the Romans; notwithſtanding their Late Defeat. The Yoke was Intolerable, they ſaid, Why did they not ſhake it off? And at this Rate they went Railing up and down from Place to Place; Burning and Pillaging all that would not joyn with them.

There

There fell out another Unlucky Squabble at the same time too; betwixt the Cæsarean Jews and the Syrians, upon the Question of some certain Privileges. The Jews Claimed a Precedency in the Right of their King Herod as the First Founder of that City: which the Syrians did not deny: but not of the Tower of Straton; they said, which was Originally the Name of the Place, before ever any Jew had set Footing there. When the Report of this Controversy came to the Knowledge of the Neighbouring Governours, they caused the Incendiaries on both sides to be taken-up, and Whipt, which for a while put some stop to the Tumult: But the Town Jews, after all this, valuing themselves upon their Wealth, fell to Vilifying and Reproaching the Syrians with Foul Language; who returned it again upon the Jews, having several Soldiers among them to supply with Confidence what they wanted in Matter of Estate: So that giving the Jews as good as they brought, the Brawl proceeded from Words to Stones, and from thence to Blows, till in the End several were Kill'd and Wounded on both Sides, but the Jews kept the Field. When Felix found that this Controversy was already advanced to a little kind of War, he press'd it with Great Instance to the Jews, that they would let fall the Dispute; but when he saw Words would do no Good, he sent Armed Troups among them, who Kill'd a great many of them; but took more Prisoners, and gave the Soldiers the Rifling of several Rich Houses for their Booty. The Modester, and the more Honourable Part of the Jews, for fear of worse Consequences, went to Felix, and Begged of him to call off his Soldiers, before it went too far, and while they had time to bethink themselves and Repent.

A Squabble betwixt the Cæsarean and the Syrian Jews, about Privileges.

The Incendiaries on both sides taken-up and Whipt.

They fall to Blows.

Felix turns the Soldiers upon them, and gives them the Booty.

King Agrippa, at the same time, gave the High-Priesthood to Ismael, the Son of Phabeus; and the High-Priests Themselves began to divide from the other Priests, and the Governours of Jerusalem; Every Man taking a Guard along with him of the Boldest, and the most Seditious Fellows he could pick-up; Railing, and throwing Stones one at another, and no more Care taken to keep the Peace then in a Downright Vacancy of the Administration. Nay such was the Impudence of the High-Priests, that they sent their Servants up and down into Barns to take away the Priests Tythes: Insomuch that the Poorer Sort of that Holy Order perish'd for want of Bread. Thus it was, and thus it must be where Faction gets the upper Hand of Justice.

Agrippa gives the High-Priesthood to Ismael the Son of Phabeus.

The High-Priests divide from the other Priests.

They walk with a Guard; take away the Tythes, and starve the other Priests.

Felix, being now removed from his Government, and Porcius Festus substituted by Nero in his Place, some of the Principal Cæsarean Jews made a Journy to Rome together, to accuse Felix: And without all Peradventure they had Crush'd him to Death, for the Violence and Injustice of his Behaviour toward the Jews, if his Brother Pallas, who was at that time in Great Favour with Nero, had not obtained his Pardon.

Nero puts Porcius Festus in Felix's place.

The Cæsarean Jews complain to Cæsar of Felix.

Pallas obtains his Pardon.

There were Two Eminent Syrians of Cæsarea, who by a mighty Sum of Mony made such an Interest with Beryllus, Tutor to Nero, and his Greek Secretary, that he got the Emperour's Letters Mandatory to Cæsarea for the Disfranchising of the Jews, and Abrogating all the Privileges that they Pretended to within that City; which Privileges had been hitherto in Common, both to Jews and Syrians. This was Granted him without any Difficulty; and that Grant was the Root of all the Calamities that afterward befel us: For the Cæsarean Jews would never be Quiet after this Letter, till it came to a Direct War.

Beryllus gets a Mandate for Disfranchising the Jews.

When Festus came into Judæa, he found all in Desolation and Distress; the Country laid Wast; the People forced from their Habitations; their Houses Expos'd to Fire and Pillage, and all at the Mercy of a Brutal Rout of Vagabond Free-Booters, that Ravag'd up and down there in Great Numbers at pleasure. These Robbers were called [a] Sicarij from Sica, or the short Sword they wore; a Weapon bending toward the Point, and betwixt a Persian Scymeter, and the Roman Fauchion. With these Weapons they did Terrible Execution by Thruſting themſelves into Crouds upon Great Days, when the City was throng'd under a Colour of Religion; and Diſpatching whom they pleas'd in that Confuſion, without any Difficulty, or Danger of Diſcovery. But otherwhiles again they fell Barefac'd with Fire and Sword as into an Enemy's Quarter, and carry'd all before them.

A noted Impoſter inveigles the Multitude into the Wilderneſs.

There was in Thoſe days a Famous Seducer with a Long Train of a Credulous Rabble at his Heels, whom he had deluded into an Opinion, that if they did but follow him into ſuch a Wilderneſs, no Harm ſhould ever befal them: But Feſtus, with a Detachment of Horſe and Foot, put a ſtop to the Proceſſion, and deſtroy'd Maſter and Diſciples altogether.

Agrippa builds a Magnificent Palace.

King Agrippa cauſed to be Erected near the Porch of the Royal Palace at Jeruſalem, belonging formerly to the [a] Aſmonæan Family, a Stately Magnificent Fabrique. It ſtood upon an Eminence, with a Noble Proſpect into the City, and was ſo Contrived that the King, out of his Bed-Chamber could ſee every thing that paſs'd in the Temple, which was a Thing he took Great Delight in. But on the other ſide, the Principal Men among the Jews were as much offended at it. For according to our Laws, we do not allow of any lookers-on upon our Holy Rites and Ceremonies, and more eſpecially our Sacrifices: So that for Prevention ſake, they ran up a High-Wall before the Seats that Incloſed the Inward Part of the Temple toward the Weſt, which did not only Blind the View from the King's Bed-Chamber; but there was no ſight neither of the Galleries to the Weſtward on the other ſide of the Temple, where the Roman Guards us'd to ſtand upon High-Days for the Security of the Place. The King took this very Ill; and Feſtus, Worſe: Inſomuch that he order'd the Wall to be taken down again. The Citizens made Anſwer, that their Lives were not ſo Dear to them as their Temple; and therefore they humbly deſired Time and Leave to ſend their Deputies to Cæſar about it, before any thing ſhould be put in Execution. This Liberty being Granted them, they ſent to the Emperour Ten Eminent Citizens, with Iſmael the High-Prieſt, and Chelcias the Treaſurer of the Temple, as their Commiſſioners. Nero did not only paſs over what they had done, but effectually Qualify'd it in permitting them to continue the Wall as it was. This Boon was granted them upon the Interceſſion of the Empreſs Poppæa, a Pious Woman, in favour of the Jews. The Ten Deputies were allow'd to come back again, but Poppæa detained Chelcias and Iſmael as Hoſtages. When Agrippa came to underſtand what paſs'd, he Transferr'd the Pontificat to Joſeph, otherwiſe call'd Cabi, the Son of Simon, formerly High-Prieſt.

This Ananus, the Father, was look'd upon as one of the Happieſt Men Living: for he had Five Sons that came ſucceſſively to the Pontificat after him, which no Man alive could ever ſay but himſelf. The Ananus we are now ſpeaking of, was naturally Fierce and Hardy; by Sect a Sadducee, the moſt Cenſorious and Uncharitable ſort of People upon the Face of the Earth, as we have ſaid elſewhere. Opinion, he took his Opportunity in the Interval betwixt the Death of Feſtus; and the Arrival of his Succeſſor Albinus (who was as yet but upon the Way) to call a Council together with the Aſſiſtance of the Judges; and to cite James the Brother of Jeſus which was called Chriſt, with ſome others, to appear before them, and Anſwer to a Charge of Blaſphemy, and breach of Law; whereupon, they were Condemn'd, and deliver'd up to be Stoned. This was ſo ſurprizing a Way of Proceeding to all the Honeſt and Conſcientious part of the City, that they preſently ſent the King Private Notice of it as a very Ill thing done; with a Requeſt that Ananus might have a Check for it, and a Caution never to do any ſuch thing again for the Future. Others were ſent with an Account of it to Albinus, who was then upon his Journy to Alexandria: Repreſenting it as an Uſurpation and Encroachment upon his Authority; for without his Conſent it ought not to have been done. Albinus took this ſo Heinouſly, that he wrote an Angry Menacing Letter to the High-Prieſt upon it; and King Agrippa at the End of Three Months remov'd him from the High-Prieſthood, and gave it to Jeſus the Son of Damnæus.

Albinus was no ſooner come to Jeruſalem, but he apply'd himſelf with all poſſible Care and Diligence, to the Quieting of the Province, and began the Work with cutting-off the Robbers. Ananias the High-Prieſt, at the ſame rate made himſelf ſo Popular by his Affability and Bounty, that he became every day more and more the Darling of the People; ſtill Plying Albinus, and the High-Prieſt with Reſpects, and Preſents: But he had a Company of lewd Servants about him, that joyning with others as bad as themſelves, went Ranging about from One Barn to Another; and forced away the Prieſts Tythes from them, Beating and Wounding thoſe that refuſed to deliver them. There were Other High-Prieſts alſo with their Servants, that did the ſame thing too, for there was no body to Controul them: The Prieſts being ready to Starve all this while, that had nothing but their Tenths to Live upon.

The Thieves ſlipt themſelves into the City one Night upon a Holyday-Eve, and ſurprized the Secretary of Eleazar, an Army Officer, and the Son of Ananias the High-Prieſt. They took him Alive; Bound him, and carry'd him away; and then ſent Ananias Word, that if he could get Albinus to Diſcharge half a Score of their Companions that he had then in Cuſtody, the Secretary ſhould be ſet at Liberty. The Neceſſity was ſo Preſſing that Albinus could not well refuſe the Gratifying of Ananias under the Preſent Circumſtances; though the Granting of this Requeſt proved of very Ill Conſequence in the End. For when the High-way Men had found out this way of Compounding their Villanies, they were never without one Invention or another to ſecure ſome of Ananias's Relations for a Pawn, which they never parted with but for ſome of their own Comerades in Exchange. By this way of Menage they grew Bold and Strong, and laid the whole Country Deſolate.

King Agrippa had now Enlarged Cæſarea-Philippi, and given it the Name of Neronias in Honour of Nero. He built alſo at Berytus, a moſt Magnificent, and Coſtly Theatre, which he endow'd with a vaſt Sum of Mony for the Celebration of the Yearly Shows, and the Diſtribution of Doles of Corn and Oyl among the People, in ſuch a Proportion by the Head. He cauſed the City alſo to be Beautify'd and Adorn'd all over, with Curioſities of Statues, and Pictures, and ſuch a Collection of Antique Pieces, and Originals, from the Hands of the Greateſt Maſters in their ſeveral Kinds, that this Town was, in truth, but the Store-houſe of all that was Rare and Pretious in the Kingdom: But by this way of Taking from his own People to Gratify Strangers, and of Beggering the one to the Advantage of the other, he utterly loſt himſelf in the Hearts of his Subjects.

Agrippa Enlarges Cæſarea Philippi, and calls it Neronias.

He builds a Glorious Theatre at Berytus.

He took away the Pontificat from Jeſus the Son of Damnæus, and gave it to Jeſus the Son of Gamaliel; which created ſuch a Feud between them, that they hardly walk'd the Streets without a Crew of Swaggering Ruffians at their Heels; Railing and Huffing ſtill at one another as they met: Sometimes with Hard Words, and ſometimes it came again to Stones; but Ananias, that had the moſt Mony, got conſequently the Strongeſt Party.

He takes the High-Prieſthood from Jeſus the Son of Damnæus, and gives it to Jeſus the Son of Gamaliel.

Coſtobarus, and Saul, being both of the Blood Royal, and nearly Related to Agrippa, had a very Great Intereſt too, and each of them a Band of Bravo's at his Beck to Execute his Commands, and to Fight his Quarrels. They were naturally Inſolent and Rapacious, where they had to do with Poor People that they might Trample upon. From this Juncture it is that we may date the Mortal Declenſion of our Common-Wealth, which from this time forward went on ſtill from Bad to Worſe.

Coſtobarus and Saul had the Ruffians ſtill at their Heels.

When Albinus heard that Geſſius Florus was coming to ſucceed him, he had no better way, he thought, to Ingratiate himſelf with the Jews, then to do Juſtice upon the people that he had in Cuſtody. So he cauſed all the Priſoners to be brought before him, and upon Examination of Matters, proceeded againſt them according to their Demerits: putting to death those that were Manifestly Guilty of Capital Crimes, and Discharging the rest that were in only for Misdemeanours, upon Fine and Ransome. This was a way to clear the Prisons, and likewise to stock the Country with an Encrease of Thieves.

Privileges allow'd to the Singing-Men of the Tribe of Levi.

Those of the Tribe of Levi, that Officiated in the Temple as Singing-Men, besought the King, and prevail'd upon him, to call a Counsel, and to grant them the Use of the Linnen-Stole, a Vestment Peculiar to the Priests; and suggesting that such a Concession would stand upon Record as an Act of Grace to the King's Eternal Honour. This Request of theirs was Heard and Granted in Form and Manner as they desir'd it; and the Singing-Men permitted to wear the Stole.

Another sort of Levites admitted contrary to Law.

There were another sort of These Levites, that Officiated in the Services of the Temple, and these were likewise allow'd, Promiscuously, to serve in the Quality of Singers. Now all this was directly against our National Laws and Customs, which were never abandon'd but with a Judgment upon the Violation.

The Temple is now finish'd, and 18000 Men ready to Starve.

The Building of the Temple being now over, and a Matter of Eighteen Thousand Workmen that had nothing to live upon, but their Labour, ready to starve for want of Employment; the People not caring to have Mony lie by them for a Prey to the Romans; and out of a Desire to make some Provision for them (for if they wrought but an Hour they were sure of their Wages) proposed the Repairing of a Building on the East Side of the Temple; which overlooking a Deep Narrow Vally, was supported by a Wall of Four Hundred Cubits High; the Stones Smooth Wrought, and White, and every piece Twenty Cubits in length, and Six in Depth, being the Work of Solomon, the First Founder of the Temple.

The Jews petition for leave to repair the Porch.

A Description of the Porch.

But Agrippa, that was Entrusted by Claudius Cæsar, with the Repairing of this Glorius Structure, computing with himself how much Easier it was to destroy such a Work then to Rebuild it; especially a Work that would take up so much time and Mony as that which was now Propounded, he did not think fit to comply with this Desire of the People; but if it might content them to Beautify the City by Paving the Streets with White Stone, he should not be against it.

Agrippa refuses them.

The High-Priesthood given to Jesus the Son of Theophilus.

This Prince took away after this, the High-Priesthood from Jesus the Son of Gamaliel, and gave it to Matthias the Son of Theophilus; and in his Days began the War of the Romans against the Jews.

The War betwixt the Romans and the Jews.

It will be Proper for me in this Place (with a respect to the Work I have in Hand) to give some Account of the Original of High-Priests; the Qualifications Necessary for those that are to be admitted into This Function, and the Number of those that were advanced to this Dignity as far as to the End of this War.

The Original Qualifications, and Number of the High-Priests.

The First of the Order was Aaron, the Brother of Moses; and after his Death, his Children succeeded him; and so the Honour descended in course to his Family: And This Custom of Hereditary Succession prevail'd so far with our Forefathers, that none but those of the Bloud of Aaron were accounted Capable of that Holy Office; not excepting even Kings Themselves.

Aaron the First of the Order.

The Succession Hereditary.

From Aaron to Phanasus 83 in Number.

From Aaron to Phanasus, who was declared High-Priest by a Faction in a time of War, there were Eighty Three in Number: Thirteen of them Officiating in that Station from the time that Moses erected a Tabernacle to God in the Desert, to their Entrance into Judæa, where King Solomon Built and Dedicated the Holy Temple. For at first there was no succeeding to the Pontificat, but by a Vacancy upon Death, whereas it came to be a Practice, afterward, to Introduce Another while the Former was yet Living. These Thirteen Persons Descending from the Two Sons of Aaron succeeded to their Honour in their Turns.

The Government at first Aristocratical; Next Monarchical, and then to the Title of Kings.

[a] The Form of Government was at first Aristocratical; after that, Monarchical; and the next Transition was to the Title of Kings. From the time of Moses's carrying us out of the Land of Ægypt to the Building of Solomon's Temple, we reckon upon Six Hundred and Twelve Years.

The History of the Pontificat.

After the Thirteen High-Priests above-mentioned, there follow'd Eighteen more in Four Hundred Sixty Six Years, Six Months, and Ten Days, in Succession one to another, under the Government of Kings. Computing from King Solomon, to the Days of [b] Nebuchadnezzar King of Babylon; when he March'd up to Jerusalem and took it; Burnt the Temple, and carry'd away the whole Nation, together with Jozedeck their High-Priest, Captives.

After a Captivity of Seventy Years in Babylon, Cyrus, the King of Persia, dismiss'd the Jews Home again, with leave to Rebuild their Temple; Jesus, the Son of Jozedeck, exercising at that time the Function of High Priest. After him, came Fifteen more of his Posterity, that succeeded him in the same Dignity, but in a Popular way of Government, till the Time of King Antiochus Eupator, which was some Four Hundred and Fourteen Years, when this same Antiochus, with his General Lysias took away both the Dignity and Life of Onias, otherwise called Menelaus, at Berytus; put by his Son from the Succession, and set-up Jacimus, High-Priest, in his Place; one of the Race of Aaron, 'tis true, but not of the Pontifical Family. Wherefore Onias, the Son of Onias the Deceaſed, went away into Ægypt, and inſinuating himſelf into the Good Opinion of Ptolemy Philometor, and of Cleopatra his Wife, Prevailed upon them to Build and Dedicate a Temple to God at Heliopolis, in Imitation of that at Jeruſalem, and to Conſtitute him High-Prieſt there, of which Temple we have ſaid enough elſewhere already: Jacimus dy'd at the End of Three Years in the Execution of the Pontifical Office without a Succeſſor; ſo that there was a Vacancy in the Pontificat for Seven Years. But after the Revolt of the Jews from the Macedonians, the Dignity was Transferr'd to the Family of the Aſmonæans, and Jonathan preferr'd to the Pontificat, which he enjoy'd for the Space of Seven Year; and then being taken off by the Treachery of Tryphon, his Brother Simon was promoted to his Place; and upon his being afterward Aſſaſſinated by his Son-in-law, at a Publique Entertainment, his Son Hyrcanus ſucceeded him, who held it for the Space of One and Thirty Years; and then upon his Death, it went to his Son Judas, otherwiſe called Ariſtobulus, who was the Firſt that took upon him the Name and Quality of King; and after one Years Reign, left his Brother Alexander, Heir and Succeſſor both to the Pontificat and to the Kingdom: In both which Capacities he Adminiſter'd for the Space of Seven and Twenty Years; and then Departing this Life he Tranſmitted the Regency to his Wife Alexandra, with Authority to diſpoſe of the Pontificat to which of the Brothers ſhe pleas'd; and ſhe gave it to Hyrcanus, who enjoy'd it for the Nine Years that ſhe Reign'd: But upon her Death, Ariſtobulus the Younger Brother, made War upon him; Overcame him, and Reduced him to the Condition of a Private Man; aſſuming both the Kingdom and the Pontificat to himſelf, which he held for Three Years, and juſt as many Months. When Pompey, upon the Taking of Jeruſalem, carry'd away him and his Children Priſoners to Rome; and Hyrcanus being Reſtor'd to the Pontificat, accepted alſo of the Principality, but not under the Title of King; Enjoying the High-Prieſthood Three and Twenty Years more, beſide the Other Nine before ſpoken of. At the End of this Term, Barzopharnes, and Pacorus, Great Men, and Generals for the Parthians, paſs'd the Euphrates, and made War upon Hyrcanus; Took him Alive, and carry'd him away a Priſoner; advancing Antigonus the Son of Ariſtobulus to the Crown, who, in Three Years and Three Months after, was taken in Jeruſalem by Herod and Soſius: and then by the Command of Anthony, put to death at Antioch.

Herod having now received the Kingdom from the Romans, made no longer any Scruple of Chuſing the High-Prieſts out of the Aſmonæan Race; but Conferr'd the Honour Indifferently upon Perſons, though never ſo Obſcure, provided they were but in Holy Orders; ſaving only in the Caſe of Ariſtobulus; for he made Choice of him, being the Grandchild of Hyrcanus, that was taken by the Parthians, and the Brother of his Wife Mariamne, to Ingratiate himſelf with the People, who had the Memory of Hyrcanus in Great Veneration. He was, in fine, ſo generally Well-belov'd, that Herod grew Jealous of him, and Drown'd him at Jericho by a Contrivance, Swimming in a Fiſh-pool; as we have ſaid heretofore. After this time, he would never Confer the Pontificat upon any of the Aſmonæan Family. His Son Archelaus took the ſame Meaſures too, and ſo did all the Romans after him, that came to be Governours of the Province. From the Days of Herod, in fine, to the Burning of Jeruſalem and the Temple by Titus, there were in all, Eight and Twenty High-Prieſts, that Govern'd in the whole for the Space of a Hundred and Seven Years; ſome of them under Herod and Archelaus, his Son. But after their Death, the Government was Ariſtocratical, and the Sovereignty lodg'd in the Pontificat, of which we have ſpoken ſufficiently already.

[a] GEſſius Florus the Succeſſor of Albinus, to the Government of Judæa, by the Appointment of Nero, was the Man that made the Jews perfectly Miſerable. He was by Birth a Clazomenian, and the Husband of Cleopatra, whom he brought along with him: a Woman every jot as bad as himſelf. It was by her Intereſt in the Empreſs Poppæa, that he obtain'd This Dignity, which he Abuſed afterwards to ſuch a Degree, that the Jews would have accounted it a Bleſſing if they could but have

Florus worse then Albinus. chang'd him for Albinus again; for though he had as much Malice and Miſchief in him as his Heart and Head would hold; He carry'd it as Cloſe and Private as he could yet: Whereas Florus, on the Contrary, made an Open Profeſſion and Oſtentation of his Wickeneſs; as if it had been the Bus'neſs of his Commiſſion to undo the Nation.

The Character of Florus. He was Rapacious beyond Meaſure; Inexorably Cruel, and ſo Inſatiably Covetous, that where there was any thing to be gotten, Much, or Little, nothing came Amiſs to him. He went Shares with the Thieves; which gave a kind of Authority to the Trade, when they knew beforehand they could Compound the Robbery for ſuch a part of the Booty. The Oppreſſion, in fine, was ſo Intolerable, that the Miſerable Jews were forced to Abandon their Habitations, their Country, and their Altars, and to fly for Sanctuary to the moſt Barbarous of Strangers. But without any more Words, it was Florus alone that forced us upon a War with the Romans, in a Reſolution rather to fall all together, then to Periſh One by One, with Infamy and Scorn. It was in the Second Year now of Florus's Government, and the Twelfth of Nero's, when the

The Beginning of the War. War began; and whoever has a Mind to be particularly Inform'd in the Hiſtory of what he did and ſuffer'd thorough the Courſe of that War, ſhall but need to read over the Books we [a] have Written upon that Subject.

The Hiſtory of the Jews from the Creation of the World to the 12*th of* Nero. I am now come to the End of my Antiquities, and to the Beginning of my Hiſtory of the Wars; the Antiquities I have brought down from the Creation of the World to the Twelfth Year of the Reign of Nero, in an Hiſtorical Deduction of what had befall'n the Jews thorough ſo many Ages: As in Ægypt, and Syria; what they ſuffer'd under the Aſſyrians and Babylonians; how they were treated by the Perſians and Macedonians: And how, laſt of all, by the Romans. I have alſo given an Accurate and an Orderly Account of the Conſtant, and Continu'd Succeſſion of our High-Prieſts for the Space of Two Thouſand Years. And ſo likewiſe for the Deſcent of our Kings, and the Courſe of other Forms of Government, as they ſucceeded one after another; their Powers, Adminiſtration, and Affairs: All which I have faithfully Extracted from the Authority of Holy Writ, as I promiſed at the Firſt Entrance upon this Work.

And I ſhall be bold to ſay this Further, that no Man living, My ſelf excepted; whether Jew, or Stranger, could have given the Greeks ſo Juſt, and ſo Punctual an Account upon the whole Matter, as I have done. For without Vanity, my own Country-Men will allow me to be as well read in the Moſaical Law as any Man. And then for my Skill in the Greek Tongue, I have ſtudy'd the Grammar, and the Critical Proprieties of it as much as another; but for the Nicety of the Accent in the Perfection of Pronouncing it, the ſpeaking of ſeveral Languages, is a Thing that our People neither Practice, nor Value; but look upon it as a kind of a Prophane Study Common to Slaves as well as to Freemen. The only Wiſdom and Learning, in fine, that we reckon upon, is a Due Application to the Knowledge of our Laws, and the Holy Scriptures, and a Right Underſtanding of them: An Excellency that ſome Two or Three perhaps of all that ever offer'd at it, have ſucceeded in to their Honour and Satisfaction.

It will not be amiſs now at laſt, I hope, to ſay ſomewhat of my ſelf: That is to ſay, of my Family, and of the Actions of my whole Life; while there are People yet Living, either to Witneſs the Truth of Things, or to Diſprove me. So that I ſhall now put an End to my Antiquities, as they are here Comprized in Twenty Books, and [b] Sixty Thouſand Lines. And I do intend further, God Willing, to draw-up a Short [c] Relation of the Whole War, from the Beginning, to this very Day: being in the Thirteenth Year of the Reign of Domitian, and of My Age the Six and Fiftieth. [d] I have propounded alſo to Write of the Jewiſh Opinions, in Four Books concerning God Himſelf, and his Nature; and likewiſe of our Laws, why ſome things are Permitted by them, others Forbidden.

a The Hiſtory of the Jewiſh Wars was Publiſhed in Veſpaſian's time, long before the Antiquities were writ. See l. 18. c. 2. Voſſ. de Hiſt. Gr. & Valeſ. in Euſeb. p. 48. & Ed. Pariſ. b Ἐξ μυριάδων στίχων in the Original c. I ſuppoſe he Means that ſhort Account of his own Life, which was Writ by way of Appendix to this XXth Book of Antiquities. See Valeſius upon Euſebius. p. 47, 48. for which Reaſon it might be plac'd next in order. d If we point the Words in the Original otherwiſe, they may be according to Epiphanius Scholaſticus, Tranſlated thus: I have propounded alſo to Write of the Jewiſh Sects in Four Books; of God himſelf and his Nature; and of our Laws, why ſome things are allow'd by them, and others forbidden.

The End of the Jewiſh Antiquities of Flavius Joſephus.

The Preface.

OF all the Wars that were ever Seen or Heard-of in this Age, whether National, or Civil; That of the Jews with the Romans, was certainly the moſt Conſiderable: and there are ſeveral Pretenders to the Writing of the Story. Some take-up their Materials barely upon Truſt, and Hearſay, without any Knowledge at all of the Matter in Queſtion. And there are ſome again, that ſpitefully Stifle, and Diſguiſe, the Evident Truth of Things, with Partial Reports, and Falſe Gloſſes; more like Orators then Hiſtorians; in Favour of the one Side, or the other, as the Faction ſtands Affected, without any regard to the Good-Faith, or Reputation of the Work.

No War like that of the Jews with the Romans.

Several Men write with ſeveral Ends.

Upon this Conſideration, I Joſeph the Son of Matthias, an Hebrew Born, and a Prieſt of Jeruſalem, have now be-thought my ſelf of Turning that Narration into Greek, for the Common Benefit of the Subjects of the Roman Empire, which I formerly Communicated in my Mother-Tongue, to the Parthians, Babylonians, and other Barbarians, for their better Information: and I ſhall give further to underſtand, that having Firſt born Arms for the Jews againſt the Romans, I found my ſelf, afterwards, under ſome ſort of Neceſſity to Intereſt my ſelf in their Service.

This Work Originally in Hebrew.

Joſephus a Party to the War.

This Terrible War brake out upon a Nick of Time, when the Romans were all Embroyl'd among Themſelves: and the Jews, being Strong, Rich, and Seditious, wanted neither Men, Mony, nor Good-Will, to Emprove the Opportunity: which they Enflam'd, into ſo Deſperate a Tumult, that they did not only Flatter themſelves with the Hope of Carrying all before them, but at the ſame time ſtruck whole Nations in the Eaſt with an Apprehenſion of being Totally Over-run: for the Jews, as well Thoſe Beyond Euphrates, as the reſt, were all in a Confederacy to Riſe as One Man. The Gauls were alſo in Motion upon the Borders of Italy; the Germans Unquiet; and, in one Word, every thing in Confuſion upon the death of Nero: Some ſetting up for the Empire it ſelf, Others, for making their Fortunes by a Change of Government, the Soldiery as well as the Reſt, and all Bent upon Innovations.

The State of Things when the War brake-out.

In this State of Affairs, I reckon'd my ſelf Bound in Honour and Conſcience, to Vindicate ſo many Important Truths from Impoſture, and Miſtake: and, After having Inſtructed the Parthians, the Babylonians, the moſt Remote of the Arabians, the Jews on the other ſide of the Euphrates, and the Adiabeni, in a Juſt Account of the Riſe, Progreſs, and Event of the War, not to ſuffer the Greeks, and ſo many of the Romans, that had nothing to do in the Controverſy, to be Impoſed upon, by Flatteries, and Fictions, and to continue wholly Ignorant upon the Main.

Joſephus Bound in Honour and Conſcience to Write the Hiſtory.

But with what Face ſhall People Cry-up That for Hiſtory, which has neither Sence nor Connexion in it; nor ſo much as one Syllable (in my Opinion) that makes for their Purpoſe? as if they could not do Honour ſufficient to the Romans, without Vilifying the Jews. Now I do not Underſtand the Glory of Triumphing over a Weak Adverſary. Why were they not Aſhamed rather, of being ſo long about it? conſidering the Mighty Power of the Romans, with the Fame and Conduct of their Generals? which is all Leſſen'd, if upon the Gayning of their Point, they Derogate from the Bravery and Reſolution of thoſe they have Overcome.

The Partiality of Hiſtorians.

The Braver the Enemy, the more Glorious is the Victory.

Far be it from me at laſt to Enlarge upon the Exploits of the Jews, as others do upon the Romans; for the Thing I pretend, is to do Right indifferently to Both Parties, without Adding or Diminiſhing; to ſay no more then I am able to prove; and to Content my ſelf in the Conſcience of an Affectionate and Tender Affliction for the Ruine of my Country: but we were Undone by our Own Diviſions; and then for the Burning of the Holy Temple, it was the Tyranny of our Own Governours, that forc'd the Romans (how much ſoever againſt their Wills) upon That Extremity. Witneſs Titus Cæſar Himſelf, under whoſe Command the Thing was done. How did he Compaſſionate us all along, when he ſaw how we were torn to pieces by Inteſtine Factions, even to the degree of ſuſpending the Final Deſtruction of the City, when he might have laid it in Aſhes out of hand: and all This on purpoſe to give the Authors of the War time to bethink themſelves and Repent. If it ſhall be Objected, that in This Paſſion and Bitterneſs of mine againſt the Oppreſſors and Spoilers of my Country, I have paſs'd the Laws and Bounds of an Hiſtorian, I have Nothing to Offer, but the Impotency of an Ungovernable Sorrow in my Excuſe. For of all the Places that ever fell under the Dominion of the Roman Empire, Jeruſalem was undoubtedly the City that had the Greateſt ſhare in Both Extreams, by Turns, of Glory and Miſery: from the Creation of the World, in fine, to This Inſtant, never any Thing came near it. And for a further Aggravation of the Calamity, we laid Violent hands upon our ſelves; which makes the Caſe yet more Inconſolable. Now if any Man ſhall think me too Senſible in ſo Deplorable a State of Things, let him diſtinguiſh betwixt the Tragical Circumſtances of the Story, and the good-Natur'd Infirmities of the Author.

The Generoſity of Titus toward the Jews.

The Glory and Miſery of Jeruſalem, by Turns.

Upon This Occaſion, I cannot but Blame, and Wonder at ſeveral Eloquent Men among the Greeks, to ſee them only By-Standers, and Eye-Witneſſes of the moſt Memorable Revolution, for War, and Military Actions, that ever appear'd under the Sun, without Concerning themſelves in any Memorials of the Hiſtory: Nay, (which is Worſe) and Derogating at the ſame time from the Ability of Others that were Willing to perform That Office; never Conſidering that what they fall ſhort of in Capacity, and Talent, is ſupply'd abundantly by Humanity and Good Will. And yet Theſe Cenſorious Criticks can take upon Them at the ſame time to Compile Hiſtories of the Medes and Aſſyrians, though done already to their Hands by Ancient Writers; to whom they are as much Inferiour for Style and Matter, (notwithſtanding this Tacit Reproche) as for Deſign. But their way of Writing was to report what they had ſeen; ſpeak upon Knowledge; and to be as good as their Words; without laying themſelves Open to the Scandal of a Contradiction, by any Diſguiſe or Falſe Suggeſtion whatſoever. It is the Part of a Faithful and a Judicious Hiſtorian, to furniſh himſelf with Materials that are New and not Common; and ſo to Tranſmit the Memorials of his own Time down to Poſterity. Now that that Man cannot properly be ſaid to be a Man of Skill and Induſtry that only Tranſpoſes like a Plagiary the Order and Diſpoſition of Another Man's Writings: But He rather that Obliges the World with an Entire Body of Hiſtory, that's all New, and his Own. It has coſt me a great deal of Money, and Labour, (being a Stranger) to furniſh both Greeks and Romans with a Memorial of Tranſactions Worthy to be known. But for the Greeks themſelves, though their Mouths are Open enough either upon the Subject of Controverſy or Profit, yet in the Matter of Hiſtory, which requires Truth and Pains, they are all as mute as Fiſhes: leaving it to a Company of Pityful Wretches that Underſtand nothing at all, to Menage the Province of Hiſtorians, and communicate to the World the Lives and Actions of Princes. But the Good Faith of Hiſtory is never the leſs Venerable with Us, for the Greeks undervaluing it.

The Greeks no Friends to the Jews.

The Duty of a Faithful Hiſtorian.

I might give you an Account here of the Original of the Jews; what they were; how they came to leave Ægypt; what Countries they paſs'd thorough in their Wandrings; where they Inhabited; how long, and how often; and when and whither they went from thence: but at This Time, and in This Place, it would be both Superfluous and Unſeaſonable; in regard that the Story has been ſo Faithfully deliver'd over and over already, by ſeveral of our own People, and as Candidly Tranſlated by ſome of the Greeks into their own Tongue. I ſhall begin my Hiſtory where Their Writers, and Our Prophets left off. As to the Conduct of the War which I was an Eye-Witneſs of, I ſhall be as Copious and Particular as is poſſible; but for what paſs'd before my Time, I ſhall be more ſhort, and General.

Joſephus's Method and Deſign.

The Method I propoſe to my ſelf, ſhall be to ſet forth how Antiochus, Sirnamed Epiphanes, after the Forcing of Jeruſalem, and Keeping Poſſeſſion of it for Three Years and a half, came to be driven out by the Sons of (a) Aſmonæus. And afterwards, upon a Conteſt betwixt the Succeſſors Who ſhould Govern, how the Romans under the Command of Pompey made their Advantage of that Diviſion: and how Herod the Son of Antipater, with the help of Socius the General, put an end to the Power of the Aſmonæan Line.

An Hiſtorical Abſtract of the War.

In the next Place, how after the Death of Herod, and under the Reign of Auguſtus, there happen'd a Popular Revolt; Quintilius Varus being at That time Governour of Judæa. I ſhall likewiſe Treat of the War that broke out in the Twelfth of Nero: and what paſs'd under the Command of Ceſtius; with the Notable Exploits of the Jews upon their Firſt Entring into Arms.

Their Fortifying the Borders upon the Diſaſters of Ceſtius, and Nero's putting Veſpaſian in the Head of the Army for fear of the Main Chance: How This General, with his Eldeſt Son, enter'd into Judæa with a Mighty Army of Romans; the Defeat of a Body of Auxiliaries that were ſcatter'd all over Gallilee, with the Number of the Slain: how he took ſome of their Towns by Force, while others Render'd. I ſhall deliver nothing, in fine, but upon Sight, and Certain Knowledge: with a reſpect to the Roman Menagement of the War; their Government, and Diſcipline; the Bounds and Content of Both Gallilees; the Condition, and Limits of Judæa; the Particular Quality of the Soil; the Lakes, and Fountains; what Towns were Taken; and the Miſeries they endur'd by Fire and Sword. I ſhall do all this, without Suppreſſing any Part of my Own Misfortunes; wherein I doubt not of being believ'd, for I Write to Thoſe that know I ſpeak the Truth.

My next Point will be, to ſhow how the Tidings of Nero's Death coming to Veſpaſian, juſt as he was diſpatching away to Jeruſalem; (the Jews at That Time being very Low) the Affairs of the Empire diverted him, and call'd him away to Rome. I ſhall take Notice alſo of the Preſages he had of his Future Greatneſs; the Changes he found there; and the Soldiery declaring him Emperor, even againſt his Will.

How upon his going into Ægypt to give Neceſſary Orders, the Jews brake out into a Violent Sedition; the Slavery they endur'd under Tyrannical Oppreſſours; and the Fierce Animoſities One againſt Another; How Titus, upon his Return into Ægypt, made Two Inroads into Judæa; how he Levy'd an Army; where he drew them-up; and in what Form of Battle.

How many deſperate Commotions he had ſeen in Jeruſalem with his own Eyes: the Number of his Approaches; the Strength and vaſt Bigneſs of his Works; the Compaſs, and the Thickneſs of the Three Walls; the Fortifications of the City, and likewiſe of the Temple; the Figure, and the Dimenſions of the Altar. All This ſhall be Exactly and Faithfully Reported. And ſo for our Solemn Feſtivals, and the Ceremonies that attend them: the Seven ſorts of Purification; the Offices of the Prieſtly Function; the Sacerdotal Robes; and all that is Sacred, belonging to the Holy Temple. Nothing of This ſhall be either Alter'd, or Omitted; but Punctually ſet down without making it More or Leſs.

I ſhall then come to the Cruelty of our Own Governours towards thoſe of their Own Tribe and Profeſſion; and to the Humanity of the Romans, even towards Strangers; and ſhew how often, and how generouſly, Titus, out of an Honourable Deſire to ſave both the Temple and the City, preſs'd and Invited the Jews to come to an Agreement among Themſelves. I ſhall Enlarge alſo upon the Sufferings and Calamities of the People, and the variety of Afflictions they labour'd under: One while by War; Another while by Sedition; and then again by Famine, till in the End they were made Priſoners: Neither ſhall I paſs over the Deſtruction of the Fugitives, or the Torments inflicted upon Thoſe that were Taken.

Jeruſalem Taken, and the Temple Burnt.

I ſhall not forget neither, the Conflagration of the Temple, againſt the very will and Liking of Cæſar himſelf: the Sacred Treaſure of all ſorts that was there Conſum'd; the Remainder of the City laid wholly in Aſhes: the Prodigies and Portents that preceded the Captivating of our Tyrannical Maſters; and the ſlavery of the People that were Carry'd away; with an Account of their reſpective Adventures, the Eager Purſuit of Thoſe that ſcap'd the Dint of the War; and the Raſing of the Retreats and Habitations of the Conquer'd, down to the Ground. I ſhall ſay ſomewhat likewiſe of Titus's Progreſs through the Country, to put Things in ſome ſort of Order again; and Then of his Return into Italy, and of his Triumph.

Theſe are the Heads of the Seven following Books; which I have Written for the ſake of Truth, not Diverſion, in Confidence, that no Man that knows any thing either of Buſ'neſs, or of This War, will blame me for it. I ſhall only refer the Reader to the Chapters for the Order of the Work.

FLAVIUS JOSEPHUS
OF THE Wars of the JEWS.

BOOK I.

CHAP. I.

Antiochus and Ptolemey Competitors. Antiochus Enters Judæa. and Takes Jeruſalem: A Cruel Perſecutor of the Jews, and Bacchides as Bad. Matthias Kills Bacchides. Judas gets the Temple, and Reſtors God's Worſhip. Antiochus Dyes. Eleazar Kill'd by the Fall of an Elephant. Judas Slain by the Troups of Antiochus.

THE Great Men of the Jews being Divided into Factions among themſelves, upon an Impulſe of Honour; (for Men of Dignity and Power do not Naturally love to be Subjected to their Equals) and This happening at a Time when there was a Competition a-foot betwixt Antiochus Epiphanes, and Ptolemey the Sixth; Onias, one of the High-Prieſts, got the Better of it, and drove the Sons of Tobias out of the City; who Apply'd themſelves to Antiochus with Supplications, that he would break into Judæa, and make Uſe of Them for his Guides. The King was eaſily prevailed upon to do the Thing his Heart was ſet upon before; and ſo he March'd into Judæa with a Mighty Army; took Jeruſalem it ſelf by Aſſault, and put a Prodigious Number of People to the Sword, that were Suſpected to be Friends to Ptolemey. The Pillage in General he gave to the Soldiers; rifled the Temple Himſelf, and for Three Years and a half diſcontinu'd the Prayers and Sacrifices that were Offer'd up dayly there to Almighty God. The High-Prieſt Onias fled to Ptolemey, who gave him leave to build a Temple and a City near Heliopolis, after the Model of That at Jeruſalem: which we ſhall have Occaſion to ſpeak of elſewhere.

See Antiquities, lib. 12. Cap. 6. 7. 8. 9. 10. 11. 14. 19.

Antiochus and Ptolemey, Competitors.

Onias too Hard for Tobias.

Antiochus Enters Judæa, and Takes Jeruſalem.

Antiochus was now Maſter of a Strong and a Wealthy City, beyond all Thought or Expectation; his Enemies at his Feet, and all the Ravages before him of a Bloudy Deſolation. But This was not yet ſufficient to put a Stop to the Courſe of an Inſatiable Cruelty and Ambition: beſide the Malice he carry'd in his Heart for the Difficulties he ſuffer'd in the Siege, to the Degree of Forcing the Jews to the Renouncing of their Country's Laws, Rites, and Religion. They were no longer to Circumciſe their Children, nor to Offer any Sacrifices upon their Altars, but Hogs, which the Law has expreſsly forbidden. This was a Barbarity that all Good Men had a Horrour for, and whoever diſcover'd but the Leaſt Reſentment of it, was ſure to Dye for't. Bacchides had at That time the Command of Judæa under Antiochus, and the World could not have found him out a Fitter Inſtrument for his Purpoſe; being a Man naturally Mercyleſs and Fierce, and as ready to Execute Miſchief, as the Other could be to Command it. It was his Common Practice to Treat Men of Quality with Blows, like Slaves; and Jeruſalem, in fine, was no Other then the Image of a City that was Taken every day over again. This was his Way of Proceeding, till the Inſupportable Inſolence provok'd ſome of the Sufferers to Meditate a Revenge.

Antiochus a Cruel Perſecutor of the Jews.

Bacchides as Bad.

Matthias, the Son of Aſmonæus (of Modin) and One of the Prieſts, drew-out a Troup of his Own Domeſtiques; (having Five Sons) and Arming them with Daggers, Kill'd Bacchides, and ſo withdrew immediately to the Mountains, out of reach of the Garriſons, for their Security. The People came Trouping-in to Matthias, till he found himſelf Strong enough to Venture down into the Plain; where he gave the Enemy Battle, and forc'd them out of the Borders. This Succeſs gave him ſuch a Reputation, that the People, in Acknowledgment of their Deliverance, choſe him for their General: in which Command he dy'd; leaving the Government to his Eldeſt Son Judas.

Matthias Makes a Party, and Kills Bacchides.

Now Judas (upon a Preſumption that Antiochus would not give it over thus) got a Conſiderable Body of an Army together of his own Countrymen: and in the Firſt place ſtruck-up an Allyance with the Romans. Antiochus, upon This, made Another Incurſion into Judæa; where he received a Terrible Repulſe and Defeat. Judas ply'd his Advantage, and gave an Aſſault to the City-Garriſon; being as yet Untoucht. In this Action, the Soldiers were beaten-out of the Upper-City (commonly call'd, the Holy Place) into the Lower. Judas being now poſſeſs'd of the Temple, purify'd it all over; ran a Wall about it; and furniſh'd it a-new with all Sorts of Veſſels for the Service of God's Worſhip; the Other being look'd upon, as Polluted, and Prophan'd. He caus'd to be Erected alſo Another Altar, and Sacrifices to be Offer'd upon it: but ſo ſoon as ever the Religion was reſtor'd, Antiochus dy'd.

Judas gets the Temple, and Reſtores God's Worſhip.

Antiochus dies, and his Son Antiochus ſucceeds him.

This Antiochus was followed by Another of the ſame Name; the Succeſſor of his Father's Enmity to the Jews, as well as of his Crown. He put himſelf in the Head of an Army of 50000 Foot, near 5000 Horſe, and 80 Elephants; and ſo fell-in upon Judæa by the Way of the Mountains. He took the Town of Beth-ſura; and paſſing thorough a Narrow Defile, in a place call'd Beth-zacharias, Judas Engag'd him in the Paſs; and before the Armies could Joyn, his Brother Eleazar taking Notice of one Elephant Taller then the reſt, with a Great Caſtle upon his Back and Golden glorious Trappings, he gave for granted that the Rider muſt needs be Antiochus. In This Confidence, he advanc'd upon the Enemy, and made his Way into their Body, up to the Elephant; but finding that the Perſon upon him, whom he took for the King, was out of his reach, he Stabb'd the Beaſt into the Guts, and was Cruſh'd to death under the Weight of him upon his Fall: giving only to Underſtand how much a Brave Man valu'd his Honour above his Life. But he, it ſeems, that rode This Elephant, was only a Private Man; and if it had been Antiochus Himſelf, Eleazar could have got no more by't then the Reputation of Sacrificing his Life to the very Hope of ſo Heroical an Exploit. This Diſappointment was look'd upon by his Brother, as a Preſage to the Fate of That Battle: for though the Jews Maintain'd a Long and an Obſtinate Fight, they were yet in the End Overborn by Numbers; and after a Great Loſs of Men, Judas, with the Remainder, retir'd into the Toparchy of Gophnis; but Antiochus went his Way to Jeruſalem: and after a Few days ſtay, was forc'd to withdraw again for want of Neceſſaries; leaving behind him a Competent Garriſon, and ſending the reſt to take their Winter-Quarters in Syria.

Eleazar cruſh'd to death by the Fall of an Elephant.

The King being now out of the way, Judas was not Idle; but taking Heart upon the Recourſe to him of ſeveral of his own Nation, together with Thoſe that had ſcap'd out of the late Battle, he encounter'd ſome of the Troups of Antiochus at a place call'd Adaſa; where he made himſelf ſo Signal by his Conduct and Valour, that being known in the Battle, he was Oppreſs'd by Multitudes, and fell in the Action. His Brother John did not live many days after him, being inveigled into an Ambuſh by the Friends of Antiochus, that coſt him his Life.

JOnathan ſucceeded his Brother as Prince of the Jews, and behav'd himſelf with Great Caution and Prudence towards thoſe of his Own Nation; Strengthening his Intereſt alſo by making Friends of the Romans, and coming to a Better Underſtanding with the Son of Antiochus. But all This would not ſerve their Turn yet. For the Tyrant Tryphon, the Tutor of Young Antiochus, had Recourſe to Treachery, and how he might Deprive Jonathan of the Aſſiſtance of his Friends over and above: ſo that upon Jonathan's coming to Antiochus at Ptolemais, with a Slender Train, Tryphon ſeiz'd him by ſurprize; and when he had him Priſoner, march'd with his Army againſt Judæa; where Simon, the Brother of Jonathan, beat him-off, and routed him: upon which, he went away in a rage, and put Jonathan to death.

Simon

Simon went-on at the ſame Rate of Conduct and Courage; took (a) Gazara, Joppa, and Jamnia; made himſelf Maſter alſo of (b) Accaron, and Demoliſh'd it; aſſiſted Antiochus againſt Tryphon, who, before his Expedition into Media, laid Siege to Dora. But ſuch was the Avarice of This King, that though Simon had contributed to the Death of Tryphon, by the Aid he had given him; it was not long after yet, that Antiochus ſent Cendebeus with an Army to lay waſte Judæa, and to Enſlave Simon Himſelf. This Prince of the Jews was ſomewhat in Years; but menag'd the War however with a Spirit of Youth and Vigour. He ſent his Sons before with the Beſt of his Troops, and went Himſelf another way with the reſt: and having planted ſeveral Ambuſhes up and down about the Mountains, he ſucceeded every where; and Gain'd a Mighty Victory: after which he was declar'd High Prieſt. Thus was Judæa deliver'd out of the Hands of the Macedonians, after a Subjection to them of a Hundred and Seventy Years.

Simon Overthrows Cendebeus, and Recovers Judæa.

This Great Man was Murder'd afterward at a Feaſt, by the Treaſon of his Son-in Law Ptolemey, who had at the ſame time his Wife and Two of his Sons Priſoners, and Order'd out his Bravo's to Diſpatch John the Third, who was alſo called Hyrcanus. The Young Man having Notice of this Deſign upon his Perſon, haſten'd away to the City; where he had a Great many Friends, partly upon his Father's ſcore, out of the Reverence they had for his Memory, and partly out of the Hatred they bare to Ptolemey, for his Ill Conditions. Now Ptolemey would fain have gotten into the City by Another Port; but the People having already taken Hyrcanus into the Town, would not admit the Other. Upon This Repulſe, Ptolemey betook himſelf to the Caſtle of Dagon beyond Jericho; and Hyrcanus, being at This Time poſſeſs'd of the Sacerdotal Dignity in Succeſſion to his Father; ſo ſoon as ever he had Sacrific'd, and diſcharg'd the Duties of his Function, he Marched away preſently to beſiege Ptolemey in the Caſtle, and to ſet his Mother and his Brothers at liberty.

Hyrcanus ſucceeds his Father in the Pontificat.

Hyrcanus advanced up to the Place, and had certainly carry'd it, if his Tenderneſs and Good Nature had not hindred him: For ſtill as Ptolemey found himſelf preſs'd, his Mother and his Brothers were preſently brought out and Expos'd upon the Wall for a Spectacle, with Menaces to caſt them down head-long from the Battlements, unleſs Hyrcanus drew-off That very Moment: and Thoſe Menaces were accompany'd with Blows too. Hyrcanus muſt needs be Tranſported with Rage and Indignation at ſo Barbarous a Treatment; but ſtill the Tenderneſs of Piety and Duty ſoften'd him again, on the other hand: the Mother all this while, without any Dread, either of Torments, or Death, adjuring the Son to do Juſtice upon That Monſter, without any regard to what ſhe ſuffer'd; for to Dye by the hand of Ptolemey, ſhe ſaid, would be more Welcome to her then Immortality it ſelf; Provided only that ſhe and her Family might have Juſtice done them upon That Unrighteous and Inhumane Wretch. Hyrcanus, in fine, betwixt the Reſolution, and the Authority of his Mother, was prevail'd upon to reſume his Courage, and to proſecute the Aſſault. But finding that ſtill as he repeated the Attacque, on the one ſide, Ptolemey repeated the Blows and Indignities on the Other; his Courage fail'd him, and his very Heart was drown'd in Sorrow. Theſe Expoſtulatory Deliberations kept the Siege ſo long in hand, that they were now Overtaken by the Seventh Year: Which with the Jews is a Year of Reſt, as the Seventh Day is a Day of Reſt. Ptolemey finding, that upon This Revolution the Siege was reſpited, he put both Mother and Brothers to death, and then fled to Zeno, otherwiſe call'd Cotylas, the Governour of Philadelphia.

The Barbarity of Ptolemey to the Mother and Brothers of Hyrcanus, whom he afterwards puts to death.

Antiochus, bearing an Old Grudge in his Mind, for a Defeat Simon had formerly given him, carry'd an Army into Judæa; with a Reſolution to be Reveng'd upon the Son for the Father's ſake; and there ſat down before Jeruſalem, and beſieged Hyrcanus in it. Hyrcanus, in This Diſtreſs, Open'd the Sepulchre of David; (the Richeſt Prince that ever was) took upward of (c) Three Thouſand Talents out of it, and came to a Compoſition with Antiochus for Three Hundred Talents to raiſe the Siege. This was the Firſt Prince of the Jews that ever entertain'd Forreign Mercenaries.

Antiochus lays Siege to Jeruſalem.

Antiochus having now quitted Jeruſalem, and being upon the March with all his Troups into Media; Hyrcanus took his Time, and preſently mov'd toward Syria, upon Intelligence that their Towns were neither Mann'd nor Fortify'd; which

He went afterward to Samaria, a City re-built by King Herod, and now call'd Sebaſte. He begirt the Place on all hands, and Committed the Care of the Siege to his Sons Ariſtobulus and Antigonus; Who brought them to ſuch a Diſtreſs for want of Food, that the People were forc'd to make Shift with that which, in truth, was not Man's Meat. In This Extremity, they addreſs'd themſelves to Antiochus (otherwiſe call'd (c) Aſpendius) for Succour; who came readily to their Aſſiſtance, but to his Own Undoing; for the Two Brothers gave him a Total Overthrow, following him upon the purſuit as far as Scythopolis: but in the End he gave them the Slip. Ariſtobulus and Antigonus returned, after This, to Samaria; ſhut them up again; forc'd the City, and laid it in Rubbiſh; carrying away the Inhabitants Captives. Every Thing ſucceeding thus to their Wiſh, the Soldiers Well-diſpos'd and Chearful, they would not ſuffer the good Humour to Cool; but in That Heat March'd as far as Scythopolis: where they came to a Partition of the Lands about Mount Carmel, among them.

JOHN and his Sons were ſo Proſperous in all they Undertook, that in pure Spite and Envy, the Nations enter'd into Conſpiracies againſt them, and would never let them be Quiet till they Themſelves were brought to Reaſon by Open War. After That Deciſion, the Remainder of John's Life and Government was Eaſy and Happy; and at the End of Three and Thirty Years, he departed This Life, leaving Five Sons behind him. He was ſo Good a Man that never any Creature had reaſon to Complain of him. A Singular Felicity! and he was in poſſeſſion likewiſe of Three Other Advantages almoſt peculiar to Himſelf. He was at the ſame Time, a Prince, a High-Prieſt, and a Prophet: receiving his Revelations from God Himſelf, and ſeldom or never Fail'd in his Predictions. As to his Two Eldeſt Sons, he foreſaw, and foretold, that their Dominion would not laſt long. It will be worth the while to write the Hiſtory of their Lives, and to ſhew how ſhort they fell of the Reputation and Happineſs of their Father.

The Death and Character of Hyrcanus.

After the Death of Hyrcanus, Ariſtobulus, the Eldeſt Son, tranſlated the Principality into a Monarchy, and in the Firſt place ſet the Crown upon his own Head. This was 481 Years and 3 Months after the Return of the People into Judæa from the Captivity of Babylon. Ariſtobulus had ſo great a Kindneſs for his Brother Antigonus, that he made him a Co-partner with him in the Royal Dignity; but the reſt of his Brethren were taken into Cuſtody, and he cauſed his Mother to be clapt up too, for pretending ſome ſort of Right to the Government, upon a Suggeſtion that John had left the Regency in her Hand: proceeding, in ſhort, to That Exceſs of Cruelty that he Starv'd her in the very Priſon.

Ariſtobulus ſtarves his Mother, and puts his Brother Antigonus to death.

But Ariſtobulus was Effectually puniſh'd for Theſe Unnatural Violences, in the Loſs of Antigonus; whom he cauſed to be put to death, upon the Calumnies of a Faction, whoſe Bus'neſs it was to make him Odious. Now Ariſtobulus had ſo Great a Tenderneſs for his Brother (having made him, as I ſaid, his Companion in the Government) and ſo fair an Opinion of him, that it was a good while while before he would believe thoſe ſpiteful Stories to be any other then Forgery and Slander. But there fell-out one Time an Unlucky Accident: Ariſtobulus happen'd to fall Sick during the Celebration of the Feaſt of Tabernacles, and Antigonus, in the mean-time, to come back from the Camp to Jeruſalem in all his Bravery. Toward the End of the Solemnity, he Marched up to the Temple in an Extraordinary Pomp and Dreſs, with a Train of Armed Men at his Heels; and the more Glorious he appear'd, the Greater Honour (as he intended it) he did his Brother; but All This upon an Impulſe principally of Devotion. The Court-Paraſites and Tale-bearers went preſently Open Mouth to the King upon this Occaſion. They did not Underſtand This Clutter of Arms and Soldiers, they ſaid, nor was it for a Private Man to March with Troups and Guards: Neither could Antigonus have any Honeſt End in this Parade. But the Honour of a Share in the Government would not ſerve his Turn, they ſaw, without the Poſſeſſion of it.

Ariſtobulus was ſo far prevail'd upon by little and little, though with ſome Difficulty, that he bethought himſelf of providing againſt all Hazards, without diſcovering any ſort of Jealouſy. He Lodg'd at That time in the Caſtle of Baris, afterwards call'd Antonia: where he ſent for his Guards, and Order'd them to wait for Antigonus in a Certain Dark Paſſage under Ground there. If he came without Arms, they ſhould let him go; but if otherwiſe, they were to Kill him upon the Place. Ariſtobulus, upon This, ſends for Antigonus to come to him; but to bring no Arms along with him. The Queen Concerted the Plot with the Conſpirators, Artfully enough, by engaging the King's Meſſenger not to deliver the Right Meſſage: but rather to tell Antigonus, that the King heard of a Wonderful Suit of Arms he had got in Gallilee; and being at preſent a little Indiſpos'd, he had a great mind to ſee him as ſoon as he could, and that he ſhould come accoutr'd in Thoſe Arms. Antigonus (without the leaſt Suſpicion of his Brother's good Faith and Kindneſs) made all the Haſt he could to Dreſs, and away, as if he had been to Shew himſelf: but in the Blind Paſſage before ſpoken of (known by the Name of Straton's Tower) the Guards Fell upon him, and Kill'd him. This Inſtance may ſerve for a Leſſon to us, that the Bonds of Nature, Equity, and Friendſhip, are all Cancell'd, where the Ear is once Open'd to Pick-thanks and Tale-bearers: and that there's no Truſting to Court-Favours.

A ſtrange Prediction of one Judas, an Eſſene.

In This Place I muſt not forget a Memorable Story of One Judas: by Sect an Eſſene; a Man Famous for Divination; and One that was never Charg'd in the Way of his Profeſſion, either with a Falſity or a Miſtake. It was his Chance to be paſſing by as Antigonus went through the Temple, and call'd out a-loud (upon the ſight of him) to ſome of his Acquaintance there within Hearing (as He had Followers and Diſciples in abundance). [Nay then, ſays he, the Lord bleſs us! 'Tis 'een time for me to Leave the World. What ſhould we do Living any longer when Truth it ſelf is Dead? My Prediction is Falſe, I perceive, and I have foretold a Lie: for That very Antigonus that was to have been Slain This day, is yet Living. The Fatal Place where he was to have been Kill'd is Straton's Tower: which is no leſs then 600 Stadia from hence, and we are at This Preſent but in the Fourth Hour of the Day.] After theſe Reflexions upon the Preſage, the Old Man, with a Sadneſs in his Countenance that betray'd the Anxiety of his Heart, ſtood a-while Muſing and Thoughtful; and by and by comes the News of Antigonus's Death, in a Subterranean Paſſage; bearing the ſame Name alſo of Straton's Tower, with That of Cæſarea upon the Sea-Coaſt: and This was it that Miſled the Prophet.

Ariſtobulus Sickens upon the News of his Brother's Death. A Judicial Diſtemper.

The Horrid Fact was no ſooner Committed, but the Concience of Ariſtobulus flew in his Face, and enflam'd his Diſtemper: ſo that betwixt Horrour of Thought, a Troubled Mind, and the Torments of his Diſeaſe; his Guts came out, and he fell into a Vomiting of Bloud. The Servant that Carry'd it out to throw it away, caſt it by a moſt remarkable Providence upon the very Place, where Antigonus was ſlain, and the Bloud of the Murderer fell upon the very Stains of the Bloud of the Murder'd. Some that Saw and Obſerv'd it, took it to be done on purpoſe; as if it had been intended only for a kind of Oblation to the Ghoſt of Antigonus. The By-ſtanders gave ſuch a Shriek upon it, that the King over-hearing it, ſent preſently out to Enquire what was the Matter; and the Shyer they were of Telling it, the more Eager was the King to know it: ſo that in the end, betwixt Force and Menace, they told him the Whole Truth of the Story. This Surprize brought Tears into the King's Eyes; and then, fetching a deep Sigh. [Well! ſays he, it was not to be Expected, that my Secret Sins ſhould ſcape the Eye of an All-ſeeing God; or that Divine Vengeance ſhould not follow ſo Horrid a Wickedneſs upon the Heel. Ah! Thou miſerable Body of mine; How long wilt thou keep my Soul from doing the Juſtice

The Laſt Words and Death of Ariſtobulus.

Juſtice that I owe to my Murder'd Mother and Brother! Why do I not rather Sacrifice my Bloud all at once, then Dreyn it out at length thus Drop by Drop? To go-off at laſt in the Bitterneſs of my Pains and Agonies, the Sport of Fortune.] With theſe Words, he Concluded his Life, and his One Years-Reign.

Alexander ſet at liberty, and declar'd King; but Rules Tyrannically.

The Widow-Queen, after the Death of Ariſtobulus, ſet Alexander at Liberty, and Declar'd him King. He was the Eldeſt Son, and reputed a Prince of Moderation: but yet ſo ſoon as ever he came to the Crown, he put One of his Brothers to Death that aſpir'd to the Sovereignty; but the Other ſubmitting to live in a Private Condition, he took him home to himſelf.

After the Taking of Aſoch by Ptolemey Lathur the King of Ægypt, Alexander gave him Battle, and kill'd a great many of his Men; but Ptolemey however got the Day. Cleopatra, the Mother of This Prince, forcing him away into Ægypt, Alexander took Gadara by Siege; and Amathus, the Faireſt Caſtle by much of all beyond Jordan; and the Place where Theodore, the Son of Zeno, had depoſited his Treaſure, and all he had that was Precious. But Theodore coming upon him before he was aware, did not only recover his Own, but took the King's Baggage, and cut-off near Ten thouſand Jews in the Battle. Alexander, by the help of ſome Enforcements, after This Blow, carry'd the War toward the Sea-Coaſts; took Raphia, Gaza, and Anthedon: which Herod afterward called Agrippias.

Theodore defeats Alexander.

Alexander takes Raphia, Gaza, and Anthedon.

It is no New Thing, where there are Great Numbers of People, to have Great Seditions; as at Publique Meetings, Feaſtings, and the like. This was the Caſe of the Jews againſt Alexander in One of their Solemn Feſtivals, and it came to ſuch a Height, that it fell little ſhort of a General Revolt: ſo that in his own Defence, he was forc'd to take Strangers into Pay; as Piſidians, and Cilicians: but for Syrian Mercenaries, their Natural Averſion to the Jews was ſo Great, that he durſt not meddle with them. In ſhort, he cut to pieces upward of Six Thouſand of the Mutineers; and then made War upon Arabia; where he ſubdu'd the Galaadites and the Moabites; made them his Tributaries; and ſo back again to Amatheus. By This Time, Theodorus being Frighted away with the Reputation of Alexander's Succeſſes, quitted the Place; and the Other finding it without a Garriſon, ras'd it to the Ground.

The Jews in a Mutiny againſt him.

Alexander ſubdues the Galaadites and the Moabites. Amatheus raſed to the Ground.

His Next Adventure was againſt Obodas the King of the Arabians; who lay Poſted in the Province of Gaulan: the Fitteſt Place in the Word for an Ambuſcade. Alexander was there Surpriz'd, and driven into a Deep Valley; where his People were Cruſh'd to death in the Defiles by the Multitude of Camels, to the Ruine, in fine, of the Whole Army: Alexander Himſelf Scaping with much Difficulty to Jeruſalem; where he found his Old Enemies more Violent and Implacable now then ever, ſince his laſt Diſaſter. They gave him a Great deal of Trouble; but upon all Encounters he was ſtill too hard for them: inſomuch, that within the Compaſs of Six Years, he deſtroy'd at leaſt 50000 Jews; but he had little Joy of Theſe Victories, where He Himſelf was the Worſe for them. He betook himſelf in the End, from Arms to Reaſoning, and to Attempt the Ingratiating of himſelf with his People ſome Gentler way: but This Vanity, and Inconſtancy of his Humour, inſtead of gaining them over, render'd him ſo Odious and Contemptible, that upon asking them what he could do in the World to pleaſe them? they told him he muſt Dye, and Try what That would do; for they could hardly Pardon him in his Grave, for the Injuries he had done them in his Life-time.

Alexander Routed by Obodas.

They called to their Aſſiſtance King Demetrius Eucærus; who finding it his Intereſt to come over to them, readily Comply'd: and Advancing with an Army, joyn'd the Jews near Sichem. They reckon'd in all Three thouſand Horſe and Forty Thouſand Foot: and Alexander, with only a Thouſand Horſe, Six Thouſand Mercenary Foot, and a Matter of Ten Thouſand well-affected Jews encounter'd them. The Two Kings, before they Engag'd, made a Tryal what Deſerters they could gain over from either Party. Demetrius apply'd himſelf to Alexander's Mercenaries; and Alexander, to the Jews that follow'd Demetrius: in hope of Succeeding on Both Sides back and forward. But when they ſaw that neither the Jews nor the Greeks were to be wrought upon, they put it to a Battle; and Demetrius carry'd it: Not but that Alexander's Mercenaries ſhew'd themſelves Men of Honour and Courage. This did not hinder however, but that upon the Final Event of This Action, they ſeem'd beyond all Expectation to have both the Better of it: for ſome of thoſe Troups that went-over to Ventidius, did not ſtick to him, and the very Compaſſion that ſeveral of the Jews had for their Unfortunate King, tranſported Six Thouſand even of thoſe that had fought againſt him, to ſeek him out out and Joyn him in the Mountains, where he had taken Sanctuary. This Turn of Humour, and Fortune, gave Demetrius ſuch a Surprize, for fear the reſt of the Army ſhould follow his Example, that he quitted his Deſign, and withdrew. But Theſe Deſertions of the Auxiliaries had no Effect yet upon the Multitude; for they Maintain'd the War ſtill againſt Alexander, till they were all Loſt: One part of them Cut-off, and the Remainder driven into (a) Bemezel; where they were All made Priſoners, and carry'd to Jeruſalem. But we ſhall now ſee how far the Ungovernable Rage of an Impetuous Paſſion will Tranſport People, when they come once to Abandon the Meaſures of Honour and Virtue. Alexander made a Treat for his Concubines; and One part of the Entertainment was the Spectacle of Eight Hundred Priſoners upon the Croſs in the Middle of the City; having firſt Cut the Throats of their Wives and Children before their Faces. This Execrable Frightful Tragedy was preſented for a Diverſion to Alexander and his Women, in the Height of the Debauche: but then it ſtruck the Party with ſo Aſtoniſhing a Terrour, that Eight Thouſand of the Inhabitants fled their Country next Night, and never came back again till after the Death of this Prince. By theſe Inhumane Methods, he came at laſt with much ado to Settle Himſelf and his People in ſome ſort of Quiet.

800 Priſoners Crucify'd for a Spectacle.

THis Peace of Alexander was not ſo well Settled, but Antiochus (otherwiſe call'd Dionyſus) the Brother of Demetrius, and the Laſt of the Race of Seleucus, brought him into Freſh Troubles. This Prince having Overcome the Arabians, put Alexander into ſome Apprehenſion for Himſelf: ſo that he ran a Line, with a Deep Ditch, and a High Wall before it; Strengthen'd with Wooden Towers of ſome Tolerable Defence. This Line, or Retrenchment was carry'd all along the Mountains near Antipatris to the Borders of Joppa: But all this was no Obſtruction to the Progreſs of Antiochus; for he ſet Fire to the Towers; fill'd the Ditches; and ſo paſſing over with his Army, march'd ſtrait away againſt the Arabians; putting-off his Revenge upon Alexander that would have hinder'd him, to ſome other Time. Aretas, the Arabian Prince, upon the Approach of Antiochus, drew his Men into Strong Holds: and then all on a ſudden, when Antiochus thought himſelf Safe and out of Danger, the Arabian fell upon him at Unawares with Ten Thouſand Horſe. The Fight was Obſtinate and Bloody; but yet ſo long as Antiochus liv'd, his Men ſtood very bravely by him, though the Arabians made a very Great Slaughter. But when Antiochus fell (as he was ſtill in the Hotteſt of the Action) his Men turn'd their Backs and fled: ſo that upon the Iſſue, betwixt thoſe that were Cut-off in the Fight and upon the Purſuit, the Army was well nigh Totally Deſtroy'd. Antiochus ſurpriz'd by Aretas. A Bloudy Battle. Antiochus ſlain, and his Army totally Routed.

The People of Damaſcus had ſuch a Dread and Hatred for Ptolemey, the Son of Minnæus, that they Enter'd into a League with Aretas, and made him King of Cœle-Syria: who carry'd the War into Judæa; defeated Alexander, and ſo went-off again upon Conditions.

Aretas and Damaſcus joyn.

The King of the Jews having taken Pella, went and Aſſaulted Geraſa, and Carry'd it, though Fortify'd with a Triple Circumvallation; making himſelf Maſter, not only of the Place, but of all Theodore's Treaſure that was laid up there, Both at once. After This, he Demoliſhed Gaulan, Seleucia, and a City known by the Name of Antiochus's Pharanx; with the Strong Caſtle of Gamara, over and above. In This Place he took Priſoner Demetrius the Governour, (a Man of a moſt Infamous Character) and ſo returned to Jeruſalem, where he was received with Joy and Acclamations, after a Three-Years-Proſperous Succeſs. At the End of the War, he fell into an Indiſpoſition by a Quartane Ague; and being poſſeſs'd with an Opinion that Action and Stirring would do him good, he Enter'd into a New, and an Unſeaſonable ſeaſonable War; and Struggling beyond his Strength, he tyr'd himſelf out with the Fatigue, and ſo Ended his Days in a Hurry, Dying in the Twenty ſeventh Year of his Reign.

Alexander's Death.

The King left the Government to his Wife Alexandra, as One that had made her ſelf very Popular by her Moderation and Virtue: a Woman far from the Rigour and Hardneſs of her Husband, and therefore he made no Doubt of the People's ready Submiſſion and Reſignation to her Authority. Neither was Alexander deceiv'd in his Opinion; for the Reputation of her Piety atton'd for the Diſadvantages of her Sex: being a Woman perfectly well Inſtructed in the Jewiſh Rites and Cuſtoms, and One that had ever given Conſtant Proof of her Zeal for the Obſervance of thoſe Holy Laws. She brought Alexander Two Sons: the Elder, Hyrcanus, and Him for his Age ſhe advanced to the Pontificate. And then finding him alſo of a Temper Heavy and Manageable, ſhe reckon'd there would be no Danger in Declaring him King too. But then for Ariſtobulus the Younger, being of a Quick and Enterprizing Spirit, ſhe thought it more Adviſable to keep him in a Private State of Life.

He leaves the Regency to Alexandra,

And Two Sons, Hyrcanus and Ariſtobulus.

Hyrcanus advanced to the Pontificate.

There was among the Jews a Certain Sect call'd Phariſees: that valu'd themſelves upon being thought Holyer then their Neighbours, and Better Skill'd in the Law. Alexandra, that was Bigotted in her Religion, even to the degree of Superſtition, had a Mighty Reverence for theſe Holy Men, upon the Pure Account of their Pretenſions: and They play'd their Game ſo well on the other Hand too, by Fair Appearances and Inſinuations, that the Powers and Privileges of the Government were Effectually Engroſs'd into their Hands. If any Body was to be put in, or put out; laid in Chains, or ſet at Liberty; it was to be All as They pleas'd. The Honourable and the Profitable Commiſſions of the Government, they reſerved to Themſelves; but the Cares, the Expences, and the Difficulties were left to Alexandra. No Creature better underſtood the Art of Publique Menage and Adminiſtration then her ſelf. She made it her Bus'neſs to Advance the Militia of the Nation to the Height. She kept Two Armies a-Foot, and a Great Number of Forreign Auxiliaries in Pay: which made her Strong at Home, and Formidable Abroad. But ſtill as ſhe had all this while the Command of Others, ſhe Her ſelf was yet under the Dominion of the Phariſees.

The Character of the Phariſees.

Alexandra govern'd the People; and the Phariſees, Alexandra.

There was One Diogenes a Man of Quality, and a Moſt Particular Friend to the Late King. The Phariſees caus'd him to be put to death, upon Suggeſtion that he had a Hand in the Crucifying of the Eight Hundred Priſoners before mentioned: who were put to death by the King's Command. Nay, they preſſed the Queen further yet, not to let any One Man Scape that was an Adviſer in That Horrible Action. The Queen was ſo Captivated, that ſhe had not the Power to deny them any Thing: ſo that under That Colour, they deſtroy'd whom they pleas'd, and carry'd it on ſo far, that no Good Man was Safe: inſomuch that ſeveral Perſons of Condition were forced to take Sanctuary with Ariſtobulus; who preſently Mov'd his Mother on the Behalf of Thoſe Perſons for their Dignity's ſake, and for the future to turn thoſe out of the Town that ſhe ſhould ſuſpect to be Guilty. This being Granted, inſtead of being put to Death, they were only Baniſh'd. Alexandra, about This Time, ſent an Army to Damaſcus, upon a Pretext that Ptolemey preſs'd very hard upon the Town: She took the Place, without any thing Remarkable that paſs'd at the Taking of it. Cleopatra was now Beſieged in Ptolemais, by Tigranes the King of Armenia, and Alexandra, at the ſame Time, Plying him with Preſents and Propoſals. But Lucullus being already Enter'd into Armenia with the Roman Army, he March'd preſently away to prevent Miſchief at Home.

The Envy and Tyranny of the Phariſees.

Cleopatra beſieg'd by Tigrones, in Ptolemais.

Some ſhort Time after This, Alexandra fell dangerouſly Ill: whereupon the Younger Brother Ariſtobulus, with a Train of his Servants, (as he had a Great many) and all in the Flower of their Youth, Faithful and Brave, got poſſeſſion of the Caſtles; took what Money he could find; Engag'd a Body of Auxiliary Troups, and declar'd himſelf King. Hyrcanus, upon This Turn, made his Moan to his Mother; who ſo far Commiſerated his Caſe, that ſhe caus'd the Wife and Sons of Ariſtobulus to be ſhut up in the Caſtle, on the North-ſide of the Temple, formerly call'd Baris, (as I ſaid before) and afterwards Antonia, in the Government of Anthony: as Sebaſte and Agrippias drew their Names from Auguſtus and Agrippa. Alexandra, after a Nine-Years Reign, was taken-off by This Sickneſs, before ſhe could revenge her ſelf upon Ariſtobulus, for Endeavouring to Depoſe his Brother.

The Death of Alexandra.

She leaves the Command to Hyrcanus.

Alexandra left Hyrcanus all ſhe had in the World, and Tranſmitted the Government into his Hands, while ſhe was yet Living; but Ariſtobulus was much his Superior yet, both in Force and Credit. The Diſpute betwixt the Two Brothers came to a Battle near Jericho; where the Greater part of Hyrcanus's Men went over to Ariſtobulus:

Ariſtobulus: Hyrcanus and the Wretched Remainder of his People ſcaping with much Difficulty into Antonia, where they had Good Hoſtages for their Security: the Wife and Sons of Ariſtobuls (as we have ſaid before) being there in Cuſtody. Theſe Brothers, before Matters proceeded to further Extremities, came to This Agreement; that Hyrcanus ſhould yield up the Kingdom to Ariſtobulus, and content himſelf with ſuch Honours and Privileges as properly belong to the Dignity of the King's Brother. The Reconciliation being Interchangeably declared in the Temple, and in the ſight of the People, with Mutual Embraces, and the Two Brothers to Change Houſes: Ariſtobulus to go to the Palace, and Hyrcanus to the Houſe of Ariſtobulus.

THis Unexpected Advancement of Ariſtobulus to the Crown, was a Terrible Mortification to all his Enemies, but eſpecially to Antipater, upon the Score of an Old Grudge betwixt them. Now this Antipater was by Extraction an Idumæan; and for his Birth and Eſtate, One of the Firſt Rank of the Country. Hyrcanus being now depos'd, and driven out of his Dominions, Antipater advis'd him by all Means to apply himſelf to Aretas, the King of Arabia, for Aſſiſtance towards the Recovery of his Kingdom: Employing his Own Intereſt alſo with Aretas towards the Gaining of his Point, and Reflecting all the while upon Ariſtobulus, as a very Ill Man; and at the ſame time Elevating Hyrcanus up to the Skyes. He ply'd him alſo with Arguments drawn from the Honour of the Undertaking, and the Generoſity of the Office; minding him that it was a Thing Worthy of Himſelf, and well-becoming the Character of a Great Prince, for One Crowned Head to Vindicate Another: and more Eſpecially in the Caſe of an Injurious Oppreſſion, and Diſtreſs. When they were both thus Inſtructed and Prepar'd; Hyrcanus to be gone, and Aretas to receive him; Antipater Convey'd Hyrcanus out of the City by night; and Poſting away with him, brought him ſafe to Petra, the Royal Palace of Arabia: and There, with Fair Words and Preſents, he deliver'd him up to the Care and Goodneſs of Aretas; who promis'd him he would do all he could toward the Reſtoring of him to his Crown. Aretas, upon This, Enter'd Judæa with an Army of Fifty Thouſand Men, Horſe and Foot; but Ariſtobulus, not being in Condition to look him in the face, was broken all to pieces at the Firſt Charge, and forc'd to take Sanctuary in Jeruſalem: where he was beſieg'd by Aretas, and had certainly been taken, if Scaurus, the Roman General, had not by this Providence deliver'd him. Pompey the Great, that was then in War with Tigranes, ſent Scaurus with an Army out of Armenia into Syria: but coming to Damaſcus, he found the Place taken by Metellus and Lellius, and their Troups drawn-off. Scaurus, coming by This Time to Underſtand how Matters went in Judæa, could not do better, he thought, then to bend his Courſe That way.

They Steal out of Jeruſalem by Night, and Poſt away to Petra.

Aretas Enters Judæa with 50000 Men. Ariſtobulus beaten, and Beſieg'd in Jeruſalem.

He was no ſooner upon the Borders, but he was there Encounter'd upon the Way by Two Embaſſadors from the Two Brothers; One from each; and Both upon the ſame Errand: That is to ſay, their Inſtructions were to Implore the Aſſiſtance of the Romans for each of the Two, one againſt the other. But Ariſtobulus's Three Hundred Talents (for that was the Sum) weigh'd down the Juſtice of Hyrcanus's Pretenſions: as appear'd by Scaurus's ſending away Embaſſadors to the Arabians and Hyrcanus, in the Name of Pompey the Great and the Senate of Rome, charging them immediately to Quit the Siege, and be gone at their Uttermoſt Peril. Aretas preſently withdraws in a Fright, out of Judæa to Philadelphia, and Scaurus returns to Damaſcus. Now Ariſtobulus did not think it enough to ſcape Taking, but got all the Force together he was able to make, and follow'd the Enemy upon the Heel. He came up with them at laſt at a Place call'd Papyron; where he fought and cut-off betwixt Six and Seven Thouſand of their Men, and Cephalon the Brother of Antipater one of the Number.

Hyrcanus and Antipater, being now Diſappointed of the Succour they Expected from the Arabians, apply'd themſelves for Relief to their very Enemies: and upon Pompey's Entring Syria, and coming to Damaſcus, they caſt themſelves upon his Honour for Protection: with an Introduction of Large Preſents, and the ſame Arguments over again that had been us'd to Aretas; deſiring Pompey upon the Main, to Conſider the Violence of Ariſtobulus, and the Right of Hyrcanus, as well in reſpect of his Age, as of his Manners. But Ariſtobulus depended ſo much upon his Intereſt in Scaurus, that he made himſelf as Fine as Hands could ſet him out, and ſo made his Compliment to Pompey in a Royal Dreſs, and with the Train and Equipage of a King. When he had ſtay'd a while: That is to ſay, ſo long as his Stomach would bear Wayting; (for he look'd upon it as a Thing below his Dignity to ſubject himſelf to an Attendance) he went his way back again to Dioſpolis.

The Vanity of Ariſtobulus, and Pompey's Contempt of him.

This Freak of Ariſtobulus gave Pompey great Offence: which was but what Hyrcanus and his Companions wiſh'd for. He draws out preſently his Roman Troups, and ſome Syrian Auxiliaries, and Marches after him. When he was paſs'd Pella, and Scythopolis, coming to Corede, upon the Borders of Judæa, in the Mediterranean, he was Enform'd that Ariſtobulus had taken Sanctuary in Alexandrion: (a Stately Caſtle upon a very High Mountain) and thither he ſent to Ariſtobulus to come down to him. This was ſo Imperious a Meſſage, that he reſolved to run any Hazzard rather then Comply with it: but what with the Murmuring of the People and the Advice of his Friends to Conſider the Strength of the Romans, and the Neceſſity of the Caſe, he was prevail'd upon in the Concluſion to go down to Pompey: which he did; and after many Things ſaid there in Defence of his Pretentions, he went up again. After This, at the Inſtance of Hyrcanus, he came down the Second time: and when the Two Brothers had diſputed the Title a-while back and forward, Ariſtobulus return'd as before, without any Let or Interruption from Pompey. He was ſo divided within himſelf, betwixt Hope and Fear, that one while he was in a Mood to Humble himſelf, and to do whatever Pompey would have him. But when he was gone half way ſometimes in That Reſolution, he repented, and ſo up to the Caſtle again, for fear of doing any Thing Derogatory to his Royal State. Pompey had now a good mind to get poſſeſſion of the Caſtles: but being told that Ariſtobulus had Charg'd all the Governors to take no Notice of any Orders but under his Own Hand, he appointed Ariſtobulus to Write to the ſeveral Reſpective Commanders immediately upon the Sight of Thoſe Letters, to Deliver them-up. Ariſtobulus did as he was Commanded; but went away immediately to Jeruſalem in Wrath, and Indignation; Meditating all the Way he went, a War with Pompey.

Ariſtobulus takes Sanctuary in Alexandrion.

The Two Brothers plead their Cauſe before Pompey.

Ariſtobulus makes away for Jeruſalem.

Pompey gave him no time to provide himſelf, but haſten'd after him immediately; and he went-on the more Chearfully for the News he met with about Jericho, of the Death of Mithridates. This is the Fruitfulleſt Province of all Judæa; a World of Palm-Trees in it, and of the Famous Balſam that drops from the Plant, upon Cutting the Bark with a Sharp Stone. He ſtay'd there That night, and diſpatch'd away the next Morning for Jeruſalem. Ariſtobulus was ſo ſurpriz'd at This Expedition, that he went and caſt himſelf at Pompey's Feet, with Supplications and Fears; Promiſes of Money, and Propoſals of giving up both the City and his Perſon into Pompey's Hands. This ſoften'd him a little for the preſent; but Ariſtobulus, it ſeems, could not make good what he had offer'd: for when Gabinius was ſent to receive the Money, the Friends and Companions of Ariſtobulus that kept the Town for him in his Name, would not ſo much as let him in.

Pompey follows him.

Ariſtobulus humbles himſelf to Pompey.

This Shuffling irritated Pompey to ſuch a Degree, that he kept Ariſtobulus a Priſoner, and ſo advanc'd to the City, to take a View of the Fortifications and Defences, and to Conſider upon what Quarter to Attaque it. The Walls were Strong and Impregnable; a Hideous Precipice at the Foot of them; and the Temple ſo Invincibly Secure, that if the City it ſelf were Taken, the Work were but half done.

Pompey makes Ariſtobulus a Priſoner, And takes a View of the Place.

While Pompey was upon This Deliberation, and caſting within himſelf where to begin and what to do, there brake-out a Violent Sedition in the Town, betwixt the Two Parties of Ariſtobulus and Hyrcanus: the Former were for Puſhing it to a War, and reſcuing their King by Arms, upon a Point of Honour and Duty; the Other, for taking Pompey into the Town, without any Oppoſition. This was the Senſe of the Majority, out of a Dread they had for the Romans. The Friends of Ariſtobulus, upon This, retir'd into the Temple, and cut down the Bridge of Communication betwixt That and the City, in a final reſolution of Maintaining it to the Laſt. Others there were that took ſeveral Romans into the Town, and put them into the Palace Royal: whereupon Pompey ſent Piſo, (one of his General Officers) with a Strong

A Violent Sedition in the Town, betwixt the Parties of the Two Brothers.

Strong Detachment to take Poſſeſſion of it. When Pompey ſaw the Obſtinacy of the Jews in the Temple, and that there was now no longer any Hope of an Accommodation, he Poſted his Guards, and put all Things in order for an Attacque: Hyrcanus and his People Contributing the Beſt they could both in Action and Councel to his Aſſiſtance. Pompey prepares for an Attacque.

Their Firſt Bus'neſs was to fill up That Monſtrous Ditch and Valley upon the North-ſide of the Wall; and This they attempted with what Rubbiſh and Materials the Soldiers could get together toward the bringing of it up to a Level: a Work of Infinite Difficulty, both in regard of the Prodigious Depth, and the Advantage the Jews had of Galling them from above: a Work, in fine, Inſuperable, if it had not been for a Remarque of Pompey's upon the Jews Superſtitious Obſervance of their Seventh Day or Sabbaoth. This Great Man underſtanding that the Jews made a Conſcience of doing Any Manner of Work upon That Day, but what was of Abſolute Neceſſity, either for the Support of Life, or the Defence of it, in caſe of Immediate Danger; he Commanded his Soldiers only to ply their Entrenchments upon That Day, without doing any Other Act of Hoſtility. When the Ground was now Levell'd, the Bulwarks advanc'd, with Strong and Large Turrets planted upon them, and Mann'd; the Romans, with Certain Tyrian Engines they had got, began the Battery: The Soldiers at the ſame time beating the Defendants out of the Towers above, with Stones from the Walls, till in the end they were quite Tir'd out with the Labour.

Pompey could not but admire the Conſtancy and Reſolution of Theſe People, and more Eſpecially in This Particular: that in the Middle of all Extremities and Dangers, they never Diſcontinued the Worſhip and Ceremonies of their Religion, but offer'd up their Daily Prayers and Sacrifices as Orderly, as if it had been in a Profound Peace: And it was the ſame Thing with them at laſt too, when they came to be Finally Deſtroy'd, and to have their Throats cut at the very Altar. In ſhort, after a Three Month's Siege, and the Loſs only of One Tower, the Temple was Taken by Aſſault. The Firſt that Enter'd the Breach was Fauſtus Cornelius, the Son of Sylla, and after Him, Furius, and Fabius, Two Centurions, with their Companies; who beſet the Temple, and put to the Sword all that either Fled or Reſiſted. There were ſeveral Prieſts at That time in the very Exerciſe of their Holy Function, that with the Sword's Point at their Breaſts, went on yet with their Oblations and Incenſe, without any regard to the Safety of their Lives, out of a Veneration they had for the Duties of their Profeſſion. The Pompeyan Jews preſs'd ſo hard upon their Fellow-Tribes-Men of the Other Party, that they forc'd ſome of them down Precipices: Others, in a rage of Deſperation, ſet Fire to what they could come at about the Walls, and then caſt themſelves into the Flames. There Periſh'd in this Outrage 12000 Jews; not many Romans, but more wounded. The Temple Taken by Aſſault. 12000 Jews Slain.

This was a Diſmal Deſolation and Calamity, in ſeveral Reſpects; but nothing touch'd the Jews ſo to the Quick, as to ſee the Holy of Holies expos'd to Prophane Eyes: a Thing that never happen'd before. Pompey, with a Train of his People, Entring into This Place, where only the High-Prieſt was to be admitted; (a) ſaw within it the Candleſticks, Lamps, and Tables for Incenſe, with Other Veſſels all of Gold; a Maſs of Perfumes, and of Sacred Treaſure to the Value of Two Thouſand Talents: but would not ſuffer any Thing of all This to be Touch'd that was Conſecrated to the Service of God. On the next Day after This Deſtruction of the Temple, he commanded the Proper Officers to take Care for the Purification of it, and to go on with the Celebration of their Holy Worſhip as before. He did alſo Declare Hircanus High-Prieſt, as a Conſideration for the Good Offices he had render'd him, both in the Siege and Otherwiſe; in drawing off Great Numbers of the Faction from Ariſtobulus. By this way of Proceeding, like a Wiſe and a Good Man, he ſecur'd himſelf of the Affections of the People. Among the Priſoners, there was the Father-in-Law, and Uncle of Ariſtobulus both in One. Pompey ſtruck off the Heads of all the Principal Authors of the Revolt; but for Fauſtus, and Other Brave Men that acted along with him, he Conferr'd upon them Signal Marks of his Eſteem, and Glorious Rewards. He Impos'd a Tributeupon Judæa. He took away from the Jews the Cities they had poſſeſſed themſelves of in Cœle-Syria; and annexing them to the Juriſdiction of the Preſent Roman Governour, he reduced the Jews to their Own Bounds. He Rebuilt Gadara, which They had Deſtroy'd, in favour of Demetrius One of his Freemen, and a Native of the Place. Scaurus makes War upon the King of Arabia.

Scaurus advancing with an Army into Arabia towards Petra, found the Ways ſo Craggy and Unpaſſable, that he had much ado to march. He laid Waſt however all the Country about Pella; where he had many Difficulties to Encounter, being put to a Pinch alſo for want of Proviſions: though Hyrcanus, by the Means of Antipater, made a Shift to furniſh him with Neceſſaries. Scaurus, well knowing that there was a good Underſtanding betwixt Antipater and Aretus, (the King of Arabia) dealt with Antipater to go to him in a way of Friendſhip, and try if he could work him to Compound the War for a Sum of Money. Antipater undertook the Commiſſion, and Menag'd the Matter ſo Dextrouſly, that the Arabian was Content to give Three Hnndred Talents for his Peace; and ſo Scaurus withdrew his Army.

Scaurus Compounds for a Sum of Money.

Now Alexander, the Son of Ariſtobulus, that had given Pompey the Slip, was by this Time in the Head of a Conſiderable Body of Men Ravaging Judæa, and preſſing upon Hyrcanus, to the Degree of Endangering Jeruſalem it ſelf, upon a Preſumption, That the Walls which Pompey had beaten down, were not as yet repair'd. But Gabinius, the Succeſſor of Scaurus; and a Perſon of Eminent Courage and Conduct, being ſent into Syria, and Marching againſt him: it concern'd Alexander to look about him, having ſo Conſiderable an Enemy to deal withal; and to put himſelf into the Beſt Poſture he could, to receive him. He had now a Marching Body of Ten Thouſand Foot, and Fifteen Hundred Horſe, beſide ſeveral Strong Holds and Defenſible Places, that he had Fortify'd; as Alexandrion, Hyrcanion, and Machærus, near the Mountains of Arabia.

Gabinius, in the mean time, ſends Mark Anthony before him with a Detachment of ſome Choice Troups of Antipater's, and a Great Number of Jews under Malichus, and Pitholaus, to Join him: Gabinius Himſelf following with the Main Body, and Advancing toward Alexander; who, finding himſelf ſo much Over-Number'd, was forc'd to Retire. But Gabinius preſſing upon him in his Retreat, came up with him, and Engag'd him not far from Jeruſalem; where he loſt Six Thouſand Men: One Half Kill'd upon the Spot; and the Other Half Taken Alive: Himſelf getting away with the Remainder to Alexandrion; and the Enemy at the Back of him. When Gabinius came up to the Caſtle, he Offer'd an Act of Indemnity to all Deſerters that would come over to him, and join him before the Battle: but Their Stomachs were too Big to accept of it; ſo that he fell upon them; and Cutting-off a Great many of them, Shut up the reſt in the Fort. *M. He gave Peremptory Orders for the Repeopling of Scythopolis, Samaria, Anthedon, Apollonia, Jamnia, Raphia, Mariſſa, Dora, Gadara, Azolus; and and ſeveral other Places, where the Citizens came Flocking-in with all poſſible Joy to reſume their Ancient Habitations.

When Every Thing here was put into Good Order, Gabinius went back to the Siege of Alexandrion, and puſh'd it forward with more Vigour than before. Alexander was ſo affrighten'd at the Deſperate State of his Affairs, that he ſent his Embaſſadors, with an abſolute Reſignation of himſelf, to acknowledge the Ill Things he had done, and to beg Pardon: with a Tender, not only of Machærus and Hyrcanion, but of Alexandrion it Self alſo at his Devotion. This being done and accepted; Gabinius levell'd Alexandrion with the Ground, at the Inſtance of Alexander's Mother, for fear it ſhould prove the Occaſion of Another War: Such was the Tenderneſs, in fine, ſhe had for her Husband and Children that were Carry'd Priſoners to Rome, that She Omitted nothing of Application and Addreſs that might ingratiate her with the General.

Machærus, Hyrcanion, and Alexandrion delivered up: and the Laſt level'd with the Ground.

Gabinius, after This, carry'd Hyrcanus to Jeruſalem; Committed the Temple to His Care and Charge; appointed Officers for the Civil Adminiſtration, and divided the whole Province of Judæa into Five Juriſdictions: The Firſt, Jeruſalem; the Second, (a) Gadara; the Third, Amathus; the Fourth, Jericho; and the Fifth, Sepphoris; a City of Gallilee: the People all this while over-joy'd to See themſelves deliver'd from a Monarchy to an Ariſtocracy.

Gabinius gives Hyrcanus the Charge of the Temple, and Settles the Government.

It was not long after This, that Ariſtobulus made his Eſcape from Rome; which prov'd an Occaſion of New Troubles: and got together a Great Body of Jews, partly for the Love of Change, and partly for the Sake of an Old Kindneſs they had for him. His Firſt Attempt was the Repairing of Alexandrion; but upon Enformation that Siſenna, Anthony, and Servilius were Marching toward him with an Army from Gabinius, he withdrew to Machærus; where he Diſcharg'd himſelf of the Burden of a Looſe and an Unprofitable Multitude, and took only a Body of Eight Thouſand Men well-Arm'd along with him: reckoning a Thouſand Fugitive Jews, that Pitholaus had brought out of Jeruſalem, into the Number.

The Romans follow'd them Cloſe, and brought it to a Combat. Ariſtobulus and His People did all that was poſſible for Gallant Men to do; but in the End, when they were tir'd out, and run down with Numbers, the Romans had a Clear Victory of it: Five Thouſand Kill'd; Two Thouſand withdrew to a Hill, and made a little Stand; and the Other Thouſand with Ariſtobulus Himſelf cut out their Way quite through the Roman Army, and ſo to Machærus. They got thither about Evening, and found it all in Ruines: but Ariſtobulus would not yet Deſpair of gaining Time enough by a Truce, to repair the Caſtle, and Reinforce his Army. The Romans in the Mean While ply'd the Attaque; but at the End of Two Days, and after a very Brave Reſiſtance, the Romans took the Place; with Ariſtobulus, and his Son Antigonus that fled from Rome with him: Who were Both Bound, and ſent to Gabinius, and ſo to Rome again. The Senate made the Father a Priſoner, but ſent the Son back to Judæa, at the Inſtance of Gabinius; who had promis'd as much to the Wife of Ariſtobulus, upon the Delivery of the Caſtles.

Ariſtobulus Defeated by the Romans; and makes his way to Machærus.

The Romans take the Caſtle, Ariſtobulus and his Son Antigonus ſent Bound to Rome.

Gabinius was now preparing for a War upon the Parthians; but Ptolemey having quitted the Euphrates, and being on his Return for Ægypt, gave him a Diverſion. Hyrcanus and Antipater were his Friends to all Manner of Purpoſes: for they ſupply'd him with Men, Moneys, Arms, Corn; and in fine, all Proviſions and Neceſſaries for a War: Prevailing with the Jews alſo that Guarded the Ways to Peluſium to let Gabinius paſs-over at his Return. This Departure of Gabinius did ſo Startle the other Parts of Syria, and create ſuch a Revolt among the Jews, that Alexander the Son of Ariſtobulus, having gotten a Vaſt Multitude of the People together, he took up a Reſolution to put Every Roman to Death that he could lay his Hand on in That Quarter. Gabinius was not Inſenſible of the Danger; and the Sedition Encreaſing, he made uſe of his Intereſt with Antipater to bring Matters to a Better Underſtanding. But Alexander being a Warlike Prince, and having an Army of Thirty Thouſand Men to Truſt to, nothing would ſerve him but the bringing of it to a Battle; which was Fought near the Mountain of Itabyr. There fell Ten Thouſand upon the Place, and the reſt Shifted Every Man for Himſelf, and ſo Diſpers'd. Gabinius, after This Defeat, return'd to Jeruſalem, by the Advice of Antipater, to Settle the People there under the Form of a Republique. He March'd from hence after the Nabathæans: Secretly Diſcharging Two Parthian Deſerters that came over to him; Mithridates and Orſanes, pretending that they had made their Eſcapes.

Alexander Defeated by Gabinius.

Craſſus Succeeds Gabinius; rifles the Temple, and loſes both Life and Army.

Craſſus Succeeded Gabinius in the Government of Syria, and rifl'd the Temple, not only of the Two Thouſand Talents that Pompey would not ſo much as Touch; but of all the Gold that was there beſides, toward the Charge of the Parthian War. Upon This, he paſs'd the Euphrates; where He Himſelf and his Army were Both Loſt: But of This in another Place.

After Craſſus, came Caſſius into Syria, who put a Stop to the Parthians when they were juſt ready to break into the Country. He was no ſooner in Poſſeſſion of his Government, but away he Marches into Judæa; takes Farichæa, and carries off near Three Thouſand Jews into Bondage: Pitholaus one of the Number; whom Caſſius put to death, upon the Perſuaſion of Antipater, for Tampering the Faction of Ariſtobulus into a Sedition. (a) Cypris the Wife of Antipater, was a Noble Arabian; by whom he had Four Sons, Phaſael, King Herod, Joſeph, and Pheroras; and one Daughter, whoſe Name was Salome. He was a Perſon belov'd for his Generoſity and Conduct, by all Men of Honour and Quality: but the moſt Particular Friend he had in the World, was the King of the Arabians; to whom he recommended the Care of his Children, when he Undertook the War againſt Ariſtobulus. But Caſſius having made a Truce with Alexander, returned to his Poſt at Euphrates, to take Poſſeſſion of the Paſs, and hinder the Inroad of the Parthians.

IT ſo happen'd a while after, upon Pompey's and the Senate's quitting Rome, and Croſſing the Ionian Sea in a Fright, that Cæſar Being left Abſolute Maſter of the Place, and All that was in it; he Order'd Ariſtobulus immediately to be ſet at Liberty, and Diſpatch'd him out of hand into Syria with Two Companies; taking for granted that the Country would quickly be his Own, if he did but ſhew himſelf upon the Borders. But that Conjecture was too Good to be True; for the Hopes of Cæſar, and the Confidence of Ariſtobulus, were both Diſappointed: the Latter being made away in the mean while, and Poyſon'd by ſome of Pompey's People. The Body was Enbalm'd, and lay for ſome time Unbury'd, till Anthony tranſported it to Judæa to be there Depoſited in the Royal Sepulchres. Neither did the Son Alexander Scape any better than his Father; for Scipio cut-off his Head at Antioch, according to Pompey's Direction: who had paſs'd Sentence Himſelf againſt him, upon the Bench, for Seditious Practices againſt the Romans. But Ptolemy the Son of Minnæus, and the Prince of Chalcis upon Mount Libanus, ſent his Son Philippion to Askalon to the Widow of Aristobulus, and Order'd the bringing home of his Son Antigonus, and his Daughters, to their Father. Philippion fell in Love with the Younger; whoſe Name was Alexandra, and Marry'd her: which his Father put him to death for afterwards, and took her to Wife Himſelf. This Allyance created in him a greater Tenderneſs for his Brother Antigonus, and for his Siſters.

Antipater, after the Death of Pompey, made his Court to Cæſar: and Mithridates, a Pergamenian, finding a ſtop put to his Expedition into Ægypt by Prohibiting his Paſſage to his Ships at Peluſium; he ſtay'd with his Army at Askelon: and did not only prevail with the Arabians for Aſſiſtance, though a Stranger, but raiſ'd a Matter of Three Thouſand Jews well Arm'd, upon his Own Account. He brought alſo ſeveral of the Leading Men of Syria into the Party: as (b) Ptolemy of Libanus, Jamblicus, and another Ptolemy; Men of ſuch Reputation, that their Intereſt and Example drew the whole Country after them. Mithridates finding himſelf now in Condition, by the Help of Antipater, to Enter upon Action, advances to Peluſium: and the Inhabitants oppoſing his Paſſage, he lays Siege to the City. Antipater got himſelf more and more honour ſtill in this Encounter: for the Firſt Dint of the Battery preſſing from His Quarter, he Himſelf was the Firſt Man that Mounted the Breach, and Enter'd the Town with his People after him.

Antipater Aſſiſts Mithridates, and takes Peluſium.

Thus was Peluſium Taken, but the Ægyptian Jews (of the Province of Onias) would not ſuffer them to go any further; and yet Antipater prevail'd with them, not only to be Quiet without making any Reſiſtance, but over and above, to furniſh Neceſſaries for the Soldiers. This Example wrought ſo far upon the People of Memphis, that of their Own Accord they deliver'd themſelves up to Mithridates. Upon the Arrival of Mithridates at Delta, they gave Battle to a Body of other Ægyptians at a Place called The Camp of the Jews; where Mithridates, with the whole Right-Wing was in Extream Danger of being totally Cut-off; but Antipater, having already broken the Enemy's other Wing where he was Engag'd, ſlipt along the Bank of the River, and came-up ſo ſeaſonably to the Reſcue of Mithridates, that he fell upon his Purſuers; deſtroy'd ſeveral of them, and follow'd the Chace up to the Enemy's Camp, where he made himſelf Maſter of the Pillage: and all This with the Loſs only of Fourſcore Men on his Side. There were near Eight hundred of Mithridates's Men ſlain upon the Purſuit; but he himſelf preſerv'd at laſt beyond all Expectation. Mithridates, after This, did him all Imaginable Right to Cæſar, in the Report he made of ſo Signal a Service: and the Emperor was ſo Frank and Generous in his Profeſſions and Acknowledgments to This Great Man, that he became more and more Zealous and Ambitious of any Occaſion to lay down his Life for ſo Illuſtrious a Maſter. He needed no other Proofs, in fine, of his Faith and Courage, then the Wounds he bare upon his Body as the Marks of his Virtue. So ſoon as the War was over in Ægypt, Cæſar return'd into Syria, and made Antipater a Free-Citizen of Rome; conferring alſo other Honours upon him, enough to raiſe an Envy againſt him, and, in Token of a Singular Reſpect and Eſteem, Confirming Hyrcanus in the Pontificate for his Sake.

AT This very Time, Antigonus, the Son of Ariſtobulus, addreſs'd himſelf to Cæſar; and ſo Order'd the Matter, that he did Antipater a far Greater Service then he intended him. His Buſineſs was to Complain of the Death of his Father; to tell Cæſar the Story of his being Poyſon'd by Pompey's Inſtruments; (as it was generally preſum'd) and to Charge Scipio with Cruelty to his Brother, &c. But, inſtead of keeping within This Compaſs, he laſh'd-out into Extravagant Invectives againſt Hyrcanus and Antipater, for driving Himſelf and his Brethren moſt Injuriouſly out of their Native Country, and for Oppreſſing the Publique, only to Gratify their Own Private Paſſions. As for the Aids they ſent Cæſar into Ægypt, there was more of Fear in it then Good Will; in hope to attone, in ſome Meaſure, for the Services they had formerly render'd to Pompey. Antipater, upon Theſe Reproaches, only Uncover'd ſome Parts of his Body, and Expos'd his Wounds as Teſtimonies of his Loyalty to Cæſar, and ſo left it to his Body to do the Office of his Tongue. [But, ſays he, I cannot ſufficiently admire the Confidence of Antigonus; the Son of an Enemy to the Romans, and a Fugitive, and at laſt, as Seditious an Incendiary as ever his Father was. Now for This Man to Exhibit Accuſations to Cæſar *againſt the moſt Faithful and Dutiful of his Subjects; and to inſiſt upon Pretentions of Merit, when he ought rather to be Thankful that he is ſuffer'd to Live: what an Unaccountable Confidence is This! Cæſar, at next Word, Created Hyrcanus High-Prieſt, as a Man perfectly well Qualifi'd for the Function. He gave Antipater, at the ſame time alſo, the Choice of any Commiſſion he would deſire; who remitted himſelf dutifully to his Maſter's Good Pleaſure: Whereupon he was pleaſed to pronounce him Governour of Judæa; and he Obtained likewiſe This further Grace, that he might repair the Walls of his Country, which Pompey had Thrown down. Theſe Decrees he Order'd to be Engraven in Braſs, and the Tables to be hung-up in the Capitol; as a Memorial of Antipater's Services, and of Cæſar's Juſtice.

When Antipater had brought Cæſar to the Borders of Syria, he returned to Judæa; where the Firſt Thing he did was to rebuild the Walls that Pompey had broken down: and then to Inſpect the Province, and either by Fair Means, or by Foul, to prevent Diſorder, and keep the Country Quiet; giving the People to Underſtand, That

And Commands Obedience to Hyrcanus.

That if they behav'd themſelves as they ought to do toward Hyrcanus, they ſhould live Happily and Eaſily in Peace and Plenty: but if they ſhould ever think of Fiſhing in Troubled Waters, and of advancing their own Fortunes upon the Ruine of the Publique, they ſhould find Antipater, inſtead of a Gentle Governor, a Severe Maſter, and Hyrcanus as Unmerciful a Tyrant inſtead of a Gracious Prince.

He Prefers Phaſael and Herod.

This Deference to Hyrcanus did not yet hinder but that Antipater ſettled the State of the Province himſelf, to ſupply the Defects and Incapacities of Hyrcanus for the Offices of a Political Adminiſtration. He gave Phaſael, his Eldeſt Son, and the Captain of the Guards, the Government of Jeruſalem, and all that Province: That of Gallilee, to Herod, his Second Son, though very Young, with the ſame Powers; who being naturally Bold and Active, was not long without an Honourable Occaſion of ſhewing the Greatneſs of his Mind. Syria was terribly infeſted, and over-run with Troups of Robbers, till he took Hezekias, the Head of them, and put to Death the Captain himſelf, and ſeveral of his Followers. This Exploit was ſo acceptable a Service to the Syrians, that all the Towns and Villages were full of Panegyricks and Acclamations, to the Honour of Herod, as the Reſtorer of them to their Liberties and Poſſeſſions. The Glory of This Atchievement made Herod known to Sextus Cæſar, the Kinſman of Cæſar the Great; who was then Governour of Syria. The Fame of This Action inſpir'd Phaſael with an Honeſt and a Generous Emulation to outdo his Brother, and to gain more and more upon the Hearts of the People of Jeruſalem; where he Exerciſed his Power with ſuch a Tenderneſs of Moderation and Juſtice, that no Creature had reaſon to Complain. The Wiſdom and Conduct of this Adminiſtration gave the People as great a Reverence for Antipater, as if he had been their Abſolute Sovereign: and He behaved himſelf all this while with a Great Exactneſs of Faith and Kindneſs toward Hyrcanus.

Herod Takes Hezekias, the Captain of the Robbers.

Hyrcanus bears a ſecret Grudge to the Two Brothers.

But to ſhew now that it is a Thing utterly Impoſſible to ſecure Great Men and Glorious Actions from the Stroke of Envy, we find it Evidently in This Inſtance of Hyrcanus. He had born a kind of a Secret Grudge for ſome time already, out of his Own Head, toward Theſe Illuſtrious Young Men, (and Herod eſpecially) for the Honour they had acquir'd in the World; all Mouths being full of the Hiſtory of their Virtues and Adventures. Now This Envious Diſpoſition was further wrought upon by a parcel of Fleering Paraſites, and Court-Earwigs, to whom the Exemplary Integrity of Antipater's Sons was an Eye-ſore. [What! ſaid they, is the Authority of the Government to be divided betwixt Antipater and his Sons, and Hyrcanus to ſtand like a Property, with only the Empty Name of it? How long will you go-on at This rate, of ſetting up Kings againſt Your Self! It is now come to That paſs, that they do not ſo much as pretend to act any longer as Deputies or Subjects; but, in One Word, bare-fac'd as Sovereigns: Witneſs Herod's putting ſo many Men to Death, in a flat Contradiction to the Jewiſh Law, and without any Mandate or Direction of Yours. Is Herod a Private Man, or a King? if the Former, Why is he not call'd to an Account for This, and to Anſwer, both to the King Himſelf, and to the Law, for the Murder of ſo many Innocent Perſons?]

Hyrcanus irritated by Evil Councel.

Hyrcanus was mov'd at This by little and little; till he came at laſt, in a Fit of Wrath and Indignation, to Command the Summoning of Herod to make his Appearance. Herod thought himſelf ſo ſafe in his Own Innocency, that with the Advice of his Father, he ſecured his Garriſons in Gallilee, and without any more ado went forthwith to the King; taking only ſuch a Guard along with him, out of a Reſpect to Hyrcanus, as might be Competent for the Securing of his Perſon, without an Affront to the Prince. Sextus Cæſar had ſo Great a Kindneſs for the Young Man, that for Fear of Miſchief when they had him among them, he ſent to Hyrcanus to acquit him of the Charge; who ſeemed Willing enough to do it, out of an Inclination he had to Oblige him. But Herod was yet a little Doubtful how far he might depend upon Fair Words, and ſo repair'd to Sextus at Damaſcus, with a Reſolution not to appear any more in caſe of a Second Summons. Hyrcanus was ply'd over and over to the ſame Purpoſe, as before, and by the ſame ſort of People. They told him that Herod was gone away in a Huff, and with a Deſign upon ſome Deſperate Attempt. Hyrcanus was eaſily Impos'd upon, and which way to Turn himſelf he knew not; for he found his Enemy too Hard for him. But when Sextus came afterwards to declare Herod General of all his Troups in Syria and Samaria, it ſtruck ſuch a Terror into Hyrcanus, betwixt the Conſideration of his Own Strength, and the Affections of the People, that he phancy'd him Marching at the Head of an Army againſt him already.

And he was not much miſtaken neither. If he valu'd himſelf upon his Arms, let him at the ſame time bethink himſelf of the Iniquity of his Cauſe; and that no Subject can ever hope for a Bleſſing from Heaven, that draws his Sword againſt his Prince; and not only his Prince neither, but his Familiar Friend, Benefactor, and Patron: and a Prince that never dealt unkindly by him, but when he was provok'd and ſeduc'd by Calumny, and Evil Councel.*] Upon this Expoſtulation, Herod let the Conteſt Fall, and Contented himſelf with giving the Whole Nation This Inſtance of his Intereſt and Power.

The Great Men were all divided into Parties: Every Man acting as his Humour and Intereſt led him, without any regard to the Publique. Caſſius took his Way into Syria to get poſſeſſion of the Troups that were Then before Apamia; where he made (a) Marcus and Baſſus, with ſome Male-Contented Cohorts, Friends: raiſing the Siege of Apamia at the ſame time. He laid the Cities under moſt Unreaſonable and Exceſſive Contributions: a Tax of Seven Hundred Talents upon the Jews; which Antipater provided for in time by an Equal Diſtribution of the Charge, and appointing his Sons and his Friends to take a Seaſonable Care of the Levy; reckoning Malichus, his Profeſt Enemy, into the Number of his Friends, upon That Pinch. The Firſt that wrought himſelf into the Good Graces of Caſſius was Herod; who preſented him with a Hundred Talents for the Quota of Gallilee: and for That Reaſon was Eſteemed One of his Beſt Friends. But it ſo fell out, that the Hope and Bravery of the Son Occaſioned the Death of the Father; for Malichus was in ſuch a Dread of him, that he could never think himſelf ſafe while t'other was Living: and ſo he Corrupted Hyrcanus's Butler to Poyſon Antipater in his Drink. This was the Requital That Great Man receiv'd from This Ungrateful Wretch. He was indeed a Perſon of Wiſdom and Courage; and the ſame, in fine, to whom Hyrcanus was Indebted for the Poſſeſſion of his Kingdom. The People were ſo Enrag'd at Malichus, upon a Suſpicion of This Execrable Practice, that they were ready to Tear him to pieces: but upon his renouncing and abjuring any Knowledge of the Matter, the Multitude ſoften'd a little, and ſuſpended; and Malichus in the mean time, by way of Prevention, put himſelf into a Condition and Poſture of Defence; for it could not be Expected that This Horrid Murther ſhould ever go-off thus. He knew Herod was abſolutely for taking his Revenge in the Head of an Army; but his Brother Phaſael diſſuaded him by all Means from making any Publique Buſtle about it, for fear of raiſing a Tumult. The Brothers, upon This, gave him the Hearing with a ſemblance of allowing his Defence; and a Countenance, as if they thought him Innocent, and then proceeded to the Funeral Rites and Duties for their Father; which were very Splendid and Magnificent.

Cæſar and Anthony in War with Brutus and Caſſius.

Herod made Governour of Syria.

Antipater poyſon'd in his Drink.

Samaria being at This time torn with Factions, Herod went down to Quiet them; but ſo as to return upon all Solemn Days, to keep his Feſtival ſtill at Jeruſalem, and his Guards about him, going and coming. Malichus did not like This Face of Things, and therefore put Hyrcanus upon telling Herod plainly, that it was a Prophanation of the Sacredneſs of the Holy Religion and Profeſſion, to Intermix Strangers with Natives. Hyrcanus did as he was directed; but Herod, in Contempt, both of the Cauſe it ſelf, and of the Authority, enter'd by night into the City. Malichus went preſently to him all in Tears for Antipater: and Herod carry'd it on the Other ſide, as if he believ'd every Word he ſaid; though ready to burſt with Rage and Indignation. But yet at the ſame time he wrote to Caſſius for Juſtice upon Malichus, for the Death of his Father, which was eaſily Obtain'd, upon ſeveral Accounts; Malichus being a Perſon that was Odious to Caſſius already: ſo that Caſſius did not only leave Herod to his Courſe at Law againſt Malichus; but ſent alſo Private Orders to his Tribunes to be aſſiſting to Herod, if there ſhould be Occaſion.

Laodicea was juſt now Taken, and Men of Quality came thronging-in from all Parts to Herod, with their Gratulations and Preſents. He look'd upon This as the Faireſt Opportunity in the World for the Execution of his Purpoſe; but Malichus ſuſpecting Foul Play, laid a Plot to give him the Slip, by getting away his Son from Tyre; who was Then a Hoſtage there: and ſo Steal away with him into Judæa. But then, well Conſidering the Deſperate State of his Affairs, he was afraid That would not ſecure him neither: and ſo he ſet his Brains at work upon a Nobler Exploit; which was to ſet up the Whole Nation of the Jews againſt the Romans, while Caſſius had his hands Full in his War with Anthony: in which Caſe he flatter'd himſelf that it would be no Hard matter to depoſe Hyrcanus, and take Poſſeſſion of the Government. But the Fates had otherwiſe determin'd it ſeems; for Herod, having a Jealouſie of ſome Great Miſchief a-working, invited both Malichus and Hyrcanus to Supper with him: ſending a Servant out under pretence of having every Thing put in Order for the Entertainment; but in truth, with Secret Inſtructions to the Tribunes to attend, and Act according to the Agreement betwixt Caſſius and Herod, before-mentioned. They March'd out with their Arms toward the Sea-ſide of the City; where they met Malichus upon the way; ſurrounded him, and cut him to pieces. The Surprize put Hyrcanus into ſo dangerous a Swoon, that they could hardly bring him to Life again; but ſo ſoon as ever he was come to Himſelf, he call'd out to Herod to know who it was had Kill'd Malichus? One of the Tribunes made Anſwer, that it was Caſſius's Order. Why then, ſays Hyrcanus, Caſſius has ſav'd me and my Country at once, in the Deſtruction of ſo Dangerous a Traytor to Both. Whether This was good Faith, or Fear, no Body knows; but This was Herod's Revenge, and This the End of Malichus.

WHen Caſſius had quitted Syria, there happen'd New Troubles in Jeruſalem, upon the Occaſion of Felix's making War againſt Phaſael and Herod, to revenge the Death of Malichus upon the Brothers. It ſo fell out that Herod being then at Damaſcus with Fabius the Governour, he was taken ſo Ill that it put him out of Condition to March to the Relief of his Brother. But as it happen'd, Phaſael had no need of Help; for he Routed Felix with his Own Troups, and did his Bus'neſs without it: but Exclaiming bitterly againſt Hyrcanus for his Ingratitude, in Siding with Felix, and in putting ſeveral Caſtles into the Hands of the Brother of Malichus: as there were many of them, and Maſſada among the reſt; One of the Strongeſt Holds in the Country. But This avail'd them little againſt the Power of Herod; who was no ſooner got abroad again, but he retook all he had Loſt, and brought Hyrcanus to his Knees, even in Maſſada it ſelf: diſmiſſing him however upon his Humiliation. He drove Marion, the King of the Tyrians, out of Gallilee, and recover'd from him Three Caſtles that he had gotten; not only ſparing the Lives of the Tyrians that he took, but Gratifying divers of them over and above with Donatives and Bounties: by which Means the People became Herod's Friends, and Marion's Enemies, both at once. This Marion was a Fit Inſtrument for Caſſius, who had ſet ſo many Tyrants over Syria already; and Marching againſt Herod, he took Antigonus, the Son of Ariſtobulus, along with him; and Fabius alſo, who was effectually but Antigonus's Mercenary: and all This, becauſe they were Enemies to Herod: Ptolemey, the Father-in-Law of Antigonus, ſupplying them with all Neceſſaries.

Herod made ready for the Encounter, and it came to a Battle upon the Borders of Judæa; Antigonus was Routed; Herod carry'd the day, and return'd to Jeruſalem; where he was receiv'd with all Tenderneſſes of Honour and Reſpect, even by Thoſe that had deſpis'd him before: but This was out of a Particular regard to the Relation he had to Hyrcanus. For This Herod was formerly Marry'd to a Woman of his Own Country: She was Nobly Born, and her Name Doris. By This Woman he had Antipater, but he was afterward Married to Mariamne, the Daughter of Alexander, the Son of Ariſtobulus, and of Alexandra the Daughter of Hyrcanus. This was the Relation he had to the King. But upon Cæſar's coming into Italy, and Anthony into Aſia, after the Death of Caſſius at the Battle of Philippi; Embaſſadors were diſpatched from ſeveral Places to Anthony in Bithynia; and the Heads of the Jews appear'd alſo, with Noiſy Complaints againſt Phaſael and Herod for Uſurping Arbitrary Power to Themſelves, and allowing Hyrcanus only the bare Name of Sovereignty. Herod being within diſtance of Over-hearing the Accuſation, menag'd ſo well with Anthony, by the Mediation of a Sum of Money, that the Complainants were all Diſcharg'd without a Hearing.

Anthony being, after This, at Daphnis in the Suburbs of Antioch, (about the Beginning of his Intrigue with Cleopatra) there came to him a Hundred of the Principal Men of the Jews all in a Body; Select Men for Quality, and Ability: and their Bus'neſs was the ſame Complaint over again againſt the Two Brothers. They had made choice of the Beſt Speakers they had, for the Advantage of the Plea; and Meſſala ſtood up for the Brothers: Hyrcanus, for Kin'red-ſake, putting-in to ſecond him. Upon the Hearing of Both Parties, Anthony asked Hyrcanus, Whom he look'd upon as the Fitteſt Man for a Character in the Government. Hyrcanus reply'd, that for his Own part, he knew not any Other Comparable to the Two Brothers. Anthony was Overjoy'd at This Declaration, having been ſo Highly Oblig'd to Antipater of Old, for a Generous Reception and Entertainment, upon his Coming into Judæa with Gabinius. So he Pronounced them Both, Tetrarchs of Judæa, and Committed the Whole Adminiſtration to their Conduct.

The Deputies Seditious and Insolent.

Anthony treats them severely.

The Deputies look'd ſo Soure and Diſguſted upon This Proceeding, that Anthony Committed Fifteen of the Hundred to Priſon: and they ſcap'd narrowly with their Lives too. The reſt he Treated Courſly, and ſo let them go. This did but enflame the Mutineers at Jeruſalem to a Higher Degree, ſo that inſtead of a Hundred, they ſent now a Thouſand Deputies Open-Mouth to Anthony at Tyre; who was at That time making ready to fall upon Jeruſalem. They were ſo Clamorous, that the Magiſtrates of Tyre were Order'd to diſperſe them; and, in Caſe of Reſiſtance, to put all to death that they took: Anthony giving them further in Charge to Maintain the Authority of the Tetrarchs, which he had ſet-up. Herod and Hyrcanus, being enform'd of This Diſorder, went out to the Deputies as they were Walking before the Port, and adviſ'd them civilly to have a Care how they Engag'd themſelves and their Country, by ſuch Intemperances, in One Common Ruine. But the Better they were Us'd, the Worſe they were: inſomuch, that Anthony was fain to bring them to reaſon by Armed Troups, and a great many of them were Kill'd and Wounded. Hyrcanus was pleas'd however to take Care of the Wounded, and to provide for the Burying of the Dead. But all This wrought nothing at all upon Thoſe that got away; for they ſtill went on Embroiling the City, and Irritating Anthony, till they provok'd him to put all his Priſoners to death.

SOme Two Years, after This, when Barzapharnes a Noble Parthian held the Government of Syria, with Pacorus the King's Son; Lyſanias the Succeſſor of Ptolemey the Son of Minnæus, ſtruck-up an Agreement, and Confirm'd it with Articles, to deliver-up to them a Thouſand Talents and Five Hundred Women upon the Dethroning of Hyrcanus, and ſetting Antigonus in His Place. They fell to work upon the Project immediately; Pacorus took the way of the Sea-Coaſt, and Barzapharnes was to March over the Midland: Ptolemais and Sidon open'd their Gates to Pacorus, but the Tyrians abſolutely refus'd him Entrance. He ſent before him a Party of Horſe into Judæa, under the Command of Pacorus the King's Butler (an Officer of his Own Name) with Inſtructions to hearken after the Enemy's Councels and Motions; and to aſſiſt Antigonus upon Occaſion.

The Jews of Mount Carmel Offer'd their Service to Antigonus, of their Own Accord; who Order'd them forthwith to advance, and poſſeſs themſelves of That Quarter of the Country they call Dryma. They brought it to a Battle, and got the better of it; and when the Enemy was Routed and Diſpers'd, their Numbers encreaſing, they march'd out-right to Jeruſalem; where Hyrcanus and Phaſael made a very Brave Reſiſtance, and after a Sharp Diſpute in the Market-Place, forc'd them to Retire into the Temple. Herod, upon This, clapt a Guard of Sixty Men into the Adjoyning Houſes; but the People ſet Fire to them out of a Mortal Hatred they had for the Two Brothers. Theſe Practices tranſported Herod to ſuch a degree of Indignation, that he fell-on upon the Enemy; Cutting-off Great Numbers of them, and there paſs'd not a Day without Blows, and Slaughter. The Feaſt of Pentecoſt being now at hand, and the City Crouding-full from One End of it to the Other, up to the very Temple it ſelf, of People that came up to the Solemnity, from all Quarters; and moſt of them with their Arms: Phaſael took Charge of the Walls, and Herod, with a Small Party, of the Palace. The Latter made ſo Unexpected a Sally into the Suburbs, that he Kill'd ſeveral, and Routed the Whole Multitude: Some fled into the City; Others into the Temple, and ſome again Shelter'd themſelves behind the Rampart.

When

When Things were brought to This paſs, Antigonus propos'd a Treaty of Peace, and Offer'd Pacorus (the King's Officer before mentioned) for an Umpire. Phaſael Entertain'd the Motion, and took the Parthian, with Five Hundred Horſe, into the City: His Pretence was only the Compoſing of a Mutiny, but the Plain Truth of his Intention was the Aſſiſting of Antigonus. This Inſinuating Perfidious Wretch prevail'd afterwards with Phaſael to ſend an Embaſſy to Barzapharnes upon the ſame Subject. This was much againſt the Liking, and Opinion of Herod; who caution'd him all the Way to have a Care how he Truſted him; for he was Falſe, and it was but Natural for a Barbarian ſo to be. He was a Traytor, he ſaid, and deſerv'd to be Treated as one. Pacorus, for the Better Colour of the Buſ'neſs, went out with Hyrcanus, and ſo with the reſt of the Company follow'd Phaſael; leaving with Herod ſome of Thoſe Cavaliers that the Barbarians call'd Freemen.

Antigonus propoſes a Peace, and Pacorus for the Umpire.

Phaſael Entertains the Motion, and takes Pacorus into the City.

The Treachery of Pacorus.

Herod Jealous of him.

When they came to Gallilee, they found the People divided, and in Arms; but the Governours of Places however came out to meet them. Barzapharnes had the Wit to Cover the Falſeneſs of his Heart with External Civilities, ſuch as ſoft Words and Preſents; but ſo ſoon as they were parted, he had an Ambuſh in readineſs to ſurprize them on their Return. They were Conducted to a Place near the Sea, called Ecdippon; and there they had the Whole Story of the Treachery: a Thouſand Talents promis'd, and Five Hundred Women to be deliver'd up to the Parthians, and ſeveral of their Own, part of the Number: that the Parthians were always falſe: and They were told further, that This Horrid Perfidy had not been put-off ſo long, but that they waited for Herod's coming up to Jeruſalem; for fear the Plot ſhould take Air, and be Diſappointed. And to ſhew now that This was more then Talk, the Ambuſh was juſt now at hand to ſeize them.

Barzapharnes Falſe and Perfidious.

The Whole Story of the Treachery.

Ophelius was the Man, to whom Saramalla (a Syrian, and the Richeſt Man of the Country) had Communicated the Minutes of the Whole Deſign. This Ophelius ply'd Phaſael with Importunity upon Importunity, to ſhift for Himſelf; but Phaſael's Reſolution was, whatever he ſuffer'd, not to Abandon Hyrcanus; ſo that he choſe rather to lay it home to Barzapharnes, and to tell him to his Teeth what a Mercenary, Perfidious Creature he was. If Money be your Buſ'neſs, ſays he, I can give you more for my Life then Antigonus has promis'd you for the Kingdom. This put the Parthian upon a Violent Denyal of the Whole Matter, with Execrable Oaths and Imprecations; and ſo he went his way to Pacorus. No ſooner was he gone, but Phaſael and Hyrcanus were taken into Cuſtody by the Parthians that ſtay'd behind, according to their Order: and had only the liberty left them of Exclaiming againſt ſo Horrid a Perjury and Treaſon.

Ophelius preſſes Phaſael to look to Himſelf.

Phaſael charges Barzapharnes to his Face.

Phaſael and Hyrcanus ſeized by the Parthians.

The Parthian, all this while, had his Leſſon given him, to try if he could Decoy Herod out of the Town, and Take him. This he Attempted; but Herod was ſo well acquainted with the Treacherous Practices of Thoſe Barbarians, that he would not ſo much as Stir out of the Walls. He made no doubt but Phaſael had written him the Whole Story at length, of the Treachery; and that the Parthians had intercepted Thoſe Letters: but all that Pacorus could do would not draw him out of his Hold; though he was preſs'd with a Pretence Plauſible enough; which was, that he ſhould meet his Letters upon the way; for he'd find no ſuch Thing in them as Impriſonment or Treachery, nor any thing more then the Common Buſ'neſs of Familiar Letters. Herod kept himſelf ſtill upon his Guard; for he had been told by others, that his Brother Phaſael was Taken-up: beſide, that Mariamne, the Daughter of Hyrcanus, and One of the Wiſeſt of Women, begg'd of him, upon any Terms, not to Stir abroad, nor Expoſe himſelf to the Manifeſt Deſigns of thoſe Barbarians.

Pacorus attempts to Decoy Herod.

Herod was too Wiſe and Wary to be Impos'd upon Bare-fac'd: ſo that Pacorus was put to his Shifts, and to bethink himſelf how he might Trick him out of his Life ſome other way. While This was in Agitation, Herod ſlipt away by night, with ſome of his Neareſt Relations, (and when his Enemies leaſt thought on't) toward Idumæa. The Parthians had no ſooner Notice of his Departure, but they got up, and follow'd him; ſending his Mother, Brother, Mariamne (to Whom he was Contracted) and Mariamne's Younger Brother, before him; while He and his People about him made good againſt the Barbarians, and got the Better of them in ſeveral Encounters: retiring at laſt to the Caſtle of Maſſada. The Jews were Harder upon him in his Flight, than the Parthians, (though ever troubleſom) and fell upon him about Sixty Furlongs from Jeruſalem, where they puſh'd it to a down-right Battle. Herod got the Victory with a Great Slaughter of Men; and, for the Eternal Honour of the Action, he Erected a moſt Magnificent Palace upon the Place, with a Strong Caſtle in it; which he call'd Herodion, after his Own Name.

Herod ſlips out of the Town by Night.

He withdrews to Maſſada.

The Jews preſs him harder then the Parthians.

Herodion Erected in Memory of This Action.

A Great many People came in to him in his Retreat; and at (a) Threſſa in Idumæa, his Brother Joſeph advis'd him by all means to Leſſen his Train; which he took to be Upward of Three Thouſand Men, and the Caſtle of Maſſada would not hold them. Herod took his Councel, and Diſcharg'd all the Unprofitable Mouths with a Viaticum to Idumæa; diſpoſing of his Kin'red, and the moſt Neceſſary Perſons for his Service into the Caſtle, with a Body of Eight Hundred Men over and above for the Guard of the Women; and Proviſions ſufficient to hold-out a Siege, if there ſhould be Occaſion. This he did, and ſo went forward to Petra, a City of Arabia.

Herod leſſens his Train.

And advances to Petra.

The Hearts of the Parthians at Jeruſalem were altogether ſet upon Booty; breaking into the Houſes of Thoſe that were gone, and rifling the Royal Palace it ſelf: but without ſo much as Touching Hyrcanus's Treaſure, which was not above Three Hundred Talents. But they poſſeſs'd themſelves of other Riches, though not ſo much as they Expected. For Herod had the Providence, for fear of the Lewd Barbarians, to take out what was moſt Pretious; and to Tranſport it long before, to Idumæa: his Companions alſo taking the ſame Courſe. But after the Parthians were Maſters of the Spoil of the Town, they were not Content with That Ravage, but infeſted the Countries alſo with a Bloody, and an Implacable War. They laid Waſt the City of Mariſſa, and not only conſtituted Antigonus, King; but deliver'd up Phaſael and Hyrcanus in Chains, into his Hands. He tore-off the Ears of Hyrcanus with his Teeth, to render him by That Maim incapable of the Pontificate, in caſe Times ſhould Turn: for the Holy Office is not to be Adminiſter'd by any Perſon Maim'd or Blemiſh'd.

The Parthians at Jeruſalem Ravage Town and Country.

Mariſſa laid Waſt: and Antigonus declar'd King. Phaſael and Hyrcanus deliver'd up to him in Chains.

But the Cruelty of Antigonus was fruſtrated by the Courage of Phaſael; who without either the Help of a Sword, or his Hands at liberty, daſh'd out his Brains againſt a Stone; ſhewing himſelf the True Brother of Herod, and Hyrcanus a Degenerate. He dy'd like a Man of Honour, and his End was ſuitable to the Glory of his Life. There goes yet Another Report of him; and that he repented after That Violence upon himſelf; but that a Phyſician was ſent him from Antigonus, that poyſon'd the Wound, and ſo Diſpatch'd him. But whether the One or the Other, we ſhall not Contend. There paſſes Another Story, that, before he dy'd, he was told by a Woman, that Herod had made his Eſcape. Well! ſays he, I ſhall now dye in Peace; for I ſhall leave a Friend behind me that will revenge my Wrongs.

Antigonus bites-off Hyrcanus's Ears. Phaſael daſhes out his own Brains.

This was the End of Phaſael, and it was now a Great Mortification to the Parthians, that Antigonus could not make good his Promiſe of the Five Hundred Women to them: but the Bus'neſs was made up at Jeruſalem, and Hyrcanus ſent Bound into Parthia. Herod knew nothing as yet of the Death of his Brother; but was ſo ſenſible of the Covetous Humour of the Barbarians, that he Concluded there was no Redeeming of him but by a Sum of Mony: and on That Account he reſolv'd upon a Journy into Arabia; in Hope of Supplying himſelf from the King, upon That Occaſion, either as a Bounty upon the Score of an Old Friendſhip betwixt the Arabian and Antipater, or as a Loan, upon the Pawn of his Nephew the Son of Phaſael, a Youth of Seven years of age; whom he had at That Time with him for his Security. The Sum he Propoſed to give, was Three Hundred Talents; the Tyrians joining with him in the Requeſt.

Antigonus could not keep touch with the Parthians.

But his Generous Intentions were moſt Unhappily prevented by This Fatality in the Death of Phaſael; ſo that Herod could do him no Good: over and above that he durſt not Truſt himſelf among the Arabians. For Malichus, Their King, Ordered him to depart immediately out of his Territories; pretending that the Parthians had demanded, by their Embaſſadors, that Herod might be driven out of Arabia: but the true Reaſon was his Ingratitude to Antipater, and the Narrowneſs of his Soul, that he would not make himſelf a Debtor to the Sons, (being then in Diſtreſs) for the Obligations he had to the Father. He had, in fine, Impudent Adviſers about him, without either Faith, or Honour; and Theſe were the Perſons that were moſt in Credit with him.

Herod Order'd by Malichus to depart Arabia.

When Herod came to find the Arabians to be his Enemies: and for Thoſe very Reaſons that he thought would have made them his Friends, he diſpatch'd the Meſſengers back again, with ſuch an Anſwer as he was Prompted to by the Paſſion of a Troubled Mind: and ſo March'd toward Egypt. He came in the Evening to a Certain Temple, where he had left ſeveral of his Company in his Paſſage. He got next day to Rhinocolura: and That was the Place, where he receiv'd the Firſt News of his Brother's Death. This ſurprize Undoubtedly Tranſported him; but ſo ſoon as ever the Firſt Heat of his Paſſion was Over, and that he had done Juſtice to the Softneſſes of Humanity and Natural Affection, he proceeded on his Journey.

(a) Al. Reſſa. See Antiq. l. 14. c. 25.

The

The Arabian repented himſelf, by This, of what he had done: and with all ſpeed ſent after the Perſon he had ſo Barbarouſly abus'd, to call him back again: but it was now too late; for he was gotten to Peluſium, where the Officers made a Difficulty of letting him paſs; till upon application to the Magiſtrates, he was left at liberty to go whither he pleas'd: out of the Veneration they had for the Fame and Worth of the Man. He took his paſſage for Alexandria; where he was receiv'd by Cleopatra, upon his Entrance into the City, with all Pompous Formalities of Honour and Reſpect: in Hope that he might be prevail'd with to Accept of the Command of an Army; which ſhe was then providing for ſome Great Deſign. But Herod's Heart was ſo ſet upon his Voyage for Rome, that neither the Queen's Entreaties, the Extream Cold of the Seaſon, nor the Hazzards of the Seas, could divert him from it. Upon his putting to Sea, he took his Courſe by the Way of Pamphylia; where there happen'd ſo Outrageous a Tempeſt that they were forc'd to caſt the Goods over-board to ſave the Veſſel. But with Great Difficulty at laſt, he got ſafe to Rhodes; where he found all Things in a Terrible Confuſion, by reaſon of a War at That Time with Caſſius. He was There receiv'd by Two Friends of his, Ptolemey and Saphinias; and, notwithſtanding his Preſent Want of Mony, made a ſhift to provide Himſelf a Stout Veſſel, that carry'd Him and his Friends to Brunduſium, and ſo to Rome. The Perſon there to whom he made his Firſt Application, was Anthony; upon the Score of an Ancient Kindneſs and Acquaintance betwixt Him and Antipater. And to him He Recounted the Adventures and Misfortunes, both of Himſelf, and his Family; with the Story of his Friends and Relations that were at preſent ſhut-up, and beſieg'd in the Caſtle of Maſſada: and how he had made a Winter-Voyage of it, to pay his Duty to him, and to Implore his Aid.

Herod Nobly receiv'd by Cleopatra at Alexandria.

Herod paſſes to Brunduſium, and ſo to Rome.

Anthony was ſo affectionately Mov'd with a Generous Compaſſion for Herod's Diſtreſs, and an Honourable Deference to the Memory of Antipater; together with a Virtuous Senſe of what was Due to the Character of ſo Excellent a Perſon, that he reſolved in the very Inſtant to make Herod now King of the Jews, as he had declar'd him Tetrarch before: and This not only out of a Reſpect to Herod; but the Averſion Anthony bare to Antigonus, had ſome part likewiſe in the Reſolution: looking upon him as a Man Turbulent and Seditious, and an Enemy to the Romans. And now after all Theſe Gentle Diſpoſitions of Anthony in Herod's Favour, Auguſtus was yet rather the Forwarder Friend of the Two; for he was never Well and Eaſy, but when he was talking of Antipater's Services in Ægypt; and what Antipater and Cæſar had ſuffer'd together there: the Honour, and the Hoſpitality of the Converſation; beſide the Worthineſs of Herod's Mind and Courage.

The Generoſity of Auguſtus and Anthony to Herod.

Upon This, there was a Senate call'd; where Meſſala, and after Him, Atratinus (Herod Himſelf Preſent) enlarg'd upon the Merits of Antipater, and his Fidelity to the People of Rome: Expoſing Antigonus at the ſame Time, for a Publique Enemy: not only for Falling-off ſo ſoon, but for receiving a Crown from the Hands of the Parthians, in Contempt of the Romans. The Senate was ſo poſſeſs'd with Theſe Harangues, that they gave their Voices Unanimouſly for Herod to be King of the Jews: Eſpecially Anthony Declaring Himſelf that it would be for the Advantage of the War with the Parthians to have it ſo. Upon the Riſing of the Senate, Anthony and Cæſar went out with Herod betwixt them; the Conſuls, and other Magiſtrates going before, to give Order for the Killing of Sacrifices, and the Depoſiting of This Decree of the Senate in the Capitol. Herod, on the Firſt Day of his Reign, ſupp'd with Anthony.

Maſſada beſieg'd by Antigonus, and in Extreme want of Water.

ANtigonus was at This Time before Maſſada; where they Wanted Water to Extremity, and Nothing elſe: inſomuch that Joſeph, the Brother of Herod, Underſtanding that Malichus the King of Arabia had repented of the Injuries he had Multiply'd upon Herod; he took up a Reſolution with Two Hundred of his Familiar Friends, to Steal out of the Caſtle by night, and to betake himſelf to the Arabians for Succour. And he had certainly left the Caſtle, if upon the Preciſe Point of Time, when he was juſt about to make the Sally, there had not fall'n ſo Plentiful a Shower of Rain, that their Pits, Ciſterns, and other Veſſels were all Repleniſh'd with it; ſo that there was now no need of Stirring. After This Relief, the Garriſon fell to their Sallies; and betwixt Surprizes and Open Force, they did conſiderable Execution upon the Enemy: not but that they had the Fortune to be ſometimes Worſted Themſelves.

A Providential Fall of Rain.

Ventidius ſeizes Antigonus's Treaſure.

While This paſt, Ventidius, one of the Roman Generals, being ſent to drive the Parthians out of Syria, Enter'd into Judæa, under Colour of a Deſign to Relieve Maſſada; but in Effect to make a Seizure of Antigonus's Treaſure. Now when he had done his Buſineſs at Jeruſalem, he went off again with the Greateſt part of the Army; but left Silo with a ſmall Body behind him, for the better Countenance of the Cheat: for if he had quite Clear'd the Country, it would have been ſaid, that he came only to Feather his Own Neſt. Antigonus however made Fair with Silo, having ſome Hope yet that he might Piece again with the Parthians; and ſo long as there was Hope, he thought the People would be Quiet.

Ventidius and Silo join Herod againſt Antigonus.

Herod being now Tranſported out of Italy to Ptolemais, liſted a Conſiderable Army, both of his Own Nation, and Strangers; and ſo Poſted away thorough Galilee toward Antigonus, with the Aſſiſtance of Ventidius and Silo: who were prevail'd upon by the Sollicitation of Dellius, at the Inſtance of Anthony, to help Herod into the Poſſeſſion of his Kingdom. But Ventidius was Taken-up with Compoſing the Broils that the Parthians had rais'd in the Cities; and Silo was already Corrupted by Antigonus, in Judæa. But Herod wanted no Men; for they came in to him every day, all the way he March'd: and Galilee, all but a very Few, went along with him Entire. The Firſt, and the moſt Neceſſary Thing he had in his Thought, was the raiſing of the Siege of Maſſada, to ſet his Friends and his Kin'red at liberty. But Joppa was a Block in his way, and the Firſt Obſtacle to be remov'd: for there was no meddling with Jeruſalem, with That Enemy at their Backs.

Silo deſerts.

Silo took This Occaſion to Withdraw; and the Jews of Antigonus's Party, purſuing him, Herod with a Handful of Men, Fought and Defeated them, and brought off Silo, after a Faint and a Weak Reſiſtance.

Herod takes Joppa, and Poſts away to Relieve Maſſada.

Joppa being now Taken, Herod haſten'd away to ſet Maſſada Free; the Country very Frankly joining with him: ſome for his Father's ſake; ſome for his Own; Others, in Gratitude, for the Obligations they had to Both: but the Greater part of them, for the Hope of Honour and Reward. He was by This time Maſter of a Conſiderable Army; but Antigonus did what he could however to Obſtruct his Paſſage, by Planting Ambuſhes in his Way, though with little or no Damage to the Adverſe Party.

Antigonus lays Ambuſhes for Herod.

Maſſada Reliev'd: and Herod advances to Jeruſalem.

Herod, in fine, found no Great Difficulty in raiſing the Siege, and in withdrawing his Friends and his Goods out of the Caſtle. He advanc'd from thence to Jeruſalem; where divers of Silo's Men, and of the Inhabitants, came over to him, out of an Awe they had for his Power.

Herod begirts the City, and Offers an Univerſal Amneſty.

He Pitch'd his Camp upon the Weſt-ſide of the Town; whence the Enemy Gall'd him with Show'rs of Darts and Arrows, and the Defendents made ſeveral Strong Sallies upon him. The Firſt Thing Herod did, was the Publiſhing of a Proclamation quite round the Walls of the City by a Herald in Form; ſetting forth, that he had no Other Deſign in this Expedition, then the Common Good of the People, and the Safety of the City, with the Offer of an Univerſal Act of Oblivion to all his Enemies, of what ſort or degree ſoever, without Exception. Antigonus, on on the other hand, did all he could, with Noiſe and Harrangue, to keep his People, either from Hearing the Conditions of the Declaration, or from being Mov'd with the Reaſon of it: and ſo he Commanded his Men to fall-on; whereupon the Beſiegers were beaten-off with Shot from the Towers, and forc'd to a Retreat. The Beſiegers Repuls'd.

The Corruption of Silo was now as Clear as the Sun, by the Clamours of the Soldiers, that he had Tamper'd and Suborn'd to put all into a Flame. They were Undone, they cry'd, for want of Neceſſaries. [They had neither Meat nor Mony: and as Antigonus had Order'd it, the Skirts of the City were all Eaten up, and they were ruin'd for want of Convenient Winter-Quarters.] At this rate were the People Animated to a Revolt, and Silo would have gone-off for Company. This was ſo Dangerous a Practice, that Herod was glad to apply himſelf, not only to Silo's Officers, but to the Common Soldiery alſo, to prevent a Worſe Miſchief. Th. Craft and Corruption of Silo. He Stirs up the People to a Revolt.

[Fellow Soldiers, ſays he, You know very well, that I have the Commiſſion of Cæſar, Anthony, and the Senate, for what I do. Do but Stay by me One Day longer, and all your Wants ſhall be Supply'd.] Upon this Aſſurance, he went away Himſelf to give Orders for Proviſion, and forthwith ſent them ſo Prodigious a Quantity, that Silo's Mouth was Stopt, and no Room left for any further Complaint. And to Secure them likewiſe for the future, he wrote to Samaria (which was then under his Protection) to ſend him all manner of Proviſions to Jericho: as Corn, Wine, Oyl, Cattle, &c. When Antigonus heard This, he preſently diſpatch'd his Troups abroad, and laid Ambuſhes to Intercept Convoys. They follow'd their Orders, and there was now a Great Army gotten together near Jericho; and Parties up and down the Mountains, to Obſtruct any Relief. Herod Compoſes the Mutiny.

Herod was not Idle all this while, but with Ten Companies, half Romans, half Jews, and a ſmall Body of Horſe, he advanced to Jericho: where he found the City abandon'd; not a Creature left in't, and only Five Hundred of the Inhabitants, with their Wives and Families, Fled to the Mountains. Theſe he took, and ſo Diſmiſs'd them. The Town had a World of Rich Pillage in it; which the Romans riffl'd, and carry'd away: and Herod, leaving a Garriſon in the Place, went his way back again. The Roman Troups had their Winter-Quarters aſſign'd them in the Cities that came over to Herod: as Idumæa, Gallilee, and Samaria. Antigonus alſo, upon Silo's Account, had part of his Army Quarter'd in Lydda, to Stand fair with Anthony. The Romans were now Eaſy and Quiet, and in a Full Enjoyment of Peace and Plenty. But Herod could not yet be at Reſt; for he Sent his Brother Joſeph with 400 Horſe and 2000 Foot to Fortify Idumæa, for fear Antigonus ſhould enter upon any New Practice: While he went Himſelf, with his Mother and the reſt of his Kin'red, to Samaria; whom he had reſcu'd at Maſſada. After the Securing of his Friends, he advanc'd into Gallilee to reduce certain Garriſons that Antigonus was poſſeſs'd of in That Province. He came up to Sephoris in a Deep Snow, and took the Place without any Difficulty; for the Garriſon Quitted it without a Blow. When he had ſtaid there a-while, and refreſh'd his Men after a Winter's Fatigue, (as there was great Plenty of Proviſions) he turn'd his Arms againſt the Free-booters, that Shelter'd themſelves in Caves, and by Sallies and Incurſions made a Worſe Ravage in the Country then a Regular War. He ſent away Three Companies of Foot, and a Wing of Horſe before him, to Arbela, and follow'd them Himſelf Forty days after with the reſt of the Army. Theſe Robbers were not at all Daunted with this Incurſion; but, on the Contrary, advanc'd againſt them in a Body, in the Confidence they had of the Conduct and Courage of their Leader. When the Armies came afterward to the Shock, the Thieves Right Wing put Herod's Left-Wing to an Abſolute Rout; but Herod wheeling immediately upon them with his Right, did not only put a Stop to the Flight of his Own Men, but brought them on again with ſuch a Fury, that the Robbers were not able to Stand before them. He had the Chace of them as far as the Jordan: a great many of them Cut-off in the Purſuit, and the reſt got over the River. Gallilee was now deliver'd from This Peſt, ſaving only ſome Straglers that kept ſtill in their Faſtneſſes; which was the Occaſion of Herod's Staying a little longer in the Country. Herod advances to Jericho. Jericho Taken, Rifled, and Garriſon'd. Herod removes his Friends from Maſſada to Samaria, and poſſeſſes himſelf of Sephoris. He bends his Force againſt the Free-booters. An Encounter betwixt Herod and the Robbers.

Herod, after this Exploit, as the Firſt Fruits of his Soldiers Services, gave the Common Soldiers a Hundred and Fifty Drachma's a Man, and to their Officers ſo much more in Proportion: and then diſmiſs'd them into their Winter-Quarters. He gave it in Charge to his Youngeſt Brother Pheroras to take Care for Proviſions, and likewiſe to run up a Wall about the Caſtle of Alexandrion: Which was all done accordingly.

Anthony was now at Athens; and Ventidius ſent to Silo and Herod, to Join him in the War againſt the Parthians: but writing to them in the Firſt place, to Settle the Affairs of Judæa. Herod was well enough Content to ſend Silo to Ventidius, while Herod attacques the Thieves in their Holes. A Deſcription of their Caves and Hiding-Places.

He Himſelf advanc'd againſt the Thieves again to Ferret them out of their Dens. Now theſe Dens or Caverns were in the Crags of the Rocks; hardly acceſſible on any ſide, but by Narrow Turns and Windings, and a Direct Precipice from Top to Bottom. The Place was ſo Nice and Difficult, that it coſt the King ſome time before he could reſolve what to do; but he bethought himſelf at laſt of an Experiment, Bold and Deſperate enough. There were ſtrong Cheſts, with Soldiers in them, let down with Ropes from the Top of the Mountain to the Mouth of the Entrance into the Cave. Theſe Soldiers deſtroy'd the Thieves in their Holes: ſome, with their Arms; and Others that Reſiſted, with Fire. When Herod had a Mind to ſave any of them, a Cryer Summon'd them to come to him. But upon the Main, there was not One Man that render'd himſelf upon his own Accord: and for thoſe that were forced to it, a great many of them prefer'd their Liberties before their Lives.

The Wonderful Reſolution of an Old Man

There was One very Remarkable Paſſage. An Old Man, the Father of Seven Sons: the Mother, and the Children, lay begging at him only for leave to go out, and render themſelves to the Enemy. This Old Man Commanded them to come out one after Another, and ſtill as any of them appear'd, he put them to Death. This Spectacle ſtruck Herod to the Heart; who ſaw it from a Place of Proſpect near at hand, and beſought the Poor Man, with Signs, and Words at length, to ſpare his Children. But no Words or Actions of Tenderneſs had the Power to work upon him. The Man went forward in his Reſolution; Kill'd the Children Firſt, and then the Mother: Caſting their Dead Bodies down the Rock, and himſelf next; reproching Herod for a Man of an Abject, Mean Spirit.

The Country Clear'd of the Thieves.

Herod goes back to Samaria, and Ptolemey Commands in his Abſence.

Ptolemey Surprix'd, and Slain.

Herod Returns, and Diſperſes the Thieves.

Ventidius Aſſiſts Herod againſt Antigonus.

When Herod had Hunted the Thieves out of their Dens, he left only ſuch a Force behind him, as he thought ſufficient to keep the Peace. Ptolemey had the Command of it, and ſo he return'd to Samaria; Marching againſt Antigonus with Three Thouſand Foot Arm'd with Bucklers, and Six Hundred Horſe. The Troublers of Gallilee made Advantage of Herod's Abſence, and fell upon Ptolemey by Surprize, and Kill'd him: They laid the Country Waſt alſo, and then fled to Bogs and Defile's for their Retreat. Herod had no ſooner Notice of this Diſorder, but he was in with them immediately, and cut-off great Numbers of their People; ſet all the Caſtles at Liberty that they had as good as blockt up, and Fin'd the Cities a Hundred Talents for the Riot.

The Parthians being now beaten, and Pacorus Kill'd; Ventidius, by the Order of Anthony, diſpatch'd Machæras to Herod with a Thouſand Horſe and Two Legions againſt Antigonus: who ſent Machæras a Complaining Letter of the Indignities Herod had put upon him, with the Offer of a Conſiderable Sum of Money to Enter into His Intereſt: but Machæras ſtood-off; partly for their Sakes to whom he was recommended, and in part becauſe Herod was the Franker Bidder of the Two. But Machæras made Fair however with Antigonus, and put on the Countenance of a Friendly Diſpoſition to Diſcourſe the Matter with him: But his Buſ'neſs, in truth, was only to feel his Pulſe, and learn the State of his Affairs, which was a Method abſolutely againſt the Opinion and Advice of Herod. Now Antigonus finding by this Time whereabouts he was, did not only refuſe him Entrance upon his Approach to the City; but kept him off from the Walls with Darts and Arrows, as an Actual Enemy. Machæras was ſo aſham'd of himſelf upon this Diſappointment, that away he went to Herod at (a) Ammaus; and in a rage put all the Jews to death that he could meet with, whether Friends or Foes, and the Herodians as well as the reſt: Neither did the Antigonians Scape any Better then their Neighbours.

Machæras goes to Herod at Ammaus, and puts all the Jews there to death without Diſtinction.

Herod meditates a Revenge.

Herod was ſo Tranſported at this Bloudy Outrage, that he was once thinking to take his Revenge upon Machæras, bare-fac'd, and as an Open Enemy: but upon Second Thoughts he Check'd himſelf, and choſe rather to Carry the Cauſe immediately to Anthony. Machæras was ſo Conſcious to himſelf of what he had done, that ſo ſoon as ever Herod was gone, he Poſted, in that Inſtant, after him; and overtaking him upon the Way, after a Thouſand Submiſſions, Proteſtations, and Other Begging Importunities, with much ado he made his Peace. But This did not divert Herod yet from going to Anthony. So he went forward; and hearing upon the Way that Anthony was at that time with a Great Army before Samoſata, (a Strong Place upon the Euphrates) he made the more Haſte to be up with him time enough to give ſome Signal Proofs of his Faith, and Courage, and at the ſame time to Ingratiate himſelf with Anthony. The Arrival of Herod put a quick End to the Siege: He deſtroy'd a Multitude of the Barbarians, and a Great Part of the Booty fell to his Share. Anthony, that had always a Mighty Value for Herod, had a Greater Eſteem for him upon this Occaſion yet then ever; which Contributed exceedingly to his Honour, and to the Hopes he had of Eſtabliſhing himſelf in the Kingdom. Antiochus, in fine, was forc'd to deliver up Samoſata.

But Joſeph, when his Brother was at a Diſtance, forgot that Article, and March'd toward Jericho with Five Companies that Machæras had provided him, to Carry-off the Corn that was then ripe upon the Ground. The Enemy fell upon him from the Mountains, and betwixt the Advantages of the Place, and the Occaſion, gave him an Utter Defeat; Cutting all the Romans to pieces, and the General Himſelf: who left behind him the Character of a Great and a Valiant Man; Theſe being only New-rais'd Troups Levy'd in Syria, and no Veterans among them to Supply the Want of Skill and Experience in their Fellows.

Joſeph Commands in Herod's Abſence.

Joſeph, Herod's Brother, Kill'd in a Skirmiſh.

But ſuch at laſt was the Brutality of Antigonus, that the Victory would not ſerve his Turn, without Unmanly Inſolencies upon the Dead: inſulting over the Body of Joſeph Himſelf, with Affronts, and Blows, and then Striking-off his Head; though Pheroras offer'd Fifty Talents Compoſition for that Laſt Indignity. Things were ſo Alter'd in Gallilee upon the Succeſs of Antigonus, that they took the Herodians of the Firſt Quality, and Plung'd them into the Lake. There was a Great Change in Idumæa too; where Machæras repair'd the Walls of the Caſtle of (a) Gath. Herod knew nothing of theſe Matters all this While; for upon the Taking of Samoſata, Anthony made (b) Soſius Governor of Syria, with a Charge to Aſſiſt Herod againſt Antigonus, and ſo he Departed into Ægypt. Soſius, upon This, ſent away two Companies into Judæa to Join Herod, and He Himſelf follow'd ſoon after with the reſt of the Army.

Strange Changes upon his Succeſſes.

Soſius made General of Syria.

While Herod was at Daphne, (the Suburbs of Antioch) he had a kind of Preſage of the Death of his Brother, in a Dream. He leapt out of his Bed upon't, and the Meſſengers that brought the News, came into his Chamber at that very Inſtant. The Surprize Struck him at firſt; but when his Paſſion had a little ſpent it ſelf, he diſpatch'd away with all poſſible Speed to find out the Enemy. Coming to Libanus, he took Eight Hundred Inhabitants of the Place, and One Roman Cohort to his Aſſiſtance. With this Body he Enter'd Gallilee before Day; Charg'd the Enemy, and beat them back into the Caſtle whence they came. He Sat down before it, and Aſſaulted it Day after day; but before he could make himſelf Maſter of it, the Winter came on ſo faſt, that he was fain to draw-off his Army into the next Village. Anthony, ſome few days after this, ſent him an Enforcement of Another Company; which put the Garriſon into ſuch an Apprehenſion, that they ſlipt away out of the Caſtle by Night.

A Fore-boding Dream of Herod's.

Herod's next Remove was in all haſte to Jericho, to take his Revenge for the Death of his Brother; where he was preſerv'd by a Providence ſo Wonderful, that it fell little ſhort of a Miracle: but God in his Goodneſs had him under his Particular Care. Herod had had at Supper with him that Night ſeveral Perſons of Great Quality, and ſo ſoon as the Entertainment was Over, the Room Clear'd, and the Company gone, the Roof of the Eating-Room fell flat down to the Ground. He took this Remarkable Eſcape for ſo Auſpicious a Preſage, with a reſpect to the War he was Engag'd in, that he Decamped next Morning Early. The Enemy in a Body of about Six Thouſand came down the Mountains, and had a Skirmiſh with his Van-Guard; but they did not much preſs to any Action with the Romans: only they Aſſaulted them with Darts and Stones at a Diſtance; and Herod Himſelf, as he paſs'd by, receiv'd a Wound in his Side.

A Strange Eſcape of Herod's upon the Fall of a Dining Room.

Antigonus, that Valu'd himſelf upon being thought Herod's Superior, both for Number and Courage, ſent a Familiar Friend of his, One Pappus, with a Body of Men

Men into Samaria to try an Encounter with Macheras. Herod, in the mean Time, takes Five Towns, and ravages the Enemy's Country; Deſtroys Two Thouſand of the Inhabitants; lays their Houſes in Aſhes, and ſo returns to the Army not far from a Village call'd Cana. There came to him Every Day a World of Jews: Some from Jericho; Some from Elſewhere; Others for Spite to Antigonus, and ſome again in Reſpect to Herod: Nay, ſome there were ſo Senſeleſs, that they lov'd Change purely for Change-ſake. Now the Thing that Herod's Heart was moſt ſet upon, was to Puſh it to a Battle; and Pappus, with his Men on the Other Hand, was as Ready to put it to an Iſſue: So that his Troups, without any Dread, either of Force, or Numbers, March'd Fiercely up to the Combat. When they came to Charge, Pappus's Men, upon the Main, made a Tolerable Reſiſtance; but wherever Herod came, he was ſo Tranſported with the Spirit of Revenge for his Brother's Death, that his Enemies fled before him. It was his Method, wherever he ſaw them in a Body, to break them into a Diſorder, and by that Means he put them all to Flight.

A Terrible Slaughter and Confuſion.

There was a Terrible Slaughter: Some beaten back into the Place whence they came; and ſome running One Way, ſome Another: Herod ſtill preſſing and Purſuing them, till at laſt he fell-in with them pell-mell into the Town. The Houſes were preſently Crouded with Fugitives, and the very Roofs Cover'd with them. But Thoſe were Eaſily Deſtroy'd; and then upon beating down the Buildings, ſeveral Periſh'd under the Ruines, and Others by the Sword; and They that Scap'd the One, were Deſtroy'd by the Other. The Streets, in fine, were ſo block'd up with Piles of Carcaſſes, that they found ſome Difficulty to March over the Dead Bodies. The Spectacle was ſo Frightful, that the People were not able to Stand the very Sight of it. In the Fluſh of this Succeſs, Herod had Certainly March'd directly to Jeruſalem, if the Extreme Rigour of the Seaſon had not made the Ways Impaſſable. This was the Only Thing that hinder'd the Perfecting of his Victory, and the Irreparable Ruine of Antigonus; who was now Diſpoſing of Himſelf to Quit the City.

A Providential Deliverance.

Herod, in the Evening, having Diſcharg'd his Friends to Refreſh themſelves after the Fatigue of the Day, went to Waſh himſelf, as is Uſual in ſuch Caſes, being Hot and Sweaty, with only One Servant to Attend Him. As he was in his Way to the Bath, One of Antigonus's Soldiers met him with a Sword drawn; and after Him, Another and Another, and ſtill more. Now Theſe were Men that fled thither with their Arms out of the Battle for Sanctuary. Upon the Sight of the King, they fell into ſuch a Dread, and Trembling, that they minded nothing but the Saving of themſelves, and ſo paſs'd him by. It ſo happen'd that no Body being at hand to Seize them, they all got-off: and as Providence would have it, Herod Scap'd Untoucht. On the Day following he Order'd the Head of Pappus (Antigonus's General) to be Struck-off, and ſent it to his Brother Pheroras, in Revenge for the Bloud of Joſeph; for it was Pappus that Kill'd him.

Pappus's Head Struck-off in Revenge for Joſeph.

Herod lays Siege to Jeruſalem.

When the Winter was Well Over, Herod Advanc'd to Jeruſalem; drew his Men to the Walls; and for the Advantage of the Attaque, encamp'd before the Temple: being the Quarter from whence Ptolemey took it formerly. This was the Third Year after Herod's being Declared King at Rome. He Aſſign'd all his Troups their Offices and Stations, and Every Man his Poſt in the Suburbs. He Order'd the Caſting up of Three Ramparts, and the Building of Turrets over them: And when he had given Theſe Commiſſions in Charge to his Friends and Officers that he could beſt Confide in, he went Himſelf to Samaria, to Conſummate a Marriage with Mariamne, (the Daughter of Ariſtobulus the Son of Alexander) to whom he had been Contracted ſome Time before: So that the Siege and the Match went on together, in Contempt of his Enemies; as who ſhould ſay, I have time enough for Both.

Upon his Marriage, he came back again to Jeruſalem with ſeveral Additional Troups; beſide a Strong Body of Horſe and Foot under Soſius the Roman General, that was ſent to Join him: the Greater Part of them took their March by the way of the Midland, and He Himſelf by Phœnicia. The Whole Army upon the Muſter amounted to Eleven Regiments, and Six Thouſand Horſe: beſide a Strong Enforcement of Syrian Auxiliaries. They Order'd the Aſſault upon the North-ſide. Herod founded his Right upon the Decree of Senate that made him King; and Soſius pleaded the Commiſſion of Anthony, for the Aſſiſtance of Herod with the Troups under his Command.

The Jews within the City were now in a very Great Confuſion and Diſtreſs; the Meaner Sort of them gathering together about the Temple, and paſſing their Judgments upon the Times in a kind of an Enthuſiaſtical Way of fore-boding Calamities to come. The Bolder Part of This Rabble went Trouping up and down, and Pil-

Pillaging whatever they could come at: eſpecially near the Town; where they left no Neceſſaries, neither for Horſe, nor Man. The Soldiery all this while Omitted nothing for the Defence of the Place. They kept the Beſiegers-off from their Walls, and ſtill Oppoſed one Inſtrument and one Stratagem to Another: but their Greateſt Excellency lay in Mining, and breaking-in upon the Enemy before they were aware. The King, on the other Hand, took Care to provide againſt the Excurſions of the Robbers, and for a Supply of Proviſions by Convoys and Tranſportations from abroad, to Anſwer the Neceſſities of the People. The Jews muſt be allow'd to have been Bold and Daring in Battle, even to the Higheſt Degree. But yet when it came to Military Skill and Addreſs, they were conſtantly Outdone by the Romans: but Maintaining the Diſpute however, though they were in a Manner ſure to Die for't. And in Caſe of any Surprizing Attempt of the Enemy from their Trenches, by Sally, or Attaque, they found ſome Way or Other in an Inſtant, to make all good. And, in One Word, they ſpar'd for neither Art nor Labour, in the Reſolution they had taken to defend it to the Laſt. But after a Five Months Defence againſt ſo Vaſt an Army, a Select Party of Herod's Men were ſo Hardy at laſt as to Mount the Wall, with ſome of Soſius's Centurions to Second them, and ſo they brake into the City. The Firſt Thing they did, after their Entrance, was to Poſt themſelves round the Temple, and as near it as they could get; while the Army diſpers'd it ſelf, and carry'd Death and Deſolation along with it, in the moſt Hideous Forms, wherever it mov'd. The Romans were Outrageous in Revenge for the Hardſhips they had Endur'd in the Siege, and the Cruelty of the Herodian Jews was an Implacable Spite, for Fear any of their Adverſaries ſhould Eſcape. The Narrow Paſſages, and the Houſes, were all fill'd, and Peſterd'd with Heaps of Dead Bodies. They ſpar'd neither Age nor Sex, and the Temple it ſelf was no longer a Sanctuary. Nay though the King Himſelf Commanded them every where upon their Allegeance to hold their Hands, they went on nevertheleſs with the Butchery, to the Degree of an Inhumane Madneſs.

Jeruſalem Taken by Aſſault.

Antigonus, in This Hurry and Confuſion, was ſo Mean and Heartleſs, that without any Regard to his Quality, or to his Paſt or Preſent Fortune, he came down from Baris, and caſt himſelf at the Feet of Soſius; who, without any ſort of Pity for his Calamity, received him with This Taunt, that his Name ſhould be no longer Antigonus, but Antigona. But though he behav'd himſelf like a Woman, he was not uſ'd like One; for he was laid in Chains, and kept a Priſoner. Herod's Enemies were now at his Mercy, but his Friends were yet ſo Troubleſom, that he had much ado to keep his Auxiliaries and Strangers Quiet; for the Multitude preſs'd ſo Violently into the Temple, out of a Rude Curioſity to ſee Things and Faſhions, that Herod had enough to do by Fair Means and Foul; as Menaces, Entreaties; nay, and ſometimes with Blows, to keep them in Order: accounting upon it that his Victory would be worſe then a Defeat, if he ſhould ſuffer thoſe Sacred Privacies to be Expos'd to Common Eyes, which the Law had kept in Reſerve.

Antigonus a Mean Pitiful Wretch.

He proceeded then to the Regulation of the Soldiery in the Matter of Pillage; telling Soſius, that at That Rate of leaving neither Men nor Mony, the Romans would render him a King of a Deſart, rather then of a City, and People; and that to gain the Whole World, he would not be a Governour upon Thoſe Terms. Soſius made This Reply, that he thought the Soldiers, after what they had done and ſuffer'd, might be allowed ſome ſort of Right to the Advantage of the Booty. You ſpeak Reaſon, ſays Herod, and take My Word and Honour for it, that I will ſee Juſtice done to Every Man of them out of my Own Fortune. By this way of Proceeding, Herod preſerv'd the Remainder of his Country, and afterward made good his Promiſe to the Army: for there was not a Common Soldier that had not his Donative, and the Officers were all rewarded in Proportion, even to Soſius Himſelf; and to ſuch a Degree, that every Creature was abundantly Satisfy'd. Soſius, after This, Dedicated a Golden Crown to God; and leaving Jeruſalem, carry'd Antigonus away Bound to Anthony; flattering himſelf all the way with the Hope of Life to the very Minute of his Execution: when his Head was Cut-off for not deſerving to Live.

Herod Compounds for the Booty.

Antigonus Loſes his Head,

The Multitude of the City were Divided, and Herod diſtinguiſh'd Party from Party accordingly; Treating his Friends with Great Honour and Kindneſs, to make the ſurer of them: but the Antigonians he put to death. When he fell ſhort of Mony, he divided what he had that was Precious, betwixt Anthony and Thoſe about him that he had the moſt value for; but all This was not enough to ſecure him yet; for Anthony was at This time beſotted with the Love of Cleopatra, and ſo Abandon'd to his Paſſion, that he could deny her nothing. Now Cleopatra had already fall'n ſo Bloudily upon her own Relations, that when ſhe had not left one near Kinſman Living, ſhe turn'd the Point of her Rage againſt Strangers; by Calumniating lumniating Men of Honour and Quality, to Anthony, and prevailing with him to have them put to death, as the ready way to make Her Miſtreſs of their Eſtates. Her Avarice Tranſported her ſo far after This againſt the Jews, and Arabians, that ſhe Enter'd into a Secret Practice againſt the Lives of their Kings Themſelves; Herod, and (a) Malichus. Anthony held her in hand upon it with Fair Words, and ſeeming Compliances: but for taking away the Lives of Two Good Men, and Two ſuch Princes, it was ſo Execrable a Propoſition, he could not but have a Horrour for it. He went ſo far however as to break Friendſhip with them, and to put her in Poſſeſſion of a Conſiderable Part of their Territories: as for Inſtance, the Lands in Jericho, ſo Famous for Palm-Trees and Balſam, and all the Cities upon the River Eleutherus, except Tyre and Sidon. When he had Gratify'd her with This Preſent, ſhe accompany'd him as far as the Euphrates in his Expedition againſt the Parthians, and ſo took her way into Judæa by Apamia and Damaſcus.

Cleopatra Covetous and Ill Natur'd.

Herod had already parted with Large Sums toward the Mollifying of Cleopatra; but her Ill Nature was ſo Implacable, and ſo Inſatiable was her Avarice, that All This would not do, without Extorting an Annuity of Two Hundred Talents out of the Revenue of Judæa; and ſo, with Great Obſequiouſneſs, and Reſpect, he Conducted her to Peluſium. It was not long before Anthony came back from the Parthian War, with (b) Artabazes the Son of Tigranes his Priſoner; whom he made a Preſent of to Cleopatra, with the whole Booty.

UPon the breaking out of the War at Actium, Herod was now at liberty, and propoſed to himſelf to accompany Anthony in That Expedition; for he had gotten (c) Hyrcania into his Hands, from the Siſter of Antigonus; and All Things were now Compos'd and Eaſy at home. But Cleopatra, for fear of Herod's expoſing himſelf to Dangers with Anthony, craftily diverted him from his Deſign. This Princeſs, having a Mortal Hatred for Both the Kings, perſuaded Anthony to Commit the Parthian War to Herod; for (ſays ſhe to herſelf) if he get the better of it, I ſhall be Queen of Arabia; and if he be Worſted, of Judæa: propounding only the Daſhing of the One againſt the Other. This Advice happen'd well enough for Herod; who, having gotten together a Mighty Body of Horſe, ſent them againſt the Syrians near Dioſpolis, where he fell upon Them; They made a handſom reſiſtance for a while, but in the End were beaten out of the Fied. Upon This Defeat, the Arabians drew out a Prodigious Army, and Poſted themſelves at (d) Canatha in Cœleſyria, there to Expect the coming-up of the Jews. Herod was now advancing toward them; but upon ſight of their Numbers, and Diſpoſition, he found it Convenient to keep himſelf upon a more then Ordinary Guard, and therefore order'd the Running of a Wall about the Camp. But the People were ſo Puff'd up with One Victory, that Herod's Precaution would be Time loſt, they thought, to make them Wait for Another: ſo that without any more Ceremony they fell on, and Routed the Arabians at the very Firſt Puſh: but Herod ſcap'd very Narrowly Himſelf upon the Purſuit, by a Body of Canathenes that were ſent-in by Athenion to the Relief of the Arabians. Now this Athenion was an Officer of Cleopatra's, and ever a Deadly Enemy to Herod. Upon the Encouragement of this Relief, the Arabians took heart, and came-on again; ſcatter'd the Herodians; and following them Cloſe through Crags and Woods, they Kill'd a World of them in the Chaſe. They that ſcap'd the Battle, fled to a Village there at hand called Ormiza: where they were Coopt-up, and ſurrounded; and the Arabians made themſelves Maſters of their Camp, and the Men that were in it. A very little while after the Blow was given, Herod came-up with Succours; but the Miſchief being firſt done, there was no Remedy. ficers:

ficers: for if they had not been ſo Haſty and Hot-headed, Athenion could never have had an opportunity to put his Plot in Execution. But Herod reveng'd himſelf afterwards on the Arabians by Surprizes, and Incurſions, over and over; and at-ton'd by ſeveral little Victories for One Great Defeat. Herod takes his Revenge.

While Herod was in the Courſe of his Succeſſes, there befell him a moſt Judicial Calamity. This was in the Seventh Year of his Reign, and in the Beginning of the Spring, when the War at Actium was at the Hotteſt. There happen'd at This time ſo Dreadful an Earth-quake, that it ſwallow'd up Cattle Innumerable, and a Matter of Thirty Thouſand People; but the Army, that lay in the Field, ſuffer'd nothing. It was, in truth, a Diſmal Accident; but Report (as it is Uſual) making it much Greater then Effectually it was, the Arabians took it for granted that Judæa was Totally Sunk and Loſt; and flatter'd themſelves with an Opinion that they might have the Whole Province now for the Asking. In This Confidence they put certain Jewiſh Embaſſadors that were Then with them to Death, and without any more ado, advanc'd into the Country to take Poſſeſſion of it. This Formidable Inroad of the Arabians ſtruck the Jews with ſuch a Terror; (eſpecially conſidering the Heart-broken Condition they were in at That Time, with One Calamity upon the Neck of Another) that Herod was fain to try if he could Reaſon a Diſtracted, Spiritleſs People into their Reſolutions and Wits again. A Prodigious Earth-quake in Judæa. Several Jewiſh Embaſſadors put to Death upon it. The Jews in a Conſternation.

You are here, in my Opinion, ſays Herod, under a moſt Unreaſonable Apprehenſion. I will allow you, ſays he, to Indulge your Sorrows under the Hand of an Offended God; but to ſubject your ſelves to the ſame Deſpondencies and Paſſions, for fear of the Power of Men, is a Meanneſs of Soul below the Ordinary Pitch of your Courage. Nay, ſo far am I from any Dread of an Enemy, after This Earth-quake, that it looks to me rather as if Providence had Order'd the Enſnaring of your Adverſaries by This Temptation, into a Vengeance for the Injuries they have done you: Neither do they lay ſo much Streſs upon the Force of their Own Arms or Valour, as upon the Opinion they have of Our Abjection and Miſery. But Thoſe are Falſe Hopes, when Men Support themſelves upon the Infirmities of Other People rather then upon their Own Virtue: Nor is there any Certainty, either in Proſperous, or Adverſe Fortune; but They are Both Unſteady, and take their Turns: and for a Confirmation of This Doctrine, you need go no further then to the Late Battle; where we were Maſters One Hour, and at Mercy the Next. This is the very Caſe of our Enemies at Preſent, or I am much Deceiv'd. They think they Take, and they are Taken. People that are Over-confident are Unwary: but a Conſiderate Fear makes Men Provident; ſo that the very Ground of your Apprehenſion is the Foundation of My Aſſurance. You would needs be Charging the Enemy contrary to Order, and Forwarder then you ſhould have been; and Athenion, you ſee, made Advantage of your Errour. But you your ſelves are now upon the Reſerve: Your Deliberations are Sober, and not Phantaſtical; which is a Diſpoſition that I look upon as an Omen of a Certain Victory. This is the Right Temper of a Brave Man, before he comes into Action: but let him keep his Fire and Heat to Himſelf till he has Occaſion for it, in the Field. And ſo let it be your Buſ'neſs now, to Convince your Wicked Enemies by Force of Arms, that the Jews will ſooner part with their Lives then their Reputation: and ſtand Firm at laſt under all Judgments and Misfortunes; and never Own the Arabians for their Maſters, who have ſo often been their Slaves. A Generous Speech of Herod's to Encourage his Soldiers.

But Why This Fear at laſt for Things Inanimate? How comes an Earth-quake to be a Portent; or a Preſage of Things to come? Is there any Thing more Natural then the Agitations and Diſorders of the Elements? They do not foretel Calamities; but they actually bring, and Create them. 'Tis Poſſible that there may be ſome Fore-running ſigns of Plagues, Famine, and Earth-quakes, to come: but when they are once Come, the Greater they are, the Sooner will they be over. Or put the Caſe we ſhould be Conquer'd now, pray Which is Worſe; the War, or the Earth-quake? But here's a Deſtination of Theſe People to Ruine, even by their Own Hands, without the Help of Enemies, that could be ſo Impious and Inhumane, as, Contrary to the Laws of Nature and Nations, to dip their Hands in the Bloud of our Embaſſadors, and Dedicate the Sacrifice to God for the Succeſs of the War. Can they ever think to ſcape the All-ſeeing Eye, and the Almighty Power of a Vindictive God, whenever we ſhall but rouze in us the Courage and Zeal of our Fore-fathers, and call theſe Perfidious Violators of Leagues and Publique Faith to a Severe and Juſt Account! Wherefore ſtand up, My Brave Fellow-Soldiers, not for your Wives, Children, or Country; but to revenge the Murder of your Embaſſadors: Whoſe very Bloud will Conſecrate the Cauſe; and Thoſe Heroes, Dead as they are, will do you more Good in the Head of your Army, then the Living Commanders of it. Do you but follow where I'll lead you, and I'll ask no more. Only One Word of Caution; Be not over-Hot, and Raſh; and when it comes to the Puſh, they will not Dare to look you in the Face.

The Army takes Heart upon Herod's Exhortation. Herod Sacrifices.

This Exhortation put the Soldiers in ſuch a Heart, that Herod clos'd with the Good Humour, and Sacrific'd: and ſo without any Delay paſs'd his Army over the River Jordan. He Pitch'd his Camp at Philadelphia, not far from the Enemy, with a Caſtle between them; which look'd as if That Caſtle were to be the Subject of the Diſpute. Herod, at That Diſtance, provok'd the Enemy to a Battle; deſiring nothing more then to bring it to a ſpeedy Tryal. The Enemy had already ſent People before to take Poſſeſſion of This Caſtle; but the Herodians without much Difficulty beat them back, and gain'd the Hill. Herod drew out every Day in Order of Battle, to dare the Arabians to a Combat: but when he ſaw they would not Anſwer the Challenge, (for they were all in a Conſternation, and (a) Altemus their General above the reſt) Herod Attaqu'd them in their Trenches, and ſo Forc'd them to a Battle: but in ſuch a Huddle they were, Horſe and Foot Marching out together, that it was all Hurry and Confuſion. They did indeed out Number the Jews; but fell much ſhort of them in Valour, though one would have thought their very Deſperation ſhould have made them Bolder. The Slaughter was not Great ſo long as they ſtood; but when they turn'd their Backs once, betwixt Thoſe that fell in the Purſuit, and Thoſe that were Trampled to death by their Own People, there were Five Thouſand Miſſing, and the reſt were driven into their Camp; where Herod preſently hemm'd them-in, and beſieg'd them: and This was not All neither; for the Pinch they were in for want of Water, was a Miſery Equal to all the reſt. In This Streight they ſent Embaſſadors to Herod, with an Offer of Fifty Talents for a Compoſition; but he Treated them with Contempt, and would not ſo much as give them the Hearing. They came out after This in Troups, in the Torment of a Raging, Burning Thirſt, and deliver'd themſelves up to the Jews, at Diſcretion: ſo that in Five days the Jews had Four Thouſand of them in Bonds. Upon the Sixth Day, the Remainder of them in a Tranſport of Deſpair provok'd the Jews to a Battle; where about Seven Thouſand more were Kill'd upon the Place. This Blow finiſh'd Herod's Revenge upon the Arabians; for it brought down their Stomachs to That Degree, that they choſe him afterwards for their Protector.

He forces the Arabians to a Battle;

And gives them a Total Overthrow.

The Arabians Render themſelves at Diſcretion;

And Petition Herod to take them into his Protection.

Herod's Matters went well enough at preſent; but the News of Anthony's Defeat at Actium (for whom he had the Greateſt Friendſhip in the World) put him quite out of his Eaſy Humour: though his Fear was, in ſome Reſpect, more then needed; for Cæſar could never think Anthony abſolutely ſuppreſt, ſo long as Herod was living. Upon This Turn of Fortune, Herod bethought himſelf how he might Obviate all Difficulties, and ſo went to Rhodes; where Cæſar was at That Time. He preſented himſelf without any Enſigns of Royalty about him, and in the Habit of a Private Man; but with a Meen of Majeſty: behaving himſelf with Great Candour, and Frankneſs, and This was his Declaration.

A Generous Addreſs of Herod's to Auguſtus at Rhodes.

I muſt Confeſs, Mighty Cæſar, ſays he, that as Anthony made me a King, I was not wanting to Employ the Kingly Powers he gave me, to the Service of my Benefactor, from whom I receiv'd them: and, if I may ſpeak freely, You your ſelf, Sir, would have found the Effects of That Juſtice, if I had not been Diverted by the Arabian War; but This did not hinder me yet from ſending him what Supplies I could, both of Troups and Proviſions: neither hath This Laſt Fatal Blow at Actium, ſtagger'd me one jot in my Gratitude and Juſtice to my Patron. I could not furniſh him, 'tis true, with Men and Arms, nor attend him in my Perſon; but I gave him a piece of Good Councel that would have been more Worth to him, if he had follow'd it: which was to rid his hands of Cleopatra; for ſo long as ſhe liv'd, he could never be ſafe: and That being done, I promis'd him Moneys, Strong Holds, Troups; Nay, and my ſelf too for a Party to the War againſt you: but betwixt the Love of Cleopatra that hinder'd Him on the One ſide, and the Secret Appointments of Providence that gave you Victory on the Other, it came all to Nothing. Now ſo it is, Great Prince, that Anthony's Fate and Mine are Wrapt up in One. We Both fell on the ſame Day, and with His Fortune I have now laid down my Crown. I have

have no pretence, Sir, to Your Clemency and Favour, but under the Character of an Honeſt Man, and a True Friend.

Well! Herod, ſays Cæſar, be Safe and Happy, and a King ſtill: and depend upon it that your Crown ſhall ſit ſurer on your Head then ever. So Good a Friend cannot but make a Good Governour. Pray be as Faithful to the Fortunate as you have been to the Contrary: and I cannot but promiſe my ſelf Great Things from the Dignity of ſo great a Mind. As to Anthony's Hearkening to Cleopatra rather then to you, his Folly has made Us all Gainers; for we had never had Herod elſe. I muſt not forget the Enforcements you ſent to (a) Ventidius againſt Anthony's Gladiators, and that you were beforehand with me in That Obligation. Wherefore Content your ſelf at Preſent with the Confirmation of the Kingdom to you, and I ſhall take ſuch further Care for the future, that you may have no Miſs of Anthony.

Cæſar, after This Speech, with Great Humanity adjur'd Herod not to doubt of his Friendſhip; and ſo placing the Crown upon his Head, confirm'd his Title to it by an Act of State, with Glorious Expreſſions in it much to his Honour. When Herod had prepar'd his way by Fair Words and large Preſents, he made Interceſſion to Cæſar on the Behalf of One Alexander a Friend of Anthony's, to get his Pardon; but Cæſar cut him ſhort with a Refuſal; telling him, that the Affronts he ſuffer'd for, were wholly Unpardonable.

Cæſar's Goodneſs and Humanity to Herod in Return. Herod begs Alexander's Pardon, but Cæſar Refuſes it.

As Cæſar was afterward paſſing through Syria into Ægypt, Herod receiv'd him upon the way with a moſt Incredible Magnificence, and while Cæſar was taking a Review of his Troups, he cauſed Herod to ride about Ptolemais along with him: where he Treated Auguſtus, and all his Friends, and his Troups with all Imaginable Splendour, Order, and Plenty. He took Care alſo for the Supply of Water at Peluſium, and Other Dry Places, for Goers and Comers; with all ſorts of Utenſils and Neceſſaries even for Common Uſe. This Illuſtrious Expence gave Occaſion to Cæſar and his Train, to ſay, that the Kingdom of Judæa was too Little for the Mind of ſo Great a Prince.

Herod's Magnificent Entertainment of Cæſar in Syria.

Cleopatra and Anthony being Both Dead when Cæſar came into Ægypt, Cæſar did not only Confer new Honours upon Herod; but annexed to his Kingdom That part of the Borders which Cleopatra had taken from him, with Gadara, Hippon, Samaria, and the Maritime Cities Gaza and Anthedon; Joppa, and the Tower of Straton: He gave him alſo Four Hundred Gauls, which had been formerly of the Guards to Cleopatra. Now Cæſar proportion'd all his Bounties to the Merit and Virtue of the Receiver. After the (b) Firſt Actias, he gave him alſo the Province of Trachon; annexing it to his Command; and ſo likewiſe Batanea, and Auranitis, upon This Account.

Herod Confirmed in his Government, with Large Additions.

It was a Common and a Conſtant Practice of Zenodorus; who liv'd in a Houſe he had Hir'd of Lyſanias, to ſend Thieves out of Trachon to Damaſcus. The Inhabitants apply'd themſelves to Varus (at That time Governour of Syria) for Relief; begging him to poſſeſs Cæſar with the Miſery of their Condition. Varus did it accordingly, and Cæſar's Anſwer was; that he ſhould Utterly Suppreſs all Robbers, and Robberies. Varus ſent Parties abroad into all Suſpected Places, and ſo Clear'd the Land of That Peſt. Varus having taken away Part of Zenodorus's Eſtate, upon This Order, Cæſar beſtow'd it upon Herod, to ſecure it from being any longer a Receptacle for This ſort of Vermine: Making him Governour of all Syria, over and above.

Herod made Governour of all Syria.

Auguſtus coming into That Province again ſome Ten Years after, caution'd the Governours in all Matters of Importance to Conſult Herod: and Zenodorus being then Dead, he gave Herod likewiſe all the Land betwixt Trachon and Gallilee. But the Thing at laſt that Herod valu'd himſelf upon, above all the reſt, was This: that Herod was belov'd by Cæſar, above all Men Living, next to Agrippa; and by Agrippa, next to Cæſar. From theſe Circumſtances he was advanc'd to the Higheſt State of Humane Felicity, and his Mind grew more and more Illuſtrious with his Fortune; for he Employ'd the Greateſt part of his Acquiſitions, in Works and Offices of Piety and Religion.

IN the Fifteenth Year of Herod's Reign, he apply'd himſelf to the Repairing, and Rebuilding of the Temple: which he did with a Splendid Magnificence, and at a vaſt Charge: Witneſs the Stately Galleries round about it, that were all rais'd up Entire from the very Foundation, and the Caſtle on the North-ſide Adjoyning to it; which, for Majeſty and Beauty, was not Inferior to the Royal Palace it ſelf: Calling it by the Name of Antonia, alluding to Anthony. He made the Encloſure about the Temple, twice as large as it was before. He raiſed alſo upon an Eminence that overlook'd the City, Two Rich, and Spatious Structures; No Temple upon the face of the Earth to be Compar'd with them: and Theſe he call'd Cæſarion and Agrippion, in Honour of his Two Noble Friends, Cæſar and Arippa.

Cæſarion and Agrippion.

Neither did Herod reſtrain the Zeal and Paſſion he had for the Eternizing of theſe Great Men's Names and Memories, to Palaces and Particular Fabricks; but he Dedicated Whole Cities alſo to the Immortalizing of their Fame to Poſterity: as Sebaſte in Samaria, for Example; a City of Twenty furlongs in Compaſs, with a Fair Wall about it; a Colony of Six Thouſand Inhabitants Planted in it, and an Endowment of Excellent Lands belonging to it, with Peculiar Franchiſes, and Immunities, in proportion to the People. Among Other Eminent Buildings, he did likewiſe Erect a Majeſtique Temple, with an Area about it of Three Furlongs and a Half: and This Temple he Dedicated to Auguſtus.

Sebaſte in Samaria.

Cæſar's Bounty to Herod.

Cæſar, after This, gave Herod an Additional Donative of Lands; and Herod, in Acknowledgment, built another Temple alſo of White Poliſht Marble, near the Head of the River Jordan, at a Place call'd (a) Panium: and This was alſo Dedicated to Cæſar. Not far from hence ſtands a Mountain of a moſt Prodigious Height; that looks down among the Craggs and Rocks into a Deep Valley: and at the Bottom, a Dark Hideous Cavern, that's Worn and Hollow'd to ſuch a Depth, by the Conſtant Fall of Waters upon it from above, that there's no Sounding of it. From the Foot of This Cavern, there comes Bubbling forth an Iſſue of ſeveral Springs: and This by Tradition paſſes for the Source of the River Jordan. But we ſhall ſpeak further to the Matter of Fact hereafter.

It was much after the ſame Manner alſo at Jericho; where Herod cauſed to be Erected, betwixt the Caſtle of Cypros and the Old Palaces, ſome Other Buildings more Commodious: and Theſe he call'd by the Names of the ſame Perſons. Herod, in fine, did not leave One Conſiderable Place in the whole Kingdom, without ſome Monumental Memorial to the Fame of Cæſar. When he had garniſhed the Borders with Temples, he did the like in the Provinces; diſtinguiſhing ſeveral of them by the Name of Cæſarea.

As Herod was in his Progreſs along the Coaſt, he took Notice of one Maritime City among the reſt, with all the Decays upon it of Time and Antiquity. It is known by the Name of Straton's Tower; and a place, for the Quality and Situation of it, Worthy of Herod's Royal Care and Bounty. This Caſtle he did not only repair with Beautiful White Stone; but Erected alſo a Princely Palace there, and never gave a Clearer Proof of the Natural Dignity of his Mind then upon This Inſtance. It lies betwixt Dora and Joppa, where the Coaſt is hardly a-bordable, and the Paſſage ſo Dangerous, that whoever takes his Courſe That way toward Ægypt from Phœnicia, runs a Great Riſque of a Miſcarriage; eſpecially with the leaſt Breath of a South-Weſt-Wind: which ſets ſo hard upon the Rocks, that it breaks back again in Eddies, and makes a Troubled Sea for a good while after. But the King's Liberality and Reſolution, in ſpite of Charge, and of Nature it ſelf, ſurmounted all Oppoſition; and he built a Port There, Larger then the Pyræneum it ſelf, with Stations for the Faireſt Ships to Ride ſafe in, againſt Wind and Weather. It was ſo Fortify'd in fine, againſt the Impetuous Violences of the Sea; and the Ornament of it ſo Agreeable to the Eye, that nothing could be added, either to the Strength, or to the Beauty of the Contrivance. Upon Herod's taking his Meaſures for the Dimenſions of the Port, he Order'd mighty Stones to be caſt into the Sea, at Twenty-Fathom-Water: the Greater part of them Fifty Foot in Length, Nine Foot Deep, and Ten Over; and ſome Bigger then theſe. When they had fill'd up the Space to the ſurface of the Water, they carry'd on a Wall of Two Hundred Foot: the One half to break the Force of the Sea, in the Nature of a Mole, from whence they took the Name of Procymæa; and the Other, for the Support of the Turrets that were planted upon it; which were Great and Graceful, and he gave the Faireſt of them the Name of Druſion, in a Compliment to Druſus, Cæſar's Kinſman. There were alſo a Great Number of Vaults for Stores; and Before, and About Theſe Vaults, a Paving of Large Stones, that ſerv'd Paſſengers, both for a Landing-place, and for a Walk. It Fronted toward the North; which upon That Quarter is the Gentleſt Wind that blows. On each ſide of the Entrance, there ſtood Three Coloſſes mounted upon Pillars: Thoſe on the Left-Hand, at the going-in, were ſupported by a Strong Tower of One Entire Stone: and Thoſe on the Right, were born up by Two large Stones, Column-wiſe, and joyn'd together; over-topping the Other. The Buildings next the Port were all of White Stone; and the Streets that led from the City to the Key, Uniform, and Anſwering one another. Upon a Hill over againſt the Port-Gate, ſtood (a) Cæſar's Temple; a Piece incomparable, both for Majeſty and Beauty: and in That Temple, Cæſar's Statue, a Work not Inferiour, either for Curioſity or Bulk, to That of the Olympian Jupiter, and made after That Model; (b) as alſo another of Rome, that did not fall ſhort of Juno's at Argos. Herod's Deſign in the Building of This Stately Town and Port, was the Advantage of the Province, and the Security of Travellers that Way: But Cæſar all This while was to be reputed the Founder of it, and it was call'd Cæſarea after his Name.

Orna-

There were alſo ſeveral Famous Works and Bounties of Herod not to be forgotten: as a Famous Market-place; a Theatre; an Amphitheatre; and the Inſtitution of the Ludi Quinquennales to be Celebrated every Fifth year, which he Dedicated to the Honour of Auguſtus. He was the Firſt alſo, who in the Hundred Ninety and Second Olympiad, propounded Honourable Rewards, not only to him that ſhould Carry the Prize in the Firſt Place, but to the Second and the Third alſo, in their Courſe, one after another. He Repair'd Anthedon, that had been ruin'd by the War, and call'd it Agrippion; and out of a Generous Exceſs of Tenderneſs for his Friend, he inſcrib'd Agrippa's Name upon the Gate of the Temple that he had built there.

A Theatre and Amphitheatre.

Agrippion Erected to the Honour of Agrippa.

He was as Dutiful a Son alſo, as a Generous Friend and Patriot; for he Erected a City to the Honour of his Father, in the moſt Pleaſant and Fruitful Part of his Dominions, and moſt deliciouſly Wooded and Watered; which he called Antipatris. There was a Caſtle alſo over Jericho; which, by Situation, was both Strong and Delightful. This Place he Wall'd in, and gave it the Name of Cypros, after his Mother. Neither did he forget his Brother Phaſael, upon ſeveral Occaſions; as in a Tower he built at Jeruſalem; which he call'd by That Name (I ſhall ſay ſomewhat of the Compaſs, and the Glory of it elſewhere) and ſo likewiſe Another City in the Country, to the North of Jericho; which he call'd alſo by the ſame Name.

Antipatris in the Memory of Antipater. Cypros from Cypris.

When he had done Honour to his Friends and Relations, he did not at laſt abſolutely forget Himſelf; for he built and Fortified a Caſtle upon a Mountain of Arabia: which he call'd by his Own Name, Herodion. And he gave the ſame Name alſo to a Hill that he caſt up, in the Form of a Woman's Breaſt, at about Sixty furlongs from Jeruſalem; which was ſet out with Great Care and Expence: and This Mount was Encompaſs'd, at the Top, with Round Turrets: the Circuit of it fill'd with Royal Palaces; as Rich and Sparkling both within and without, as Art, Care, and Coſt could make them. He ſupply'd it with Water from a very Great Diſtance, and at a Mighty Charge. The Stairs were all of Pure White Marble, and Two Hundred Steps up to the Top. This Emminence was all forc'd by the Hand, and of a Wonderful Height. Now at the Foot of it, he built a Princely Palace, and provided for Inns alſo, and Houſes of Entertainment; where he might diſpoſe of his Friends and their Luggage: inſomuch that, Conſidering the Proviſion that was made for all Manner of Conveniencies, it ſeem'd to be a City rather then a Caſtle; but upon the Main, it was all no more then the King's Houſe.

Herod Provides for the Common Good of Mankind.

But after all Theſe Glorious Structures, Herod could not yet be ſatisfy'd, unleſs he made Strangers alſo Partakers of his Generoſity and Good Will to Mankind; for at Tripolis, Damaſcus, and Ptolemais, he caus'd Publique Baths to be ſet-up: Strong Walls at Biblis; Galleries, Council-Chambers, Publique Magazines, Market-places, and Temples at Berytas and Tyre: Theatres at Sidon and Damaſcus; an Aquæduct at Laodicea, upon the Coaſt; Water-Works and Baths at Askalon, with Cloyſters and Piazza's; every way Admirable, both for the Work and Size: In ſome caſes he gave Woods, and Harbours; and upon Other Cities he beſtow'd Lands; as if he had made them Sharers in his Kingdom. In ſome Places again, (as at Coos) he gave an Everlaſting Revenue toward the Maintaining of Baths: and the Donative was to Perpetuity, that they might never forget the Benefit. He gave Corn to All that wanted it; and furniſh'd the Rhodians many and many a time with Moneys for the Setting out of a Navy, when they had Occaſion for it. He repair'd the Temple of Apollo (call'd Pythium) out of the very Aſhes, at his Own Coſt, and made it Better then it was at Firſt. What ſhall I ſay of his Liberality to the Lycians and the Samians? His Largeſſes all over Jonia, to Every One that Ask'd him? Are not the Athenians, the Lacedæmonians, the Nicopolitans, and thoſe of Pergamus in Lycia, are they not all ſenſible Witneſſes of Herod's Bounty? In what a Condition was Antioch the Capital of Syria, that ſtood in ſuch a Bog for Twenty furlongs together, that there was hardly any coming near it till Herod caus'd the Paſſage to be Pav'd all along with White Marble, and ſet up Contrivances upon the Way for a Shelter againſt foul Weather!

But it will be ſaid perhaps that Theſe were all Private Caſes, and only Concern'd ſome Few Particulars that were the Better for them. What ſhall we ſay then to his Obligations upon the Elians; wherein not only Greece, but the Whole Body of Mankind are Engag'd: at leaſt ſo many of them as have heard the Fame of the Olympick Games! For when he found, upon his Coming to Rome, that Theſe Games were all that now remain'd of Ancient Greece; and that the Solemnity it ſelf was now a-falling for want of Money to Maintain it, he did not only take the Charge upon Himſelf, for That Year, of being (a) Agonotheta, but ſettled an Annual Allowance toward the Upholding of it for ever. It would be an Endleſs Work to run through the Debts, and Tributes, that he remitted; and particularly Thoſe of (b) Phaſaelites and (c) Balameotes: beſide ſeveral Towns in Cilicia; where he diſcharg'd their Penſions. He did Great Things, in fine, and would have done Greater; but the Apprehenſion he had of drawing Envy upon himſelf, as if he had ſome further Deſign in his Head, kept him in Awe: for why ſhould he do more, they cry'd, for other Princes Subjects, then their Own Maſter would do for them?

A Great Soldier, and an Excellent Sword-man, and a Strength of Body Anſwerable to the Dignity of his Mind.

This Prince had a Strength of Body Anſwerable to the Greatneſs of his Mind. He was a Great Maſter of the Chace, and gain'd his Point in it; for No Man was Better a-Horſe-back then Himſelf. He kill'd Forty Beaſts once in One Day. That Country breeds a Great many Boars; but more Deer, and Wild-Aſſes. He was a Soldier, and a Sword-man not to be Reſiſted. He was Terrible in his very Exercizes; the ſureſt Marks-man Living; either with Dart, or Arrow: and, beſide the Excellencies of his Body and Mind, he had Fortune to Friend too; for the Fate of the War went very ſeldom againſt him: or, when it did, it was either by Treachery ſome where or Other, or by the Raſhneſs of his Soldiers; and not by his Own Fault.

THE Felicity of Herod's Reign was mightily diſorder'd by Troubles in his Family; and the Creature that he lov'd above all Earthly Things was the Cauſe of it: for being now poſſeſs'd of the Kingdom, he turn'd off Doris his Firſt Wife that was a Jew, and took Mariamne, the Daughter of Alexander the Son of Ariſtobulus: which cauſed Miſerable Diviſions in his Houſe, Eſpecially after his Return from Rome. Ant. l. 15. c. 3, 4, 9, 11. l. 16. c. 1. 2, 6, 7, 8, 11, 12, 16, 17.

He did, in the Firſt Place, baniſh out of the City, Antipater: whom he had by Doris, for the Sake of Children had by Mariame; allowing him only the Liberty of the Town upon Feſtivals. And then he put to death, Hyrcanus, his Wive's Grandfather, (who was now come back from the Parthians) on Suſpicion of a Plot upon his Life. For Barzepharnes having brought him away Priſoner to the King of Parthia, after the Taking of Syria; the Jews on the other ſide of the Euphrates, out of pure Compaſſion, ſet him at Liberty, and paid his Ranſom: at which time, if he had follow'd their Councel, and not come to Herod, he might have Liv'd Safe and Happy: but betwixt the Snare of a Match, and the Paſſionate Deſire he had to ſee his Own Country again, he was enveigled to his Ruine. The Thing all this while that wrought upon Herod, was not that he had any Deſign upon the Government, but that he had a Rightful Title to it.

Antipater, Herod's Son by Doris Expell'd the City.

Hyrcanus, his Wives Grandfather, put to Death.

Mariamne had Five Children by Herod: Two Daughters, and Three Sons; and the Youngeſt of the Three dy'd in the Courſe of his Studies and Exerciſes at Rome. The Two Elder were train'd up in a Royal Education, in regard both of the Nobility of the Mother, and that they were Born while he was in Poſſeſſion of the Crown. But nothing mov'd Herod ſo Powerfully in their Favour, as the Wonderful Aſcendant that Mariamne had upon the Spirit of her Husband: whoſe Fondneſs ſo far encreas'd upon him, that it made him utterly Inſenſible of all Indignities and Affronts: while Mariamne requited this Infinite Tenderneſs of his with an Equal Degree of Averſion. She did not want Matter of Pretence for a Diſguſt: and then preſuming upon the Extravagant Paſſion he had for her, ſhe did not ſtick to Charge him Point-blank with the Murder of Hyrcanus and Ariſtobulus, and to load her Reproaches with Aggravations: the Latter an Innocent Youth, ſhe ſaid; but Seventeen Years of Age when he was Created High-Prieſt, and cut-off ſo ſoon as he had receiv'd the Order. The Firſt time that he appear'd in his Holy Robes, upon a Feſtival Day, to Officiate at the Altar, it was ſo Moving a Spectacle that the People wept with Joy at the Sight of him. But the very ſame Night was Ariſtobulus ſent away to Jericho, and there drown'd in a Lake, by the Gauls, and by Herod's Order.

Mariamne had Five Children by Herod.

She fell bitterly foul upon Herod.

Ariſtobulus drown'd in a Lake at Jericho, by Herod's Order.

Mariamne did not yet Content her Self with theſe Outrages againſt Herod; but ſhe fell Fouler alſo upon his Siſter, and his Mother: which he heard without one word Speaking; for Love had ty'd up his Tongue. This Nettled the Women to that Degree, that they laid their Heads together how they might Touch Herod more to the Quick; and ſo they let fall ſome Words of Reflexion upon his Wive's Honour and Virtue: and among Other Things plauſible enough, they told him a Story

Herod's Love made him put up all Affronts. The Women make Herod Jealous of his Wife and Siſter.

Story of his Wive's ſending her Picture to Anthony; and what Pains ſhe took to make her ſelf known to him, out of the Heat of an Ungovernable Appetite: for Anthony was the Greateſt Libertine in Nature, and a Man that would ſtick at Nothing for the gaining of his Ends; though it ſhould be the very Life of Herod himſelf. What betwixt the Rage of an Implacable Jealouſy, the Conſideration of Cleopatra's Inſatiable Avarice and Cruelty, and the Power ſhe had over Anthony, in the Inſtance of Lyſanius, and (a) Malichus the King of Arabia, who were both put to death at her Inſtigation; Herod was as if he had been Thunder-ſtruck: for he found himſelf in Danger of Loſing not only his Wife, but his Own Life alſo.

Herod goes to Anthony, and leaves the Care of his Wife to Joſeph, the Husband of his Siſter Salome, with a Secret Inſtruction, that if Anthony Kill'd Herod, Joſeph ſhould Deſtroy Mariamne.

In this Perplexity of Thought, Herod reſolv'd to go to Anthony, and ſo recommended the Care of his Wife during his Abſence, to Joſeph, the Husband of his Siſter Salome; whom he had ever found Kind and Faithful to him: but with this Secret Inſtruction over and above, that if Anthony Kill'd him, he ſhould Deſtroy Mariamne. Now Joſeph innocently gave a Hint of This to the Queen, with an Intent to poſſeſs her how Wonderful a Kindneſs the King had for her, that he could not endure the Thought of a Separation even in Death it ſelf. Herod, upon his Return, in the Courſe of his Gaieties and Love-Stories, fell to Swearing and Proteſting that in his Whole Life he never had a Paſſion for any Other Woman. No, ſays Mariamne, That I perceive, by the Order you left with Joſeph to ſee me Diſpatch'd. The Bolting of this Privacy made Herod Stark Mad; for it ran ſtrongly in his Head, that Joſeph would never have Blabb'd ſuch a Secret, but in the Confidence of an Amour. In this Diſtraction he leapt off from his Bed, and took a Walk in the Court; and whom ſhould he meet there but Salome? who would not loſe ſo Fair an opportunity of Calumniating Mariamne; and ſhe did it in ſuch a manner too, that it ſerv'd to Confirm Herod in his Suſpicion. So that he preſently gave Order, in a Furious Fit of Jealouſy, to have them Both put to Death. So ſo ſoon as the Word was out, he repented of it; but the Execution was done Firſt: His Love and his Madneſs governing him by Turns. Nay, ſuch was the Tranſport of his Extravagance, that he would not believe her to be Dead, when he did as good as know ſhe was ſo: but like a Mad-man he went on talking to her, as if ſhe had been yet Alive. In a ſhort time the Funeral Solemnities put that Point out of Diſpute: and Herod's Grief for his Dead Wife was not inferiour to the Love he had for his Living one.

Joſeph lets fall a Word of this to Mariamne, that coſt them both their Lives. The Ground of Herod's Jealouſy. Joſeph and Mariamne put to Death upon't.

The Paſſionate Violences of the Mother were now exercis'd upon the Sons; and ſuch was the Horrid Barbarity of the Proceeding, that they look'd no otherwiſe upon their Father then as a Common Enemy. They had been of the ſame Opinion a long time, even when they were at Rome together; but much more Confirm'd in it ſince their coming back into Judæa; for the Strength of their Minds grew up with that of their Bodies. They were now of Age to think of Marriage; and One of them Marry'd the Daughter of his Aunt Salome; who was a Mortal Enemy of their Mother: the Other took the Daughter of Archelaus the King of Cappadocia. In the Liberty of this Condition, they talk'd more at Freedom then formerly, and that Confidence betray'd them to the Malice of Enformers: inſomuch that their Enemies made no Difficulty of telling the King bare-fac'd, that his Sons were in a Conſpiracy againſt him, and that the Son-in-Law of Archelaus had a Deſign to Slip away to his Father-in-Law; and thence to Rome, with a Complaint againſt Herod Himſelf to Cæſar. When theſe Phancies were buzz'd into Herod's Head, he takes Antipater home to him that he had by Doris; propoſing to make uſe of Him, as a Countermine againſt the Brothers; and ſo begun with a Remarkable Preference of Antipater before the reſt.

The Brothers found this Change ſo Intolerable, for Men of their Bloud to be Subjected to the Son of an Obſcure Private Woman, that their Stomachs were too Big to bear the Indignity, without declaring their Reſentment of it; which they did very Frankly upon all Occaſions: but they loſt Ground daily by it, which turn'd to Antipater's Advantage; for he play'd his Game ſo Artificially with his Father, that by the Help of Flatteries and Calumnies, (which Calumnies were menag'd, partly by Himſelf, partly by his Inſtruments and Friends) he brought it to this Iſſue at laſt, that his Brothers were not only put out of all Hope of the Succeſſion; but Himſelf publiquely and Formally Entitled to it by his Father's Teſtament. He was ſent, after This, to Cæſar, in a kind of a Royal State and Character; for he had the Robes and the Train of a King, only he wanted the Crown. He was ſo puffed up with the Vanity of this Pomp, that he got his Mother introduc'd into Mariamne's Bed-Chamber, by the Help of Inſinuations and Slanders; which was his Way of Practice againſt his Brothers: inſomuch that he wrought his Father by Degrees into a Deſign upon their Lives.

And formally Settles upon him the Succeſſion.

Upon

Upon this Subject, Herod took Alexander to Rome with him, and there Charg'd him before Cæsar as a Confederate toward the Poysoning of his Father. When Alexander was admitted to his Defence, and before a Judge that was not to be Impos'd upon by Antipater and Herod, he soften'd his Father's Mistakes all that was possible; Spake home and Substantially to the Points Charg'd upon Himself; acquitted his Brother Aristobulus, who was Involv'd in the same Accusation; and from thence proceeded to lay Open the Impostures, Frauds, and Contrivances of Antipater: and all This with so good a Grace, that the Innocency of his Conscience was yet further Illustrated by the Force of his Eloquence, being a Sharp and a Ready Speaker: Concluding, in fine, with this Modest Resignation; that it is no Crime for a Father to punish his Children, if they be Guilty. This Farewel drew Tears from the Whole Audience; and had also such an Effect upon Cæsar, that All Disputes and Accusations apart, he made them all Friends; provided that for the Future, the Sons should be Obedient to their Father, and the Father at liberty to leave the Kingdom to whom he pleas'd.

Herod and his Sons made Friends.

Herod, at his Return from Rome, could not but Acquit his Sons of the Crime Charg'd upon them; but the Suspicion stuck by him still: for Antipater ply'd him so hard upon that Topique, that he kept his Jealousies Waking: though he did not Dare to Say or Do any thing publiquely that might Clash with the Sense, or the Authority of the Reconciler. Herod took his Passage by Cilicia, and so to (a) Eleusa; where he was receiv'd by Archelaus with Great Pomp and Respect, who gave him a Thousand Thanks upon his Son-in-Law's Account, wishing him much Joy of the Accommodation. Archelaus in the mean time had not been wanting Himself, by Letters and other Instances to his Friends at Rome, to get Voices, and make an Interest for Alexander. He Conducted Herod, in fine, as far as Zephyrium; where he made him a Present of Thirty Talents, and so Departed.

Herod Magnificently Entertained by Archelaus.

When Herod came to Jerusalem, he call'd an Assembly; and in the Presence and Hearing of his Three Sons, gave the People an Account of his Journy and Bus'ness, with Thanks Innumerable to GOD and to Cæsar for Composing the Breaches in his Family, and Settling his Sons in Unity and Peace: [A Blessing, says he, which I shall ever Value incomparably above the Glories of a Crown, and which I shall Endeavour to preserve and emprove accordingly. It is to Cæsar that I stand Indebted for my Dignity and Estate; and to Cæsar again that I owe for the Liberty and Privilege of appointing my Own Successor. It is to Him also, that I am to pay my Acknowledgments; with This Declaration, that I design them all Three, both for the Sovereignty and the Succession; if it may be Agreeable to the Will of God and Your good Liking. The Eldest of them has the Title of Seniority; the Other Two may pretend to the Dignity by their Extraction, and the Command at last is Large enough for All Three.

Herod calls an Assembly at Jerusalem, and makes a Wonderful Discourse upon the Whole State of the Case.

As for Those that Cæsar hath United, and the Father Set up, You must be sure to Pay them all Due Respect: That is to say, it must be Impartial, Equal, and Just; with a regard to a Precedency of Birth-right: For the Advancing of One Man before his Time, will not be near so Great an Obligation upon Him that is Prefer'd, as a Heart-breaking to the Other that is Postpon'd. But now for Fear of Evil Councel, or Example, (as there's no Danger like That of Ill Instruments under a Man's Own Roof) it shall be My Care to place Wise and Sober People about them: Such as I can Depend upon, and such as shall be Answerable for their Order and Good Agreement.

Now I do further Expect also from these Ministers, as well as from the Officers of my Army, that for the Present they shall Own no Other Master then my self; for it is not the Government, but the Honourary Part of it that I have Transmitted to my Sons: So that they shall have the Pleasure of a kind of Regency in the Administration; but the Burden of it is to rest upon my Shoulders, and the Last Result of Matters, in the Judgment and Determination of Things, must be my Province, even whether I will or no. If you Consider my Age; the Course of my Life, or the Piety of my Manners; I am not yet so far gone upon the First Point, but by the Course of Nature I may be Allow'd many a Fair Day to Live yet: Neither have I done any Thing to shorten my Life by Intemperate Pleasures; and then for my Duty to God, I have been so True to his Holy Worship, that I will not Despair of the Blessing of a Longer Time yet in this World, even in Consideration of that Zeal and Devotion. But if any of you shall take upon him to Advance the Sons, while I am yet Living, in Contempt of the Father, let him Expect to be severely Punish'd for it: not but that I should be glad to have my Children Honourably Treated in the World; but Young Men are Hot and Pragmatical, and 'tis but throwing a Temptation in their way to make them more Meddling then becomes them. People should do well to Consider, before they make these Applications; for it is my Part, as Men do Well or Ill, to see them Rewarded or Punish'd: and I will not be wanting to that Article of my Duty. The Best Way will be for Sons and Father to be all of a Mind; for it is their Intereſt to have Me Govern, and it is Mine for Them to agree among Themſelves.

And now, My Dear Children, ſays Herod, Conſult, in the Firſt Place, That Natural Affection which Providence hath made Common even to Beaſts with Men, and acquit your Selves like Dutiful Children to your Father. Bleſs Cæſar in the Next Place for the Good Office of his Mediation; and pray take it Kindly from Me in the Third Place, that I only Deſire what I have a Right to Command: That is to ſay, let me Entreat You to live Amicably, as Brethren. I ſhall now take Care to provide You ſuch a Train and Equipage, as may be Suitable to your Quality. Be ſure You live Peaceably one with another, and I beſeech God keep me Steady in the ſame Mind.

When he had made an End of Speaking, he Embrac'd his Children, and Diſcharg'd the Meeting. Some Malecontents went away Muttering, and pretending that they could not hear One Word he ſaid: Others were Deſcanting upon This and That: and Wiſhing, upon the Whole, that they might find him as good as his Word.

The Brothers are ſtill Jealous.

The Brothers were ſtill divided among Themſelves, and ſo Jealous One of Another, that they were glad to part for fear of Worſe. Alexander and Ariſtobulus took it heinouſly that Antipater ſhould have the Preference: Antipater, on the other hand, was as much Troubled that the Other Brothers ſhould be allow'd any Share at all in the Government. Now Antipater being a Falſe Man, Cloſe, and Malicious, and One that could keep his Thoughts to himſelf, had a Mortal Hatred for the Brothers, but made no Shew of it: Whereas the Other Two, that were Frank and Open, made a Point of Honour of it to Diſguiſe or Diſſemble any Thing. Their Enemies in the mean time had Inſtruments every where at Work to make Advantage of Words and Diſcourſes: Some, by Provoking them to Bold and Dangerous Liberties; Others, to gain upon them by Inſinuations, under the Maſque of Confidence, and Friendſhip: inſomuch that not a Syllable paſs'd at Alexander's, but it was preſently Carry'd to Antipater, and from Him to Herod; with Additions and Deſcant. There was nothing ſo Innocent but by Interpretation it was made Criminal: and whereſoever there was the Leaſt Ground for a Calumny, That Mole-Hill was made a Mountain.

Antipater's Character.

His Cloſe and Artificial Way of Manage by Spies and Informers.

Antipater all this while was never without his Agents about Alexander, to Pump Things out of him: and One poſſible Circumſtance was enough to Countenance a Thouſand Palpable Impoſtures: and ſo One Truth in a Whole Maſs of Lies, was Sufficient to make the Whole Story Current. It was Remarkable again, that Antipater's Tools as well as Himſelf, were all upon the Reſerve: Whether this was a Natural Cloſeneſs, or that their Mouths were ſtopp'd with Mony, it matters not: But ſo it was, that this Man's Whole Life was but One Myſtery of Iniquity. Antipater, in ſhort, ſo Order'd the Matter, that Alexander's Friends, Servants, and Acquaintance were all Corrupted, either by Flatteries or Rewards, into the Betraying of him in whatſoever he Said or Did. But Antipater's Maſter-piece, after all, was this, Inſtead of declaring himſelf an Open Enemy, he had his Confidents at hand to accuſe the Brothers; and ſtill as any Thing came-in againſt Alexander, he ſeem'd to take his Part at Firſt, and afterward, with a Side-Wind turn'd all againſt him; with ſuch Sly, Glancing Intimations, that they made Herod Stark Mad, in a Full Perſuaſion that the Whole Story of Alexander's Plot upon his Life was True: neither did any thing give more Credit to the Calumny, then Antipater's Artificial Way of Mincing the Matter.

Herod was Mortally incens'd againſt the Two Brothers by Theſe Practices of Antipater: and juſt as much as They loſt in the good Opinion of the King, Antipater got, and Thoſe that were for the Government fell-in with him: Some, of their Own Accord; Others, for Faſhion-Sake; as Ptolemey, the moſt Conſiderable of his Friends; the King's Brothers, and effectually the Whole Family; for Antipater was all in all; and Nothing went ſo near Alexander's Heart, as to Conſider that this Wickedneſs was altogether Menag'd by the Councel and Conduct of Antipater's Mother, who was Worſe then a Step-Mother, in the Hatred ſhe bare to the Queen's Children. Now though Great Court was made to Antipater, with an Eye to the Credit he had with Herod; the Order of the King Himſelf went yet a Great deal further, in forbidding all People effectually, upon their Peril, to Entertain any Intercourſe with Alexander or his Brother, or to make any Sort of Application to Either of them. This Interdiction ſtruck a Dread, not only into the King's Houſhold, but to their Friends abroad; for Herod had Privileges conferr'd upon him by Auguſtus, that he never granted to any Other: as the Liberty of Fetching Deſerters out of Other Princes Juriſdictions, where He Himſelf had nothing to do. The Brothers knew Nothing at this time of their Fault; for Herod had not as yet Exhibited any Publique Charge againſt him: which made the Danger ſo much the Greater, for want of Precaution how to Defend themſelves. They collected the State of their Own Caſe however, from the Cooling of the King's Kindneſs toward them, and their Troubles conſequently encreas'd.

Antipater did his Bus'neſs the ſame way too with his Brother Pheroras, and Salome his Aunt, and talk'd as Freely to them againſt his Brothers, as he could have done to his Own Wife. The Feud went very High already, but it was Mightily enflam'd by Glaphyra the Wife of Alexander; who upon all Occaſions would be Vaunting of the Nobility of her Extraction, and ſetting up her ſelf above all Others. She derived from Themenus, ſhe ſaid, on the Father's Side, and from Darius the Son of Hyſtaſpes, on the Mother's: reflecting at the ſame time upon Herod's Wife and Siſter, as Upſtarts; and Treating them, in fine, with all Imaginable Contempt. Herod did not Marry for Quality, ſhe ſaid, but for Beauty. We have taken Notice already that Herod had ſeveral Wives, and that he was well enough pleas'd with Polygamy, being allow'd by the Jewiſh Law: and they were All exaſperated againſt Alexander for the Pride and Stomach of Glaphyra.

Meanneſs of Birth among Women is a Crime.

Ariſtobulus made Salome his Enemy too, though his Mother-in-Law; and ſhe was ſo, in truth, before: being piqu'd ſufficiently at the Outrageous Haughtineſs of Glaphyra; who would be ſtill caſting her in the Teeth with the Meanneſs of her Birth, and telling him that his Wife was only a Private Woman, but his Brother Alexander had Marry'd a Queen. The Daughter of Salome carry'd the Story preſently to her Mother, with Tears in her Eyes: and then Another at the end of it, how Alexander and Ariſtobulus had threaten'd all Herod's Wives, if ever They came to the Crown, and would make the Mothers and the Daughters Spin for their Living; and for the Boys, they might Serve well enough, they cry'd, for Pariſh-Clerks: which was only a Jeaſt put upon them for their Love of Letters. This Diſcourſe put Salome in ſuch a Fret, that away ſhe went with it immediately to the King; and for the Credit of the Accuſation, it was the Evidence of a Mother againſt a Son-in-Law. And there was yet Another Report beſide, that ſtung Herod more than all the reſt. It was given out, that Alexander and Ariſtobulus would be often bemoaning the Miſerable Condition of their Mother, with Sighs and Groans; and Curſing the Father. It was ſuggeſted further, that upon Herod's dividing Mariamne's Wearing-Cloaths among the reſt of his Wives, the Brothers would be foreboding ſtill how ſoon that Gawdry would be turn'd into Mourning.

Salome does the Office of a Tale-bearer.

Herod, upon theſe Inſinuations, knowing his Sons to be Bold and Vigorous Young Men, was not without ſome Apprehenſion of Violence from them: but Unwilling however to force things beyond Recovery. So that being upon the very Point of going away to Rome, he Order'd his Sons to be call'd; and betwixt the Severity of a King, and the Tenderneſs of a Father, he gave them Good Councel, and Advice to agree among themſelves, and to love one another; with the Promiſe of an Abſolute Pardon for what they had done Amiſs, upon Condition of their Repentance and Amendment. The Anſwer they return'd was a Flat Denial of the Charge; which they Undertook to prove, not only Falſe, but Impoſſible, if they might be allow'd the Hearing: giving their Father to Underſtand, that ſo long as his Ears were Open to Tale-bearers, there would be no End of Calumnies.

Herod's Advice to his Sons.

When the Brothers had pacify'd Herod, and ſet their Own Hearts at reſt from any further Apprehenſion of Danger, they fell into New Anxieties for the Future. Pheroras and Salome they knew very well were their Deadly Enemies, and Two Perſons Harſh enough, and very Conſiderable: Pheroras eſpecially; for He did as good as ſhare with Herod in all the Regalities of the Government, ſaving only the Crown it ſelf. He had a Hundred Talents of his Own Proper Revenue; beſide the Profit of all the Lands beyond Jordan, which he enjoy'd by the Bounty of Herod: at whoſe Requeſt, Cæſar was prevail'd with to make him a Tetrarch. Herod honour'd him alſo with a Royal Match; beſtowing upon him his Wive's Siſter in Marriage: and after Her Death, he Offer'd him his Eldeſt Daughter with Three Hundred Talents for her Portion. But Pheroras was ſo Captivated with a Paſſion for an Ordinary Perſon, that he declin'd the Propoſal. Herod took This in ſuch Indignation, that he gave her to the Son of his Brother; who was afterward Slain by the Parthians. He was mightily Incens'd for the Preſent; but upon Second Thoughts he Imputed the Refuſal to the Violence of his Paſſion, and ſo Pardon'd his Folly.

Pheroras and Salome Deadly Enemies of the Brothers. Pheroras Highly Oblig'd to Herod.

There had been a Rumour, it ſeems, of a long Standing; that Pheroras had a Deſign, even in the Life of Mariamne, to Poiſon his Brother. This was a Time ſo Favourable to Spies and Informers, that Herod, though one of the Kindeſt of Brothers, was yet ſtartled at the Report; tho' he could not altogether believe it. There were a great many ſeized upon Suſpicion, and ſeveral put to the Queſtion; paſſing from

A Report that Pheroras had a Deſign to Poyſon his Brother. Herod Startled at it. Divers Seiz'd, and put to the Queſtion upon't.

One to Another, till they came at laſt to the Friends of Pheroras. They confeſs'd nothing of the Poiſon; but Pheroras, they ſaid, had ſome Thoughts of ſlipping away with his Miſtreſs into Parthia; and that Coſtobarus, Salome's Second Husband, was Privy to the Purpoſe and Deſign. It was This Coſtobarus, to whom Herod deliver'd her up, after her former Husband was put to Death for her Adultery. And Salome did not come off without an Accuſation neither; for her Brother Pheroras laid it to her Charge, that ſhe had been Treating a Match with Syllæus, Governour of Arabia under King Obodas, and the Bittereſt Enemy that Herod had in the World. Salome was found Guilty of every Article that her Brother Pheroras Charg'd upon her; but Herod however Pardon'd them Both.

Pheroras and Salome found Guilty, but Herod Pardons them Both.

The Storm of the Faction fell now whole upon the Head of Alexander. As for Inſtance: There were Three Eunuchs in the Houſe, that were all in the Good Graces of the King, and well known by the Offices they had in the Family; that is to ſay, a Cup-bearer, a Sewer, and a Valet de Chambre: One of them to fill his Maſter's Wine; the Second to provide his Supper; and the Third to put him to Bed, and ſupply the Office of a Bed-fellow. Now Theſe were all Alexander's Creatures, as far as Flatteries and Rewards could make them. Herod took up a Jealouſy, and putting them to the Torture, out came the whole Bus'neſs; the Practice, the Promiſe, and the Inſtrument; together with Alexander's way of Impoſing upon them. There was no Hope of Herod, he ſaid, a wicked Old-Man, that had his Hair dy'd like a Fop to make him look Young. The Reſpect you pay to Him, ſays he, belongs to Me, that am to be his Succeſſour to the Kingdom: and he cannot hinder it. I ſhall have it in my Power then, ſays he, to Revenge my ſelf of my Enemies, and to Reward my Friends: Your ſelves in the Firſt place. The Informers added This further, That the Great Miniſters and Officers were all for Alexander in their Hearts, and menag'd their Matters together in their Private Meetings and Cabals.

Three Court-Officers put to the Torture, and Confeſs. Alexander's Part of the Story.

This was ſuch a Thunder-bolt to Herod, that he durſt not be too quick in publiſhing the very Diſcovery: but his Tale-bearers, and Agents, were at work Night and Day, to ſpy up and down in all Families and Places what was Said and Done; and it was Certain Death to be but ſo much as Suſpected. There was nothing to be heard of in This Part of Herod's Hiſtory, but Cruelty and Injuſtice. Every Diſguſt made way for a Calumny, and That Calumny was made a Mortal Crime; for Herod did but Execute the Malice that Other People put in his Head: No Witneſs ſo Infamous, no Impoſture ſo Groſs and Ridiculous, but it found Credit, and the Puniſhment was ſo Quick, that it ſcarce waited for the Offence: but the Accuſed and the Accuſer went off together; for Herod reckoned all Formalities of Law to be but Fooleries, where the Life of a Prince was in Danger.

Herod at his Wits End upon't.

His Outrageous Cruelty and Injuſtice.

Nay, he was now Diſtemper'd to ſuch a degree of Outrage, that it was not enough for a Man to be Innocent, or to ſcape an Accuſation; but his very Friends far'd the Worſt of all Others: ſome he Baniſh'd the Kingdom; and where he could not Exerciſe his Power, he wreak'd his Spite upon them in Foul Words. But Antipater was the Source of all This Miſchief, and betwixt Himſelf, his Friends, and his Rabble, there was Nothing Omitted to Enflame the Accuſation. Nay, he had ſo frighted the King with a Company of Idle Fooliſh Stories, that he Phancy'd Alexander ſtill before him with a Sword drawn to deſtroy him. In This Dread he cauſed him immediately to be Taken-up, and Bound; and ſo proceeded to the Tormenting of his Friends. Many of them Dy'd Mute, and Sacrific'd their Lives to a Good Conſcience. Others that had not the Heart to ſtand the Torment, patch'd up a Lie, and brought the Two Brothers into a Plot upon the Life of the King: That Plot to be put in Execution one day as they were a-Hunting, and They Themſelves in the mean time to ſlip away for Rome. This was a very Unlikely Story; but the Invention paſs'd, upon This Pinch, for want of a Better: for Herod did not only believe it, but made Uſe of it in his Own Juſtification for Committing his Son to Priſon.

Antipater the Source of all.

Alexander Taken-up, and his Friends Tortur'd. Some ſtand Mute, others tell a Lie, to ſave themſelves.

Herod being now under the Judgment of ſo Incurable and Implacable a Jealouſy, Alexander Troubled his Head no longer with the Unprofitable Way of Argument and Excuſe, in his Own Defence; but bethinking himſelf of another Expedient, he reſolved for the Future to ſay as they ſaid; and by Confeſſing himſelf Guilty, to involve his Enemies in the ſame Condemnation. So that he drew up Four Papers, Owning himſelf a Confederate againſt the Life of his Father; with the Names of divers of the Conſpirators; but Pheroras and Salome in the Firſt Place: Charging Salome with the Impudence of Forcing herſelf into his Bed one night, whether he would or no. Theſe Papers being in Herod's Hands, and a World of Bloudy Reflections in them upon ſeveral of the Nobility, it ſo fell out by Providence, that Archelaus in This very Nick of Time came into Judæa, in a Thouſand Frights for his Son-in-law, and Daughter, and with a Deſign to ſerve them all he could. And he did did it effectually; for it was his Conduct and Addreſs that in ſome degree brought Herod to his Wits again.

Archelaus upon this Point of time comes into Judæa.

Upon their coming together, Archelaus brake out into an Outrage of Paſſionate Exclamations, Why where's This Execrable Son of mine, ſays he. Why does he not ſhew his Parricidal Treacherous Head, that I may tear him to pieces with my own Fingers: and provide a New Husband and a Better Man for my Poor Daughter? But alas! She is Tainted with the very Memory of the Relation ſhe had to This Wretch, and conſequently fit for no Body: though as Innocent as ſhe was Born, of his Practices and Councels. But the Greateſt Miracle of all, as it appears to me here, is your Patience; in ſparing the Life of a Conſpirator to the Hazzard of your Own. Little did I think, when I made ſuch Haſt out of Cappadocia, to have found Alexander yet Alive: ſo that my Buſineſs was rather to have had ſome Diſcourſe with you about my Daughter; whom I parted with to This Wicked Man, only out of a Reſpect to You. But as the Caſe ſtands at preſent, ſomewhat may be ſaid upon Both Accounts. Now You are too much a Father, and perhaps too much a Man too, to puniſh a Rebellious, Treacherous Son as he deſerves: Wherefore let us only Change Hands, and Leave it to me to do Right upon your Son, as I ſhall recommend to your Generoſity the Care of my Daughter. And Debates the Caſe of Alexander with Herod.

This Diſcourſe of Archelaus, as it put Herod in a Better Humour toward Alexander, ſo it ſet him yet more and more againſt Pheroras; for This was the Chief Argument of the Four Papers which Herod gave him to Read: and ſo from End to End they ran quite thorough them from One Article to Another. Archelaus was now Maſter of an Opportunity to his Own Wiſh, and Inſinuated himſelf by little and little into the Merits of the Cauſe; laying the Blame upon the Ringleaders, as they were Marked out in the Papers: and chiefly upon Pheroras. Archelaus finding by this time that he had ſome ſort of Credit with the King, made Advantage of the Occaſion, and ſo took Another Biaſs. Archelaus gains Herod over to the Intereſt of Alexander, and ſets him more againſt Pheroras.

In my Opinion, ſays he, Your Son is in more Danger of being Undone by a Faction, then you are in of being Deſtroy'd by a Son. Why Alexander muſt be a ſtark Mad-man, to Enter into any ſuch Practice of his Own Head. He does in a manner divide the Government already with his Father; and a Fair Pretence he has likewiſe to the Succeſſion: and what would he more, if it were not for the Importunity of ſome Violent Spirits at hand to Debauch and Seduce him? Youth, alas! is Raſh and Slippery, and eaſily Impos'd upon by Ill Company, and Corrupt Councels, for want of Conſideration and Experience. Now there are a ſort of Inſtruments, that neither Young nor Old are able to Reſiſt: ſuch a Cabal of Makebates and Incendiaries, that where ever they appear, Men, Families, and Whole Kingdoms, fall before them.

Herod began now to be of Archelaus's Opinion, and to think more Favourably of Alexander, and worſe of Pheroras then he had done: This being the Argument of the Four Papers. When Pheroras came to find Herod in a more Tractable Temper then uſual, and that Archelaus was the Man that he moſt depended upon; he ſet a Bold Face upon it; and with a Shameleſs Impudence, to ſupply all other Defects, he quitted Alexander, and betook himſelf to Archelaus: who told him plainly how Impoſſible a Thing it was for him ever to come off from an Accuſation ſo Manifeſtly prov'd againſt him; for the Sun was not Clearer then the Evidence of his being in a Conſpiracy againſt the Life of his Brother: beſide that the Ruine of Alexander was alſo of his Contrivance. Now, ſays Archelaus, Why cannot you give over this way of Shuffling and Out-facing Things, and rather make a Frank Confeſſion of what your very Soul knows you to be Guilty of? Your Brother has a Natural Tenderneſs for you, and I am perſwaded he might be prevail'd upon for your Pardon. If you like the Propoſal, make the Experiment, and you may be ſure of my Help to do you the Beſt Offices I can. Archelaus gives Pheroras Good Advice.

Pheroras bethought himſelf, and took the Hint; and with a Rueful Mourning Dreſs, and Countenance Diſmal and Sad, on purpoſe to move Compaſſion, he went and caſt himſelf at Herod's Feet; made his Confeſſion, and begg'd Forgiveneſs: Acknowledging his Faults; but at the ſame time caſting them all upon the Tranſport of a Fooliſh Paſſion he had for a Woman, that made him Idle Headed, ſo that he knew not what he Said or Did. So ſoon as Pheroras had given This Evidence againſt himſelf, Archelaus's next Work was to Qualify Matters with Herod, and to bring him into a more Converſable Humour. Well! ſays Archelaus, This is a very Ill Thing from ſo Near a Relation, and yet I my ſelf have ſuffer'd a Great deal more from a Brother then this comes to. But in that Caſe I thought it Prudence to Sacrifice my Revenge to a Natural Affection and Duty. It is in Kingdoms as it is in Bodies: when an Ill Humour falls down into any One Part, 'tis more Adviſable to Try Remedies then to Cut it off. Pheroras humbles himſelf, confeſſes, and begs Herod's Pardon.

Archelaus had now Sweetn'd Herod toward Pheroras, and Treated Alexander, in Semblance at leaſt, with Reproaches and Menaces; and in Concluſion, he would e'en take take away his Daughter, he ſaid, without any more ado. This ſeeming Fierceneſs of Archelaus wrought ſo ſenſibly upon the Spirit of Herod, that he became an Advocate for his Son upon it, and made it his Suit to Archelaus not to make void the Marriage. His Anſwer was; that out of the Reverence he had for the Rights of Allyance, he was Content to leave his Daughter abſolutely at Herod's Diſpoſal, provided only that he ſhould not give her to Alexander: (But this was all Counterfeit and Diſguiſe.) Herod was for the continuing of the Young Couple together. They had Children, he ſaid, and ſo Great a Kindneſs One for the Other that it would be Death to part them. If ſhe ſtays, ſays Herod, we'll have an Act of Oblivion: if ſhe goes away, the Caſe is Deſperate; for there's nothing puts Relations in Better Order then the Comfort of a Family-Converſation. This Deliberation was ſcarce over, but Archelaus went out and came back again in a Trice, and brought in Alexander along with him; whom he preſently reconciled to his Father. Archelaus was much of Opinion for Herod's going to Rome, with an Account to Cæſar of all the Late Tranſactions; for, ſays he, I have written at large already upon This Subject.

Herod becomes an Advocate for Alexander.

Archelaus brings Alexander to his Father.

This was a Crafty, and a Healing Councel of Archelaus's, to deliver his Son from Danger, and at the ſame time to Celebrate the Feſtival of the Reconciliation, with all Inſtances of Humanity and Reſpect. Archelaus was now upon his Departnre, and Herod made him a Preſent of Seventy Talents; a Throne Set with Pretious Stones, with a Train of Eunuchs, and a Concubine call'd Pannychis. All the King's Great Miniſters, Friends, and Relations, were likewiſe Treated by Herod's Expreſs Order with Rich Preſents, Every Man in his Proportion: Herod Himſelf and his Nobility Conducting Archelaus on his way as far as Antioch.

Herod's Magnificent Preſents to Archelaus at his Departure.

There came a Perſon into Judæa not long after This; a Man of Po'icy that Outdid Archelaus Himſelf: One that did not only Overthrow the Project of Alexander's Reconciliation to his Father; but ſo Order'd the Matter, that he brought Alexander Himſelf to his End. His Name was Euricles; a Native of Lacedæmon: Corrupted by the Love of Mony into an Affectation of Power, and ſo Laviſh in his Expences, that the Revenue of a Prince would not Anſwer his Profuſions. He made Herod ſeveral Preſents of Great Value, that look'd like Baits to draw on more; for Herod ſent him Greater preſently in Return. He ſet little Value upon any Bounty that was not the Price of Royal Bloud: ſo that he made his way to Herod's Good Graces; one while, by crafty enſnaring Diſcourſes, and another while, by the Groſſeſt of Huperbolical Flatteries; till in the End he got ſo perfect a Meaſure of the King's Weak-Side and Humour, that whatever he ſaid or did, was all to Herod's Liking. By this Paraſitical Way of Complaiſance, he made himſelf a very Conſiderable Intereſt at Court; beſide that being a Spartan, they had an Honour for his Country as well as for his Perſon.

Eurycles, a Falſe, Lewd Wretch, brings Alexander to his End.

He Inſinuates himſelf into Herod's Good Graces.

When Euricles came to diſcover the Weakneſſes of the Family, with the Factions and Diviſions of the Children, and to ſee how Herod ſtood affected to them in Particular, he took up his Lodging with Antipater; and pretending a wonderful Kindneſs to Alexander, told him a Long Tale of his Friend Archelaus, and what a Greatneſs had ever been betwixt them: which was as Good as a Letter of Recommendation to Alexander, who not only Swallow'd it himſelf, but Poſſeſs'd his Brother Ariſtobulus alſo with the Belief of the ſame Story. When Euricles had ſounded all the People he had to do withal, he put-on ſeveral Shapes and Forms, and went ſeveral ways to work as the Caſe required: his Bus'neſs being upon the Main to get Antipater's Mony, and to Betray Alexander. 'Tis an Admirable Thing to me, ſays Euricles to Antipater, how You, that are the Eldeſt Son, and Next Heir to the Crown, can ſuffer your ſelf to be Impos'd upon by Pretenders to your Right! And then to Alexander. How can You, ſays he, that are both the Son and the Husband of a Great Princeſs, endure to ſee the Son of a Private Woman interpoſe betwixt You and the Crown: eſpecially having ſuch a Friend to ſecond you as Archelaus? All this went down now with the Young Man for Good Faith, upon the Credit of Profeſſing a Friendſhip for Archelaus. Alexander was ſo far from Diſtruſting any thing, that he took Euricles into a Cloſer Confidence, and Open'd his very Heart to him in the Matter of Antipater. It is no Wonder, ſays he, for Herod, that took away the Life of the Mother, to take away the Kingdom from the Son. Euricles at the Hearing of This, Bleſſing himſelf at the Barbarity of the Practice; and with a Countenance of Pity, and Condoling, he Engag'd Ariſtobulus likewiſe in the Diſcourſe, and conſequently hamper'd him in the ſame Snare. When Euricles had Fiſh'd out Matter enough againſt them Both, away goes he to Antipater with the Story, and ſome Additional Circumſtances to it of his own making; as if the Conſpiracy were juſt upon the Point of Execution, and the King's Life every Moment more and more in Danger. Antipater made Eurycles a Preſent of a vaſt Sum of Mony for this Service, and his Good Word to his Father over and above. And ſo

His main Buſineſs is to get Antipater's Mony, and to betray Alexander.

Alexander makes Eurycles his Confident.

to

to the very Death of Alexander and Ariſtobulus, Eurycles offer'd himſelf for an Evidence againſt the Brothers.

Eurycles went now to Herod with This Speech in his Mouth;

I am here come in Gratitude, ſays he, to Acknowledge all your Favours, and to give you Your very Life in Requital. It is now a Long time that Your Death hath been reſolv'd upon: inſomuch that Alexander had a Drawn Sword in his Hand once, with a Full Determination to have done the Deed. And let me tell you, Sir, This Horrid Wickedneſs had been Compleated, if I had not put a Reſpite to the Diſpatch by ſeeming to Approve of the Thing, and Offering my ſelf to Join in the Exploit. What! ſays Alexander, cannot Herod Content himſelf with the Uſurpation of a Kingdom; the Death of my Mother, and the Tearing of the Government to pieces, without Declaring That Pitiful Wretch Antipater his Succeſſor, to the Scandal of all Crowned Heads? But it belongs to me to do Juſtice to the Ghoſts of Hyrcanus and Mariamne: Neither would it be Congruous that the Government ſhould deſcend from ſuch a Father to ſuch a Son without Bloud. There's not a Day paſſes over my Head without Freſh Arguments and Provocations, to Confirm me in my Purpoſe. There's not a Word paſſes my Lips but it is made a Snare to me. Drop but one Syllable upon the Subject of Honourable Families and Extraction, and Herod caſts it in my Teeth as an Affront that ſtruck at him. No no, ſays he, Alexander is the Only Man of Honour I warrant you, and his Father no Better then a Scoundrel. When I am a-Hunting with him, if I ſay Nothing, Why do not you Talk, he Cries; or if I Talk, Why do I not hold my Tongue? Nay, I cannot ſo much as Commend him, but he Calls it Picking of a Thank. I can do Nothing, in fine, to His Liking; and it is Only Antipater that has the Good Fortune to pleaſe him. So that (ſays Alexander) if This Plot ſhould Miſcarry, I had rather be in my Grave then Outlive the Diſaſter: if it ſucceeds, I can eaſily get-off to my Father-in-Law, and thence to Cæſar; who knows but Little, alaſs! of This Hiſtory, or of the Temper of Herod. I ſhall not now ſtand Trembling when I come to Rome, as Formerly, under the Awe of a Severe Father; who was Then Preſent: nor ſhall I much inſiſt upon Private Injuries done to my ſelf, but rather Turn my Diſcourſe to Publique Grievances; as Horrible Corruptions and Oppreſſions, and the Squandring away of Thoſe Unmerciful Impoſitions in Luxury and Pleaſure. I ſhall ſhew which way they went, into what Hands; the Miſerable Slavery of the Cities, and the True Reaſons of it: and to Conclude, I ſhall deliver ſuch a Hiſtory of the Death of my Grandfather Hyrcanus, and my Mother Mariamne; and make ſuch a Diſcovery of the Wickedneſs of That Prince, that No Man Living, after Theſe Neceſſary Truths, ſhall ever take me for a Murderer of my Father.

A False and Scandalous Story of Alexander.

When Eurycles had finiſh'd This Invective againſt Alexander, he turn'd the Remainder of his Diſcourſe into a Panegyrick to the Honour of Antipater: The Only Son, he ſaid, that Truly lov'd his Father, and put a ſeaſonable ſtop to the Progreſs of the Deſign. The King being ſtill labouring under his Former Jealouſies, brake-out upon This Hint into the Impatience of a moſt Intolerable Rage; and it was now Antipater's Time, and Maſter-piece, to Enflame his Extravagance, by trumping up New Matter, and Witneſſes againſt the Brothers. The Evidence was This. That Alexander and Ariſtobulus held a private Correſpondence with Jucundus and Tyrannus, Two Horſe-Officers that for ſome Miſdemeanour were Diſcharg'd of their Command. This Enformation put Herod into ſuch a Fury, that he Order'd them immediately to the Torture. But They knew Nothing, they ſaid, of the Matter in Queſtion; Only there was a Certain Letter it ſeems, ſent from Alexander, as to the Governour of Alexandrion; deſiring him to receive Himſelf and Ariſtobulus into the Caſtle, in Caſe of Their Father's Death; and to furniſh them Both with Arms and other Neceſſaries, if ſuch a Thing ſhould Happen. Alexander Charg'd This Letter as a Forgery of Diophantus; a Bold Man, and Wonderfully Dextrous at Counterfeiting Hands, and beſide all This, he was the King's Secretary. And it is to be Noted, that he was at laſt put to death for Forgery. The Governour of the Caſtle was alſo Tortur'd; and there was Nothing gotten out of Him neither. The Sons were effectually Quitted: But for Eurycles; That Peſt of Mankind, and the Projector of This Whole Bus'neſs: How was he Celebrated by Herod for his Friend, and Preſerver! and Complemented at laſt with a Preſent of Fifty Talents for his Pains. This Abandon'd Wretch, before Archelaus could have any Certainty of the Impriſonment of the Two Brothers, made a Journey to him by Stealth, and had the Face to tell Archelaus, that All was Well betwixt Herod and Alexander, and that He Himſelf had made them Friends. From thence he went into Achaia with his Treaſure; where he ſpent it as lewdly as he Got it. In the End, he was Arraign'd by Cæſar, for Seditious Practices, Broils, and Oppreſſions. He was in the Concluſion Baniſh'd; and This was the Puniſhment he ſuffer'd for his Lewd Practices againſt Alexander and Ariſtobulus.

It

It may do well enough in This place to Oppoſe Evaratus of Coos, in the Contrary Extreme to Eurycles the Spartan. He was much a Friend of Alexander's, and in Herod's Court at the ſame time when the Spartan was there. The King put him to it very Strictly what Credit he gave to That Report of the Conſpiracy, and to the Accuſations that were given-out upon it. Evaratus declar'd upon his Oath, That he never knew the Young Men Guilty of any Thing like it. But the Miſerable Priſoners were never the Better for it; for Herod's Ears were only Open to Calumnies; and People were More or Leſs in his Favour, according to the Degree of being More or Leſs Infamous; and there was no Other way to pleaſe him but by Saying, Doing, and Believing, as He did.

Herod's Ears Open only to Calumnies.

Salome an Incendiary to the Father againſt the Sons.

Salome in the mean time was a Terrible Incendiary to Herod againſt his Sons, for the Securing of Her ſelf. Ariſtobulus gave her a Caution, both as a Mother-in-Law, and as an Aunt, to have a Care of Her ſelf; intimating that ſhe was in as much Danger from Herod now, as any Body elſe, lying under a Second Charge for the ſame Crime ſhe was accuſed of Before: That is to ſay, that ſhe had Contracted a League with Syllæus the Arabian, with a Deſign to Marry him, though ſhe knew him to be the King's Enemy; and that ſhe gave him a Secret Account, from time to time, of the King's Councels. Ariſtobulus gave her This Warning on purpoſe to Involve her in the ſame Common Fate with his Brother and Himſelf: but it fell out Unhappily; for This was the Rock they ſplit upon, and the very Tempeſt that ſunk them Both. For Salome in That Moment went to the King, and told him what Ariſtobulus had done; which Tranſported him to That Degree of an Impetuous Rage, that he caus'd the Brothers to be immediately taken apart, and laid in Chains.

Herod in a Rage lays the Brothers in Chains.

And ſends Cæſar an Account of the Matter.

Herod, in This Heat, ſent Volumnius, a Colonel of Horſe, and Olympus, one of his Particular Friends, to Cæſar, with Copies of the Proceedings. Upon their Arrival at Rome they deliver'd their Letters, and Cæſar was in Great Trouble for the Young Men upon the Reading of them; but he was Tender however of Exerting his Civil Power to the Prejudice of the Natural Power of a Father over his Children: ſo that he return'd Herod an Anſwer to This Effect. That he was Maſter of Himſelf, and of Thoſe that belong'd to him. But Cæſar thought it yet Adviſable to call an Aſſembly of his Friends and Relations, and the Governours of the Province, to Enquire into the Conſpiracy: and ſo Proceed to do Juſtice upon Thoſe that ſhould be found Guilty of Prepenſe Malice: but if there were no More then a Thought of Withdrawing, or Flying, in the Caſe; a ſlender Puniſhment, he thought, might ſerve the Turn.

Herod calls a Council to meet about it at Berytus, according to Cæſar's Order.

The Aſſembly meets.

But the Sons not brought into Court for fear of Miſchief.

The Emperour had Mark'd out Berytus for the Place of Meeting; and Herod, in Conformity to Cæſar's Direction, call'd a Councel there. The Preſidents were of Cæſar's Appointment in Writing; Saturninus, and Pedanius, Embaſſadors, with Volumnius the Governour of the Province; the Friends and Relations of Herod; not Omitting Salome and Pheroras: and after Theſe, the Principal Men of Syria, King (a) Archelaus only Excepted; for Herod had a Jealouſie of Him, being the Father-in-Law of Alexander. The Councel was againſt bringing the Sons into Court, and Prudentially enough too; for the very ſight of them would have Endanger'd the Moving of a Troubleſome Compaſſion; and then if they had been heard ſpeak for Themſelves, Alexander would with Great Eaſe have Baffl'd all their Objections: ſo that they were rather kept under Cuſtody at a Diſtance, in Platane a Village of Sidonia.

The King Opens the Cauſe with Great Partiality, and Paſſion.

When the King ſtood up to ſpeak, he behav'd himſelf Paſſionately, and vented his Diſpleaſure againſt his Sons, as if they had been Preſent. When he was upon the ſubject of the Conſpiracy, his Voice was Low and Faint, and he did not Care for bearing too hard upon That Topique becauſe his Proofs were Weak; but when he came to Muſter up Malicious Expreſſions, Indignities, Injuries, and Diſobediences Committed againſt Himſelf, his Voice was heard all over the Court; giving the Aſſembly to Underſtand that Thoſe Reproaches were Worſe to him then Death: and finally, when he ſaw that all paſs'd without Contradiction, he only lamented the Miſery of his Condition in the gaining of ſo Ruinous a Victory; and upon This, Order'd the Court to proceed to a Sentence.

And meeting with no Contradiction, He bids the Court Proceed to a Sentence.

A Sentence of Death paſt upon Them.

Saturninus gave his Opinion Firſt, that they deſerv'd to be Puniſh'd; but not with Death: for it would not look well, having Three Sons Preſent in the Aſſembly, to paſs a Sentence upon Thoſe that were Abſent. The Two Legats were of the ſame Mind, and ſo were Others that came after. The Firſt Man that gave Sentence of Death was Volumnius, and Others follow'd him as they were influenc'd by the Paſſions and Intereſt of Herod; but not a Man of them, out of any Ill Will

to

to the Priſoners. Judæa, and Syria was all in Dread and Suſpence, what would be the Iſſue of This Affair: though at the ſame time no Body thought that Herod could ever have the Heart to Murder his Own Children. But he had yet ſo Little Tenderneſs of Nature, as to ſend his Sons to Tyre in Chains, and thence by Sea to Cæſarea; Deliberating in the mean time what Death to put them to.

And the next thing was to Conſider what Death they ſhould dye.

In the mean time, up comes one (a) Tyro, an Old Soldier of the King's, and a Great Lover of the Young Princes: He had a Son too that was much in Favour with Alexander. This Tyro, in a Horror of Indignation for what Herod was a-doing, went about Raving and Crying-out like a Mad-man, (as in truth he was no Better.) Juſtice, ſays he, is Trampled upon; Truth is Loſt, and there's nothing but Villany and Iniquity left in This World. There's no ſuch Thing as Humanity and Natural Affection upon the Face of the Earth. At This rate he went on, Raging, and Exclaiming like a Man Weary of his Life. Nay, he had the Courage at laſt to Advance to the King Himſelf. Of All Men Living, ſays he to Herod, You Your ſelf are certainly the moſt Miſerable: a Man given over to the Judgment of believing the Falſeſt and the Worſt of People, to the Prejudice of the Beſt Friends you have. As for Inſtance. There is Salome and Pheroras: Two Perſons that You Your ſelf know deſerve to ſuffer Death, and you have declar'd as much: and yet Theſe are the People, upon whoſe Teſtimony you are about to take away the Lives of your Sons. You never Conſider what an Eaſe it will be to Antipater, when the Right Heirs are remov'd, and You Two left alone; for their Buſineſs is to have a King They may Govern as They pleaſe. But let him have a Care then of the Soldiers too; for if They come to take Fire at This Butchery, who knows how far it may go? for there's not a Soul but pities the Brothers, and Men of Quality Grumble Publiquely at it to ſee how Things are Menag'd. Tyro, upon This Occaſion, Naming ſeveral of the Male-Contents; which in the ſame minute were taken-up by Herod's Order, together with Tyro and his Son.

The Generous Bravery of Tyro a Common Soldier, in favour of the Brothers.

There was One Tryphon by, at That Time; a Kind of Mad-man, and the King's Barber. This Tryphon leapt-out to ſhew himſelf to the Company, and ſo ſet up for a Witneſs. [That ſame Tyro, ſays he to Herod, Offer'd me a Conſiderable Reward in the Name of Alexander, if I would but Undertake to Cut your Throat in the Shaving.] Upon This Enformation, Tyro and his Son, and the Barber, were preſently Order'd to be put to the Queſtion. Tyro and his Son deny'd All, and the Barber was Wholly Silent: Whereupon Herod Commanded Tyro's Torments to be Encreas'd, when his Son out of pure Tenderneſs and Pity to his Father, promis'd the King a Diſcovery of the Whole Tranſaction, if he might have his Pardon. Upon This, he was taken off the Torture, and then declar'd that his Father was put upon it by Alexander to Kill the King. This was taken by ſome only for a Shift in the Boy to get himſelf Eas'd: but there were Others again that gave more Credit to it.

Tryphon the King's Barber ſets up for an Evidence againſt them.

Herod, after This, made a Bitter Speech againſt ſome Great Officers of the Army, together with Tyro; which ſo Exaſperated the Common People that they fell upon Theſe Officers, Tyro and the Barber, with Stones and Cudgels, and put them All to Death. As for the Sons that were now at Sebaſte, not far from Cæſarea, Herod caus'd them to be Strangled, and the Dead Bodies to be Carry'd afterwards to Alexandrion, and laid by Alexander there, the Mother's Uncle. This was the End of Ariſtobulus and Alexander.

Antipater in a Conſpiracy againſt the Life of his Father.

ANtipater by This time reckon'd himſelf ſure of the Kingdom; but never was any Man ſo Univerſally Odious to the People: for they well enough Underſtood the Whole Train of This Wickedneſs to be of his Contrivance. But he was as Uneaſy on the One hand, as he thought himſelf Unſafe on the Other, for fear the Children of the Slaughter'd Brothers ſhould riſe up to revenge the Death of their Fathers. Alexander had by Glaphyræ Two Sons; Tigranes and Alexander: Ariſtobulus had likewiſe by Berenice, the Daughter of Salome, Herod, Agrippa, and Ariſtobulus; and Two Daughters, Herodias and Mariamne. Glaphyra was now ſent away with her Portion into Cappadocia, after the Death of Alexander; and Berenice, the Widow of Ariſtobulus, was Married to the Uncle of Antipater: who bethought himſelf of This Match to make Friends again with Salome, and put an End to all Quarrels. Antipater ply'd Pheroras with Complements and Preſents; making Court at the ſame time to Cæſar's Friends, and ſending vaſt Sums of Money to Rome to Engage them. Neither was he leſs Bountiful to Saturninus and the reſt of his Friends in Syria. But all This would not yet do His Work; for the More he gave, the Leſs they valu'd him: and ſo far was This Expence from any Appearance of a Generous Bounty, that it was look'd upon to be Only a Squandring, out of Fear. So it was, in fine, that he was never the Better for what he gave: and where he gave Nothing, he made People ſo much the more his Enemies. He was the Larger in his Liberalities, becauſe he ſaw, contrary to all People's Expectation, that Herod took ſuch Care of the Poor Orphans; which gave to Underſtand, by the Commiſeration he had for the Children, the Penitent Senſe and Regret he had for the Death of the Fathers.

He tries all the Arts of Smooth Words, Bribes and Preſents, to make himſelf an Intereſt, but to no Purpoſe.

Herod's Tenderneſs for the Children looks like a Regret for the Death of the Fathers.

A Council call'd.

Herod, having now call'd his Friends, and Kin'red together, ſent for the Young Princes, and ſo Addreſs'd himſelf to the Company with Tears in his Eyes upon This Occaſion.

Herod's Addreſs to the Aſſembly.

You have here before you, ſays Herod, the Children of an Unfortunate Family. Their Fathers have been taken from me by a ſad Fate, and I find my ſelf Bound in Humanity and Good Nature to do the Beſt I can for the Orphans, in Diſcharging the Part of a Grandfather, more to my Satisfaction, then I did that of a Father. In Purſuance of This Purpoſe, I ſhall make it my Care in the Firſt place to leave Theſe Children in Good Hands, and under the Charge of the Beſt Friends I ſhall leave behind me when I am gone. To begin with you Pheroas, ſays he, I would have you Marry your Daughter to Alexander's Eldeſt Son, and to ſupply the Place to him of a Father, and a Neceſſary Guardian. As for your part, Antipater, ſays he, I would have your Son to take One of the Daughters of Ariſtobulus: under which Relation, you will be as Good as a Parent to the Orphan. And ſo for my Son (a) Herod, the Grandchild of Simon the High-Prieſt by the Mother-ſide, let him Marry the Other Siſter. This is my Will and Deſire: and no Creature that has any Regard or Kindneſs for Me will Diſpute it. Thus I would have it; and I beſeech God to Proſper Theſe Alliances to the Comfort of my Kingdom and my Family, and Grant in Mercy that the Children may be look'd upon with a more Favourable Eye then their Fathers.

His Care for the Settlement of the Royal Family in Convenient Matches.

Herod Concludes with a Benediction, And ſo Diſmiſſes the Court.

With This Benediction Herod Concluded; and Joyning the Hands of the Princes, and Weeping over them, he took a Particular Leave of the Whole Aſſembly one by one, and ſo Diſmiſs'd the Council.

Herod's Speech goes to the Heart of Antipater.

Antipater, upon the Hearing of This, ſtood like a Statue; inſomuch that Every Body took Notice of the Surprize: for he look'd upon all the Reſpects his Father paid the Children, to be no Other then a Derogation from Himſelf. This was a Way, he thought, to put all Things into Confuſion again: at leaſt if Pheroras the Tetrarch ſhould Join Intereſts with Archelaus, in Favour of Alexander's Sons. It ran in his Head again, the Univerſal hatred he had drawn upon Himſelf; the Compaſſion of the People for Thoſe Fatherleſs Children; and, in fine, the Concern the Whole Nation had in the Matter; betwixt a Tenderneſs for the Living Children, and a Reverence for the Memory of the Dead: In which Caſe, Antipater was look'd upon as neither Better, nor Worſe than the Murderer. Theſe Things well Conſider'd, Antipater had nothing elſe to do, but to Diſſolve the Contracts: And how to gain that Point, was now the Queſtion; for Herod being Fierce and Suſpicious, was not to be dealt withal by Craft and Circumvention. So that he went rather a Frank bare-fac'd way to work, and Openly deſir'd of him (but with all Modſty and Deference) that he would only make good the Honour he had thought him worthy of, and Beſtow'd upon him: For all the reſt was but the Shadow of a Kingdom, without the Subſtance; which would be certainly the Caſe, if Alexander's Son ſhould not only have Archelaus for his Grandfather, but Pheroras alſo for his Father-in-law. Antipater preſs'd Herod with violent Importunities to change the Diſpoſition of the Marriages, having a numerous Family, he ſaid, and the Thing would be eaſily done.

Antipater finding no Remedy but by Diſſolving the Contracts;

Preſs'd it Earneſtly to Herod, and after ſome few Difficulties carry'd his Point.

Herod had Nine Wives, and Children by Seven of them: Antipater by Doris; Herod by Mariamne the Daughter of the High-Prieſt; Antipas and Archelaus by (a) Malthace a Samaritan; and a Daughter, Olympias: whom (b) his Brother Joſeph marry'd; Herod and Philip by Cleopatra of Jeruſalem, and Phaſael by Pallas. He had alſo other Daughters, Roxane and Salome: The one by Phædra, the other by Elpis; and two Wives that had no Children; the one was the Daughter of his Brother, the other his Couſin German; and over and above theſe, he had by Mariamne the two Siſters of Alexander and Ariſtobulus. So that here's Choice enough, ſays Antipater, for the ordering of the Matches ſome other way.

The King perceived by This time what Thoughts Antipater had of the Children, and what Purpoſes and Intentions towards them; and was very much Diſturbed at it, for fear he ſhould ſerve the Survivors, as he had done their Predeceſſors, whom He Himſelf had Murder'd before. Herod was ſo very Angry with him for this Expoſtulation, that he gave him hard words, and made him Quit the Room: But with a little Flattery and Cajoling, he was quickly Wrought upon to make ſome Alteration in his Project: So that he gave to Antipater Himſelf the Daughter of Ariſtobulus, and marryed the Son to the Daughter of Pheroras. This was enough to ſhew what an Aſcendant the glozing way of Antipater had over the Spirit of Herod. But This would not do yet in the Caſe of Salome, though his Own Siſter, and a Siſter Seconded alſo with the Intereſt of the Empreſs (c) Julia in her Favour. Salome had a mind to marry Syllæus the Arabian, and Engaged Julia in the Requeſt: Which Herod did not only Oppoſe in the Thing it Self, and all Interceſſions for it, but bound Himſelf with an Oath to Treat her as the Greateſt Enemy he had in the World, if ſhe did not give over the Thought on't. After This, he forc'd her upon a Match witch Alexas a Friend of his, and ſo to Marry One of her Daughters to the Son of Alexas, and the Other to the Uncle of Antipater by the Mother-ſide. He gave alſo One of the Daughters of Mariamne to Antipater the Son of his Siſter, and the Other to Phaſael the Son of his Brother.

The Caſe of Salome and Syllæus.

When Matters were thus ſhuffled and alter'd, and every thing ſettled to the Humour and Convenience of Antipater, and conſequently to the manifeſt Excluſion of the Orphans, his Malignity was now Bolſter'd up with ſo Audacious a Confidence, that it made him wholly Inſupportable. He found that all People Hated him, and that he could not be ſafe unleſs he made them Fear him too: Beſide that Pheroras treated him as a Prince Eſtabliſhed in his Soveraignty.

The Inſolence of Antipater.

There brake out at the ſame time new Broils at Court, upon a Faction among the Women; for the Wife, the Mother, and Siſter of Pheroras, together with the Mother of Antipater, behaved themſelves Inſolently and Contemptuouſly, even toward the King's Daughters: which Antipater was well enough pleas'd withall, for he hated them mortally. And for the reſt of the Women, they ſtood all in Awe of the Cabal; ſave only Salome, who gave the King plainly to underſtand the Truth of the Matter, and that their ſecret Meetings and Conſultations were not for his Service When the Women came to underſtand that the King had notice of theſe Conventicles, and took great offence at them, they gave over that open way of Caballing, and on the contrary, would ſtill be jangling, and thwarting one another in the King's hearing, as if they were rather Enemies than Conſpirators. Antipater under the Cloak of this Diſguiſe, made direct ſport with Pheroras, and betwixt Jeſt and Earneſt banter'd and abuſed him: But then they kept up their Night-Clubs and Collations, and the more they were obſerv'd, the more they ſtuck together. But nothing of all this ſcap'd Salome, and from Her it went immediately to the King. This put Herod into a Rage, eſpecially againſt the Wife of Pheroras: Upon whom Salome laid the greateſt ſtreſs. Herod, upon this, call'd a Council of his Friends and Relations, and among other Foul Practices, exhibited a Complaint againſt her for Affronting his Daughters; engaging the Phariſees againſt him, and giving his Brother a Potion to make him hate him. And now, ſays Herod, turning to Pheroras; Which of the two would you part with, your Brother or your Wife, if it were put to your Choice? I would rather part with my Life it ſelf, ſays Pheroras, than with my dear Wife. This Anſwer put Herod to a ſtand; and thereupon he gave Antipater in Charge, That he ſhould never entertain any Diſcourſe, or have any thing more to do with either Pheroras or his Wife, or any Body elſe that belong'd to them. Antipater made a ſhew of readineſs to comply with his Order; but This not withſtanding they ſpent ſeveral whole Nights together, for fear of Diſcovery; however he ſo Order'd the matter with ſome Friends he had in Italy, that Letters were written to Herod, by any means to ſend Antipater over to Rome, to make his Court a-while to Cæſar. Upon This Invitation, Herod immediately provided him a Princely Equipage, with Money and all Neceſſaries, and ſo Diſpatch'd him away for Rome with his Will and Teſtament along with him: Wherein Herod declar'd Antipater Himſelf his Succeſſor, and Herod after Antipater, whom he had by Mariamne the Daughter of the High-Prieſt.

Syllæus the Arabian made at this time another Journey to Rome, (without any regard to Cæſars Command) to diſpute the ſame Cauſe over again with Antipater, that he had formerly defended againſt Nicholas. It was a Controverſie of Great Moment alſo, that he had with his Sovereign Aretas, having put ſeveral of his Friends to death, and Soemus for one, the moſt eminent Perſon both for Power and Wealth in the whole City of Petra. He likewiſe corrupted Tabatus, one of Cæſar's Governours, with a Sum of Money to aſſiſt him againſt Herod; but Herod afterward out-bidding him, drew Tabatas off again from Syllæus, and made him Receiver of Herods Dutys. Now Syllæus finding that he came to no Account, gave Auguſtus to underſtand by way of Complaint, that Tabatus was not Cæſar's Governour, but Herod's. This provocation tranſported Tabatus to ſuch a Degree, that being as yet in great Credit with Herod, he went and betray'd Syllæus to him; telling the King, that he had engag'd Corinthus, one of the Guards, with a Sum of Money, to joyn with him in a Conſpiracy: Adviſing withal, that he might be forthwith taken into Cuſtody. The King made no Difficulty of doing it at firſt word; for this ſame Corinthus, though he had his Education in the Court, was nevertheleſs by Birth an Arabian. So that in a ſhort time Corinthus was not only taken up Himſelf, but two Arabians more that were found with Him; the one of them a Friend of Syllæus, and the Name of the other was Phylarchus: Who being put to the Queſtion, confeſs'd upon the Torture, that they had prevail'd upon Corinthus for a Mighty Sum of Money to undertake the killing of the King. Saturninus the Governour of Syria took the Examinations, and ſent them away to Rome.

Herod Baniſhes Pheroras the Court, for refuſing to turn away his Wife; who vows never to Return while Herod lives. Herod falls ſick, and ſends for him, but he refuſes to come. Herod Recovers, and Pheroras falls Sick. Herod *viſits him, and he dyes ſome few days after. HErod preſs'd every day harder and harder upon Pheroras to turn away his Wife. He found Matter in abundance to Hate her for; but no way to Puniſh her, till in a Frantick Out-rage he baniſh'd both her ſelf and her Husband the Court. Pheroras bore the Affliction well enough, and ſo went ſtrait away to his Tetrarchy, with an Oath never to return again while Herod liv'd; and that nothing but His Death ſhould put an End to his Baniſhment. Herod fell now into a Fit of Sickneſs, and ſent ſeveral times for Pheroras to come to him, as having ſomewhat to Communicate to him before he Dy'd: But Pheroras would not be prevail'd upon to go; and Herod on the other hand, beyond all Expectation, recover'd. Pheroras, after This, fell ill Himſelf, and Herod upon That Occaſion gave a ſingular Inſtance of his Humanity and Patience; for he gave him a viſit, and Treated him with all the Care and Affection imaginable: But That Diſeaſe took him off in a ſhort time. It was generally thought that Herod had a very Particular Kindneſs for Pheroras, to the laſt Hour of his Life: And yet there goes a Report for all This, that he made him away by Poiſon. The Body however was carry'd away to Jeruſalem; a Publique Mourning appointed for him, and a moſt Magnificent Funeral. This was the End of One of the Murderers of Alexander and Ariſtobulus. But the Puniſhment of This Wickedneſs fell afterwards upon the Head of Antipater, the Author of it: And His Ruine took it's Riſe from the Death of Pheroras; for ſome of His Freed-Men, in the Agony of their Paſſion for ſo Irreparable a Loſs, went boldly to the King, and told Him that His Brother was poiſon'd, for his Wife had given him ſomething to eat, that was neither Dreſs'd nor Seaſon'd after the uſual Manner; and that, upon the ſwallowing of it, he was immediately ſick at heart. It was Obſerv'd, that two Days before, there was a Cunning-Woman brought out of Arabia, at the Inſtance of the Mother and Siſter, to prepare a Philtre for Pheroras; but inſtead of a Love-Potion, it prov'd to be a Deadly Poyſon, and given by the Advice of Syllæus; to whom this Woman was well known.

The Body Bury'd at Jeruſalem, with Pomp and Solemnity.

Here were ſo many Suſpitions ſtarted, and the Preſumptions ſo ſtrong, that the King Order'd the putting of ſeveral Perſons, Bond and Free, to the Queſtion: One of them crying out in the Extremity of her Torments, God (ſays ſhe) the Ruler of Heaven and Earth, Avenge Thy Self and us upon the Mother of Antipater, for all the Miſeries we ſuffer here for her ſake. When the King had gotten This Light, he follow'd it as far as it would lead him; and a Woman laid open the whole Story of the Familiarity betwixt the Mother of Antipater, and Pheroras, and his Women; their Clandeſtine Meetings; and how Pheroras and Antipater, when they came from Court, ſat up and made merry with them all night, and not a Servant admitted into the Chamber. It was one of the Free-Women that gave this Evidence.

Pheroras ſaid to be Poiſon'd, with Strong Evidences and Preſumptions to Confirm it.

A Poyſon inſtead of a Love Potion Adviſed by Syllæus.

When they came to be Examin'd a-part, there was ſuch an Agreement in their Informations, that the Truth of the Charge was no longer to be Doubted. It came now into Herod's Head that Antipater's withdrawing to Rome, and Pheroras's (in effect) procuring his own Baniſhment, were only Contrivances to get out of the way: For they were often heard to ſay, That Herod would never ſtop at Alexander and Ariſtobulus; but that they Themſelves and their Wives, muſt prepare to take their turns: For why ſhould any Body hope to Fare better at Herod's hand, after the Execrable Murder of his Wife and Children? So that there is no Fence againſt This Monſter, but getting out of his Reach.

The Witneſſes Agree among themſelves, and with one another.

The Women depoſed further, that Antipater would be often Complaining to his Mother, That when I (ſays he) am Grey-Headed, my Father grows every Day younger and younger; and who knows but I may dye before I come to Govern? Or what if my Father ſhould Dye before me, (as that may be a long time firſt) I ſhall have loſt the very Reliſh of the Pleaſure of a Crown: Beſide the Hydra's Heads that are now ſhooting out again in the Children of Alexander and Ariſtobulus: And as for my own Children, they are cut off by my Father's Will from any pretence of Claiming to the Succeſſion; for he has made the Son of Mariamne his Heir; at leaſt if the Will of a Dotard may paſs for any thing. But he'll take care to put a ſtop to This Diſpute, by not leaving one Soul of his Family alive to pretend to't. He is certainly of all Fathers thers that ever liv'd, the moſt Unnatural and Malicious to his Sons ; and yet worſe, if it be poſſible, to his Brothers : Witneſs the Hundred Talents he gave Antipater, never to have any thing more to do with Pheroras : and then when Pheroras cry'd out, What Hurt have we done him ? Nay, for That, ſays Antipater, I wiſh he would but Content himſelf to Strip us Naked, and then leave us Alive. But what can a Body hope for from ſo very a Brute, that makes the Open Profeſſion of Friendſhip Intolerable, and Dangerous ? But, ſays he, here do we content our ſelves to Meet and Enjoy one another by Stealth : whereas if we had but the Hearts and Hands of Men, we might find Means to Aſſert our Rights and Liberties, in Another Way.

The Diſcovery Clear and Certain.

This was the Women's Confeſſion ; and that Pheroras had ſome Thoughts of getting away with them to Petra It was a Clear Diſcovery ; but the Great Evidence of All to Herod, was the Hundred Talents : for he had only mention'd That Particular to Antipater. So that he began with Doris, Antipater's Mother, as the Firſt Object of his Fury ; took away all the Ornaments, and Pretious Things he had given her, to the value of many Talents : and, after the Rifling of her, he Baniſh'd her. After This, upon the Cooling of his Choler, he caus'd Pheroras's Women to be taken off the Torture : but trembling all the while, and diſtracted betwixt Jealouſies and Fears. Nay he was ſo Strict and Cautious in his Cruelties, that he put the Innocent to the Torture without Diſtinction, for fear any of the Guilty ſhould ſcape.

Herod's Mercileſs Rigour.

The Evidence of Antipater's Deputy about the Poyſon.

The Next that took his Turn was Antipater the Samaritan, the Deputy of the other Antipater : and it appear'd by His Evidence, that Antipater ſent for Poyſon into Ægypt, by a Certain Friend of Antiphilus, with a Deſign upon the King's Life ; which he receiv'd from Theudion, the Uncle of Antipater, and upon His Order deliver'd it to Pheroras ; who had taken upon him the doing of the Deed, while He Himſelf ſhould be at Rome, and out of diſtance to be ſuſpected : Pheroras committing the Care of the Poyſon to his Wife to lay it up.

The Evidence of Pheroras's Widow.

The King ſent preſently, upon This, for the Widow of Pheroras, and Commanded her without any delay to ſhew him the Secret ſhe had receiv'd. She went out in That Moment with a Pretence to fetch it ; but caſt her ſelf Head-long from the Top of the Houſe, to prevent, both the Torture, and the Diſcovery : but God's Providence would not ſuffer Antipater to ſcape thus ; for her Fall was not Mortal. She was taken up, and carry'd to the King, and ſo ſoon as ever ſhe came to her ſelf (for her Head was Troubled) the King put her to it to tell him what made her to take That Deſperate Leap : aſſuring her upon his Oath, that if ſhe ſpake the Truth, ſhe ſhould have no further Puniſhment ; but if ſhe Falſify'd, ſhe ſhould Dye upon the Torture, without allowing her ſo much as the Rites of a Burial.

By This time ſhe was come a little to her Senſes, and bolted out This Ejaculation. Am I, ſays ſhe, to keep Secrets, now Pheroras is Dead and gone, in favour of Antipater that has been the Deſtruction of us All ? Great Prince ! Give me the Hearing, and I call That God that cannot be deceiv'd to bear Witneſs to the Truth of what I ſay. When you (ſpeaking to Herod) were upon a Viſit to Pheroras in his Sickneſs, and Weeping over him, My Husband call'd me to him. See, my Dear Wife, ſays he, how much I have been Miſtaken in my Opinion of my Brother's Kindneſs to me ; for in plain Terms, I hated him, and meditated the Death of This Man, that ſhew'd ſo Generous a Pity for me in my Diſtreſs, (though yet among the Living) but I have the Juſt reward of my Iniquity. And now fetch me immediately the Remainder of the Poyſon that Antipater gave you to keep, and burn it before my Face : I ſhall carry the Vengeance of a Troubled Conſcience into the Other World elſe. I brought it as I was bid, and threw the greater part of the Poyſon into the Fire before his Eyes : the reſt I reſerved for a Time of need in caſe of the Worſt. With Theſe Words, ſhe produc'd a Box, with a Little of the Poyſon in it. The Brother and the Mother of Antiphilus were Then put to the Queſtion : and their Enformation was that Antiphilus brought That Box out of Ægypt ; and that he receiv'd the Poyſon it ſelf from a Brother of his at Alexandrion, that practis'd Phyſique. It look'd as if the very Ghoſts of Alexander and Ariſtobulus had been Every where at work to make Diſcoveries, and to draw Proofs from the moſt Unlucky Perſons and Circumſtances. It was now Evident that Mariamne the Daughter of the High-Prieſt had a hand in the Plot ; as was made appear by her Brothers upon the Queſtion : But Herod puniſh'd the Mother in the Son ; for he Struck Herod the Son of Mariamne out of his Will, having formerly declared him in his Teſtament the Succeſſor of Antipater.

THE Laſt, and the Stabbing Witneſs, in Confirmation of all the reſt, was Bathyllus, one of Antipater's Free-men, that was juſt now come back from Rome, and brought with him a Supplemantal Poyſon: That is to ſay, the Poyſon of an Aſp and of other Serpents, for Pheroras and his Wife to finiſh the Work withal, if the Other ſhould fail; beſide another Invention over and above: which was, the Counterfeiting of ſeveral Letters againſt the Brothers, which were of Antipater's Compoſition. Ant. l. 17. c. 6, 7. Bathyllus a Stabbing Witneſs againſt Antipater. A Supplemental Poyſon. Antipater Counterfits Letters againſt the Brothers.

Archelaus and Philip were at That time at Rome, in the Courſe of their Studies. They were now grown up, and Young Men of Great Hope and Courage; and to all That, the Sons of the King, and ſo Dangerous a Rub in the Way of Antipater, that he had little Hope of gaining his Point, unleſs he could get Them remov'd: and in Order to That End, he got Letters forg'd againſt them in the Name of ſeveral of his Friends then Living at Rome; ſome of them all together upon the Subject of their Irreverend Diſcourſes upon their Father; Openly and Violently Exclaiming againſt the Death of Alexander and Ariſtobulus; taking it very Ill that they ſhould be now ſent for away (as their Father had Order'd them to Return:) and This was the Thing that Troubled Antipater more then all the reſt. Nay, Antipater was in a Practice of Forgery, and Secret Intelligence, even before he left Judæa, and procur'd Letters from Rome to Herod upon the ſame Subject; while He Himſelf, for the Avoiding of Suſpicion, apply'd himſelf to his Father as a kind of Advocate for his Brothers. He hop'd they were not ſo Bad, he ſaid, ſome things might be Falſe, and Others might have more of Heat and Raſhneſs in them then of Malice. It was a vaſt Expence he was at all this while upon his Intelligencers, toward the Deſtruction of his Brothers: and to Confound the Account, he brought a great many Rich Garments, Carpets, Gold and Silver-Plate, and ſeveral Other Curioſities of Great Price, to the Value of Two Hundred Talents upon the Whole; which he plac'd to the Account of the Suit they had with Syllæus, as a Blind to the Subornation. Archelaus and Philip, Princes of Great Hope. Antipater a Great Dealer in Forgery, and Falſe Intelligence. Nothing but Fraud and Hypocriſy.

Thus it went, but the Greater Evil ſwallow'd up the Leſs: for when the Whole Country rung of the Parricide, and all Letters and Witneſſes agreed in the Proof and Deteſtation of a repeated Deſign upon the Lives of the Brothers, there was not ſo much as One Word mention'd upon the Road out of Judæa, of the Preſent State of Herod's Family; though it was now full Seven Months betwixt the Proof of the Fact and Antipater's Return. But all the World hated him, or who knows but it might be a Peculiar Providence that Stopp'd People's Mouths, that would otherwiſe have been Blabbing; in Order to the Execution of a Divine Vengeance upon ſo many Horrid Murders.

Antipater wrote Herod word now, that he was juſt Entring upon his Journy, and how Honourably Cæſar had Treated him, and Diſmiſs'd him. But the King was ſtill in Pain till he had him ſure; ſo that for fear of having him Diverted by any Precaution, he wrote him the Kindeſt Letters, in pretence, Imaginable; and, in a Familiar way, deſir'd him to be with him as ſoon as poſſible: for if he made Haſt, he might Compound for his Mother's Fault; whom Antipater knew to be Baniſh'd already. The Firſt Notice he had of the Death of Pheroras was by a Letter he receiv'd at Tarentum; which wounded him to the very Heart. Some look'd upon it as a matter of Decency and good Nature in ſo Near a Relation; but Others again Imputed This Exceſs of Sorrow, not ſo much to his Tenderneſs for Pheroras, as for the Loſs of a Wicked and ſo Neceſſary an Inſtrument, and for the Diſappointment of the Plot: Beſide that he was in ſome Apprehenſion too of being detected in what he had done, and for fear the Story of the Poyſon ſhould come out. Upon his Coming into Cilecia, he receiv'd his Father's Letter above-mentioned: and then haſten'd away preſently, Herod in pain till he had Antipater ſure. The News of Pheroras Death ſtartled Antipater upon Divers Accounts.

At

At his coming to Celenderis, he had a kind of a Superſtitious fore-boding upon him: and, in particular, his Mother's Condition ran mightily in his Head. The Wiſer, and the more Cautious part of his Friends, were abſolutely againſt going to his Father, till he were certainly Enform'd upon what Pretence his Mother was turn'd away, for fear He Himſelf ſhould come to be Involved in his Mother's Crime. But the Short-ſighted People about him, that were altogether for being at Home again, without any Regard to Antipater's Intereſt: They were abſolutely for making what Haſt they could, for fear his Delay might make him ſuſpected, and ſuggeſt Matter for Calumny to Work upon. For if any thing ſhould be mov'd againſt him, it would be done in his Abſence; and no Man would Dare to Open his Mouth againſt him, if he were upon the Place. Beſide that it would be a Madneſs to hazzard a Certain Advantage upon a Wild Phancy: whereas he was rather immediately to Poſt away to his Father, to be within diſtance of receiving a Kingdom that could be no Body's but His. Antipater was Over-rul'd by the Fatality of an Impulſe, and ſo he proſecuted his Voyage to Sebaſte a Port of Caſarea.

Antipater's Friends divided, whether he ſhould Return to his Father or not.

The Latter Carried it, and ſo he went forward to Sebaſte.

But upon his Arrival, to his Great Admiration, the People all Avoided him, and not a Creature durſt come near him. They hated him as much before, 'tis true; but they were not ſo much at liberty to ſhew it. Some were afraid of the King; for all the Talk was now of Antipater: and Antipater the only Man all this while that knew the Leaſt of Himſelf. Never was any Man more Glorious at his going outward for Rome, or ſo Abject and Contemptible as he was upon his Return. He was no Stranger to the Broils and Confuſions of the Family; but he had the Wit to keep his Fears as much as poſſible to Himſelf, and with a Cheerful Countenance to Cover an Aking Heart. There was no Poſſibility of making an Eſcape, or of any Other Way of Relieving himſelf in This Extremity. He had no Certainty of the Affairs of the very Houſe; for no Body durſt come at him to Enform him: ſo that he had now and then ſome Intervals of Hope, either that Things were not Diſcover'd, or in caſe of the Worſt he did not Deſpair of bringing himſelf off by Confidence and Impoſture; which were the Only Two Friends he had to Truſt to.

When Antipater came to the Place, to his Great Admiration, not a Creature would Own him.

Antipater had nothing left him to Truſt to, but Confidence and Impoſture.

Being thus Arm'd and prepar'd, he Advanc'd without his Friends into the Palace; for his Train was repuls'd with Contempt at the Firſt Gate. It ſo fell out that Varus the Governour of Syria was then preſent. Upon his Entrance, he had the Impudence to Addreſs himſelf to his Father, as in a Way of Duty and Reſpect: but as he came Nearer him, Herod put out his Hand to ſtop him, and with a down-Look cry'd out to him. What! ſays he, ſhall a Parricide preſume to Embrace Me? A Curſe upon the Impious Soul of thee, for Daring to come near me till thou haſt Clear'd thy ſelf of all thy Crimes! And you have here your Judge before you, Varus; who ſhall paſs Sentence upon you according to your Demerit. Wherefore be gone, and prepare againſt to morrow for your Defence; which is all the Time I ſhall allow you.] Antipater ſtood Mute, and, without One word in return, went his way back again. His Mother and his Wife came to him afterwards, and Enform'd him of the Whole Proceeding. This brought him to Himſelf again, and to conſider what he had to ſay in his Own Juſtification.

Antipater Enters the Palace, and Addreſſes himſelf to his Father. Herod turns Sharp upon Him.

And bids him prepare for his Tryal the next day.

Herod, having a Councel next Day of his Friends and Relations, call'd likewiſe the Friends of Antipater to be there Preſent: Himſelf and Varus ſitting Preſident. He cauſed all the Witneſſes to be brought in: of which Number there were certain Servants of Doris the Mother of Antipater, that had been long ſince Priſoners. Theſe Servants brought Letters from the Mother to the Son, to This Purpoſe. [Your Father knows All, and therefore have a Care of coming near him, unleſs you can depend upon Cæſar for his Protection.] After the Introducing of the Witneſſes, Antipater enter'd the Court; and caſting himſelf at the Feet of his Father: I beſeech you Sir, ſays he, grant me an Impartial Hearing without prejudging my Cauſe, and I make no Doubt of Clearing my ſelf to be an Innocent Perſon.

The Court Met the day following. The Witneſſes Produced.

Antipater Enters the Court, and at his Father's Feet prays only for an Impartial Hearing.

Herod call'd out to him a-loud to hold his Tongue, and ſo Directed his Diſcourſe to Varus. [I do certainly know, ſays he, that you Varus, or any Other Unbiaſs'd Judge, will be fully ſatisfy'd that Antipater deſerves to Dye: but I am afraid, in the mean time, what Opinion you may Conceive of my Invidious Fortune; as if This Calamity were juſtly befall'n me for being the Father of ſuch Children. But I have ſome Right however to your Humanity and Compaſſion, for having been ſo Indulgent a Father to ſuch Profligate Wretches. As for the Young Men that are now Dead and gone, I deſign'd them for the Government, and Train'd them up at Rome in the Court and Favour of Cæſar, *the better to prepare them for the Exerciſe of Royal Dignity: and none at laſt ſo Great Enemies of My Peace and Safety, as Thoſe that I had rais'd in the World, even to be the Envy of Princes. to Himſelf in the Succeſſion. And what is the Requital now that this Monſter deſigns me for all theſe Tenderneſſes, but the Ent'ring into a Practice againſt the Life of his Maker? I was likely to live too long, he thought: Nay, I had liv'd too long already, and that was his Grievance: The Crown Alone would not Content him, it ſeems, unleſs he made his way to't through the Bloud of his Father. And in this truly he ſeem'd to have ſome Colour of Reaſon, for my bringing him back to Court out of a Private Condition, to the Excluſion of the Sons I had by the Queen, in declaring him my Succeſſor.

Now to Confeſs my ſelf to You, Varus, I am Convinc'd of my Errour. I did not do well to provoke my Sons by Cutting-off the Succeſſion to their Wrong, and in Favour of Antipater: for what did I ever do for Them Comparable to what I did for Him. He had a Great Part of the Adminiſtration in his Hands while I was Living; and the Succeſſion actually Settled upon him after my Death: and beſide other Gratifications, a Separate Revenue of Fifty Talents, and his Expences every where upon my Charge: Three Hundred Talents upon his Voyage to Rome, and the Only Perſon of my Whole Family that I recommended to Cæſar, as my Preſerver. Take them All together, they had not half the Wickedneſs in them of Antipater, and the Proofs againſt Them were infinitely ſhort of what I have againſt Him. And yet this Bloudy Wretch has the Face to plead Innocent, and does not Deſpair, I perceive, of Baffling the Truth with a Trick. Varus, look to your ſelf; for he will tell his Tale well enough; but I know the Beaſt thorough all his Diſguiſes and Impoſtures, and that he is Falſe at the Bottom.

This is the Man that was ſo Earneſt with me, in time paſt, to have a Care of Alexander, and how I expos'd my Perſon. How often would he come into my Bed-Chamber, and look about and Hunt for fear of Treachery? This Man was my Guardian, and my Security, while I ſlept; my Comforter in my Mourning for the Dead Brothers: and One that would Undertake for the Duty of Thoſe that were Living: My Champion, in fine, and my Guard. When I call to Mind, and Conſider the Addreſs, and the Hypocriſy of this Man; how Artificially he laid his Snares, and Cover'd his Deſigns; I can hardly think my Self Alive at this Day, or how it was poſſible for me to Scape the Nooſe. But ſince my Fate will have it ſo; and that my Greateſt Enemies are to be Thoſe of my Own Family; and Thoſe I have been the Kindeſt to: I ſhall only Deplore the Hardſhip of my Inevitable Deſtiny, and keep my Sorrows to my ſelf: But with this Reſolution, that not One Man comes off that ſhall be found Guilty of Thirſting after my Bloud, though the Whole Houſe ſhould Fall in the Condemnation.]

Herod brake-off upon this Period, in a Confuſion of Thought, and gave Order to Nicolaus, one of his Friends, to enter upon the Proofs. Antipater, that had lain Proſtrate all this while at Herod's Feet, now rais'd his Head, and with a little Exclamation addreſs'd himſelf to his Father. [You have had the Goodneſs Sir, ſays he, to plead my Cauſe: for how can I be a Parricide, and yet recorded by Your Self for Your Preſerver? If my Piety be only Impoſture and Pretence, as You are Pleas'd to ſay it is, how come I to be ſo Crafty in One Caſe, and ſo beſotted in Another, as not to Underſtand, that though Men may be Impos'd upon, yet the All-Searching and the All-Seeing Eye of God, that knows our Hearts, will not Suffer ſo Great a Wickedneſs to paſs Unpuniſh'd! God's Vengeance overtook my Brothers becauſe of their Undutifulneſs to You. But what Temptation had I now to Practiſe upon Your Life? The Hope of a Kingdom? Why, I did as good as Reign already. Or was it that I thought you hated me? That was Impoſſible, after ſo many Demonſtrations to the Contrary. Was I affraid of You? When quite on the Other hand, Others ſtood in awe of me, in Conſideration of the Zeal I had for your Safety. Or was it that I wanted any Thing? So far from it, that all my Profuſions were Supply'd out of your Treaſure: So that Certainly I muſt be the Worſt, even of Men, and of Brutes, to be Wanting in good Offices toward ſo Kind a Father: being a Perſon that You Your Self, as you ſay, receiv'd into Your Favour; Prefer'd before ſo many of Your Other Sons, and whom You declar'd King while You Your Self were yet Living; beſide Other Benefits, in proportion, to make Me the Envy of Other Men.

Nicolaus Enters upon the Proofs.

Antipater's Defence.

Wretch that I am! And this Fatal Journy of mine to give ſo much Time and Matter for Envy and Treachery to Work upon. But it was, Sir, for the Service of Your Self, and of Your Affairs, that I Undertook this Voyage; and to keep Syllæus from putting Affronts upon Your Old Age. Rome is the Witneſs of my Loyalty, and ſo is the Prince of Rome, and of the World, Cæſar Himſelf; that has ſo often Celebrated me for my Reverence to my Father. Be pleaſed, I beſeech You, to receive theſe Letters that have more Truth in them then all the Forgeries that have been Trump'd-up againſt me: Theſe Letters are my Juſtification, and the Infallible Arguments of a Sincere Affection for You. You may remember, Sir, how Unwillingly I took that Journy to lay my ſelf at the Mercy of all the Enemies I left behind me. It was Your Command, Sir, that ruin'd me, how Unwillingly ſoever; in forcing me to give my Adverſaries Time for Concerting their Malice againſt me.

If I had been a Parricide, Divine Juſtice either by Sea or Land would have found me out. But I ſhall not lay the Streſs of my Innocence upon that Argument; for I know very well that with God's Permiſſion You have Condemn'd me in your Heart already. All that I beg even in this State is only that I may not Suffer upon the Credit of Proofs Extorted by Torment: but let me rather be put to the Teſt, either of Fire, Screws, or what Other Inſtruments of Cruelty you ſhall think fit; without any Mercy to a Miſerable Carcaſs: for if I am a Parricide, no Pain can be too much for me. Antipater deliver'd theſe Words with ſuch a Paſſion of Tears and Outcries, that the Whole Court, Varus and all, were ſoften'd at it. Herod alone was ſo Tranſported with a Senſe of the Wickedneſs, and the Clearneſs of the Evidence, that all Antipater's Tears and Ejulations paſs'd with Him only for Matters of Courſe.

Nicolaus very Severe upon Antipater.

This Declamation of Antipater's was follow'd by Nicolaus; who prefac'd what he had to ſay, with a Diſcourſe upon the Craft of Antipater, as the King had Order'd: which, upon the Main, amounted to a Mortal Accuſation without leaving him any Hope of Mercy. For all the Iniquities of the Kingdom were Imputed to Antipater; eſpecially the Deſtruction of the Brothers, which was manifeſtly the Effect of his Calumnies: beſide his Practices upon the Survivors, as Standing in the Way of his Preferment. And it could not be expected, that He that could think of Poyſoning his Father would ever Spare his Brothers. When he came to the Proof of the Poyſon, the Evidences were produ'd in Order; with Aggravations upon the Crime of Pheroras, and Antipater all this while the Promoter of the Wickedneſs: the King's Beſt Friends Corrupted, and the Whole Palace fill'd with Lewdneſs. This he ſaid, with a great deal more to the ſame Purpoſe, and ſo Concluded.

The Evidences of the Poyſon Produc'd in Order.

In the Next Place, Varus call'd upon Antipater to Anſwer for Himſelf; who ſaid no more then that God was the Witneſs of his Innocence, and ſo laid himſelf down in Silence. Varus then call'd for the Poyſon, and gave a Draught of it to a Condemn'd Perſon; who dy'd immediately. He had afterward ſome Private Diſcourſe with Herod; Tranſmitted the Proceeding to Cæſar, and ſo Departed the next Day. The King kept Antipater in Chains, and gave Cæſar an Account of the Proſecution.

Antipater in a Plot with Achme againſt Salome.

Antipater was Charg'd, after this, with a Treacherous Deſign upon Salome: for a Servant of Antiphilus, at his Return from Rome, brought the King a Letter from one Acme that waited upon the Empreſs: wherein ſhe gave him to Underſtand that finding ſeveral Letters from Salome to Julia, among her Miſtreſſes Papers, ſhe thought it might be a good Office privately to ſend him the Papers. Now theſe Letters were Stuffed with the moſt Virulent Scandals and Reproaches upon the King that could be Invented: and all of Antipater's Contrivance; and Acme only Employ'd as an Inſtrument, for a Sum of Money to Convey them to Herod. And the Thing was made yet more Evident by Another Letter to Antipater from the ſame Woman, in theſe very Words. [I have written to Your Father, according to Your Direction; and I have likewiſe ſent him Other Letters. You may depend upon it that the King will never forgive his Siſter after the Reading of them. Pray take care, when I have done my Part, that You do not forget Your Promiſe.

Herod grows Sad upon it;

Upon the Detecting of this Forgery, and other Subornations againſt Salome, Herod grew extreamly Sad, and Penſive, to think how narrowly Salome had Scap'd the Snare of Antipater: and it would not out of his Head but that Alexander Himſelf, for ought he knew, might be taken-off too by ſuch Another Impoſture: So that he took-up a Peremptory Reſolution, without any more delay, to do Juſtice upon Antipater in the Name of the Whole Family. But in this very nick of time, Herod was diverted by a Sudden Fit of Sickneſs from the Execution of it. He ſent Cæſar however an Account of Acme's part in the Intrigue, and the Treacherous Practices againſt Salome. He alter'd his Will upon it; Struck Antipater out of it, and Subſtituted Antipas in his Place: taking no Notice of Archelaus, and Philip, though the Elder Brothers, upon the Suggeſtions of Antipater. He bequeath'd to Cæſar, beſide Other Conſiderations in Money by the By, a Thouſand Talents: and to the Empreſs, her Sons, Friends, and Freemen about Fifty Talents more; with Lands, and Conſiderable Bounties to Others. He gave alſo to his Siſter Salome Legacies to a Mighty Value. This was all Settled accordingly by his Laſt Will.

And Reſolves to ſee Juſtice immediately done upon Antipater.

Herod falls Sick in that Inſtant, and prevents the Execution.

He Strikes Antipater out of his Will, and puts Antipas in his Place.

He Settles his Legacies.

The Miſery of Herod, both in Body and Mind.

HErod, betwixt Age, Sickneſs, and Grief, grew every Day Weaker and Weaker. He was now Threeſcore and Ten, and ſo Inconſolably Afflicted about the Death of his Sons, that in his Beſt Health he had no Joy even in Life it Self. He was at this time very Ill; but the Thought of Antipater's being ſtill Alive, was yet the moſt Senſible Part of his Trouble: for his Head ran upon Nothing ſo much as the Appointment of Antipater's Execution, ſo ſoon as ever he ſhould find himſelf in Condition to Order it. And An Outragious Tumult.

Upon the Neck of theſe Calamities, there happen'd a New Broil upon a Popular Tumult: and the Two Heads of it were Judas the Son of (a) Sephoræus, and Matthias the Son of (b) Margalus: Two Sophiſts, Famous for their Skill in the Laws, and conſequently of Great Reputation among the People. They were mightily follow'd by the Younger Sort, and their Lectures daily Throng'd and Crouded with Numerous Congregations. When theſe Rabbies found the King languiſhing, betwixt Anguiſh of Thought, and Diſtemper; they brake it one to another how fit a Time that might be to Vindicate the Honour of God, in the Demoliſhing of all Works whatſoever Erected contrary to his Holy Laws: and to take This along with them, that the Setting up of Images in the Temple, or the Likeneſs of any Living Creature, was abſolutely Forbidden. Now this was Underſtood to point at the Golden Eagle that Herod had plac'd upon the Great Gate; and ſo ſet the Multitude at work preſently to pluck it down, as the moſt Glorious Hazzard they could run, for their Laws and their Country, even if they ſhould Die in the Attempt; for ſuch an End would be follow'd with Everlaſting Life and Happineſs, and with Immortal Honour: Whereas none but Narrow Groveling Souls, and Pittyful Short-Sighted Creatures, would rather chuſe to Die in their Beds of a Diſeaſe, then Fall a Sacrifice to Religion and Virtue. While this Humour was a-working, came the Surprizing News all on a ſudden that the King was juſt upon the Point of Death: This made the Rabble Bolder, and more Outrageous then before: inſomuch that they Mounted the Temple at Noon-day; and letting down themſelves with Ropes and Axes, cut the Golden Eagle to pieces: a Huge Multitude of People in the Temple looking on. The Captain of the Guards had no ſooner Notice of this Uproar, but he fell-in among them preſently with a Party; Seiz'd about Forty of the (c) Forwardeſt, and Carr'yd them away to the King. [Are You ſo Inſolent, ſays Herod, as to break down the Golden Eagle? They told him Yes, they had done it. By what Order, ſays Herod again? By the Laws of our Country, they cry'd. Well! ſays he, And what makes you ſo Chearful now when you are ſure to Die? We are Chearful, ſaid they, in the Aſſurance of a Better Life after This. The King was ſo Mov'd at this Behaviour, that his Anger put New Life into him, and made him in ſome Meaſure forget his Diſeaſe. He call'd them over and over Sacrilegious, and Seditious Miſcreants, under a Colour of Law to Attempt the Over-turning of the Government! But, ſays he, like a Company of Wicked Creatures you have behav'd Your Selves, and like ſuch you ſhall be Puniſh'd. The People were affraid the Severity might go too far, and therefore made it their Requeſt to Herod, that he would Content himſelf with Juſtice upon the Ring-leaders, and the Priſoners, and ſhew Mercy to the reſt. The King was at laſt prevail'd upon, and Order'd Thoſe that came down by the Ropes and the (d) Two Heads of the Faction to be burn'd Alive: and Thoſe that were taken together, to have their Heads Struck-off by the Common Hang-man.

Judas and Matthias, Two Popular Stickers, the Heads of it.

They Tamper the People into an Uproar againſt Herod's Golden Eagle.

In this Inſtant comes News that Herod was given over.

The Rabble grows Bolder upon't, and cuts the Golden Eagle to Pieces.

The Guards Maſter the Faction, and carry their Priſoners to the King.

The People Reaſon the Matter with Herod.

A Strange Complication of Diſeaſes.

Herod by this time was all over in pain from Head to Foot: a Violent Fever; an Intolerable Itching all over his Body; Gripes of the Cholique; Dropſical Humours; Windy Pains in his Stomach; his Privy Parts Putrify'd, and crawling with Worms; Difficulty of Breathing; Broken Sighs; Contraction of the Nerves, and Convulſions all over. Some were Superſtitious enough to make this Calamity a Judgment upon him, in Revenge for the (a) Two Rabbies: but yet notwithſtanding all the Torments and Diſeaſes he had to Struggle with, he was ſtill ſo Deſirous of Life, that in this very Extremity he ſought for New Remedies, and Cheriſh'd ſome Hope yet of his Recovery. He croſs'd the Jordan, and try'd the Warm Baths of Callirhoe that run into the Lake Aſphalitis; a Water not only Medicinal, but Pleaſant to the Taſte. His Phyſicians then adviſ'd him to a Bath of Warm Oyl; but upon dipping into the Veſſel he loſt his Senſes, and his Eyes were ſet in his Head. This laſt Fit was ſo Ghaſtly, that his Keepers brake all-out into a Clamour at the Fright; ſo that the very Outcry brought him a little to himſelf again. But at laſt when he found that there was no Hope, he Order'd the Soldiers Fifty Drachma's a Man, and Mony to a Great Value to be divided betwixt his Governours and his Friends.

Herod tries ſeveral Remedies and Phyſitians, but to no purpoſe.

When he came back to Jericho, and found his Caſe Deſperate, he did in a manner threaten Death it ſelf by one of the moſt Dreadful Reſolutions that ever was heard of: the raging Violence of his Choler having put him directly into a Flame. He ſent out an Order quite through Judæa, for the Seizing of all the Nobility, and ſhutting them up in the Circus, or Hippodrome. Upon this, he ſpake to Salome, and her Husband Alexas. [I know very well, ſays he, that the Jews will make Holiday of the Day of my Death; but I ſhall take Care not to want Mourners, or a Splendid Pomp of Funeral Solemnities, if You Two will but follow my Direction. Let it be Your Care then, ſo ſoon as ever the Breath is out of my Body, to ſee the Soldiers turn'd looſe upon the Perſons in the Circus, and put Every Man of them to the Sword. Now this will be a Certain Way to make the Whole Province of Judæa, and Every Particular Family in it, True Mourners for my Death.

Herod leaves a Bloudy Order with Salome and Alexas.

Juſt upon the Diſpatch of this Order, Herod's Deputies brought him Letters from Rome, that Cæſar had Order'd Acme, the Servant of Julia, to be put to Death; and that Antipater was alſo Condemn'd to Die: but the Letters ſaid withal, that if his Father ſhould think fit to content himſelf with Baniſhment, Cæſar would not be againſt it. Herod, for the preſent, was ſomewhat reliev'd by this Meſſage: but then Relapſing into his Pains (as he was at that time afflicted with a Tearing Cough) he had ſome thought of laying Violent Hands upon himſelf: and ſo took an Apple and call'd for a Knife, as if it had been only to Cut or to Pare it. After he had look'd a little about him for fear of being taken Notice of, he rais'd his Hand with the Action of a Man about to Stab himſelf: but his Nephew Achiab perceiving it, ran up to him, and Catching hold of him, prevented the Miſchief.

Letters from Rome of Achme's being put to Death, and Antipater Condemn'd to Die.

Herod, in the Horrour of his Pains, Attempts to Kill himſelf.

There was preſently, upon this, a Hubbub rais'd in the Palace, on a Report that the King was Dead. Antipater was Overjoy'd at the Hearing of it, and had the Confidence to Treat with his Keepers for a Sum of Money to let him go; but the Head-Officer did not only refuſe to Comply with the Propoſal, but went in that Inſtant to the King with the Story: who, upon the Hearing of it, burſt out into an Exclamation ſtronger then one would have expected from a Man in his Condition: and thereupon Order'd his Guards to go out that Moment and Diſpatch him, and to ſee his Body Depoſited in the Caſtle of Hyrcanion. Upon this he alter'd his Teſtament once more, and declar'd the Eldeſt Brother Archelaus his Succeſſor in the place of Antipas, and made Antipas a Tetrarch.

A Report in the Palace that Herod was Dead. Antipater Treats with his Keepers upon it, about an Eſcape. The King Orders his Guards to Diſpatch him immediately, And makes Archelaus his Succeſſor inſtead of Antipas.

The Father dy'd Five Days after the Son, 34 Years from the Death of Antigonus, and 37 Years after he was Declar'd King by the Romans. He was a Fortunate Man as ever liv'd, ſaving the Troubles in his Own Family. He was Advanced to the Crown out of a Private State. He kept it a long time, and at laſt left it to his Sons.

The Death of Herod. Salome and Alexas Diſappointed Herod's Cruel Order.

The Soldiers knew nothing as yet of the King's Death: ſo that Salome went out before-hand with her Husband to the Hippodrome, and Order'd all the People to be ſet at Liberty that were ſhut up there; (though appointed for Death) and Every Man Diſmiſs'd to his Own Home. This was upon a Pretence that Herod had chang'd his Mind. So ſoon as the Company was gone, Publication was made of the King's Death to the Soldiery: who being then drawn together into a Body at the Amphitheatre of Jericho; Ptolemey, the Keeper of the Royal Signet, entertain'd them with a Speech in Honour of the Deceas'd: whom he Celebrated for a Fortunate Prince, Condoling at the ſame time with the People for ſo Senſible a Loſs. After this, he read over a Letter to them that Herod had left for the Soldiers, being a Paſſionate Recommendation of his Succeſſor to the Tenderneſs and Good Will of the People. After this Letter, he read the Will: wherein Philip was declar'd Heir of Tracon, and the Neighbourhood to it: Antipas, Tetrarch, (as I ſaid before) and Archelaus to Inherit the Kingdom. Herod gave Order for the Delivery of his Ring alſo to Cæſar, and to preſent him with the Knowledge of the Whole Matter: for there was Nothing to be done, Diſpos'd of, or Confirm'd, but by Cæſar's Authority and Direction: and for the reſt, the Former Teſtament to ſtand as it was.

Herod's Will Read.

This was follow'd by an Unanimous Shout of Gratulations and Acclamations, with a [Long Live Archelaus.] Both Soldiers and People preſſing-in with their Good Wiſhes and Prayers. The next Work was to be the Enterring of the Body: wherein Archelaus ſpar'd neither for Coſt nor Care; and all the Enſigns of Royalty were made uſe of for the Pomp and Ornament of the Funeral. The Herſe was cover'd all over with an Embrodery of Gold and Pretious Stones, and an Intermixture of Purple: and upon this was the Body laid, and Cover'd with Purple too: a Diadem upon the Head: a Crown of Gold over that: a Scepter in his Right-hand, and his Children and near Relations round about him: the Guards and the Thracian Troops, Germans and Gauls, March'd in the Head of this Solemnity; in a Form and Order of Battle: All the reſt of the Troups following their Leaders alſo in very Good Order. And now to Cloſe up the Pomp; Five Hundred Officers, Demeſtiques, and Free, brought up the Train. The Body was carry'd 200 Stadia to the Caſtle of Herodion: where it was Bury'd according to the King's Mandate. And this was the End of Herod.

The Ceremony of Mourning and Feasting in the Case of Archelaus.

THE Necessity of Archelaus's going to Rome upon the Death of Herod prov'd the Occasion of New Troubles. For after the Ceremony of the Seven-Days Mourning was Over, and the People Magnificently Feasted (a Custom among the Jews that ruines many a Man with the Expence, for fear of being thought Impious in the Neglect.) Archelaus, I say, after This Solemnity advanced all in White up to the Temple; where the People Joy'd him with Large Expressions of Reverence and Respect: and He himself from a Stately Tribunal, and his Throne of Gold, shew'd as much Grace and Humanity to the People.

His Gracious Declaration in favour of the People.

He gave them Thanks for the Care they had taken of his Father's Funeral, and for the Royal Honours they had now paid to Himself, as to an Anoynted King. But yet, says he, till Cæsar, the Declar'd Lord and Master of all, shall have Confirm'd the Succession, I shall not Entitle my self so much as to the Name, and much Less to the Power and Authority of a King. This was it, that, when the Army would have set the Crown upon my Head at Jericho, made me refuse it at Their Hands: though, says he, I shall never forget the Kindness and the Hearty Good Will, both of the Soldiers, and of the People, when ever I shall come to be possess'd of Regal Power from Him that hath a Right to Confer it: and let them depend upon it, says he, that they shall find me upon all Occasions readier to Oblige them then ever they found my Father.

The Multitude brake-out into unreasonable Demands.

The Multitude was mightily pleas'd with this Declaration, and in the same Instant put him to some sort of Tryal how far he would be as good as his Word. They ply'd him with several Petitions: some to have their Taxes Eas'd; Others to have them wholly taken off; and some again for a Discharge of Prisoners: but upon the whole Matter, Archelaus deny'd them Nothing. This being over, he Sacrific'd, and Feasted with his Friends.

Archelaus Sacrifices, and Treats his Friends.

The Common People began upon the Subject of Grievances.

A Little after noon, there were gotten together a Rabble of Male-Contents; and not One Word more upon the Subject of the Common Mourning for the Death of the King: But they began now to Open upon the People's Grievances. It was hard, they said, for Herod to put People to Death for cutting down the Golden Eagle from the Gate of the Temple; and This was not a Discontent in Secret neither; but what with beating of Breasts, Lamentations, and Impetuous Outcries for the Loss of so many Good Men that effectually dy'd Martyrs for the Religion and Laws of their Country, the whole City rang of the Clamour. We Demand Justice, they cry'd, upon Herod's Mercenaries, the Accursed Instruments that Executed this Wickedness. Wherefore, in the First Place, let Herod's High-Priest be turn'd out, and a Man of more Piety and Integrity put in his Place.

Archelaus

Archelaus was tranſported at this to the Uttermoſt Degree of Indignation; but being in haſt upon his Journey, he was not at leiſure then to wait for a Revenge: ſo that for fear of loſing his Opportunity one way, and leaving a Tumult behind him the other, he thought it more Adviſable to deal with them by Admonition and Fair Words, then by Violence. Upon This, he ſent his Maſter of the Horſe to deſire them to be Quiet; but the Heads of the Sedition, ſo ſoon as ever he came-up to the Temple, fell to pelting him with Stones, without hearing him ſpeak one Word. Archelaus ſent, after him, ſeveral other Meſſengers upon the ſame Errand, and they all Far'd alike: inſomuch that they wanted but Number to make it a Downright Rebellion.

Archelaus finding there was no dealing with them by Force, ſends his Officers to Quiet them by Fair Words.

An Uproar little ſhort of a Rebellion.

The Feaſt of Unleavened Bread was now at hand; the Jews call it their Paſſover. This Feſtival gave an Occaſion for Sacrifices in abundance, and brought a World of People up to the City upon the Account of Religion: Divers of the Faction of the Two Sophiſts among the reſt, who came thither to lament the Death of thoſe pretended Patriots, and there they ſtood their Ground; wayting for Matter to Enflame their Party, would not be got out of the Temple.

The Feaſt of the Paſſover. And a Violent Tumult upon that Occaſion.

Archelaus had the Foreſight to ſend a Band of Soldiers and a Tribune, with Orders to ſeize their Principals, if they ſhould be Troubleſom: And This he did to Obviate the Danger of a General Tumult. The Multitude made Head againſt this Party; ſome they Kill'd with Stones, and the Tribune himſelf came-off ſorely wounded; the Mutineers going as innocently back again to their Devotions, as if Nothing had been. Archelaus finding to his Coſt that this Tumult was not to be Compos'd without Bloud, turn'd the whole Army looſe upon them; the Foot in the City, and the Horſe before the Walls. The Foot fell upon them, even in the Act of Sacrificing, and Kill'd near Three thouſand of their Men at the very Altar. The Remainder fled to the Mountains; and Archelaus cauſing Proclamation to to be made for all People to depart to their own Homes, put an end to the Feſtival.

The Multitude worſted the Guards.

Till the Army fell in and Routed the whole Body.

This Sedition being Suppreſs'd, Archelaus with his Mother and his Three Particular Friends, Poplas, Ptolemey, and Nicolaus, took Shipping together for Rome; leaving Philip behind him, both as his Viceroy, and as a Truſtee to Menage his Particular Eſtate. Salome with her Children went along with him, together with the Sons of the King's Brothers, and others of the Kin'red, under a pretext of Aſſiſting Archelaus toward the gaining of the Succeſſion: but upon the Truth of the Matter, their Bus'neſs was to call him to an Account for the Violation of the Holy Temple.

Archelaus, upon this, takes Shipping for Rome. And leaves Philip to Act in his Stead.

As they were upon the way, they met with Sabinus, the Governour of Syria, at Cæſarea; who was then going into Judæa, to take Poſſeſſion of the Monies that Herod had left behind him; but Varus, at the Inſtance of Archelaus, and upon the Mediation of Ptolemey, put a ſtop to his Journey: ſo that Sabinus, for Varus's Sake, neither meddled with the Caſtles, nor with the Money, to the Prejudice of Archelaus; and paſs'd his Promiſe, that he would do nothing in it, but with Cæſar's Approbation; and upon that Account ſtay'd at Cæſarea. But yet ſo ſoon as Varus was gone for Antioch, and Archelaus for Rome, Sabinus, upon the Removing of theſe Obſtacles, took his time to go to Jeruſalem, where he lodg'd himſelf in the Palace, and ſent from thence to the Governours of the Caſtles, and the Officers of the Treaſury, to put the One into his Hands, and give him an Account of the Other. But the Officers were ſo Juſt to the Orders and Inſtructions of Archelaus, that they kept Touch with him to a Tittle, and put off Sabinus with this Anſwer, that they were Cæſar's Officers, not Archelaus's. Antipas, at the ſame time, put in for the Kingdom too; inſiſting upon it, that the Former Teſtament was the Better Will of the Two; and the Succeſſion in That Teſtament was ſettled upon Antipas: and he was ſure to have the Intereſt of Salome and Others of their Relations that ſail'd with Archelaus, toward the Supporting of that Pretence. He carry'd his Mother with him, and Ptolemey, the Brother of Nicolaus, and a Try'd Friend of Herod's; which went a great way in that Caſe; for there were no two Men Dearer then They: but the Perſon that he chiefly depended upon was Irenæus, a ſharp Man, and an Excellent Orator. Antipas reckon'd himſelf ſo ſure in the Strength of theſe Seconds, that whoever adviſ'd him to any ſort of Deference, either to the Seniority of Archelaus, or to the Authority of his Father in his Second Teſtament, he would ſcarce afford him the Hearing. When they came to Rome, all the Enemies of Archelaus were ſure to joyn with Antipas: Thoſe eſpecially that had a Mind to ſhake-off the Yoke of Government, or at leaſt to be under a Roman Magiſtracy; and in Caſe they could not Obtain that, they would have Antipas for their King.

Sabinus was now at Cæſarea on his way for Judæa. But Varus put a Stop to his Buſineſs, and his Journey.

Antipater, the Son of Salome, (a Nimble Orator, and a Bitter Enemy to Archelaus) Open'd the Cauſe: Suggeſting, in the firſt Place, That Archelaus had long ſince Exercis'd Sovereign Authority in Effect, and that it was, now, but Matter of Form to Contend about the Name. For what ſignifies a Hearing before Cæſar, to him that has already refus'd him for a Judge? For Herod was no ſooner Dead, but People were immediately Engag'd, and Suborn'd to ſet the Crown upon his Head; while He himſelf did not only ſit like a King in a Royal State, and upon a Golden Throne, but Act like One too; as in changing the Order of the Militia; diſpoſing of Charges; receiving and granting Petitions; exerciſing the Power of Life and Death in Publique Crimes; ſetting his Father's Priſoners at Liberty, &c. which are all Regal Privileges. Now for this Perſon that has already Engroſs'd to himſelf the Powers and Enſigns of Royalty, to come to Cæſar only for the Title of it, makes Auguſtus but a Shadow of a Prince, and a King in Sound, not in Effect.

Antipater Opens the Cauſe againſt Archelaus.

And then further, ſays Antipater, what's all the Clutter Archelaus makes, with the Solemnity of his Mourning Weeds, and his ſower Faces, for his Dead Father, more then a Part in a Play? He looks ſorrowfully all day, and then ſits-up Fuddling and Feaſting, and making Merry all night. And what was it at laſt, but the Deteſtation the People had for this Hypocriſy, that rais'd the late Sedition! But the main Streſs of the Charge was yet to come; which was, A Horrible Slaughter about the Temple. It was a Feſtival-Day; the People gather'd together to Worſhip, and pay their Devotions; and They themſelves were made the Sacrifice Their Throats, in ſhort, were Cut, and ſuch Heaps of Dead Bodies pil'd up in the Temple, as in the moſt Implacable and Mercyleſs of Forreign Wars was hardly ever heard of. Now Herod was ſo well Acquainted with the Cruelty of This Man's Nature, that it was almoſt Impoſſible for him ever to give him the leaſt Hope of a Crown, ſo long as he was in his Right Senſes. And that alaſs! was the King's Caſe in the latter Teſtament: his Mind was more out of Order then his Body; and he did not know what he did. Beſide, that after all this, there was no Diſability or Defect charg'd upon Antipas the Succeſſor by the former Will; but People gave him the Character of a Prince every way Qualify'd for the Royal Function. Or what if it ſhould be ſuppoſed now, that Herod was, in truth, ſound and in his right Senſes? Archelaus has as good as Abdicated the Royal Dignity by Acting againſt the Laws of the Conſtitution. What Havock would this Young Man make now, if he had Cæſar's Authority to cover him in his Cruelties, that does all this upon his own Account without any Power at all?

Antipater ſpake abundantly to this Effect, and a great many near Relations of Archelaus gave Evidence againſt him to the ſeveral Points. When Antipater had now finiſh'd his Plea for the Plaintiff, up-ſtood Nicolaus for the Defendent: who, in the firſt place, made it appear, That the Slaughter Committed in the Temple was not only of Abſolute Neceſſity, but the People that were kill'd were Cæſar's Enemies. He ſhew'd likewiſe, That for the other pretended Crimes, the Preſent Oppoſers of Archelaus were themſelves the Adviſers of them. As to the Validity of the ſecond Teſtament, he argu'd, That it ought to ſtand, in regard that Herod had at that time the Conſideration and Reſpect to refer the Confirmation of it to Cæſar. Now he that had the Judgment to know the Right Lord and Maſter, had certainly Senſe enough to oppoint the Right Heir.

Nicolaus for the Defendent.

With theſe Words Nicolaus Concluded his Argument, and Archelaus then Stepp'd-out on a ſudden and caſt himſelf at Cæſar's Feet; who took him preſently up again with ſo Singular a Grace of Benignity and Reſpect, that he gave to underſtand by it, he thought him worthy to Succeed his Father; but no Poſitive Reſolution taken at that time.

Archelaus caſts himſelf at Cæſar's Feet, who Receives him Graciouſly.

This being done, Cæſar Diſmis'd the Council for that day, and enter'd into a Deliberation with his Friends what was to be done in the Caſe: whether to chooſe any of Thoſe that were in the Will, for a Succeſſor, or to make an equal Partition of the Principallity among the whole Family: for they were Numerous, and it would require a Great Expence to Maintain them all with Honour.

And ſo Adjourns the Court.

BEfore Cæſar came to any Reſolution upon the Succeſſion, Malthace the Mother of Archelaus Sicken'd and Dy'd. At This time there came Letters from Varus, out of Syria, of a Revolt among the Jews; which Varus foreſeeing, went up to Jeruſalem upon Archelaus's Journey to Rome, to reſtrain the Incendiaries, and to keep Things Quiet. When he found This would not Do, and that the Multitude was ſtill Unruly, he Quarter'd one of the Three Legions he brought out of Syria, in the City; and ſo went back again to Antioch. The Jews in an Uproar.

But when Sabinus came afterward to Jeruſalem, he furniſhed the Jews with New Matter to Work upon. For finding himſelf Enforc'd with Varus's Troups, beſide a Band of his Domeſtiques that were all Arm'd, and within Call, to ſerve the Turn of his Violence and Avarice; his Deſign was to get the Caſtles, and Herod's Moneys into his Hands, by Force and Menace, upon the Governours and other Officers that had them in Charge. It was now the Feaſt of Pentecoſt, or the Fiftieth Day: ſo call'd from the Term of the Revolution after Seven times ſeven Days. The People gather'd together in Prodigious Numbers, not ſo much for Religion, as for Spite and Indignation: a World out of Gallilee, Idumæa, Jericho, and the Country beyond Jordan, with the Inhabitants of Judæa; that for Number and Courage were more Conſiderable then the reſt. They divided into Three Bodies, and Pitch'd their Tents in Three Quarters: One upon the North of the Temple; Another upon the South, toward the Hippodrome; and the Third to the Weſtwarſt of the Palace. So that the Romans were now Beſet.

Sabinus Enflames the Quarrel.

The Feaſt of Pentecoſt.

The People come flocking up to it from all Quarters.

The Manner of the Jews Drawing-up.

Sabinus's Heart began to fail him, betwixt the Courage, and the Number of the Enemies: ſo that he preſs'd Varus, by One Meſſenger upon the Heel of Another, to bring him Relief immediately, or All would be Loſt elſe. He ſhifts for Himſelf however, and gets into the Tower of the Caſtle that Commands all the reſt; which takes it's Name from Phaſael the Brother of Herod, that was ſlain by the Parthians. Sabinus, from This Tower, gave a Signal to the Legionaries to break-in upon the Enemy: but He had not the Heart Himſelf to lead-on the very Men that he was to Command. The Romans, according to their Order, made a Deſperate Attempt upon the Temple, and it came to a very Bloudy Fight: but ſo long as the Jews had no Help from above, either with Darts or Arrows; the Romans, being the Better Soldiers, had the Advantage of the Jews. But when the Jews afterward came to get poſſeſſion of the Galleries, and to gall the Romans from Over-Head, there were Abundance of them Kill'd, and at the ſame time out of diſtance to take their Revenge: But Hand to Hand, they would have been much too hard for them.

Sabinus preſſes Varus for Relief.

And takes Sanctuary in the Tower of Phaſael.

An Aſſault given to the Temple, and a Bloudy Fight upon it.

The Jews gall the Romans from the Galleries above.

Upon This Pinch, the Romans put Fire to the Galleries; which, for the Workmanſhip, Proportions, and Ornament, were every way Incomparable. There were Abundance of the Jews that periſh'd in the Fire: Some cut-off by the Enemy upon their Fall; Others puſh'd off from the Battlements; and ſome again, in Deſpair, Choſe rather to Dye by the Sword, then by the Fire, and laid Violent Hands upon Themſelves. Thoſe that made any Attempt upon the Romans from the Walls, were deſtroy'd without any Difficulty; till at laſt, when they were either Kill'd or Scatter'd, the Soldiers made a Booty of the Holy Treaſure; carrying off Four Hundred Talents, and leaving the Remainder to Sabinus, all but what was Carry'd away by Stealth.

The Soldiers Pillage the Holy Treaſure.

This Loſs of Men and Treaſure brought-on an Enforcement of a more Dangerous Body of Jews upon the Romans then the Other, both for Valour and Number. They ſummon'd the Palace, and ſat down before it, with a Menace of giving no Quarter unleſs they immediately quitted it, and offering Sibinus liberty to depart with with his Legion, and what other Troups he had about him, if he thought fit: as there were a great many Court-Volunteers; and Three Thousand Men of Sebaste; (the Braveſt Fellows Herod had in his Army.) Theſe were Commanded by Rufus and Gratus: Rufus a Horſe-Officer; and Gratus, a Foot: Both of them Men of Mettle and Conduct: and a Conſiderable Advantage to the Parties they ſided with, even in their Single Perſons. The Jews ſtill preſs'd the Siege; and Attempted the Walls of the Caſtle; calling out to Sabinus all the while to quit and be gone, without Oppoſing himſelf any longer to the Reſolution they had taken of Recovering their Liberties. Sabinus would willingly have gone off, if he durſt have Truſted them; but their Civility look'd ſo like a Snare, that he ſuſpected it: and therefore, in the Hope of Relief from Varus, he ſtood the Siege.

Rufus and Gratus, Two Eminent Officers.

Judæa was at That time all over in Tumults, and Pretenders of all ſorts wayting for an Opportunity to break-in upon the Government: as there were gotten together a Band of Two Thouſand Veterans in Idumæa, that had formerly ſerv'd under Herod. They were well Arm'd and Appointed, and had ſeveral Encounters with the King's Troups: with Achiab, Herod's Kinſman, in particular; who had often to do with them upon Sallies out of Wall'd Towns, but in the Plain Field he was not able to deal with them.

Judæa all over in Factions and Broils.

In Sephoris of Gallilee there was One Judas, the Son of Hezekias, (the Famous Captain of the Robbers that was formerly taken by Herod:) This Judas had at That time gather'd together a Conſiderable Body of Men; forcing the King's Magazines, and Arming Himſelf and his Companions out of thoſe Stores: ſetting himſelf againſt all Oppoſers, and Extremely haraſſing the Country.

The Perſon, and Exploits of Judas the Son of Hezekias, the Great Robber.

There was Then alſo on the Other ſide of the River, One Simon, formerly a Domeſtique of Herod's. He was a Man of a Huge Size and Stature; a Robuſt Body; and of ſo Exact a Symetry, that nothing could be more Graceful in the Proportions of One Part to Another. He had at his Heels a parcel of Thieves, and went up and down roving with a Crown upon his Head, burning and laying Waſt wherever he came: as at Jericho, he ſet Fire to the King's Palace there, and laid ſeveral Glorious Buildings in Aſhes round about it; where, with much Eaſe, he made himſelf Maſter of a very Rich Booty. He was in a Fair way to have gone thorough with his Work, and made a Clear Country of it; if Gratus that commanded the King's Foot had not brought his Bow-men from Trachon, and a Brave Body of Sebaſtens, ſeaſonably-in to their Relief. In ſhort they fought, and Simon was Worſted; a Great part of his Foot cut-off, and Himſelf put to the Rout; but as he was upon his Flight a-croſs a Steep Bottom, Gratus Gain-cop'd him, and with a Blow athwart the Neck and Shoulders cut him down. This was the End of Simon. But there was Another Gang yet of the ſame ſort of People that were gotten together about (a) Amathus and the Borders of Jordan; which laid all the Palaces in Rubbiſh thereabouts.

Simon formerly a Servant of Herod's.

There was alſo at That time a Certain Shepherd, whoſe Name was (b) Athronges; who had the Confidence to ſet-up for a King. He had a Body to Execute any Thing, and ſo daring a Reſolution that he feared neither Danger nor Death it ſelf: ſo that in the Strength of This Impulſe he would run all Hazards. He had for his Seconds Four Brothers like himſelf, that ſerv'd him for his Officers, both of War and Councel. They had every Man his Troup, and with Theſe Parties he made his Incurſions. When he was upon any Bus'neſs of Moment, he ſat Mounted on his Throne, with a Crown upon his Head; pronouncing Judgment, and giving his Orders like a very King indeed. At This rate the Five Brothers went-on for ſome time, ſpoiling the Country, and deſtroying whatever ſtood in their Way: The Romans in the Firſt place, and the Kings Troups; Nay, and the Jews Themſelves, wherever they could make a Booty of them. There was a Convoy one day with Corn and Arms that the Romans were carrying to one of their Legions. Theſe Free-Booters met them by (c) Emmaus, and Fought them: they Kill'd Arius the Centurion, and ſome Forty of his Beſt Men, and they had been all Loſt, if Gratus with his Sebaſtens had not come in the Nick of time to bring them-off. This Ravage went-on a good while with Great Spoil and Havock: and nothing came amiſs to them, either Natives or Strangers. But in the end, Three of the Brothers were taken; the Eldeſt, by Archelaus; and the Two Next, by Gratus and Ptolemey; A Fourth render'd himſelf to Archelaus, upon Conditions. This was the End of the Adventure of Theſe Five Men. But Judæa was at This time all over-run with a Pillaging, Plundering War.

Varus, being given to Underſtand from Sabinus and the Chief Officers at Jeruſalem, that the Legion there was in danger to be Loſt, he haſten'd away all that was poſſible to their Succour, and ſo March'd with the Two Other Legions he had under his Command, and Four Wings of Horſe, to Ptolemais; Ordering the King's and the Princes Auxiliaries to join him there at the Rendezvous. The People of Berytus brought him an Enforcement of Fifteen Hundred Men well Arm'd, in his Paſſage. Upon his coming to Ptolemais, Aretas the King of Arabia (being a Bitter Enemy of Herod's) joyn'd him with a Conſiderable Body of Horſe and Foot. When he had drawn up his Troups near Ptolemais, he ſent part of his Army into Gallilee, under the (a) Command of his Friend Gallus; who ſoon after Encounter'd a Party, and gave them a Total Rout; Enter'd the City of Sephoris, burnt it to the Ground, and made all the Inhabitants Slaves.

Varus carry'd his Army after This into Samaria; but ſpar'd the City, becauſe they had not Intermeddled in the Revolt. He Encamped at (b) Arus, a Village belonging to Ptolemey; which the Arabians deſtroy'd for no Other Reaſon but that he was a Friend to Herod: The Army advanc'd next to (c) Sappho, a Strong Place; which they Took, Rifl'd, and Pillag'd. He advanced from hence with his Army to Jeruſalem; where the Jews quitted the Siege upon the very Tidings of his Approach. Some ſhifted away into the Fields and the Woods; but the Citizens, on the Contrary, carry'd it Fair, and Welcom'd him into the Town. They had nothing to do, they ſaid, in the Sedition, but laid the Blame upon Others; and They were ſo far, from joining with the Mutineers, that they were as much blockt-up i'the Town Themſelves as the Romans. But it was a Great Day, and They could not hinder People from coming into the City. Joſeph the Nephew of Archelaus, with Rufus and Gratus the King's Generals, the Sebaſtenes, and the Roman Soldiers alſo in their Military Habit: Theſe, in the Firſt place, March'd all out of the Town to meet him. Sabinus durſt not look Varus in the face, and had ſlipt away ſome time before out of the Town to the Sea-ſide. Varus in the mean time diſpers'd his Troups up and down all over the Country, in ſearch of the Principal Authors of This Tumult. They took up great Numbers of them: and for Thoſe Sticklers that Varus found to be leaſt Malicious, he order'd them to be kept in Cuſtody; and for the reſt that were more Criminal, he cauſed near Two Thouſand of them to be Crucify'd.

Upon the Approach of Varus, the Jews quit the Siege in a Confuſion. The Citizens waſh their Hands of the Sedition, and complement Varus into the Town.

Varus had Intelligence yet once again of Ten Thouſand Jews in Arms about Idumæa; ſo that he immediately Diſcharg'd the Arabians, and ſent them home: for they did not Act as Men of Honour and Soldiers, but gave themſelves wholly-up to Spoil and Rapine, and laying the Country Waſt wherever they came, which was much againſt his Liking. Upon the receiving of This News, he put himſelf in the Head of his own Troups, and March'd directly againſt the Enemy: but before it came to Blows, they bethought themſelves, and, upon the Advice of Achiab, render'd and laid down their Arms. Varus was Eaſy to the Multitude, but ſent the Officers to Anſwer for Themſelves to Cæſar. After he had pardon'd ſome, finding ſeveral Kinſmen of Herod's in the Number, he proceeded againſt Them as Traytors for taking up Arms againſt their King. By this means, Varus accommodated Matters at Jeruſalem; and leaving the ſame Legion again in the City that he made uſe of before for their Guard, he return'd to Antioche.

Ant. l. 17. c. 11. WHile This paſs'd in Judæa, there happen'd Another Wrangle with the Jews at Rome, that put a further Delay to the Pretentions of Archelaus. There were Fifty Deputies that had been ſent to Rome from their Principals at Jeruſalem, before This Confuſion brake out, (and it was with Varus's Licence too.) Their Bus'neſs was to Petition Cæſar in the Name of the reſt, for a Free Liberty and Exerciſe of their Profeſſion: and there were Eight Thouſand Jews, Inhabitants of Rome, that went along with them in the Requeſt. Cæſar call'd a Council of the Roman Nobility, and of his Own Particular Friends, to meet in the Temple of Apollo upon the Mount-Palatine: a Structure of his Own Erecting, and as Rich and Curious as Coſt and Ornament could make it. The Council being Aſſembled, there was a Multitude of Jews and their Embaſſadors ranged on the One hand, and Archelaus with His Friends on the Other. The Kin'red kept themſelves upon the Guard of a kind of Diſcreet Neutrality: the Envy and Hatred they had for Archelaus would not ſuffer them to ſide with Him, and then they were aſham'd on the Other hand to take part with the Enemies of a Prince of the Bloud. Among Others, there was Philip the Brother of Archelaus, whom Varus ſent before, upon Two Friendly Accounts: the One, that he might be within diſtance of aſſiſting his Brother upon Occaſion; the Other, in caſe Auguſtus ſhould think fit, to divide the Government among the Children of Herod, he Himſelf might come-in for his Share.

Cæſar Calls a Council of Noblemen and Friends to Adviſe upon it.

The Jews and their Deputies on the One hand, Archelaus and his Friends on the Other.

The Accuſers were now to be Heard; and the Firſt Point in Queſtion was This: What had Herod done Contrary to the Law? It was then urg'd, That he never demean'd himſelf like a King; but on the Contrary, as the moſt Intolerable Tyrant upon the Face of the Earth. And his Cruelty did not ſtop neither at the Profuſion of Innocent Bloud, and the Violation of Juſtice: but he made the very Living wiſh themſelves Dead. And he did not only Tear the Bodies of his Subjects to pieces with Torments; but ſtript his Towns and Cities of All that was Choice and Pretious, and gave it away in Oſtentation to Forreigners: Sacrificing the very Lives alſo of the Jews to Strangers. Inſtead of the Bleſſings of our Ancient Laws and Liberties, he hath left his People nothing but Beggery and Iniquity in Exchange: inſomuch that they have ſuffer'd more Plagues ſince His coming to the Crown, then their Forefathers ever felt ſince their Deliverance from Xerxes, out of the Captivity of Babylon.

A Bloudy Invective of the Jews againſt Herod and his Sons.

But the Jews have been now ſo wonted to Slavery, that they are grown Modeſt and Patient under the Yoke, even to the degree of Entailing a Voluntary Servitude upon their Poſterity; in the Perſon of Archelaus, the Son of the late Tyrant: whom they ſaluted as King immediately upon the Death of his Father. They Mourn'd for Herod together, and Offer'd up their Joint Vows for the Long and Proſperous Reign of his Succeſſor. And then to put it out of doubt that he was the True Son of his Bloudy Father, he made his Auſpicious Entrance upon the Government, with the Slaughter of Three Thouſand Citizens: and the better to Entitle himſelf to the Succeſſion, This Butchery was his Oblation to God of Three Thouſand Victims: and All This upon a Holy Day, and the Carcaſſes pil'd-up in the Holy Temple.

What Wonder is it now for Men that have Outliv'd ſo many Miſeries, and ſcap'd ſo Dangerous a Rock, to Own their Averſion to This Man, and to Fall (if periſh they muſt) like Men of Honour with their Faces to the Enemy! All that the Jews deſire at the Hands of the Romans, is only that Cæſar will Judge the Wretched Remainder of them ſo far Worthy of Pity, as not to Expoſe them to the Rigour of their Mercileſs Oppreſſors: but rather to Annex Judæa to Syria, and range them under the Laws and Rules of the Roman Government. It will Then be ſeen whether the Jews are in truth ſo Turbulent and Seditious a ſort of People as they are given out to be; when they fall once into the Hands of Humane, and Temperate Governours. With This Prayer the Deputies clos'd their Charge.

Nicolaus,

Nicolaus, in his Reply, clear'd the Kings in the First place of the Crimes ſuggeſted againſt them, and ſo proceeded to a Character of the very Nation of the Jews: ſetting them forth to be a People Uneaſy under any Government, but Naturally Averſe to Kingſhip: Concluding his Diſcourſe with ſome Remarques upon the Relations of Archelaus, that joyn'd with his Accuſers. Nicolaus ſtands up in the Defence of Archelaus.

When Cæſar had heard Both ſides, he diſſolv'd the Court, and after ſome few days beſtow'd upon Archelaus One Half of the Kingdom under the Name of an Ethnarchy, and with a Promiſe to make him KING in a ſhort Time, if he found he deſerv'd it. The Other Half he divided into Two Tetrarchies; which he gave to Two other Sons of Herod: One, to Philip; the Other, to Antipas; who had had a Diſpute with Archelaus about the Sovereignty. There fell to His Share the Country beyond the River; and Gallilee, of Two Hundred Talents-yearly Value. But Bathanæa, Trachon, and Auranitis, and ſome part of the Land of (a) Zenon about Jamnia: This was aſſign'd to Philip, and yielded a Revenue of a Hundred Talents. There fell into Archelaus's Ethnarchy, Idumæa, All Judæa and Samaria; (b) which Laſt was Eas'd of a Fourth part of their Tribute, as a Reward for not Joyning in the Rebellion with their Neighbours. Straton's Tower, Sebaſte, Joppa, and (c) Jeruſalem, were all caſt into Archelaus's Lot: but Gaza, Gadara, and Hippon (Greek Cities) were detach'd from the Kingdom, and annexed to Syria. The Income, upon the Whole, to Archelaus, amounted to (d) Four Hundred Talents. Cæſar beſtow'd upon Salome, beſide what was left her by the King's Will, Jamnia, Azolas, and Phaſaelis: He gave her a Palace alſo at Askalon; which were valu'd in All at Sixty Talents: But her Palace was ſubjected to the Juriſdiction of the Ethnarchy. When Cæſar had Diſcharg'd all Herod's Legacies to his Kin'red, he gave to his Two Virgin-Daughters Five Hundred Thouſand pieces of Minted Money over and above, and Marry'd them to the Sons of Pheroras. But, in the End, upon the Diviſion of Herod's Patrimony, Cæſar made a Generous Diſtribution of a Thouſand Talents more, that were bequeath'd to Himſelf: reſerving only ſome Particular Things of Little Value, to keep by him in Memory of the Deceas'd. Cæſar hears the Cauſe; and ſoon after ſettles the Government; and ſees Herod's Will Executed.

CHAP. V.

A Counterfeit Alexander. The Manner of the Contrivance. The Method and Menage of the Cheat. The Impoſtor Detected, and Condemn'd to the Galleys. The Firſt Projector put to death.

AT This Time there ſtarted up a Certain Young Man, by Nation a Jew, and brought-up in Sydon, with the Free-Man of a Roman Citizen. This Man took upon him to perſonate Alexander, whom Herod put to Death; and went to Rome on purpoſe to ſet up the Impoſture. He had with him, for Countenance, and Councel, Another Jew, that was perfectly well Enform'd in the Train and Intrigues of Herod's Court. This Jew gave his Companion his Leſſon; which was, that the People that were Employ'd by his Father to put Himſelf and Ariſtobulus to death, had ſo Great a Compaſſion for them, that they ſubſtituted Other Bodies in their Places, and Convey'd the Brothers out of the Way. This paſs'd for Current with many Jews in Crete; who furniſh'd the Pretender there with Plentiful Supplies. He went from thence to Melos: where he was received again with ſtill more Honour and Bounty. Nay, and he carry'd the Matter ſo Fair too, that he took ſeveral of his Friends along with him to Rome. Upon his Arrival at (e) Puteoli, the Jews of the Place made him Magnificent Preſents: and his Father's Friends treated him all the while as a Sovereign Prince. The Wonderful Likeneſs, in fine, had got him ſuch Credit, that as many as had ſeen Alexander would not ſtick to Swear that This was the Man. The Story made ſuch a Noiſe in the World, that the Jews at Rome came all Flocking-in to ſee him: Nay the very Streets and Ways were Throng'd where he was to paſs. In ſhort, This Conceit ran ſo Strong in their Heads, that they carry'd him up and down in a Chair of State, and ſpar'd for Nothing either of Coſt or Reſpect that might ſort with his Pretence. Now

Now Cæſar calling to mind the Lines and Air of Alexander's Face: (whom he remember'd ever ſince he was before him upon Herod's Accuſation) he bethought himſelf of ſending One Celadus (who knew him as well as any Man) to fetch the Young Man to him; not but that Cæſar gave it for a Cheat all along: but however, for the Humour's ſake, ſomething was to be done in Form. Celadus found him out; and upon the Firſt ſight of him, concluded him to be a Counterfeit: but when he came to Conſider the Coarſneſs of his Skin, Shape, and Manner of Addreſs, his Suſpicion was Confirm'd beyond all Peradventure. The Thing indeed that mov'd Celadus the Moſt, was his Bold Way of Out-facing People. Asking about Ariſtobulus; he was very Well, he ſaid; but liv'd on purpoſe at Cyprus, to be out of Harmſway: for if they kept together, there would be more Danger of Miſchief by a Surprize. When Celadus had kept his Countenance thus far, he took him aſide, and told him plainly; This is All a Juggle, ſays he: Do but You diſcover the Author of This Contrivance, and Cæſar will give you your Own Life for your Pains. He promis'd him that he would, and ſo follow'd him to Cæſar: where he Nam'd the Jew that had put him upon it to get Mony by it. And, in Effect, the Sums that he rais'd from the Cities, upon this Phancy, were more then Alexander Himſelf could have Procur'd, if he had been Alive. The Menage was ſo Ridiculous that Cæſar could not but ſmile at it: and yet however in the End, he condemn'd the Falſe Alexander to a Galley; (as a Service that his Body was made for) and Commanded the Adviſer to be put to death: but for the Fooliſh People of Melos, They had pay'd Dear enough for their Madneſs, he thought, in the Expence; and ſo That Charge was their Puniſhment.

Archælaus Baniſh'd for his Oppreſſion, and his Goods ſeiz'd. A Foreboding Dream. The Dream Expounded and made Good. Another Dream, of the Princeſs Glaphyra's. Glaphyra's Viſion of her Firſt Husband. She Tells her Dream, and Dyes within Two Days.

Ant. l. 17. c. 12. WHen Archelaus came to be ſettled in his Ethnarchy, he did not forget Old Grudges, but preſs'd bloudily hard, upon Both Jews and Samarians: and upon an Embaſſy from Both, to Cæſar againſt him, in the Ninth year of his Government, he was Baniſh'd to Vienna, a City of Gaul, and his Eſtate Confiſcated.

Archelaus Baniſh'd for his Oppreſſion, and his Goods ſeiz'd.

There goes a Story of a Strange Dream Archelaus had before his Summons to attend Cæſar. He had a Dream of Nine Large, Full Ears of Corn, and Oxen Eating them. Upon This, he apply'd himſelf to ſeveral of the Magicians and Chaldeans to Unriddle This Dream. Some ſaid One Thing; ſome, Another; but Simon, an Eſſene, gave it This Interpretation. Theſe Ears of Corn, ſays he, are Years: By Oxen, is to be Underſtood Changes, and Overturning of Things; as the Earth is Overturn'd with the Plough. So many Years as there were Ears of Corn you are to Reign: and after many Strange Revolutions, to Dye. Within the Compaſs of Five Days after This Reſolution, Archelaus was call'd upon to plead his Cauſe before Cæſar.

A Foreboding Dream.

The Dream Expounded.

And comes to paſs.

There was Another Memorable Dream alſo of the Princeſs Glaphyra, the Daughter of Archelaus the King of Cappadocia, and the Wife of This Archelaus: whoſe Firſt Husband was Alexander, the Brother of Him we are now ſpeaking of, and the Son of Herod; by whom he was afterwards put to death. This Princeſs, after his Death, Marry'd Juba the King of Lybia: and upon his Deceaſe went home again, and liv'd with her Father in her Widowhood. Archelaus the Ethnarch fell ſo deſperately in love with her at Firſt ſight, that he preſently put away Mariamne, and took her to his Wife. In ſome ſhort time after This, ſhe went back into Judæa, and had there a Viſion of her Firſt Husband Alexander, appearing to her. Audacious Creature! ſays he, Was not One Husband enough for thee, after me? But haſt thou had the Face now to take a Third, and This under my Own Roof? And which is yet worſt of all, my Own Brother? Theſe are Injuries not to be put-up. But This will not do: for I will have you again in ſpite of your Heart. She told This Dream to her Friends, and dy'd within Two Days.

Three ſorts of Jews: Phariſees, Sadducees, and Eſſenes. Of the Eſſenes; their Temperance, and Opinion of Marriage; their Goods in Common; their Apparel, Charity, and Way of Living: their Scruples of Conſcience. Another ſort of Eſſenes. Of the Phariſees. Of the Sadducees. They are Severe, even to One another; but Inhuman to Strangers.

THE Eſtate of Archelaus being now reduced into a Province, Cæſar ſent down Caponius, a Roman Knight, with a full Commiſſion to Govern it. In his Days, one (a) Judas a Gallilean, ſtirr'd up the People to a Revolt; upon a Suggeſtion, that in Owning the Romans for their Maſters, and in paying them Tribute, they ſerv'd God and Man both a-like. Now This Man was of a Sect by himſelf, and in truth without a Fellow. There are among the Jews Three Sects of (b) Religion; as Phariſees, Sadducees, and Eſſenes: The Laſt is the Faireſt of the Three for the Exercice of (c) Holineſs and Severity. Ant. l, 17. c. 12.

Three ſorts of Jews; Phariſees, Sadducees, and Eſſenes.

Theſe Eſſenes are by Nation Jews; the moſt United and Friendly People one wth Another under the Sun. They have the ſame Averſion to Pleaſure that they have to Vice, and reckon upon Continence, and the Command of the Paſſions, as a Virtue of the Firſt Rate. They have no Great Reverence for Marriage; but for Other People's Children, that they take under their Care while they are Young and Tender, they value them as their Own Fleſh and Bloud, and Train Them up accordingly. They are not yet againſt Marriage, as Enemies to the Race and Succeſſion of Mankind; but they have an Opinion that the Fair Sex is Frail, and Intemperate, and hardly to be kept within the Compaſs of Fidelity to One Single Man.

Of the Eſſenes. Their Temperance. Their Opinion of Marriage.

As to the Matter of Wealth, and the Gods of this World, they have it All in Contempt, and do not ſo much as know what it is to be Rich or Poor, for it lies All in Common, as a Condition of the Society. By This Means, no Man ſhall be Contemptible for being Poor, nor Honourable for being Rich: but the Whole Party ſhall live like Brethren, being All Equal Sharers in One Common Patrimony.

As for the Goods of This World they have all in Common.

They will not ſuffer any Oyl to come upon their Bodies; or if ſuch a Thing ſhould happen, they are never Quiet till they get it out again. They Value themſelves upon the Plain Simplicity of their Appearance, though never ſo Courſe; provided only that their Garments be White and Clean.

Their Apparel plain and Cleanly.

They chooſe their Stewards for the Receit and Menage of their Revenues, out of the Beſt Men they have, and leave it to Their Diſcretion to make a Diſtribution of them to Every Man in proportion, according to his Need.

The Extent of their Charity.

They have no One certain Place of Abode, but diſperſe themſelves up and down into ſeveral Cities; where they are ever Ready and Open to Entertain all Comers, of their Own Sect, and as Free as if they were at Home, though they never ſaw One another in their Lives before.

Their way of Living.

They carry nothing about them when they Travel, but Arms for their Security upon the High-Way. They have ſome Body or Other in Every City to take Care of their Friends, that they want neither Lodging, Food, Garments, nor Other Neceſſaries. (d) The Dreſs they wear reſembles that of Children when they are under the Charge of Maſters and Governours.

And Travelling.

They never Change either their Garments or their Shoes, but when the One is Torn, or the Other Worn-out. They nether Buy nor Sell among Themſelves; but help one another with what they want, and what One Wants the Other Supplies: not by the Way of Exchange; but the One is Oblig'd to Give, and the Other at liberty to Receive.

They neither Buy nor Sell, One with Another.

They are the Strickteſt People to God-ward of All Men Living. They make a Conſcience of ſpeaking One Word of Common Buſ'neſs before the Sun riſes; but they have certain Traditional Forms of Prayer for That Occaſion, Imploring particularly from (e) God, that the Sun may Shine upon them. After This Act of Devotion,

Devotion, they are All Diſmiſs'd to their ſeveral Tasks and Employments: and when they have Study'd, and wrought hard till Eleven at Noon, they meet again with Linnen-Clothes thrown over them, and ſo Waſh themſelves all Over with Cold Water. Upon This Purification, they retire to their Cells; where no Mortal of any Other Profeſſion is allow'd ſo much as to breathe upon them. From thence they Enter into a Refectory, which they account little leſs Holy then the Temple it ſelf. When they have ſtayd there a while without a Word ſpeaking, the Baker brings up Every Man his Loaf, and the Cook, every Man his Plate, or Meſs of Soup, and ſets it before him. The Prieſt then Bleſſes the Meat, and not a Creature dares ſo much as touch it till the Grace be Over. And ſo after Dinner, Another Grace again; for they never fail to give God Thanks, both before and after Meat, as the Author of the Bleſſing. This Duty being Over, they quit their Habits, as in ſome Meaſure Sacred; and ſo to their Ordinary Work again till Evening. They go next to Supper, as before; where they ſit together, Gueſts and all, if they have any, at the ſame Table.

There's no Manner of Noiſe or Diſorder in Thoſe Houſes. They ſpeak by Turns: and This Way of Gravity and Silence gives Strangers a Great Veneration for them. This is the Effect of a Conſtant Courſe of Sobriety, in their Moderation of Eating and Drinking only to ſuffice Nature.

The Reverence they have for their Superiors.

They are not allow'd to do any thing without the Advice of their Superiors; ſaving only in Offices of Aſſiſtance and Compaſſion, and There they are left at Liberty; for Every Man is Free to help the Virtuous, and to Relieve Good Men in Want. 'Tis true they are not allow'd to give any thing to their Relations without leave of their Governours.

Men of Temper, Peace, and Good Faith. The Eſſenes are againſt all Oaths.

They are Great Maſters of their Paſſions; Men of Good Faith; Lovers of Peace, and their Word, at leaſt as Sacred as their Oath: for they do effectually look upon the taking of an Oath Worſe then Perjury, and account of Him for a Liar and a Man of No Credit, that cannot be believ'd without bringing-in God for a Witneſs.

They have a Mighty Honour for the Wiſdom of the Ancients.

They have a Mighty Reverence for the Works and Writings of Antiquity; eſpecially in what Concerns the Good either of Soul or Body: as in the Caſe of Remedies for Diſeaſes; the Vertues of Plants, Metals, Stones, Minerals, and the like.

The Form and Method of Entring into the Society.

When any Man has a mind to come into the Society, they do not preſently Admit him hand over head; but keep him out of the Pale for one Whole Year; admitting all of the ſame Claſs to the ſame Order of Diet: Giving Every Man alſo a Pick-Ax, a Girdle, and a White-Garment (as aforeſaid.) When a Man has been long enough among them to give ſome Competent Proofs of his Continence, and Virtue, they change his Courſe of Diet, and allow him the Benefit of Purifying Waters to Waſh himſelf: but he is not yet admitted to the Table in the Refectory, till he has ſtood a Two-Years-Probation for his Integrity and Good Manners; and upon That Tryal he is taken into the Society: That is to ſay, upon This Further Condition, before he can be Eſtabliſh't a Member of the Community.

With Theſe further Conditions.

He is Firſt to bind himſelf by Solemn Execrations and Profeſſions, to Love and Worſhip God; to do Juſtice toward Men; to Wrong no Creature Willingly; No, nor to do it though Commanded; to declare himſelf an Enemy to all Wicked Men; to join with all the Lovers of Right and Equity; to keep Faith with all Men; but with Princes Eſpecially, as they are of God's Appointment, and his Miniſters. He is likewiſe to declare, that, if ever he comes to be advanc'd above his Companions, he will never abuſe That Power to the Injury of his Subjects; nor Diſtinguiſh himſelf from his Inferiors by any Ornament of Dreſs or Apparel: but that he will Love and Embrace the Truth, and bring Falſe Speakers to Juſtice. He binds himſelf likewiſe to keep his Hands Clear from Theft, and Fraudulent Dealing, and his Soul as Untainted with the Deſire of Unjuſt Gain: That he will not Conceal from his Fellow-Profeſſors any of the Myſteries of his Religion; nor Communicate any of them to the Prophane, though it ſhould be to ſave his Life. And then for the Matter of his Doctrine, that he ſhall deliver nothing but what he hath receiv'd: That he will Endeavour to preſerve the Doctrine it ſelf that he Profeſſes; the Books that are Written of it; and the Names of Thoſe from whom he had it.

Theſe Proteſtations are made uſe of as a Teſt for New-Comers, and as a Security to keep them faſt to their Duty.

Upon

Upon the Taking of any Man in a Notorious Wickedneſs, he is Excluded the Congregation: and whoever incurs That Sentence, comes probably to a Miſerable End. For He that is ty'd-up by Theſe Rites and Sacraments, is not allow'd ſo much as to receive a Bit of Bread from the Hand of a Stranger, though his Life it ſelf were in Hazzard: ſo that Men are driven to Graze like Beaſts, till the Fleſh rots from the Bone. In This Diſtreſs, the Society hath ſometime had the Charity and Compaſſion to receive ſome of them again, when they were at the very Point of Death; Computing that the Puniſhment they ſuffer'd might in ſome degree attone for the Offence. Their Way of Puniſhing Offenders.

In the Adminiſtration of Juſtice, they are the moſt Regular and Exact People alive. They determine Nothing but what is Carry'd by a Hundred Voices at Leaſt; and when the Judgment is once paſt, there's no Recalling it. The Eſſenes the Juſteſt People alive.

Next to the Supreme Authority of God Himſelf, they reckon that of their Legiſlators: making it Death to ſpeak ill of them, or to Blaſpheme them. They aſcribe Great Honour to their Elders, and to the Majority of the People; and think it very Reaſonable to Obey the One, and to Hearken to the Other. When there are Ten together in Council, no Particular Perſon is to ſpeak, if the Other Nine be againſt it. The Eſteem they have for their Legiſlators. Their Debates in Council.

They make it a Matter of Immorality to ſpit toward the Middle of the Company, or upon the Right-hand.

They are the Strickteſt Obſervers of the Sabbaoth of all ſorts of Jews: for they do not only make Ready their Sabbaoth-Day's Meal the night before, to avoid Kindling a Fire on That Day; but they dare not ſo much as remove a Pot or a Diſh from one place to Another, or Eaſe themſelves of the Neceſſities of Nature. The Strict ſt ſort of Jews in the Obſervance of the Sabbaoth.

Upon Other Days, when they are preſs'd at any time to ſtep aſide, they take a Pick-Ax (as I ſaid before) and open the Ground a matter of a Foot Deep: When they have Diſcharg'd themſelves, they fill up the Hole again, out of a Superſtitious Scruple not to pollute the (a) Beams of the Sun with ſuch an Object. And though there be no more in it then a Natural Purgation; it is yet follow'd with the Solemnity of a Formal Purification.

The People that make Profeſſion of This Manner of Life, are divided into Four Sorts, according to their Reſpective Obligations; and the Younger are reputed ſo much Inferior to their Elders, that if they do but Touch one another, they are fain to Purify, as if it were upon the Contact of a Stranger. They live to a Great Age; a Hundred Years and Upwards many of them: which I aſcribe in a great Meaſure to the Simplicity of their Way of Feeding, and to the Temperance of their Manners. They Live Temperately and Long.

They are Firm and Hardy againſt all Dangers too, and Reſolute, to the Contempt of Torments: inſomuch that they account an Honourable Death much more Deſirable then Life it ſelf. We need go no further for the Proof of This Aſſertion, then to the War betwixt the Jews and the Romans. And upon ſeveral Occaſions, what Torments did the Jews Endure! as Burning, breaking of Bones, and all Manner of Pains, rather then let Fall One Irreverent Word of their Legiſlator, or but Touch one Morſel of a Forbidden Meat: and All This, not only without Supplications and Tears, or any Abjection of Mind; but with a Chearfulneſs of Countenance in the very Anguiſh of their Pains: Defying, and Triumphing over their very Tormentors, and delivering up their Souls with a Serene Conſtancy of Courage in the aſſurance of Exchanging a Preſent Life for a Better to come. And ſtand Firm to the Contempt of Torments, and Death it ſelf.

They firmly believe the Mortality of the Body; and that the Soul, being of the ſame Subſtance with the Subtileſt Air, is Incorruptible, and Immortal: and, by a kind of Natural Inclination, or Attraction, ſhut up in the Fleſh as in a Priſon. But when it ſhall be Freed from theſe Corporeal Bonds, as out of a Long Slavery, it ſhall then cheerfully Mount-up to the Region of Endleſs Bliſs. This Opinion ſuits well enough with ſome Conceits of the Greeks; who Phancy a Place beyond the Ocean, where there's neither Rain, nor Snow, nor Raging Heats, but only Gentle Refreſhing Gales: and This do they make to be the Seat of the Bleſſed Souls. As for the Wicked Souls on the Other Hand, they ſtand Condemn'd to Impetuous Tempeſts, Killing Froſts, and Everlaſting Pains and Groans, World without End. The Eſſenes Opinion of the Soul.

This is much after the Grecian Story of the Fortunate Iſlands: which are the Places ſet apart for the Entertainment of Thoſe Glorious Spirits they call Heroes, and Demi-Gods: and then they have their Hell too, in the Deſcription of an Infernal Pit, with Plagues and Puniſhments for ſuch as Siſyphus, Tantalus, Ixyon, Tityus, and the like: Computing all this while the Soul to be Immortal, from the Natural Diſpoſition it hath to the Love of Virtue, and to the Deteſtation of Vice; for Good Men are made Better even in This World by the Hope of Better Things yet to come in Another: beſide the Check that it puts to Impiety and Lewdneſs; when Men ſhall come to Conſider, that though they may ſcape the Eye and the Stroke of Humane Juſtice in This World, Divine Vengeance will yet find them out in That to come, and Puniſh them with Pains Everlaſting. This is the Eſſenes Philoſophy upon the Subject of the Soul: and we find very few, when they have once Imbib'd this Doctrine, that ever Depart from it.

Some of Them pretend to the Spirit of Prophecy.

There are among the Eſſenes alſo, that take upon themſelves to foretel Things to come; building their Confidence upon Ancient Prophecies and Holy Writ: and not without Preparatory Sanctifications to fit them for the Work. But be it as it will, they ſeldom fail in their Predictions.

Another ſort of Eſſenes.

There is now Another Sort of Eſſenes, Agreeing with the Former in the ſame Meats, Manners, and Laws; but they are yet divided upon the Point of Wedlock: for they look upon Thoſe that are directly againſt Marriage, as the Profeſt Enemies of Mankind: That is to ſay, in Cutting-off the Succeſſion, and ſo Extinguiſhing the Race. Now if All People were of the ſame Mind, the World would quickly be at an End. But they proceed with This Caution yet, that the Woman muſt be Subjected to a Three-Years-Probation, and if ſhe ſhall be found in a Condition of Health fit for Child-bearing, ſhe ſhall be Reputed after that Tryal Qualify'd for Marriage. The Women are likewiſe to be Cover'd when they Waſh, as the Men are; and this is enough ſaid of the Eſſenes.

of the Phariſees.

To come now to the Two Former Sects, the Phariſees, and the Sadducees: The Phariſees are, in the Firſt place, the Great Doctors of the Law, and the Beſt Read-Men in the Jewiſh Rites and Ceremonies. It is, in Effect, the Firſt Article of their Creed, that Fate and God do All; and yet that whether we do Well or Ill, it is much in our Own Power Which of the Two: only that Deſtiny interpoſes ſometime in This or That Particular. They believe the Soul to be Immortal, and they believe likewiſe a Tranſmigration of the Souls of Good Men into Other Bodies: but at the ſame time, that the Souls of the Wicked are Tranſmitted into a State of Everlaſting Woe.

of the Sadducees.

The Sadducees, on the other Hand, abſolutely deny Fate. God can do no ill, they ſay, Himſelf; and he leaves Men at liberty to do what they liſt. They have Good and Evil before them, and they take their Choice. But for Reward or Puniſhment in Another World, they Underſtand Nothing of it. The Phariſees, in fine, are Sociable, and live in a Good Intelligence one with another; but the Sadducees, are Harſh, and Ill-Natur'd even among Themſelves: but directly Inhumane and Intolerable to Strangers. This is All I have to ſay of the Philoſophy of the Jews, and I ſhall now return to my Text.

They are harſh, even among Themſelves, but Inhumane to ſtrangers.

Auguſtus Dies and Tiberius ſucceeds him.

Auguſtus being now Dead alſo, after a Reign of Seven and Fifty Years Six Months and Two Days, Tiberius the Son of Livia ſucceeded to the Roman Empire. Philip the Tetrarch built a City in Paneas, which he call'd Cæſarea: It was Erected at the very Head of the River Jordan: And he rais'd Another alſo in Gaulanitis; which he call'd Julias. Tiberias in Gallilee, was built by Herod; and ſo was Julias alſo in (a) Peræa.

Pilate was now Governour of Judæa; and being ſent thither by Tiberius to take Charge of His Command, he ſecretly convey'd late one Night into the City certain Enſigns of Cæſar's, with his Image upon them. This put the Jews into ſo Outragious a Tumult the next Day, that they were all at their Wit's End to think what would become of their Liberties and Religion, if their Laws were Trampled upon, and prophan'd at This rate: For the bringing of Images into the City was a Thing abſolutely Forbidden. This Diſorder in the Town, was quickly Seconded and Enflam'd by a vaſt Confluence of People from all parts of the Province. The Jews, upon This, went in a Great Body to Cæſarea, to move Pilate for Relief; and there they Earneſtly beſought him to be Tender of their Laws, and to Order the Removing of the Images out of the City. Pilate gave no heed at all to what they ſaid; ſo that the Jews threw themſelves Flat upon the Ground round about his Houſe, and in That Poſture they continued Five Days, and Five Nights, without ſo much as moving from the Place.

On the Sixth Day, Pilate mounted the Tribunal which was in the great (b) Court and gave the Jews a Summons, as if it had been only to receive his Anſwer: When all on a ſudden, the Deſign being ſo laid, and a Signal given, the Jews were immediately ſurrounded with Armed Troops, Three Deep, quite round about them. This was ſuch a Surprize, that the Jews might well be amaz'd at it; and in that Inſtant Pilate declar'd that they ſhould Dye Every Man of them, unleſs they receiv'd the Colours into the City: And upon That Word he Order'd the Soldiers to draw their Swords. The Jews in This Confuſion caſt themſelves Proſtrate, One and All before Them, ſtretch'd out their Necks, and Offer'd themſelves to the Execution: Crying out with One Voice, That they would rather Dye, than ſee the Prophanation of their Laws. Pilate was ſo aſtoniſht at the Daring Zeal of Theſe People in the Defence of their Religion, That he gave Order preſently to have the Statues remov'd.

This Broil was follow'd with Another. The Jews have a Holy Treaſure which they call (c) Corban; and Pilate laid a Tax upon it toward the Charge of Aquæducts, for the bringing in of Water at the diſtance of Three Hundred Furlongs. The Common People were ſo Tranſported at This Impoſition, that they came Open-Mouth to Pilate about it, as he was upon the very Tribunal. But he had the Foreſight to provide for a Tumult, by intermixing Soldiers in Diſguiſe with the Multitude, to be in Readineſs to Fall on, when ever Pilate ſhould give the Word: But with This Caution however, in Caſe of any Uproar, to make uſe only of Cudgels without drawing their Swords. The People grew Clamorous and Unquiet: And upon That Provocation, Pilate gave the Soldiers the Signal; who did Execution according to their Orders. There was a Great Number of Jews Deſtroy'd; what with thoſe that Dy'd by Blows, Some Crowded and Trampled to Death, Others that periſhed upon the Purſuit. The Rabble took this Rebuke for a Warning, and gave over Muttering: So that This Severity put an End to the Riot.

Agrippa the Son of Ariſtobulus, who was put to Death by his Father Herod, went ſome time after to Tiberius with a Complaint againſt Herod the Tetrarch. Tiberius never minded the Accuſation: So that Agrippa was Eaſie and Quiet at Rome, in the Condition of a Private-Man; and made his Court the Mean-while to Perſons of the Firſt Quality, and in Particular to Caius the Son of Germanicus. Agrippa was Treating him One Day with the Complement of a Collation; and when he was well Warm in his Cups, and the Good Humour upon him, Agrippa ſtretching out his Arm with an Exclamation: Ah! ſays he, How glad ſhould I be to ſee Caius Maſter of the World inſtead of Tiberius. This was carry'd to Tiberius by One of the Company, where he was kept in Great Miſery till the Death of the Emperour, ſome Six Months after: which was when he had Reigned Two and Twenty Years Six Months, and Three Days.

Caius Cæſar, upon coming afterward to the Empire, Diſcharg'd Agrippa, and gave him Philip's Tetrarchy, (who was now Dead) and the Title of King too. This Advancement of Agrippa went to the Envious Heart of Herod the Tetrarch: And his Wife Herodias was not wanting neither to the Enflaming of his Ambitious Mind into the Hope of the Kingdom; and at this Rate ſhe Twitted him. You were Lazy, ſays ſhe, and might have had it for the Asking, if you had but thought it worth a Journey to Cæſar. If Caius was prevail'd upon to make Agrippa a King, of a Private Man, he would never have ſtuck certainly at making Herod a King, of a Tetrarch. Herod was now prevail'd upon Memnon's Sepulchre.

Caius Cæſar had the Blaſphemous Vanity, in This Tide of his Fortune, to ſet up for a God, and to aſſume to himſelf both the Name and the Worſhip. He ſtruck off the Heads of ſuch Numbers of the Roman Nobility, that the very Order was in a Manner Suppreſs'd, and his Countrey Diſabled, by Thoſe frequent Executions. And his Impious Cruelty did not ſtop here neither, but he carried it into Judæa too; ſending Petronius with a Commiſſion, and a Charge to ſet up his Statues in the Temple, and to put every Soul to the Sword, that ſhould dare to refuſe them: And for the reſt of the Jews to make them All Slaves. But God in his Mercy Order'd Matters Otherwiſe. Petronius Marched away in all Haſte from Antioch toward Judæa, with Three Legions and a conſiderable Number of Auxiliaries out of Syria. The Report of This Expedition was ſuch a Surprize to the Jews, that the greater part of them could not believe it; and Thoſe that did, were not in any condition to provide for a Defence. But the Army being now advanc'd as far as Ptolemais, they were all ſeiz'd with a Mortal Terror.

This Ptolemais is a City upon the Coaſt of Gallilee, Situated on a large Plain, and Surrounded with Mountains to the Eaſt-ward at the diſtance of ſome Sixty Furlongs; but belonging to Gallilee; to the South-ward with Carmel, at about a Hundred and Twenty Stadia to the North, and a very High Mountain, call'd the (a) Tyrian Ladder, at a Hundred and Twenty alſo. Some Two Stadia from the Town it ſelf, there was a little River called (b) Belus, and not far from it ſtands Memnon's Sepulchre, Bordering upon a Proſpect of near a Hundred Cubits over; which has ſomewhat in it that is very Remarkable. There is the Appearance of a Round Valley that yields a kind of a Glaſſy Sand: The Ships meet and carry it off, and as faſt as they fetch it away, the Winds from the Top of the Mountains fill up the Place again. It is the Nature of that Place to turn any thing to Glaſs that comes into't. But the moſt Wonderful Thing of all, to me, is this: that after thoſe Sands are Vitrify'd, 'tis but caſting any Part of them upon the Skirts of that Place to make it Common Sand again; Such is the Nature and Condition of the Soil.

Petronius Relents.

He Summons All the Jews to Tiberias.

He Expoſtulates the Matter with the Jews.

In this Conſternation, the Jews with their Wives and Children went to Petronius at Ptolemais, and there beſought him as well for their Country-ſake as their Own, not to preſs the Violation of their Laws to the Ruine of ſo many Miſerable People. The Petitioners were ſo Many and ſo Earneſt, and their Caſe ſo Deplorable, that Petronius was prevail'd upon to leave his Army and the Emperour's Statues at Ptolemais: and ſo advancing toward Gallilee, he Summon'd the Jews of all Sorts to attend him at Tiberias. Being come to Tiberias, he Enter'd upon a Diſcourſe to them of the Strength and Power of Rome, and the Menaces of Cæſar: adding withal that the Jews Requeſt was in truth but a Tacit Affront: for why ſhould they take upon them to diſpute thoſe Orders that all the Subjects of the Roman Empire beſide themſelves Submitted to? That is to ſay; the Placing of the Emperour's Statues in the Temples among their Other Gods. This Expoſtulation, he told them, was within a little of a Revolt: and next after Cæſar, He Himſelf was Concern'd in the Matter.

They had nothing to ſay for themſelves, but that the Laws and Cuſtoms of their Country would not allow them to ſet up any Images whatſoever, either of God or

Man;

Man; or in any place whatſoever, either Sacred or Prophane. Well! ſays Petronius, and am not I to keep my Maſter's Laws as well as You are to keep Yours? Or in Caſe I ſhould Tranſgreſs them in Your Favour, ſhould not I deſerve to be Puniſh'd? Neither is it Petronius that Oppoſes You, but Cæſar: for I am as much under Command as You are Your Selves. The Whole Multitude upon this, brake-out into an Unanimous Out-cry, that if they were ſure to Die for't, they would never Yield to the Violation of their Laws.

When the Hubbub was a little laid: What! ſays Petronius, You are reſolv'd to take up Arms againſt Cæſar then, are You not? No, ſaid they, there's not a Day goes over our Heads, but we Offer-up Vows and Sacrifices to God for his Proſperity, and for the Whole People of Rome: but if he goes about to Impoſe Images upon us in the Temple, he goes the way to work to make the Whole People of the Jews but One Sacrifice, and in that Caſe, We our ſelves, with our Wives and Children, are all Ready to Give-up our Lives for the Asking. Petronius was ſo divided upon this, betwixt Admiration and Pity, to ſee the Invincible Force of ſuch a Zeal for Religion, and ſuch a Multitude of People United in the Same Reſolution, that the Meeting broke-up once again without any thing done.

Petronius ſo Charm'd with the Bravery of the Jews, that he Diſſolved the Meeting yet once again, without coming to any Reſolution.

But Petronius went the next Day, and ſo from time to time in Private, and Man by Man, to ſome of the moſt Eminent Perſons among them, and ſpake in Publique alſo at the ſame time to the Common People: One while adviſing them as a Friend, and then Minding them of the Inſuperable Courage of the Romans, and the Danger of Incurring Cæſar's Diſpleaſure: beſide, ſays he, that I am under an abſolute Neceſſity of Obeying my Orders. But when he ſaw that Nothing of This would work upon them, and that they had already loſt their Seed-time to attend this Controverſy; having been already near Fifty Days about it, Petronius told them at laſt that for their Sakes he was reſolv'd to Expoſe himſelf to a Deſperate Hazzard. I will either ſatisfy Cæſar, ſays he, and ſave You and My Self both at once; or, if Nothing will Serve him but Extremities, I will lay down my Life for You. And ſo he Diſmiſs'd the Multitude with a Thouſand Vows and Prayers for him, and drew off his Army from Ptolemais to Antioch. From Antioch he ſent immediately to Cæſar, with an Account of the Manner of his Entring into Judæa: how the Whole Nation were joyn'd in One Common Petition; which he was affraid could not be Oppos'd or Deny'd without the Hazzard of the Whole Province. They deſir'd nothing more, he ſaid, then the Maintenance of their Laws againſt all Innovations. The Anſwer that Caius gave to this Letter was an Order for the putting of Petronius to death for not Executing his Command. But it ſo fell out that the Bearers of this Order were kept Three whole Months upon the Way by Contrary Winds: and in the mean time comes the Tidings of the Death of Caius by a Quicker Paſſage, and Seven and Twenty Days before the Other.

Petronius Reaſons the Matter with the Petitioners;

And Promiſes them his Mediation to Cæſar.

Ant. l. 17. c. 14. The Army Declares Claudius the Succeſſor of Caius.

CAius being cut-off by Treachery, when he had Reign'd Three Years and Six Months, Claudius was advanced to the Government by the Army which was then at Rome. The Conſuls, Sentius Saturninus and Pomponius Secundus, appointed, according to the Reſolution of the Senate, Three Companies for the Guard of the City, and ſo they met in the Capitol: where they determin'd to Oppoſe Claudius in Spite, for the Barbarities of Caius, out of a Deſign to bring the Government again to an Ariſtocracy; as it was of Old, when the Worthieſt Men were taken into the Adminiſtration. It ſo happen'd that Agrippa came, while this paſt, and was Invited both into the Councel by the Senate; and into the Army of Claudius; as a conſiderable Addition to what Party ſoever he Eſpous'd. Now Agrippa, finding Claudius to be as good as Emperour already, he went over into his Intereſt without much Difficulty, and was immediately Employ'd upon an Embaſſy to the Senate: giving giving them to Underſtand, that the Army's ſetting of Him up for Emperour, was an abſolute Force upon him, and in Truth, purely their Act, whether He would or no: but that now ſince the Thing was done, he could not recede, either with Honour or Safety; for it would look like an Undervaluing of the Good Will of the Soldiers, to decline the Dignity: as it would provoke them to a Revenge, if he ſhould ſeem Inſenſible of the Obligation; telling them over and above, that now he was brought on, there was no coming-off: for the Envy of the Choice would ſtick by him ſtill, even if he ſhould lay down the Sovereignty. But however, ſince the Firſt Point was over, and that he was in Poſſeſſion of the Government, he had determin'd within himſelf to Attend and Execute the Office: not as a Tyrant to Domineer at Will and Pleaſure, but as a Prince of Tenderneſs for his People: He ſhould Content himſelf with the Honour of the Name of Emperour, and in Caſes of State to hearken to the Advice of the Senate; for, ſays he, if Claudius were not Modeſt and Temperate in his Own Nature, the Exemplary Fate of Caius was enough to make him ſo.

Claudius a Prince of Tenderneſs and Moderation.

When Agrippa had gone thus far, the Senate (depending upon their Credit with the Army, and the Prudence of their Own Conduct) they made him this ſhort Reply; That they were not a People to be made Voluntary Slaves. Agrippa carry'd this Anſwer to Claudius, and was preſently ſent back again to tell the Senate that Claudius was not a Man to betray his Friends that promoted him to the Empire. He was very much troubled at the thought of having a Quarrel with the Senate: but if it muſt come to a Deciſion by Arms, Claudius deſir'd them only to appoint ſome Spot of Ground without the City for the Place of Battle: for it would be a Thouſand Pities to have Rome it ſelf laid in Bloud and Aſhes, only to Gratify the Humour of a few Hot-Headed People. This was it that Agrippa had in Charge from Claudius, and he deliver'd it accordingly to the Senate.

The Senates Anſwer to Agrippa. Claudius's Return to the Senate.

While Things were in this Diſpoſition and Poſture, One of the Soldiers who was there preſent ſtood forth, and drawing his Sword; My Fellow Companions, ſays he, What's the Matter here that we are now at Daggers-drawing with the Beſt Friends we have, and upon the very Brink of a Civil War, only for adhering to Claudius? An Emperour without a Blemiſh, and a Prince that we ſhould rather Treat with Duty and Reſpect, as our Protector, then with Arms, as an Enemy. With theſe Words he March'd off through the Middle of the Court, and the reſt of the Soldiers follow'd him. This Deſertion put the Nobles into ſuch a Fright for fear of the Conſequences, that when they found Huffing would do no Good, they very Fairly did as the Military Man had done before them; they went their way, and declar'd for Claudius. In this Interim, Divers of the Officious Pick-thank Soldiery lay upon the Watch, with their Swords drawn, under the Walls, to Diſpatch them at their coming out: and they had been Kill'd Every Man of them, before Cæſar could have known any Thing of the Matter, if Agrippa had not given Timely Notice to prevent it: telling Cæſar plainly, that if he did not put a Check to the Licence of the Army; eſpecially toward the Nobility, there would be nothing but Cutting of Throats, in a ſhort time, and inſtead of making him the Maſter of a Glorious Empire, they would leave him only the Prince of a Deſart.

Claudius's Friends had been all Deſtroy'd, if Agrippa had not prevented it.

Claudius took Agrippa's Advice, and put the Soldiers in Better Order; Treated the Senators in his Camp with all Honour and Kindneſs: and then went out with them according to Cuſtom, to Offer Vows and Sacrifices for the Proſperity of the Empire. He beſtow'd upon Agrippa, not only his Father's Kingdom Entire, but thoſe Places over and above that Auguſtus had Conferr'd upon Herod; as Trachonitis, and Auranitis, with a Command alſo that was call'd the Kingdom of Lyſania; appointing the Particulars of this Grant to be Notify'd by Proclamation to the People; and giving it likewiſe in charge to the Senate, to have it cut in Braſs, and ſet-up in the Capitol. He gave the Kingdom of Chalcis alſo to Herod, the Brother of Agrippa; who was become his Son-in-Law too, by Matching him to Berenice his Daughter.

Agrippa was now grown Great in Wealth and Power, beyond all Thought or Imagination: and the Treaſure that he got, he did not Squander away neither, upon Vanities or Trifles. His Firſt Enterprize was the Walling-in of Jeruſalem; and if it had been carry'd-on anſwerable to the Beginning, the Romans would never have done any good upon't. But after a Three-Years Reign as King, he Dy'd at Cæſarea, and left the Work Unfiniſhed; having Govern'd Three Years before, in the Quality of Tetrarch. He left Three Daughters that he had by Cypris; Berenice, Mariamne, and Druſilla; and one Son, whoſe Name was Agrippa. There was Another Brother Aristobulus also that Dy'd a Private Man, and left a Daughter whose Name was Jotapa. These, as we have said before, were the Children of Aristobulus the Son of Herod. But Alexander and Aristobulus were the Sons of Herod by Mariamne, whom the Father Himself put to Death. After the Death of Herod that Govern'd in Chalcis, Claudius introduced Agrippa the Son of Agrippa, into his Uncle's Kingdom: and Cumanus Succeeded Tiberius Alexander in the Kingdom of Judæa. During the Time of his Administration, the Jews fell into New and Grievous Troubles. The People being gathered together at Jerusalem in Vast Numbers to Celebrate the Feast of Unleavened-Bread, and a Band of Soldiers standing at the Gate of the Temple, (as it was Customary upon these Meetings,) for fear of Tumults. There was One Soldier among the rest that turn'd-up his Back-side Naked in the Face of the Congregation, and made a Beastly Noise with it answerable to the Brutality of the Action. This put the Whole Multitude into such a Rage, that they press'd in Throngs up to Cumanus for Justice upon the Soldier for that Affront: and some Hot Mutinous Young-Men, among the rest, made a Direct Brawl and Quarrel of it; falling-on with Hard Words and Stones, and Striking the Soldiers. Cumanus, for fear of further Mischief by a Popular Uproar, sent an Enforcement of Fresh Men to Support the Former. This put the Jews in such a Fright, that they shifted for themselves to get out of the Temple as soon as they could; but the Passages were so Crowded and Wedg'd-up, that a Matter of Ten Thousand were Trod and Squeez'd to Death in the Press. This Encounter made it a Dismal Festival to the Whole Nation: Tears and Wringing of Hands in Every House; and not a Family but had a share in the Mourning.

A Beastly Affront upon the Jews by a Soldier, at a Solemn Festival.

A Horrible Uproar.

Ten Thousand Smother'd in the Press.

This Calamity was scarce over, but Another follow'd upon the Back of it. One Stephen, a Domestique of Cæsar's, was Travelling upon the High-way, with some Houshold-Stuff of his Master's. He was set upon near (a) Bethoron, and Robb'd, by a Band of Thieves. Cumanus sent a Party to take up the People in the Neighbour-Villages, and bring them to him Bound; making Them Answerable for not Taking the High-Way-Men. While they were upon this Enquiry, a Common Soldier, happening in the Search to lay his Hands upon the Books of Moyses, tore them to pieces, and threw them into the Fire. This brought the Jews together in Throngs, as if their whole Country had been in a Flame. They All met in the same Instant, as if they had been Mov'd by a Machine; and then in the Heat of a Superstitious Zeal, they repair'd immediately to Cumanus at Cæsarea: where they press'd him with Violent Importunities, not to let that Wretch Scape Unpunish'd, that had put so Audacious an Affront upon God and his Law. Cumanus found there was no Quieting these People without some sort of Satisfaction: So that he Commanded the Soldier to be brought out, and put to Death in the Sight of the Whole Field. And that put an End to the Tumult.

There happen'd at the same time an Unfortunate Difference betwixt the Jews of Gallilee and Those of Samaria. There was a Certain Jew of Gallilee, passing through a Village call'd (b) Geman, in the Great Plain of Samaria, that was there Kill'd as he he was going-up to Jeruſalem to Worſhip at a Solemn Feſtival. The People of Gallilee preſently drew out a Body to revenge themſelves of the Samaritans by Arms: the Better Sort of them applying themſelves to Cumanus; and adviſing him by all means, before it went too far, to go over to Gallilee; and upon a Strict Enquiring into this Matter, to ſee Juſtice done upon the Murderers. Cumanus, it ſeems, had ſomewhat elſe to do, and ſo Diſmiſs'd the Petitioners without Entring into the Cauſe. The Story of this Outrage coming ſoon after to Jeruſalem, put the Whole Multitude into ſuch a Flame, that they left the Buſneſs of the Day; and in a Confuſion, without either Officer, or Order, reſolv'd to fall upon Samaria, in Spite of all their Officers could do to reſtrain them. The Heads, both of the Robbery, and the Tumults, were Eleazar the Son of Dinæus, and Alexander; who breaking into the Borders of Acrabatena, burn'd all before them, and put Man, Woman, and Child to the Sword.

Cumanus, upon the News of this Ravage, came with a Sebaſten Party of Horſe to the Relief of the Country; took a Great many of Eleazar's Followers, and cut-off many more. As to the Remainder of this Rabble that made ſuch Havock in Samaria, the Great Officers, and the Leading Men of Jeruſalem, went out in Sackcloth and Aſhes after them; begging of them, and uſing all Arts and Arguments to make them quit their Deſign. Do not Deſtroy Jeruſalem, they cry'd, to be reveng'd of Samaria. Have Pity upon Your Country, Your Temple, Your City, Your Wives; which are in truth all at Stake: and do not Sacrifice All that is Dear to You in this World, to be reveng'd of One Poor Gallilean. The Jews came at laſt to themſelves again, and the Fit went off.

The Rabble are at laſt Reaſon'd into their Wits again.

The Countries all over Infeſted with Robbers.

There was about that Time Notable Robbing and Stealing: (as Peace breeds Villany) The Countries were all Over-run with Men of Prey: and upon the Whole Matter, it was but the Greater Thieves Robbing the Leſs. Numidius Quadratus being then Governour of Syria, Several of the Heads of the Samaritans addreſs'd to him at Tyre, with a Heavy Complaint againſt the Robbers that Infeſted their Country. There were divers of the Jewiſh Nobility then preſent, and there was Jonathan alſo, the Son of Anan the High-Prieſt. Now this Jonathan baffled all Objections with turning the Blame upon the Samaritans, as the Firſt Authors of the Tumult, in the Death of the Gallilean. He Charg'd the Conſequences alſo upon Cumanus, for want of doing Juſtice in Time upon the Offender.

Quadratus, when he had heard the Cauſe, put off the further Conſideration of it till he came into Judæa: where he might have a more Particular Enformation He went after that to Cæſarea, and there cauſed all Thoſe that Cumanus had taken. Alive, to be put to Death. Thence to Lidda, where he heard the Samaritans Cauſe once over again, and cut-off the Heads of Eighteen Principal Men of the Jews, that he certainly knew were Dipp'd in the Tumults. He Order'd Cumanus and Celer the Tribune away to Rome to Anſwer for Themſelves to Claudius. Things being thus Settled, he went forward from Lidda to Jeruſalem; where finding the People in the Middle of their Feſtival of Unleavened-Bread, all in Peace, he went back for Antioch.

He made Felix, the Brother of Pallas, Governour of Judæa, Samaria, Gallilee and Peræa. He prefer'd Agrippa from the Kingdom of Chalcis to a Greater Command. He gave him alſo the Province that had been (a) Philip's; which was Trachonitis, Batanæa, and Gaulanitis: Superadding to All Theſe, the Kingdom of Lyſania, and the Tetrarchy that had been Varus's.

No Man ever made a Worſe Uſe perhaps of the Advantages of a Great Power and Fortune, then Nero did; Witneſs the Waſhing of his Hands in the Bloud of his Brother, his Wife, and his Mother; and then the Proſecution of that Inhumane Cruelty toward his Neareſt Relations; the Folly and Madneſs of Turning a Prince into a Player, and ſubjecting the Imperial Dignity to the Buffooneries of the Stage. To come now to That Part of Nero's Hiſtory that Concerns the Jews. He gave Ariſtobulus the Son of Herod the Government of the Leſs-Armenia, and annexed Four Cities more to the Territory of Aggrippa: That is to ſay, Abila, and Julias, in Peræa; and in Gallilee, Tarichee, and Tiberias, with their Dependencies. The Remainder of Judæa he gave to Felix; who no ſooner had his Commiſſion, but he made War upon the Robbers; Took Eleazar their Captain, with ſeveral Others, and ſent them all Bound to Rome; after they had haraſs'd the Country at Pleaſure for Twenty Year together. In fine, what with the Thieves that were kept Priſoners or put to death; and the Country-People that Joyn'd with them, the Number of the Kill'd and Taken was almoſt Incredible. So ſoon as the Land was well clear'd of Theſe Ruffians, up ſtarted Another ſort of Cut-Throats, under the Name of Sicarii; from Sica, the Weapon they Us'd. Now Theſe People made no Difficulty of doing their Work even at Noon-Day, in the very Streets of Jeruſalem, and in the Face of the Sun: eſpecially upon Great Days, when the Town was Crouded with People. Their way was to carry ſhort Daggers under their Coats; and mixing with the Multitude, privily to Stab their Enemies: and then as any Man fell, who ſo forward as They Themſelves to Wonder at the Villany. This Practice went on a good while, not only without Diſcovery, but the Actors of it not ſo much as ſuſpected The Firſt Man that fell by Theſe Aſſaſſines was Jonathan the High-Prieſt: after which, not a Day paſs'd for a good while, without ſeveral Executions of the ſame kind. This ſo ſtartled the City, that the very Fear was in ſome reſpect Worſe then the Miſchief; for it was as Dangerous to Walk the Streets, as to be in a Battle. They ſuſpected Every Man for an Enemy at a Diſtance; and durſt not Truſt their Friends when they came near them. And after all, This Watchfulneſs and Guard was not enough to ſecure them: ſo Bold and Dextrous were Theſe Bravo's in the Exerciſe of their Profeſſion. A New ſort of Cut-Throats call'd Sicarii. Their way of Conduct and Execution. Jonathan the High-Prieſt was the firſt that fell by Theſe Ruffians. The City in a Diſmal Fright and Confuſion at it.

There was Another ſort of Miſcreants now that did yet more Miſchief with their Tongues then the other did with their Weapons. 'Tis True, they ſpilt no Bloud, but they deſtroy'd more with their Doctrines, then the Other did with their Daggers; and utterly Corrupted the Happy and the Orderly State of the City. Theſe were Impoſtors, and Seducers, that, under the Colour of Religion, ſet Men a-Madding after Strange Opinions and Innovations. They withdrew the People into Woods and Solitudes, upon pretence that God had a Work in Hand to ſet them at Perfect Liberty; and that he would Reveal himſelf further to them by Tokens from Heaven that would give them an Infallible Aſſurance of it. Felix ſaw manifeſtly what they were a-doing, and found it Neceſſary to Nip the Deſign of a Rebellion in the Budd: ſo that he ſent out a Body of Horſe and Foot after Theſe Enthuſiaſts, and deſtroy'd a Great Number of their Diſciples. The Danger of Enthuſiaſts and Impoſtors, under Colour of Pretended Revelations. Felix Defeats a Body of the Seducers.

This Plague was follow'd with That of an Ægyptian Pretender, that fell Heavier upon the Jews then the Other. This Ægyptian was a Magician, but paſs'd for a Prophet; with about Thirty Thouſand Men at his Heels, that he had inveigled into his Congregation. He led them about by the Way of the Wilderneſs, and ſo to Mount Olivet; propoſing to March thence to Jeruſalem; beat out the Roman Garriſon, and make himſelf Maſter of the Place and Country: with his Friends and A Magician ſets-up for a Prophet. And Marches in the Head of Thirty Thouſand Men toward Jeruſalem.

Guards about him all this while to aſſiſt in the Enterprize. Felix, finding it to be a Growing Evil, advanced-up to the Ægyptian with his Roman Legions, and a Conſiderable Body of the Jews to join him. Felix gave him Battle, and totally Defeated him; the Ægyptian Himſelf, with ſome few of his Followers, ſaving themſelves by Flight. There were Great Numbers of his People Kill'd; Others Taken, and put in Chains; and the reſt Diſpers'd to their Own Homes.

Felix Encounters Him upon the Way, and gives him a Total Rout.

It is with a Diſtember'd Nation as in the Caſe of an Ill Habit of Body, One Trouble is no ſooner remov'd but Another comes on. For the Magicians and the Robbers were now laying their Heads together, how they might ſet up for Abſolute Liberty, and Engage the Multitude in a Reſolution to ſhake-off the Roman Yoke. This they attempted, both by Argument, and Menace; Threat'ning Death without Mercy for any Man to Own that Juriſdiction: Propoſing to reduce thoſe by Terror, that would otherwiſe ſubject Themſelves to a voluntary Slavery. This Party diſpers'd it ſelf all over the Country; plund'ring Great Men's Houſes; Cutting of Throats, and Burning wherever they came: ſo that Judæa was brought to the Laſt Extremity of Deſperation, with Dread and Trouble; the War growing every day more Cruel then Other.

The Magicians and the Robbers ſet up for Abſolute Liberty.

There was at This Time Another Tumult alſo that brake-out about Cæſarea, upon a Commotion that was Started there betwixt the Jews and the Syrians living promiſcuouſly together. The Jews would have it to be Their City; arguing that a Jew was the Founder of it, meaning King Herod. Their Competitors could not deny a Jew to have been the Builder of it; but inſiſted upon it, on the Other hand, that it belong'd to the Gentiles: for if it were the Jews City, they would never ſuffer Temples and Statues to be Erected in it. They fell into ſuch Heats upon This Diſpute, that they betook themſelves to their Arms; and not a Day paſs'd but there was Miſchief done, More or Leſs, betwixt the Forward Men of the Two Parties. The Elders did all that was poſſible to be done, by Authority and Advice, to Quiet the Jews on the One hand, but they were Wholly Ungovernable; and the Greeks, on the Other hand, thought themſelves too good to Truckle to the Jews. They were look'd upon, 'tis True, to have more Wealth and Courage; but the Greeks had a much greater Intereſt in the Soldiery: for a Great Part of the Roman Army being drawn out of Syria, they were the Readier to aſſiſt them, both as their Countrymen and Kin'red. The Magiſtrates and Officers did all that was to be done too, by the Uttermoſt Severity of Diſcipline, to Quaſh the Tumult; as taking the Incorrigible and Obſtinate into Cuſtody; Whipping, and Chaining them up, and the like. But the Exemplary Sufferings of ſome wrought Nothing upon the Spirits of Others that were more harden'd; Nay on the Contrary, That which they thought would have Diſcourag'd or Over-aw'd them, made them ſtill Worſe and Worſe.

An Outrageous Tumult betwixt the Jews and the Syrians, about the City of Cæſarea.

The Elders do all they can by fair Means and foul, to Quiet it.

Felix, at laſt, when he ſaw nothing would bring them to Reaſon, Commanded the Faction away out of the City by Proclamation, upon their Uttermoſt Peril: but divers ſtaying behind in Contempt of Authority, the Governour ſent a Party of Soldiers in among them that Kill'd ſeveral of them, and ſeiz'd their Goods. But the Sedition going-on ſtill, the Governour Diſpatch'd away Commiſſioners to Nero; (ſome of the Principal Men of Both Parties) to plead their Cauſe before Cæſar. Feſtus ſucceeded Felix, and fell very hard upon the High-way-men that were moſt Troubleſome to the Province; Taking, and Killing a Great many of the Thieves.

The Cauſe comes at laſt to be Heard before Cæſar. Feſtus ſucceeds Felix.

Albinus ſucceeded Feſtus; but he did not Govern like his Predeceſſor. He was a Man ſo Univerſally Wicked, that there was No Ill he ſtood-out at: as Corruption, Avarice, Extortion, Oppreſſion; and This in all Caſes too, as well Private as Publique: Bribery in Civil Cauſes; Bribery again in Perſonal; and the Nation ſqueez'd to Death under the Burden of Arbitrary Tributes. Was any Man in the Hand of the Law for Rapine, and Violence, either upon Conviction before the Preſent Magiſtrate, or upon the Sentence of Former Judges? There needed but a Friend and a Piece of Money to ſet him at Liberty: and no Man was ever found Guilty by This Governour, that had but Money to make him Innocent, and Purchaſe his Freedom. Ant. l. 20. c. 15, 16. Albinus ſucceeds Feſtus. A Corrupt and a Tyrannical Governour.

There was at This time a Faction at Jeruſalem, that had ſet their Hearts upon a Change of Government; and Thoſe of the Party that had wherewithal, Compounded with Albinus beforehand to be eaſy to them in caſe of a Broil. But there was a Popular Mixture of Men alſo, that could not be Quiet themſelves, ſo long as the State was at Peace: and Theſe People were taken into the Intereſt of Albinus. The Heads of This Mutinous Medley had every one of them a Troup of Good Fellows at his Heels, of his own Complexion, while the Governour Himſelf was only the moſt Illuſtrious Thief of the Band; with his Guards about him to do Execution at pleaſure upon Thoſe that were not in a Condition either for Reſiſtance, or Defence. It came to This upon the Main, that the Loſers durſt not Open their Mouths to Complain; and Thoſe that Scap'd, were glad to give part of what they had for the Saving of the reſt: and the Receivers Themſelves Worſe at laſt then the Thieves. In fine, There was no Faith left upon the Earth; and the Multiplicity of Tyrants was Evidently the Foundation of a Slavery to come.

Theſe were the Manners, and This the Character of Albinus: but Geſſius Florus that came after him, was ſuch a Foyl to him, that the Former look'd like an Angel upon the Compariſon. Albinus indeed was Falſe, but yet Cloſe and Secret in his Iniquities; which had ſomething like Modeſty in it: but Geſſius made an Open Profeſſion of his Lewdneſs; inſomuch that he valu'd himſelf upon the Merit of his Crime, and made it his Glory to declare himſelf a Profeſs'd Enemy to the Whole Nation. He behaved himſelf in the Province, liker an Executioner, then a Governour; for he Treated the Whole Body of the People like Common Criminals, without ſetting any Bounds, either to his Rapine, or to his Tyranny. He had neither Pity in him, nor Senſe of Honour; but Mercileſs to the Miſerable, and utterly void of Shame in Caſes ſo Foul, that Impudence it ſelf would have bluſh'd at. No Man ever put Truth out of Countenance with Paradox and Impoſture, as this Man did: neither did ever any Man find out ſuch Artificial Ways of Addreſs for the doing of Miſchief. The Deſtroying of a Whole Nation, Man by Man, would not ſerve his Turn neither, without ſweeping away Whole Cities Entire, and Cutting-off the Neck of the Common-Body of the People at a Blow. He gave ſuch Liberty and Encouragement to Spoyl and Pillage, that it fell little ſhort of a Proclamation of Allowance to All People to take what they could get; provided he might but go a Share in the Booty. And then for his Avarice, he drein'd the Province into ſo ſtarving a Degree of Poverty, that the Inhabitants left it, in effect, a Deſart, for want of Bread to put in their Mouths. Albinus a Lewd Man, but nothing to Geſſius Florus that came after him. Albinus and Florus Compar'd.

Ceſtius Gallus was at That time Governour of Syria; and in His Days there was not a Jew that durſt ſo much as Open his Mouth to him in a Complaint againſt Florus. But however upon his Coming up to Jeruſalem, upon the Feaſt of Unlevened Bread, the Multitude, to the Number of Three Hundred Thouſand, made their Application to Gallus to take Pity of a Miſerable People, and deliver the Province out of the Hands of Florus; That Peſt of a Governour. Florus was within Hearing of This Outrage; but ſo far from being Mov'd, or out of Countenance at it, that he turn'd it all to Ridicule. Ceſtius, in the mean time, did what he could to Pacify the People, by telling them that Florus ſhould deal better with them for the future; and ſo he went back again to Antioch. Florus brought Gallus on-ward of his way as far as Cæſarea; telling him a Thouſand Flams and Falſe Stories, as they Ceſtius Gallus Governour of Syria. A Heavy Complaint to Gallus againſt Florus.

paſs'd: but, at the ſame time, caſting within himſelf the Neceſſity of a War with the Jews, as the Only way to lie Undiſcover'd and bring himſelf off. In the Caſe of a Peace, the Jews, he thought, would lay hold of ſuch an Opportunity to bring the Cauſe before Cæſar; which would be Dangerous: whereas if he could but once Work them to a Revolt, the Greater Miſchief would take-off the Envy of the Leſs: and therefore he had no way, he ſaw, but to Force them by degrees into a Rebellion in his Own Defence.

Florus does what he can to make the Jews Rebel.

Cæſar's Decree in favour of the Cæſarean Greeks.

The Cæſarean Greeks had at This time carry'd their Cauſe againſt the Jews before Cæſar, and obtained a Decree in Their Favour: which Sentence gave a Riſe to the Jewiſh War. It bare Date the Twelfth Year of Nero, and the Seventeenth of Agrippa, in the Month Artemiſius.

Ant. l. 20 c. 1 5. The Buſ'neſs of Cæſarea was the Occaſion of the Jewiſh War.

THE Tyranny of Florus was indeed a Dangerous Temptation to a Rebellion: but the Jews ſtood Firm againſt that Provocation, and afterward it was the Bus'neſs of Cæſarea that did the Work.

There was a Certain Greek had a Houſe in Cæſarea, cloſe upon the Place where the Jews had their Synagogue. They would fain have made a Purchaſe of this Houſe, and Treated with the Maſter ſeveral Times about it, Offering him much More for it then it was Worth: But ſo far was he from Complying with the Propoſal, that out of pure Croſſneſs, inſtead of giving them more Eaſe, he fell to blocking of the Way in a manner quite up, by Crouding ſo many little Shops into the Paſſage, that there was hardly Room left for One Single Body to get into the Synagogue. Upon This, ſome of the Hot Young Men of the Jews went out preſently to the Work-men, and caution'd them not to go-on, at their Peril. Florus countermanded That Prohibition: ſo that the Jews had nothing more to do but to Try the Governour with a Sum of Money. Several of their Principal Men met about it, and among the reſt, one John, a Farmer of the King's Cuſtoms; who contracted with Florus for Eight Talents to forbid the Building. They deliver'd him the Money, and he promis'd all Things ſhould be done accordingly; but immediately upon the Receit of it, away goes he from Cæſarea to Sebaſte, as if it had been on purpoſe to leave them at liberty for an Uproar: as who ſhould ſay, Eight Talents is the Price of an Opportunity for you to cut one Anothers Throats.

The Jews Affronted in their Synagogue.

The Bribery and Perfidy of Florus.

The Next Day, being the Jews Sabbaoth, when the People were all together in the Synagogue, a Spiteful Cæſarean ſet an Earthen Veſſel juſt before the Door with a Sacrifice of Birds upon it. This Contemptuous Mockery put the Jews out of all Government and Patience, they ſaid, to ſee their Laws had in Deriſion, and the Place Prophan'd. The more Moderate and Subſtantial Men of the Party, were for Appealing to the Men of the Government for Juſtice and Redreſs: But for the Seditious Hot-brain'd Young-Fellows of the Faction, Nothing would ſatisfie Them but Ribaldry and Blows; and the Cæſareans, on the Other hand, were as Ready for the Encounter: The Story I told you of the Sacrifice, being purpoſely deſign'd to draw on a Quarrel. And here began the Action.

A Mock Sacrifice.

A Violent Commotion.

Jucundus, a Horſe Officer, Endeavours to Compoſe it, but in vain.

In This Difficulty the Jews Remove the Books of their Law.

They Petition for Relief, and are Puniſh'd for ſo doing.

Jucundus, a Captain of Horſe, and one that was left to keep the Peace, coming in juſt upon This Nick of Time; Order'd the Earthen Veſſel (above-mentioned) to be taken away: and then apply'd himſelf toward the allaying of the Tumult. But the Jews finding Jucundus over-born by the Cæſareans, preſently took up the Books of their Laws; and carry'd them off to (a) Narbata, a Province of That Name, ſome Sixty Furlongs from Cæſarea. Twelve of their Chief Men, with John the Publican, went to Florus at Sebaſte; with a Complaint for what had paſs'd, and a Petition for Redreſs; not forgetting to let fall a Word by the By, (though very Tenderly) of the Eight Talents. Florus caus'd them immediately to be Taken up and Bound, for preſuming to remove their Laws from Cæſarea. (That was the Pretence.)

This Action of Florus's ſtruck the Jews of Jeruſalem with a Horror and Deteſtation, to the Laſt Degree: But they found it Convenient for the Preſent to keep it to Themſelves. Florus went on all this while blowing the Coals: and for a further Enflaming of the Quarrel, he ſent in Cæſar's Name for Seventeen Talents out of the Treaſury, and for the Emperor's Service. This put the Jews in ſuch a Confuſion, that they ran up and down to the Temple and about like Mad-men; Crying out all the Way upon Cæſar, Cæſar, as loud as they could Roar, to be deliverd from the Inhumane Barbarities of Florus: purſuing him with Clamours, Mockeries, and Maledictions of all ſorts. As there was One of the Mutineers had gotten an Alms-Basket at his Back, and went about the Streets begging of Broken-Meat for the Poor Miſerable Florus in deriſion of him. But All Theſe Taunts and Abuſes had no Other Effect upon Him, then that they made his Avarice ſtill more Spiteful, as well as more Inſatiable. And then inſtead of putting a Check to the Firſt Heat of the Sedition at Cæſarea, and removing the Cauſes of the Tumult as he ought to have done, both by Duty and Contract; he takes his March with an Army of Horſe and Foot to Jeruſalem, and makes the Power of Rome only ſubſervient to his Private Paſſions and Luſts; either of Pride, Profit, or Revenge; filling the Hearts of the People wherever he came, with Confuſion and Terror.

Florus makes Matters Worſe and Worſe.

The Jews Outrageouſly foul upon Florus.

The Multitude however, after all manner of Indignities caſt upon them, put on the Countenance ſtill of an Officious Reſpect in going out to receive him upon the Way, and preparing to Entertain him with all Semblances of Honour and Eſteem, Uſual in ſuch Caſes. While they were in This Diſpoſition, to give him a ſeeming Welcome into the City, Florus quite ſpoil'd the Complement by ſending Capito a Centurion to them, with Fifty Horſe to put a ſtop to their Journy; who deliver'd his Meſſage to them in Theſe Terms. [I am to Command you, ſays he, in the Name of Florus, to go your ways home again: and to let you Underſtand that the Man you have made ſo Bold with, both in Earneſt, and in Jeſt, is not to be Cajoled into a Better Opinion of you by a Parcel of Fair and Falſe Words. If you are, in Truth, as you would be thought to be, Men of Reſolution and Courage; call That Man all thoſe Scandalous and Reproachful Names to his Face, that you did behind his Back: and aſſert That Liberty by your Arms, that you have made ſuch a Noiſe with in your Clamours.] What with This Rebuke, and the Soldiers breaking-in upon the Multitude, the People ran ſeveral Ways in a Fright, without Waiting for the Ceremony of Saluting Florus, or of paying Thoſe Offices to the Soldiers that are Cuſtomary in ſuch Encounters. They went, in fine, every Man to his Own Home; and betwixt Care and Fear, took not much Reſt That Night.

They Offer him however the Complement of a ſeeming Reſpect.

Florus turns them off with Scorn.

Florus lodg'd at This time in the Palace, and the next Day he mounted the Tribunal; the High-Prieſt and the Prime Men of the City being there Preſent. He paſs'd Bitter Reflexions upon ſome Lewd and Reviling Speeches that had been thrown out againſt him; demanding Poſitively that the Authors of them ſhould be found out and Produc'd: threat'ning withal, that he would take his Revenge upon Thoſe that were there upon the Place, if they did not bring him the Guilty. The Jews made Anſwer, That for the Body of the People, they were for Peace and Quiet: and for Thoſe that laſh'd out with their Tongues, they implor'd a Pardon for them. For it could not be Imagin'd, they ſaid, in ſo Vaſt a Multitude of People; but there muſt needs be ſome Raſh and Unexperienc'd Men in the Mixture. Neither was it Poſſible to Diſtinguiſh who were Guilty, and who not: for even Thoſe that repented of what they had done, would not yet Own the doing of it. And therefore they only Offer'd it to Florus's Conſideration, Whether any thing could be more for the Service of the Roman Empire, then to Conſult the Safety of the People and City, by preſerving them Firm in their Allegiance to Cæſar: and whether it might not be more Adviſable (in caſe of the Worſt) to ſpare ſome Few Criminals for the ſake of a Great many Innocents, then to Deſtroy ſo Great a Number of Innocent Men for the ſake of here and there One that was Guilty. This way of Reaſoning blew-up Florus into ſuch a Rage, that he preſently Order'd away the Soldiers to the Great Market in the Upper-Town, to Rifle the Place, and Kill all they met. When the Soldiers found themſelves Supported in their Claim to the Pillage by the Concurring Authority of their Commander; they did not only Execute their Order upon the Places and People they were ſent to: but all Houſes were Alike to them, and all the Inhabitants put to death without Diſtinction: as well Thoſe they took upon their Flight, in By-ways, and Secret Paſſages; as Thoſe they found in their Houſes. No Booty, in ſhort, came Amiſs to them. Several of the Nobility, that they ſeiz'd and brought to Florus, were by His Order Whipt and Crucify'd. A Grippa was at This time gone to Alexandria upon a Visit to Alexander; whom Nero had made Governour of Ægypt. His Sister Berenice was Then at Jerusalem, and in Extreme Affliction for the Barbarous Outrages that were Practis'd there: insomuch that she sent several Messages to Florus by some of her Horse-Officers and Guards; beseeching him Earnestly to hold his Hand, and spill no more Bloud. But Florus had no sense at all, either of the Heinousness of the Sin, or of the Honour of the Mediatress: His Heart was set upon Lucre and Pillage, and he look'd upon all Other Things (Berenice her self not Excepted) with Contempt and Neglect. So that the Soldiers did not only go-on, Massacring and cutting of Throats, before Berenice's Face; but had most certainly Kill'd the Queen Her self, if she had not made her Escape into the Palace: where she lay Waking all That night, with a Guard to look to her, for fear of a Surprize. The Occasion of her coming to Jerusalem, was the Paying of a Vow to Almighty God; as is Usual in cases of Providential Deliverances from Sicknesses and Other Great Dangers. It is Customary for People under those Circumstances to Continue in Prayer for Thirty Days before they Sacrifice; abstaining from Wine and Shaving the Hair. Berenice was now in her Diurnal Course of Devotion; and standing bare-foot before the Tribunal, there was she interceding to Florus for the People, but without any Success or Respect: beside that she ran the Risque of her Life for the Piety of the Office. This was the Sixteenth of the Month Artemisius.

She Mediates to Florus in favour of the Jews.

On the next day, the People Gather'd together in the Market-place (in the Upper Town) Outrageously Exclaiming against the Murderers of their Friends that were Kill'd there the Day before. But the Main Stress of their Rage and Ribaldry fell upon Florus. The Great Men and the High-Priests were so sensible of the Danger of Provoking him the same way over again, that they tore their Garments, and went about begging from Man to Man, not to Talk at That rate; for the Exasperating of Florus was the Way to Ruine them all. Upon This Application, the Multitude was a little more Compos'd: partly out of Respect to the Intercessors, and partly in Hope that the Governour's Spite was over.

The People in an Uproar Raging against Florus.

They are Reason'd into a Better Temper.

Florus Troubled at it His Project for the Raising of a new Broil.

Florus was not at all pleas'd to see Things so Quiet again; and therefore he bethought himself of a Contrivance how to Create a New Broil. He sent for the High-Priests and some of the Chief Men of the Jews to come to him, and then told them that there were Two Companies coming from Cæsarea; and it would be a Convincing Evidence of the People's Good Affection to the Government, if they would but go-out, and meet them upon the Way. The Thing being promis'd and agreed upon, Florus gave it in Charge to the Centurions, that, in case the Jews greeted them with any shew of Complement or Respect upon their Meeting, they should not pay them any manner of Civility in Return: and if but One Cross Word or Look should follow upon it, they should betake themselves to their Arms. The High-Priests got the People together into the Temple, and there Adjured them by all means to go-out and Complement the Romans upon the Way; and to be sure to give them a Friendly Salute, for fear any thing should be Ill-taken. There were several Rash Heads in the Croud against it; and the rest of the Multitude, while the Slaughter of their Friends was yet Fresh in their Memory, were Forward enough to Join in Opinion with the Incendiaries. While This was in Agitation, in-came all the Priests and Levites, exposing the Holy Vessels and Other Pretious Ornaments of the Temple: the Singing-Men and Organists with their Musical Instruments; addressing themselves to the People with Earnest Entreaties to preserve the the Honour of the Temple Sacred, without provoking the Romans by Contumelious Affronts to the Rifling of it. There were alſo divers of the High-Prieſts with Aſhes upon their Heads; their Breaſts Naked, and their Garments Torn: applying themſelves to all the Men of Dignity, one by one in Particular, and to All together in General, with repeated Importunities not to betray their Country for ſo ſmall a Matter, to Thoſe very People that gap'd after the Ruine of it. For what, ſaid they, will the Romans be the Better for't, if you ſhew them the ſame Reſpect now that you have done formerly? And what will the Jews now be the Better either for the Refuſal of it? Nay, on the Contrary, if you Treat them with Honour, and according to the Forms of Good Manners, you will leave Florus no Pretence to Trouble you; and it will effectually amount to a Redeeming of your Country from the Calamities that you have otherwiſe to Fear. You are alſo to Conſider the Diſproportion betwixt the Peaceable Majority of the Multitude, and a few ſcatter'd Mutineers; and that it is all the Reaſon in the World, that the Greater Part ſhould Over-rule the Leſs. This Way of Diſcourſe had ſuch an Effect upon the People, that betwixt Authority, Argument, and Menace, the Fierceſt Men of the Faction were brought over to hear and to do Reaſon. So ſoon as Things were brought to This Diſpoſition, the Prieſts and Princes of the People Marched out to meet the Soldiers; and the Multitude in very good Order follow'd them. When the Jews were advanc'd within diſtance of Exchanging a Ceremony, the Jews ſaluted them with Great Humanity: but Receiving no Return, the Angry Part of them fell immediately to Reviling Florus, as the Author and Contriver of all their Miſeries. The Soldiers took the Hint, and in the ſame Inſtant fell upon the Jews with Clubs and Cudgels; put them into a Confuſion, and upon the Purſuit trampled Great Numbers of them under their Horſes Feet; ſo that upon the Whole, betwixt Thoſe that dy'd of Blows and Wounds; Thoſe that were Cruſh'd to death in the Croud, or ſmother'd in the Gate by preſſing who ſhould get out Firſt, and ſo hindring one another, it was upon the Main a Miſerable Deſtruction, and as Frightful a Spectacle; for what with Bruiſes, Maims, and Suffocations, the Bodies were ſo Disfigur'd, that One Friend did not know the Face of Another, to give him decent Burial. In fine, the Enemy kill'd all they could come at: and the Thing they principally labour'd was to get betwixt the Jews and the Gate of (a) Bezeth, being a Paſs that led to the Caſtle Antonia and the Temple. Florus, at the ſame time, made a Sally out of the Palace with what Troups he had, upon the Back of the Jews, in a Proſpect of Forcing the Caſtle: but upon the People's Rallying and making Head againſt him, his Deſign fail'd him. For having now got Poſſeſſion of the Houſes, they annoy'd the Romans to ſuch a degree with Stones and Darts, from the Roofs, that the Enemy finding no Fence againſt That way of Attaque, nor any Poſſibility of breaking through the Multitudes of People that throng'd up thoſe Narrow Streets, Florus was fain to Retire with the Remainder of his Army to the Palace. The Jews being now in ſome Apprehenſion of Florus's returning to the Aſſault, and of his making an Attempt upon the Temple by the way of the Fort Antonia, they went and cut down a certain Gallery of Communication betwixt the Fort and the Temple: which was ſuch a Mortification to Florus, that finding his Project Hopeleſs, and his Avarice Diſappointed, (for the Holy Treaſure was all he aim'd at) he gave over the Enterprize. Upon This, he conferr'd with the High-Prieſt and the Senate; telling them that he was now leaving the City, and ready to aſſign them what Garriſon they ſhould think fit. Their Anſwer was, in regard that there were to be no Innovations, One Company would be ſufficient; provided it might not be That which the People had had a Quarrel with already: for they were great Sufferers by them, and lay under a Prejudice. Florus chang'd the Company, as they deſir'd, and went back with the reſt of his Army to Cæſarea.

Florus Charges the Jews to Ceſtius as Enemies to Cæſar. Berenice and ſome Great Men give Ceſtius the Truth of the Story. Ceſtius Adviſes upon it.

FLorus was no ſooner come to Cæſarea, but he found out New Matter for the Enflaming of a War, and ſent it in a Letter to Ceſtius [the Governour of Syria:] wherein he Charg'd the Jews with a Revolt, which was ſo Impudent a Falſity, that the very Crimes he Imputed to the Jews, he was Expreſly Guilty of himſelf. Now the Queen Berenice, and the Principals of Jeruſalem, were ſo Juſt and Candid in This Matter, as to give Ceſtius the Particulars of the Whole Truth, and a Punctual Account of Florus's Way of Adminiſtration. Upon the Receit of This Intimation, Ceſtius preſently Conferr'd with the Great Men about him, what he were Beſt to do. Some were for his Marching with an Army out of hand into Judæa, and to bring the Offenders to Juſtice, if the Report ſhould be found to be True; or Otherwiſe, to Encourage them in their Loyalty, if they ſhould appear to be Falſely Accus'd. Now Ceſtius Himſelf was rather of Opinion for Employing ſome Perſon of Honour and Addreſs before hand, to learn out the Truth of Things, and then for giving him a Faithful Enformation upon the Whole Affair. The Man he pitched upon was (a) Politianus a Tribune; who, meeting King Agrippa near Jamnia, in his Return from Alexandria, told him whence he came; who ſent him; and what was his Bus'neſs. There were at That time there, ſeveral High-Prieſts of the Jews; Senators, and Others of the Firſt Quality, to pay their Duty to the King: they had no ſooner paſs'd the Firſt Complement of Reſpect in courſe, but they launch'd out into a Lamentable Remonſtrance of the Miſerable State they were reduc'd to by the Inhumanities of Florus. Agrippa thought as They did; but it would not have ſtood with His Dignity to blow the Coal: ſo that he rather turn'd the Invective Artificially againſt the Jews, whom yet he Pity'd in his Heart; out of a deſire rather to Reſtrain, and Sweeten, then to Exaſperate their Paſſions: for the Leſs they might ſeem to Suffer, the Leſs Provocation could they pretend to a Revenge. They that had moſt to loſe, and certainly moſt Reaſon to deſire a Peace, could not but take That Gentle Reproach for a Signal Inſtance of the King's Goodneſs.

And Pitches upon Politianus for the Menage of the Enquiry. He meets Agrippa, and tells him his Bus'neſs.

The People of Jeruſalem Receive Politianus and Agrippa, at Sixty Stadia from the Town.

The People of Jeruſalem received Agrippa, and (b) Politianus, upon the Way, Sixty Furlongs from the City, out of Reſpect, to attend them up to the Town: the Women all the while bitterly bewailing the Loſs of their Murder'd Husbands; and the Whole Multitude, after their Example, burſting out into Tears and Lamentations as by Conſent: ſome of them Imploring Agrippa in Generoſity to take Pity of the Nation; and Others begging of (c) Politianus but to go into the City, and ſee what Havock Florus had made there. Upon This, they took him into the Market-Place, and ſhew'd him how every Thing was abandon'd there and Forlorn, and the Houſes all in Rubbiſh. They Prevailed with (d) Politianus after This, by the Means of Agrippa, to take the Tour of the City as far as the Pool of Siloah, and only one Servant along with him: where he ſhould ſee with his Own Eyes how Obedient the Jews were to all Other Romans in Authority: But for the Horrid Cruelties of Florus, they were utterly Intolerable. When he had taken a View of the City, and Enform'd himſelf ſufficiently in the Loyal Diſpoſitions of the Jews, he call'd the People together, and went up to the Temple: where he Enter'd into a Declamatory Commendation of their Approved Fidelity to the Romans; and then, after Enlarging himſelf in Exhortations and Good Councils, upon the Subject of the Common Peace, he gave God Praiſes and Thankſgivings, with all Veneration for his Holy Religion, in Place and Manner according to the Law; and ſo went back to Ceſtius.

They ſhew Politianus what Havock Florus has made up and down the City.

Politianus

Politianus had no ſooner turn'd his Back, but the Multitude immediately addreſs'd themſelves to the King and the High-Prieſts, preſſing for Leave to ſend Embaſſadors to Nero with a Complaint againſt Florus: For if we (ſaid they) ſhould ſit ſtill, without bringing ſo bloudy an Outrage to an Examination, and putting the Authors of it to the Teſt, it would look as if we our ſelves were the Criminals, and durſt not abide the Tryal. It was Clear on the one hand, that it would be Dangerous for Agrippa to refuſe them This Liberty; and it had, at the ſame time, the Face of an Invidious Proſecution, on the Other, to turn looſe the Multitude againſt their Governour by ſuch an Invective, under the Name of an Embaſſy. So that Agrippa, finding Himſelf divided betwixt the Bold and Martial Humour of the Romans, and the Hazard of Tranſporting the Jews into a Tumult, call'd an Aſſembly to meet in a Great Gallery; and after the Placing of his Siſter Berenice upon a Chair of State, in the Aſmonæan Palace, which overlooks That Gallery from the Upper Part of the Town (the Temple and the Gallery being join'd by a Bridge) he ſpake to the People after This Manner.

The People preſs for a Complaint to Nero againſt Florus.

The Danger of ſuch a Proceeding.

Agrippa calls an Aſſembly.

If I found you now under any ſort of Diſpoſition to make War upon the Romans, as I am at This time clearly Convinc'd of the Contrary; and that the Greater Part of Your Profeſſion are Men of Peace and Order, I ſhould have Sav'd both You and My ſelf This Trouble. For what would any Application or Advice of mine Signify, to a Body of Men that labour under an Incurable Prejudice? But in regard that ſome People are purely Unquiet for want of an Experimental Knowledge of the Miſeries of War: ſome out of a Vain and Inconſiderate Hope of Liberty; others out of Avarice, for the Advantage of the Booty, and making Profit to themſelves out of a General Confuſion: in regard, I ſay, of theſe Corruptions and Miſtakes, I have now thought fit to call you together; and to tell you what I think Convenient to be done under your Circumſtances, in order to the rectifying of your Errours, and to prevent the Ruines of a Dutiful Majority by the Intemperate Heats of a few Deſperate Libertines. All I deſire is only your Patience and Silence, and to be heard without Murmuring and Noiſe, whether you like what I ſay or not. As for Thoſe that are abandon'd to the Spirit of Diſorder and Confuſion, and irrecoverably Loſt; They are ſtill at Liberty to go their own way, let my Opinion be what it will. But it is to no Purpoſe for me to ſpeak at all unleſs I may be heard by Thoſe that deſire to hear me.

A Healing Speech of Agrippa to the Jews.

I know very well that the Faults of Governours, and the Bleſſings of Liberty, are Two Common Topiques for Men of Art and Paſſion to work upon. Now before I enter upon the Diſquiſition of what You your ſelves are, and the Force you are pretending to Encounter, I muſt, in the Firſt Place, divide Two Points that you Confound, by taking them into One. If Revenge upon your Oppreſſors, (or let it be Juſtice, if you pleaſe) be the Thing that you Contend for, What's the meaning of your Crying up Liberty at ſuch an Extravagant Rate? Or, if Subjection be in it ſelf ſo Intolerable, What's the Quarrel to your Governours? For let them be the beſt Natur'd People under the Cope of Heaven, Subjection is but Subjection ſtill; and ſo ſtill as Scandalous as it was before.

The Faults of Government and the Bleſſings of Liberty are the Common Subjects for Art and Paſſion to work upon.

Whether Rulers be Good or Bad, Subjection is Subjection ſtill.

Take Things to pieces now, and Conſider a little; upon what Ground it is that you pretend to Calumniate and Cavil; and in what manner you are to behave your Selves, even if your Governour ſhould be to Blame. It is Your Intereſt, as well as Your Duty, to Sweeten Things with Offices of Tenderneſs and Reſpect, and not to Treat Your Superiors with Brawls and Courſe Language. When you make Things greater then they are, you provoke Thoſe that are over you to make Things worſe then they would otherwiſe be: and to turn That Male-Adminiſtration that they were half aſham'd of before, into a Bare-fac'd, raging Tyranny. There's Nothing takes off the Edge of Oppreſſion, like Patience: Reſignation is enough to put Perſecution out of Countenance, even let it be never ſo Violent and Unjuſt.

We owe a Duty and Reſpect even to the Worſt of Governours.

Make it the Caſe now, that You are in truth extremely abus'd by the Roman Government, will you have This to be the Act preſently of all the Romans: nay and of Cæſar Himſelf too? And there's your Quarrel. You cannot Imagine that Thoſe Governours have it in their Commiſſion to Oppreſs you; or that Cæſar Himſelf can look Eaſt and Weſt, and ſo thorough the Four Quarters of the World all at a Time; when 'tis no Eaſy Matter for him to get a Faithful Account at Rome, even of what is done here. How Great a Madneſs is it then to run the Riſque of ſo Dangerous a War for Trifles; and, in very deed, for we know not what! Beſide that Matters may mend in time; for Governours are neither Immortal nor Perpetual; but they take their Turns: and it is Reaſonable enough to hope, and to Promiſe our ſelves, that the next Comer will be Better. Now when a War is once Commenc'd, 'tis neither to be let-fall, nor to be continu'd without Miſerable Inconveniences. As for Thoſe that ſet-up for Liberty, let them have a Care, in the Firſt Place, not to run themſelves out of it; for the Laſt Slavery is always the Uneaſyeſt, and to avoid That Yoke muſt be acknowledged a Juſt Cauſe of War: for he that is once a Subject, and then falls off, is rather a Stubborn Slave, then a Generous Advocate of Freedom.

A Diſſwaſive from Sedition.

If any thing could have been done againſt the Might of the Romans, why was it not done when Pompey brake-in upon us? But if your Fore-fathers, and the Princes of Thoſe Times, (though much your Superiors, in Men, Money, and Conduct) were not able to ſtand before ſo Inconſiderable a Detachement of their Power; with what Face or Senſe can you pretend now, at This time of the Day, to bid Defiance to the Whole Body of the Empire? To ſay nothing of the Obligation of an Hereditary Allegeance, of ſo Long a Continuance, that hath deſcended from your Predeceſſors to their Poſterity.

The Bravery of the Athenians was not able to ſupport them againſt the Romans.

What do you think of Thoſe Brave and Generous Athenians, that Conteſted for the Liberty of Greece, to the very Extremity of Laying their Country in Aſhes? Thoſe People that brought down the Proud Heart of the Vain and Inſolent Xerxes: put him to Flight at (a) Salamis; and having broken the whole Power of Aſia, forced him to ſhift for himſelf in a Cock-boat: That Haughty Prince that turn'd the Sea into Land, and the Land into Sea, to make Room for his Fleets and Armies; that look'd as if they would have ſwallow'd Europe: and yet the Nation that did All This are now Subjects to the Romans; and Greece receives Laws from Italy.

The Lacedæmonians.

The Caſe is the ſame with the Lacedæmonians too; after all their Famous Exploits at Thermopylæ and Platea; and Ageſilaus's Carrying their Victorious Arms into the Heart of Aſia. And yet at preſent Theſe Heroes own the ſame Maſters ſtill?

The Macedonians, &c. had All the ſame Maſters.

To come now to the Macedonians, with their Philips, and their Alexanders, ſtill running in their Heads: a People that to This very Day propoſe little Leſs to Themſelves then the Empire of the Univerſe: Has not Fortune reduc'd Theſe People alſo to the ſame Fate, and of Conquerours made them Subjects? And Subjects alſo to the ſame Governours. I might reckon up a Great many other Nations now, much more Conſiderable then your ſelves, that in the Vanity of an Ambitious Contention for Liberty, have been forced to Submit and to Obey: and are you the only Men in the World do ye think, that are too Good to ſerve the Sovereign Lords of all other People? Where's your Militia, or the Arms that you depend upon? Your Fleets to Scoure the Roman Seas? And where's your Treaſure to Anſwer the Expence of This Undertaking? You Phancy an Ægyptian or an Arabian War perhaps: but you proceed altogether upon Falſe Meaſures, without Comparing the Diſproportion betwixt your Ability and your Undertaking, and the Inequality betwixt a Weak and a Diſorderly People, and the Stability of a Formidable Empire. 'Tis a Common Thing for you to be Over-run and Surpriz'd by your Next Neighbours; when at the ſame time the Romans carry'd the Whole World before them.

The Power and Majeſty of Rome.

The Romans Lords of the Univerſe.

Nay, and the Known World would not Content them neither; for though they were poſſeſs'd of the Courſe of the Euphrates to the Eaſt; the Danube to the North; the Libyan Deſart to the South, and as far as Cadiz to the Weſt: Nothing would ſerve them but Another World beyond the Ocean, and the Carrying of their Arms into Brittany; which at That time was look'd upon as Inacceſſible. But what is it now that you pretend to all this while? Would you be thought Richer then the Gaules; Hardier then the Germans, or Wiſer then the Greeks; or do you take your ſelves to be Hard enough for all Mankind beſide? Upon what Ground is it that you are thus Bold and Confident againſt the Romans? It will be ſaid perhaps that it is an Uneaſy, and an Irkſome Thing, to Serve: but if it be ſo to you, what muſt it be to the Greeks? who, over and above a Large Extent of Territory, are look'd upon as Men of the Nobleſt Extraction of any People under the Sun: and yet Theſe Men, Great and Noble as they are, live in Obedience to the Romans. And ſo do the Macedonians alſo; who have undoubtedly more Right to a Claim of Liberty then you can pretend to. Or what do ye ſay to the Five Hundred Cities of Aſia that peaceably ſubmit themſelves to a Conſul, without any Guard or Garriſon to Over-awe them. To ſay nothing of the Heniochians; the Colchians; the Nations about the Boſphorus, and the Inhabitants of the Coaſts of Pontus, and the Lake of Mæotis: People ſo Free in Former Times, that they never had ſo much as a Maſter among Themſelves; and yet Three Thouſand Romans were enough to keep them all in Subjection: and Forty Galleys ſufficient to Preſerve all Thoſe Seas in Peace and Obedience, which no Creature durſt Venture upon before.

Had the Bithynians, Cappadocians, Pamphylians, Lidyans, and Cicilians, nothing to ſay for themſelves upon the Point of Liberty? for they are at preſent all Tributaries, and pay their Duties, without Soldiers to Compel them. And how is it with the Thracians now in a Large Country of Seven Days Journey in Length, and Five Over; and much more Rude, and more Defenſible then yours: being almoſt Impaſſable for the Bitter Froſts, and Deep Snows there; and yet a Guard of only Two Thouſand Romans keeps them all in Order. And then for the Illyrians from beyond the Danube as far as Dalmatia, and ſo likewiſe the Dacians: They are All under the Guard only of Two Legions. Nay, the Dalmatians Themſelves, after ſo many Conteſts for Liberty; ſo many Baffles in the At- tempt,

tempt, and ſo many Rallies and Reinforcements afterwards, in proſecution of the ſame Deſign; how Quiet and Eaſy are they under the Command of One Single Legion!

But after all This; if any Pretence whatſoever might Juſtify a Revolt, the Gaules of all Men Living have the Greateſt Encouragement, and Temptation to do it, in the very Situation of their Country. For they are Naturally Fortify'd; On the Eaſt, with the Alps; the Rhine, on the North; the Pyrenæan Mountains, on the South; and on the Weſt, with the Ocean. But all theſe Advantages notwithſtanding; Three Hundred and Fifteen Nations in the ſame Intereſt; an Inexhauſtible Source of all Good Things within themſelves both for Uſe and Commerce, not only for their Own, but likewiſe for the Common Benefit of Mankind: and yet we find Theſe People under the Roman Allegeance; and propounding no other Happineſs to Themſelves then in That of their Maſters. And This Reſignation does not ariſe from the Want of Courage, either Natural or Acquir'd; or from the Want of Brave Examples in their Anceſtors; who had ſtood a Diſpute of Eighty Years for the Maintenance of their Liberty: but finding ſo Admirable a Concurrence of Fortune and Virtue in the Actions of the Romans, the Gaules were ſo ſurpriz'd betwixt the Veneration they had for the One, and their Dread of the Other, that the Romans gain'd as much upon them by their Goodneſs as by their Arms: inſomuch that at This Day, with only Twelve Hundred Men, they ſecure almoſt as many Cities in their Allegeance.

What was Spain the Better now for their Golden Mines, when they came to Contend with the Romans for their Freedom? Or I might Inſtance in Nations more Remote from Rome, both by Sea and Land; as the Luſitanians, and Cantabrians: where neither Valour, Diſtance, nor Poſition, could Warrant them againſt the Power of Rome; though Bordering upon a Sea ſo Impetuous, that it is not to be ſo much as Nam'd, or thought of, without Dread and Horror. And what ſignify'd Hercules's Pillars, or the Pyrenæan Mountains; ſo many Warlike Nations in the Way; Diſtance, or any Other Difficulty, to the Obſtructing of the Progreſs of their Victorious Arms? But they were reduced as well as the reſt; and One ſingle Legion ſerv'd for a Guard upon them All.

I need not tell you that the Germans are a Populous Nation, and that their Country is of a Vaſt Extent: the People Strong, and Big-limb'd; their Courage Anſwerable to their Size and Stature; and Firm to the very Contempt of Death it ſelf. But Part of This, you are Eye-Witneſſes of; for the Romans have Slaves of that Nation all over the Earth: In their Anger they are more Outrageous then Brutes; and the Rhine is at This Day their Frontier. They have a Guard of Eight Roman Legions upon them, that make Slaves of as many of them as they Take, and the reſt ſave themſelves by Flight.

As for Thoſe that place ſo much Confidence in the Walls of Jeruſalem, they ſhould do well to conſider the Walls of Brittany; where the Inhabitants are ſurrounded by the Sea, in a kind of a New World not much Inferior to the Other. They have made themſelves Maſters of This Vaſt Iſland too, and aſſigned only Four Legions for a Guard upon it. And what ſhall we ſay of the Parthians now? A Powerful and a Warlike People, that have heretofore given Laws to ſo many Great Nations Themſelves. What's the Meaning of ſending the Flower of their Nobility for Hoſtages to Rome, but a Tacit Acknowledgment of Subjection under the Colour of Peace? Are we the Only Men in the World to make War upon the Empire, when All Other Nations tremble under the Apprehenſion of their Arms?

Pray Call to mind the Fate of Carthage, a People that Valu'd Themſelves as Branches of the Noble Race of the Phœnicians, that had the Honour of the Famous Hannibal for their Commander. What was the End of That Brave People, but to fall under the Conquering Arms of Scipio?

But neither the Cyrenæans, of the Lacedæmonian Race; nor the Marmaridans that ſtretched their Dominion as far as the parch'd Deſarts; nor the Syrtes, ſo frightful to our Apprehenſions; nor the Naſamonians; nor the Moors; nor the Numberleſs Multitude of the Numidians, were able to put any Check to the Roman Courage. They had reduced in fine the Third Part of the World to their ſubjection, ſo large that the very Nations are hardly to be Number'd, beginning from the Atlantick-Sea, and the Pillars of Hercules, to the Red-Sea, and Comprizing all the Æthiopia's. All This they took by Arms; reſerving over and above to Themſelves, a Yearly Tribute of Corn, ſufficient to Maintain the People of Rome for Eight Months: beſide Other Duties that they pay Chearfully and Readily, though there be but One Legion in Garriſon to raiſe the Contribution.

But here's no need of Recourſe to Remote Examples for Proof of the Uncontroulable Power of Rome, when we may have Inſtances ſo much nearer hand. As for the Purpoſe, in Ægypt: a Kingdom that ſtretches out as far as Æthiopia and Arabia-Felix; contiguous to the Indies; and an Infinite Multitude of People in it, beſide Thoſe of Alexandria: and yet This Mighty Populous Kingdom does not think much to be rated by the Poll toward the ſervice of the State, and as a Tributary to the Romans; but frankly anſwers the Impoſition, though not without ſome Ground plauſible enough to grumble at it.

How comes it now that Alexandria does not Revolt too? A Strong, a Large, and an Opulent City; Thirty Furlongs in Length, and Ten in Breadth: Prodigiously Peopl'd, and Fortify'd round about it, either with Deſolated Deſarts; Seas without Ports; Deep Rivers, or Boggy Quagmires. But the Fortune of Rome ſurmounted all Theſe Difficulties: for Two Legions in the City were enough to ſecure the (a) Peace of Ægypt, and to Bridle the Macedonian Nobility. Now this City paid more Tribute in a Month then You do in a Year: and Four-Months-Proviſion in Corn for the People of Rome, beſide Money.

If This be the Caſe, What Deſarts do you Propound to repair to for Companions in your Undertaking? For All the Habitable Part of the World is Clearly againſt you; and in Effect, Romans; unleſs you flatter your ſelves with Hopes of Aſſiſtance from your Country-Men the Adiabenians on the Other Side of the Euphrates. But ſuppoſing now that they could be Guilty of ſo Groſs an Overſight as to Engage in a War ſo Deſperate, upon ſo Unreaſonable a Ground; the Parthians Themſelves would never Endure ſuch a Diſreſpect toward the Romans as muſt inevitably end in a Rupture, by Countenancing a War againſt them. So that you have no Retreat left but a Recourſe to God's Power (in Truth) againſt his Providence; which is moſt Evidently ſeen in the Advance, Eſtabliſhment, and Protection of the Roman Empire.

Agrippa Reflects upon the Conſcience and Religion of the War.

Conſider again the Conſcience and Religion of the War, even if You Your Selves were the Stronger of the Two. How can You pretend to Diſpence with the Violation both of God's and of Your Own Laws; or to Expect a Bleſſing from Heaven in the very Act of your Diſobedience? If you (b) keeep the Sabbaoth-day as Strictly and Religiouſly as you Profeſs, and as your Laws bind you to do; You will moſt certainly be Caught in the ſame Snare over again that your Predeceſſors were Hamper'd in by Pompey heretofore: That is to ſay; by taking Advantage of Your Scruples, and falling upon You on Thoſe Days when You dare not ſo much as move a Hand to Defend your ſelves. Now if you make no Conſcience of breaking the Laws, in Fighting One Day as well as Another, how do you Fight for the Maintaining of them, and how can you look for any Favour from God in the Deliberate Breach of his Own Commandments? Who ever made War but in Hope of Aſſiſtance either from God or Man? and when Both fail, what can be the Conſequence but a Voluntary Wilful Slavery? If This be your Reſolution, what have you more to do but to lay Violent Hands upon your Wives and Children, and to lay your Glorious Country in Aſhes? The Extravagant Madneſs of the Action will be ſome ſort of Excuſe for it: beſide that it will ſave you the Diſhonour of falling by the Hand of an Enemy.

'Tis a High Point of Wiſdom, my Good Friends, and, upon my Word, a very Neceſſary Point, to foreſee, and to provide for a Storm while the Ship is yet in the Harbour: and it is as Dangerous, on the Other Hand, to put-off the Conſideration of it till the Tempeſt is upon You, and then to ſtand Trembling, and at your Wits end, which way to turn your ſelves. As for thoſe Calamaties that Threaten us at Unawares, and by Surprize; People that fall into them are to be Pitty'd; for there's no Preventing of Evils not to be foreſeen: but for Men that run Head-long into Viſible Hazzards, they fall not only Unlamented, but with Infamy alſo, and Scandal.

Your way of Proceeding in this Affair would almoſt perſuade a Body that you are already agreed upon Terms with the Romans, how they are to Behave Themſelves in Caſe of Gaining their Point. That is to ſay; with Tenderneſs and Moderation, and not According to the Practice of Other Nations, with Fire and Sword; burning your Sacred Cities; Extirpating your Whole Race, and deſtroying Every Man of you, upon the Purſuit, that Outlives the Dint of the Battel: for which way can you Fly, but into the very Mouths of your Enemies; who are either the Subjects of Rome already, or ſuch as live in fear of being quickly made ſo.

The Cauſe of the Jews is One Common Cauſe.

And you are not to flatter your ſelves that this Calamity will ſtop here neither; but all the Jews upon the Face of the Earth are to Expect Your Fate: and the Whole Univerſe will Join as one Man, to the Puniſhing of this Rebellion. You will remember what I tell you now, when you ſhall ſee the Streets run Bloud, to Gratify the Impetuous Violences of a few Turbulent and Hot-Headed Councels. And the Romans are not to be Blam'd at laſt, for doing only That which You Your Selves have forc'd them to: and You are then to Conſider, on the Other ſide, in caſe they ſhould Spare You, what an Impiety you have to Anſwer for, in the Abuſe of ſo much Humanity and Good Nature.

Or if You have no longer any Senſe now of Natural Tenderneſs for Your Wives and Children, have at leaſt ſome Compaſſion for Your Capital City, and the Sacred Walls of it: have Mercy even upon the Temple; your Law, and the Holy Sanctuary; which You Your Selves are now about to deſtroy with Your Own Hands: for You are never to hope for Mercy again from the Romans, after ſo Ungrateful an Abuſe of the Indulgences you have formerly received from them.

But

But to Conclude, I do here call God and his Holy Angels, and our Whole Country, and all that is Sacred, to Witneſs: that for my Own Part, I have done whatever in me lay toward your Preſervation. If you will do as you Ought to do, and follow my Councel, you may yet live in Peace: but if you go-on in This Deſperate way of Tumult and Outrage, I will have no more to do with You.

This Diſcourſe of Agrippa was Seconded ſo Effectually with the Tears of his Siſter Berenice, who was there Preſent, that they both Wept, and the People abated ſomewhat of their Violence, and fell to Muttering One with Another, that Their Quarrel was not to the Romans; but to Florus, for the Indignities he had put upon them. And yet ſays Agrippa, You do the very ſame Things that the Profeſs'd Enemies of Rome would do. Have you not broken down the Antonian Galleries: and do you not refuſe Cæſar his Tribute? Now if you would remove all Pretence of Jealouſy, you have no more to do then, without any further delay, but to Pay the One, and to Rebuild the Other: for This is none, either of Florus's Fort or Tribute.

The People were now coming to Themſelves again, and very Orderly waited upon the King and Berenice up to the Temple; where they apply'd themſelves immediately to the Re-edifying of the Galleries, and at the ſame time ſent their Agents and Officers up and down the Province to gather up the Duty that was behind: which was forthwith Collected and pay'd-in; being the Juſt Sum of Forty Talents, which was the whole Arriere.

The Violent Rage of the Tumult being ſomewhat abated, Agrippa adviſed the Multitude to ſubmit to Florus for the Preſent, till Cæſar ſhould ſend them Another Governour. This put the People in ſuch a Flame, that they did not only give him Inſolent Reviling Language; but pelted him with Stones, and drove him out of the City. The King was Senſible of the Contempt, to the Higheſt Degree, and finding the Rabble ſo Inſufferably Bold, and Ungovernable, He ſent ſeveral Men of Quality to Florus at Cæſarea to make ſuch Choice out of them as he thought fit, to ſerve as Collectors for the whole Province; and ſo Agrippa Departed.

Agrippa brings the People in ſome Meaſure to their Wits again.

SOon after this, there was a Strong Party of the Faction gotten by Stealth into Maſſada, a Roman Garriſon: where they Surpriz'd the Soldiers; put all the Romans to the Sword, and a Guard of their Own People into their Places.

Maſſada Surpriz'd, and the Garriſon put to the Sword.

There happen'd at the ſame time, Another Diſorder alſo, in the Temple at Jeruſalem. One Eleazar, the Son of Ananias the High-Prieſt; a Deſperate Daring Young Man, and a Military Officer then in Command, preſs'd ſome of his Friends among the Prieſts, not to receive any Offering or Sacrifice but from the Nation of the Jews. Now This was the very Ground and Foundation of a War with the Romans: for upon this Inſtance of Eleazar's, Cæſar's Sacrifices came to be rejected that were Offer'd-up in Courſe for the Welfare of the People of Rome. The High-Prieſts, and the Men of the Beſt Quality declar'd themſelves Extremely Unſatisfy'd with the Novelty of that Prohibition; and with Great Importunities deſir'd the Continuance of ſo Pious a Cuſtom as the Offering-up of Prayers for Princes and Governours: but the Mutineers were Stiff and Inexorable; depending upon the Strength of their Numbers; for all that were for Innovations were on their Side: Eleazar being look'd upon more Particularly as the Head of the Sedition; a Perſon (as I ſaid before) of Courage, and in Command. This Occaſion brought together the Princes, the High-Prieſts, and the Phariſees of the Firſt Quality, to adviſe what was Beſt to be done upon the Preſent Juncture: for They ſaw Manifeſtly the Mortal Conſequences that threaten'd the City by this Tumult. They debated the Point, and came to this Reſolution; to try what they were able to do toward Pacifying the Minds of the People. In Order to this Experiment; they call'd the People

The Jews Reject the Romans Cuſtomary Sacrifices.

Eleazar the Head of the Faction; And This Refuſal the Ground of the War.

Men of the Beſt Quality are for Moderate Councels.

People together in a Body before the Brazen-Gate, (as they call'd it) on the Inſide of the Temple to the Eaſtward: and there they began their Diſcourſe with Reflexions upon the Raſhneſs of the Enterprize, and of Involving their Country in ſo Deſtructive a War. From thence they proceeded to the Unreaſonable Ground of the Diſpute, and the Injuſtice of the Cauſe: for ſo far were their Predeceſſors, they ſaid, from Prohibiting or Refuſing Oblations from Strangers, (which would have been a Wicked Thing) that they were, in ſome ſort, a Part of their Worſhip: their Preſents, as appears to this very Day, being preſerved in the Temple as Ornaments, and in Honour to the Memory of the Preſenters.

The Impiety and Injuſtice of the Prohibition.

But to be now Provoking the Romans to a Dangerous War: and to the Scandal, if not the Ruine of Jeruſalem it ſelf; by ſetting-up New Methods of Religion (for this Impious Interdiction, to the Excluding of all ſorts of People but Jews, from Offering up Prayers and Oblations to God in his Holy Temple, imports no leſs:) This has the Face I ſay of ſo Extravagant an Impoſition, that the very Inhumanity of it were not to be Excus'd, even in the Caſe of any Private Perſon: But to make it General, and carry it to the Whole People of Rome; and effectually, to the Excommunicating of Cæſar Himſelf, the Affront muſt needs be Unpardonable. But what if this Contempt ſhould be turn'd upon Us now, and we that refuſe to Offer up Prayers and Oblations for Other People, ſhould not be allowed the Liberty hereafter of Worſhipping for Our Selves? when the City ſhall be left without all manner of Diſcipline; as This we are to Expect unleſs we Repent, and make Satisfaction before Cæſar comes to the Knowledge of the Uncharitable and Fooliſh Things we have done already.

An Affront to Cæſar himſelf.

With theſe Words, ſeveral of the Beſt Read-Men they had in the Jewiſh Rites and Laws, ſtood forth with Preſidents and Reports of the Practices of Former Times, upon the Point in Queſtion; who did all Agree and Declare, that their Anceſtors never refuſed the Receiving of Oblations from Strangers. But the Innovators; whoſe Bus'neſs was War, not Peace, gave no Heed to what they ſaid: neither did the Levites ſo much as ſhew themſelves at the Altar; being wholly Intent upon the War.

Preſidents and Reports in favour of the Practice.

When the Men of Quality found the Multitude too ſtrong for the Government, and Themſelves the Likelieſt Men to fall firſt under the Laſh of the Romans, they laid their Heads together, and agreed upon ſending Deputies with Inſtructions to make Things Eaſier to them: ſome to Florus; and Simon, the Son of Ananias the Chief of them: Others to Agrippa; the Principals being Saul, Antipas, and Coſtobarus: which Laſt was a Kinſman of Agrippa's. Their Bus'neſs was to Sollicit them both to come with ſome Troups to Jeruſalem to Cruſh the Rebellion in time.

They Apply themſelves to Florus and Agrippa for Succour.

This was the Beſt News in the World to Florus, that had a mind to Enflame the War, how Calamitous ſoever in it ſelf: as appear'd by the Delay of his Anſwer to the Deputies, on purpoſe to give the Rebels Opportunity to gather to a Head. But Agrippa, that was for the Common Good, had a mind to ſave both Parties the beſt they could; the Guilty as well as the Innocent; and by that means to ſecure the Jews to the Romans, and Jeruſalem to the Jews. But yet however finding his Own Intereſt at Stake too, he ſent Two Thouſand Auxiliary Horſe: That is to ſay, from Auranitis, Batanæa, and Trachonitis; with Darius in the Head of them, and Philip the Son of Joachim their General.

Agrippa ſends Troups to Jeruſalem.

The Princes of the People, with the High Prieſts, and all that were for Peace, received theſe Deputies into the Upper-Town; the Lower Part, and the Temple, being already in the Hands of the Faction. They began a Skirmiſh with Darts and Stones, and ſo to Bows and Arrows on Both Sides, without Intermiſſion: and now and then upon Sallies, and Excurſions, they fought alſo hand to hand. The Rebels ſeem'd to be the more Daring; but the King's Men underſtood the Art of War the better of the Two. The Thing they principally preſs'd, was the Forcing of the Sacrilegious Faction out of the Temple: while Eleazar and his Complices labour'd as hard on the Other Side to make themſelves Maſters of the Upper-Town. The Diſpute laſted Seven Days, without any manner of Advance on either hand, but with Great Slaughter on Both Sides.

A War begun in the City.

A very Great Slaughter.

The Feſtival of (a) Xylophoria (as they call it) now drawing on: which had the Name from the Cuſtom of Carrying Wood to the Temple, to keep Fire all the Year long, they excluded the Rebels from their Worſhip. But while a Party of the Jews were abroad upon this Office, a Band of Cut-Throats (known by the Name of Sicarii, from the Privy Daggers they wore) fell-in among Theſe People; and ſo Emprov'd the Advantage, that the King's Troups being overborn, both with Hardineſs, and Number, Quitted the Upper-Town; and the Faction immediately took Poſſeſſion of it. They brake, after this, into the Houſe of Ananias the High-Prieſt, and burnt the Palace of Agrippa and Berenice to Aſhes: propoſing in the next place, to ſet Fire to the Offices of Record; and to Deſtroy Both together, that Creditors might have Nothing to ſhew for their Money: not doubting by this Contrivance to draw over all the Beggers and Debtors into their Intereſt; and ſo to turn the Squabble into a Direct War of the Poor againſt the Rich, under the Colour of Aſſerting their Liberties. The Keepers, in fine, that had theſe Papers and Securities in Charge, abandon'd their Truſt, and Shifted away for Themſelves: and Both Records and Offices were all Burnt. After this Maim to the Strength and Credit of the City, they apply'd themſelves more particularly to the Proſecution of the War.

Men of the Beſt Quality Creep into Sinks and Vaults.

In this Deplorable Confuſion, ſeveral of the Nobility and High-Prieſts were forced to fly for their Safety into Sinks and Vaults; Others got into the Upper-Palace among the King's Troups, bolting the Door after them, and making good the Paſſage: Ananias the High-Prieſt, Hezechias his Brother, and Agrippa's Deputies being of the Number.

The Faction Contented themſelves for the Preſent with the Victory they had gotten, and the Miſchief they had done: and ſo lay ſtill a-while, and Paus'd upon it. But the Day following being the Fifteenth of the Month Lons, they attaqu'd the Caſtle of Antonia: and after Two Days they carry'd it by Aſſault; Cut the Whole Garriſon to pieces, and burnt the Place: paſſing from thence to the Palace, where Agrippa's Troups had taken Sanctuary. They divided themſelves into Four Bodies, and attempted the Undermining of the Walls; but the Defendents were fain to keep Cloſe, as not being Strong enough to venture a Sally. The Agreſſors all this while ply'd their Works, and ſeveral of the Faction, as well as the Sicarii, periſh'd under the Walls. In ſhort, they fought Day and Night without Reſpite: the Faction, in hope of making the Defendents Deſperate by Starving them; and the Defendents propounding to Tire out the Faction with the Fatigue of a Continual Duty.

Antonia Taken by Aſſault.

There was among theſe People, One (a) Manahem, the Son of Judas of Gallilee; a Crafty Man, and an Artificial Orator: This was He that formerly upbraided the Jews under Cyrenius, for Profeſſing to Worſhip One God, and yet at the ſame time Owning the Romans for their Maſters. This Manahem had a Deſign upon Herod's Arſenal at Maſſada; ſo he inveigled ſeveral Men of Quality into his Party; took them along with him, and forc'd the Place; Arm'd a Company of Vagabonds and Beggerly Fellows out of it; and with Them for his Guard, away he Marched like a Little King to Jeruſalem; ſets-up for the Head of the Mutineers, and accordingly gives his Orders in Form for the Carrying on of the Palace-Siege.

Manahem Heads the Jeruſalem Rebels.

The Thing they moſt wanted was Machines; for there was no Working at the Foot of the Wall within View of an Enemy over their Heads to gall them from above: ſo that they began to break Ground at a diſtance, and carry'd-on a Cover'd Way to the Foot of one of the Towers; which they Undermin'd at the Foundation, and then propt it-up with Timbers to Support the Weight. When they had finiſh'd the Work, they ſet Fire to thoſe Timbers, and ſo withdrew: and thoſe Pillars being Conſum'd, the Turret fell to the Ground. But the King's Troups were aware it ſeems of this Stratagem, and ran up Another Wall immediately behind the Turret to make the Place good. This Diſcovery, upon the Fall of One of the Towers, and when they reckon'd their Work as good as done too, put the Beſiegers into the Greateſt Aſtoniſhment and Confuſion imaginable. But yet for all this, the King's People in the Palace ſent to Manahem, and the Other Leaders of the Mis-rule that were with him, for leave to Depart: which was preſently Granted; but only to the King's People, and Others of his Religion, who forthwith went their way.

A Notable Stratagem Defeated.

The King's People get leave to Depart.

This put the Romans quite out of Heart that ſtay'd behind; for they were neither Able to deal with ſo Vaſt a Number, neither could they in Honour deſcend to Treat with Rebels: beſide the Hazard of lying at the Mercy of Men that had neither Honour nor Faith. In This Extremity they quitted the Camp as not Defenſible, and betook Themſelves to the King's Forts; as Hippon, Phaſael, and Mariamne. Manahem's People immediately breaking in as faſt as the Soldiers quitted; Killing all they could lay their Hands on; Stripping the Places of all the Furniture, and in the Concluſion burning the Camp. The Death of Ananias and Hezekiah

ON the Day following, Ananias the High-Prieſt was taken up out of One of the Sinks about the Court, where he had hid himſelf, and his Brother Hezekiah with him; and Both put to death by ſome of the Sicarii. The Faction ſet Strict Guards alſo about the Forts; inſomuch that none of the Soldiers could make their Eſcapes. Now what with the Ravaging of ſo many Fortify'd Places, and the Death of Ananias the High-Prieſt; Manahem was puff'd up into ſo Vain and Overweaning a Conceit of Himſelf, that he became the moſt Inhumane and Inſupportable Tyrant upon the Face of the Earth; as if no Man Living had the Spirit of Government but Himſelf. Theſe Savage Inſolencies gave Occaſion to Eleazar, and ſome Few of his Confidents, to Enter into a Diſcourſe one with another upon This Subject. It cannot be for ſhame, ſays one of them, that any Man that has lifted up his Hand againſt the Romans in Vindication of his Liberty, ſhould betray That Liberty again to a Private Man; and truckle to ſuch a Maſter too; as, even if he were not unqualify'd for Government by his Cruelty, he were yet a Scandal to the Function by the very Meanneſs of his Extraction. If there be an Abſolute Neceſſity of ſetting-up one Man above all the reſt, Manahem certainly of all Mortals is not to be That Man. When they had talk'd themſelves into a Reſolution, they went together in That Heat up to the Temple: and there was Manahem attending his Devotions, in the Pomp of a Prince, both for his Dreſs and Train, in his Royal Robes, and with his Armed Guards about him. While he was Priding himſelf there in the Huff of his Glory, ſome of Eleazar's People made a Violent Aſſault upon his Perſon; which ſet the People preſently a-ſtoning (a) him, upon a Phancy that all would be well again if he were but gone. His Guards made a ſhew of ſome ſlight Reſiſtance, till they ſaw that the Whole Multitude were againſt him: and then Every Man ſhifted away the Beſt he could. They Kill'd as many as they could Take, and hunted out the reſt as far as was Poſſible. Some few got privately into Maſſada; as Eleazar for one, the Son of Jairus, and Manahem's near Kinſman: who afterwards Exerciſed a Tyrannical Government in That Place. As for Manahem Himſelf, he was taken pittifully ſculking in a place called Ophlas; dragg'd out of his Hiding-Hole, and Expos'd; Miſerably Tortur'd, and then put to Death. His Deputies and Aſſiſtants were ſerv'd likewiſe after the ſame manner, and (b) Abſalom for one, who was the Chief Promoter of the Tyranny.

Manahem, a Mean Scandalous Wretch, ſets-up for a Prince. He is Aſſaulted in the Temple.

The Seizure and Death of Manahem.

The People ſtruck-in all this while with the Oppoſers of Manahem; Phancying to themſelves (as I have ſaid already) that This would be a Ready way to the Working of an Accommodation: whereas That Party, in truth, was only an Anti-Faction to Manahem, that were ſetting-up for Themſelves; not ſo much deſigning to Suppreſs One Tyranny, as to Erect Another. The Multitude were at This time very Earneſt with the Commanding Men of the Faction not to bear ſo hard upon the Romans; but rather to raiſe the Siege and let them go: But the more they preſs'd it on the One ſide, the more were They againſt it on the Other. When Metilius the Roman General, and the People about him, had done all that was to be done for the Defence of the Place, and were now brought to the Laſt Extremity, they Offer'd to Capitulate with Eleazar, and to deliver it up with all that was in it, upon Condition only of Quarter for their Lives. The Terms were readily accepted, and Gorion the Son of Nicodemus; Ananias the Son of (c) Saddaca, and Judas the Son of Jonathas, were all Three Employ'd to Ratify the Treaty upon Oath, and ſo to Sign and Seal the Articles. So ſoon as the Agreement was Confirm'd, and the Formalities over, Metilius drew-off his Soldiers without any manner of Trouble or Interruption, or the Leaſt Suſpicion of any; ſo long as the Romans were under their Arms. But when, according to Oath and Compact, they came to deliver-up their Swords and Shields, Eleazar's Guards broke-in upon them; ſeiz'd them, and barbarouſly Aſſaſſinated them, without either Reſiſtance or Supplication on the Romans

This Outrage was no Mortal Blow yet to the Romans; for what ſignify'd the Loſs of ſo many Troups out of the Vaſt Armies they were Maſters of: but it was Evidently a Prologue to the Deſtruction of the Jews. For here was in ſight a War Inevitable; on a Juſt Ground too; and a City (the Principal in the Quarrel) ſo Polluted with Perfidy and Rebellion, that even if it ſhould ſcape the Vengeance of Romans, Divine Juſtice would moſt certainly find it out. Never ſo Mournful; ſo Univerſally ſad, and ſo Deſpairing a Face of Things; and the Innocent ſo Involv'd in the Dread of the Common Fate, as if They Themſelves were to be Anſwerable for the Guilty: and the Butchery was ſo much the more Afflicting and Grievous, for being a Sabbaoth-Days-Execution: Upon which Day, we are not Allow'd to do any Work whatſoever, let it be never ſo Holy.

UPon the very ſame Day and Hour, as Divine Providence would have it, there was a Maſſacre of the Jews at Cæſarea, to the Number of above Twenty Thouſand in One Day; and not a Jew left in the Town: for Florus pick'd up Thoſe Few that fled, and ſent them in Chains to the Galleys. This Butchery made the Whole Nation Stark-Mad: ſo the Jews divided into ſeveral Bodies, and diſpers'd themſelves. They began with ſome Villages of Syria, and then laid Waſt ſeveral of the Bordering Cities: as Philadelphia, Gebonitis, Geraſſa, Pella, and Scythopolis. After This, they brake-in upon Gadara, Hippon, and Gaulonitis; laying ſome Places in Rubbiſh, and Burning Others: and ſo they Advanc'd to the Tyrian Cedaſa, Ptolemais, Gaba, and Cæſarea. They Over-ran Sebaſte alſo and Askalon, without any Oppoſition: and when they had reduced theſe Places to Aſhes, they deſtroy'd Anthedon, and Gaza; They rifled alſo, and laid waſt ſeveral Villages upon the Frontiers, and put to death as many of the Men as they could catch. The Syrians, on the Other Hand, made their Repriſals upon the Jews, not only in the vaſt Numbers of them that they put to the Sword; but the Perſecution Extended to the very Inhabitants of their Cities. And they did This partly out of an Old Grudge they bare them, and in part by way of Prevention, in the Weakening of an Enemy. The State of Syria was at This time moſt Deplorable; for Every City had Effectually Two Armies in it, and no way to Preſerve Either of them, but by Deſtroying the Other. The Days were ſpent actually in Bloud-ſhed, and the Viſionary Fears of Worſe, made the Nights yet more Uneaſy. The Syrians Pretence was only to remove the Jews: but then they were ſo Divided about Others, that they only ſuſpected to be Jewiſh, that as they thought it hard to put them to death only upon a Jealouſy; ſo they were Affraid to let them alone on the Other hand, for fear they ſhould be Jews.

The Deplorable State of Syria.

There were ſome again, that, of Moderate and Good-Natur'd Men before, were now become Hard and Cruel, out of meer Avarice, and the Hope of Lucre. For they rifled all they Kill'd, and had the Booty for their Pains, as the Reward for their Virtue; reputing Him the Braveſt Man that got moſt by his Trade: for Robbery was call'd Victory. It was a Horrid Spectacle to ſee the Streets peſter'd with the Dead Bodies of Men, Women, and Children, that lay there, not only Unbury'd, but Uncover'd; and not ſo much as a Rag over their Nakedneſs. It was the ſame Caſe with the reſt of the Provinces too: beſide the Dreadful Proſpect of Worſe yet to come.

Meer Avarice makes People Hard and Cruel.

The Jews had hitherto made War only upon Strangers; but drawing toward the Borders of Scythopolis, they found the very Jews of that Quarter their Enemies: ſo much did they Prefer their Intereſt, and Convenience, before either King or Country. For the Scythopolitan-Jews joined with the Inhabitants of Scythopolis againſt the Other Jews. But This Agreement was Menag'd with ſo much Heat, that the very Eagerneſs created a Jealouſie of their Good Faith. For what, ſaid they, if theſe People ſhould Join againſt them with the Other Jews; ſurprize the Town in the night, and then throw all at laſt either upon a Revenge for their Sufferings, or the Neceſſity of their Condition? The Citizens, upon This Occaſion, told the Confederate Jews; that if they would prove themſelves to be Men of Integrity and Juſtice towards Strangers, they ſhould withdraw for the preſent with their Famil es into a Certain Grove there at hand. This they did accordingly, and for the Two Next Days all was Quiet at Scythopolis: but upon the Third Night, their Scouts bringing them Intelligence how Looſe they lay; ſome faſt a-ſleep; Others Careleſs, and all off their Guard, the Men of Scythopolis fell upon them in This Poſture; cut them all-off to the Number of Thirteen Thouſand; ſeiz'd the Pillage of their Camp, and ſo went their way.

Thirteen Thouſand Jews put to Death at Scythopolis.

After This General Account, I muſt not paſs over the Death of one Simon that periſh'd in This Barbarous Action. He was the Son of one Saul; a Perſon of Condition, and a Man Famous in his time, as well for the Strength of his Body, as for the Greatneſs of his Mind: Both which Faculties he had Employ'd in the Favour of the Scythopolitans, and to the Wronging of his Own Country. He did Daily Executions upon ſeveral of the Jews living near That Place; and would frequently put Whole Troups to the Rout: inſomuch that his Single Perſon was almoſt Equivalent to an Army. But, in the End, a Vengeance Overtook him anſwerable to his Crime. For when he ſaw how the Jews were ſurrounded with the Scythopolitans, and ſtuck with Arrows and Darts all over the Grove, Simon drew his Sword, and without Striking a Blow (for it would have been to no Purpoſe againſt ſuch a Multitude) he addreſs'd himſelf with Outcries and Exclamations to the Men of Scythopolis. [How juſtly am I puniſh'd here, ſays he, for the Ills I have done, and for purchaſing Your Truſt and Good Will with the Lives of ſo many of my Fellow-Citizens! Why ſhould Strangers be Truer to me then I have been to my Friends and Country? But I am now to Dye, and it will not become a Man of Honour to fall by the Hand of an Enemy; but rather to do Juſtice upon my ſelf: which will be an End and a Puniſhment Worthy of me, and agreeable to the Reputation of a Heroe: That is to ſay, I will not put it into the Power of an Enemy to Glory in my Ruine, and to Triumph over me in my Calamity.] Upon the ſpeaking of Theſe Words, he took a View of his Wife, his Children, his Ancient Parents, and his Whole Family that were then about him, with both Tenderneſs and Rage in his Eyes. While he was thus gazing as in ſuſpence, he took his Father by the Hair; ſet Foot upon him, and ſo ran him through. His Mother's Turn was next, and he Kill'd her too; who ſeem'd Willing enough to receive the Stroke. After the Father and the Mother, he did Execution likewiſe upon his Wife, and his Sons; who appear'd rather to meet the Weapon then to Avoid it; and by That Means they prevented the Enemy. But when he had put all his Kin'red to death, he pil'd them-up; and then advancing himſelf upon their Bodies, he ſtretched out his Right Hand for all People to take notice of it, and ſo plunged the Sword into his Own Bowels. This Young Man, for the Force of his Body, and the Firmneſs of his Mind, deſerves to be remember'd with Compaſſion: but whoever conſiders his Fidelity to Strangers, and his Unnatural Inhumanity to his Own Brethren, cannot but Confeſs that in the End he was Rewarded according to his Works.

Several Other Maſſacres of the Jews.

THis Maſſacre at Scythopolis was follow'd with ſeveral in Other Places after That Example: 2500 in Askalon; 2000 in Ptolemais; a Great Number of the Jews put to death at Tyre, and more ty'd in Chains: in Hippon, and Gadara, they cut-off all that were Stirring and Active, Impriſoning the reſt: and at This rate they were dealt with elſewhere, in Proportion as they were Hated or Fear'd. But in Antioch, Sidon, and Apania, they were Safe and Quiet in the Enjoyment of their Lives and Liberties: whether it was that they were not Strong enough to be Dangerous, or out of Compaſſion to a People that did not ſeem to have any Deſign upon the State: which ſeems to have been the more Probable Opinion of the Two.

And

And ſo for the Geraſenes, the Jews that had a mind to ſtay with them, might: and then for the reſt, they gave them a Safe Conduct to the Borders.

There fell out at the ſame time a very Unhappy Buſ'neſs for the Jews, in the Kingdom of Agrippa. This Prince having Occaſion to give Ceſtius Gallus a Viſit at Antioch, left one Varus, a Friend of his, and a Kinſman of King Sohemus's, to Adminiſter in his Abſence. At that time, the Province of Batanæa ſent Seventy of the Beſt Men they had, for Wiſdom, and Quality, to deſire the Favour of a Garriſon; to the end that, in caſe of any Commotion or Tumult, they might be in Condition to ſuppreſs it. Varus preſently ſends out a Party of the King's Troups to Cut them all off upon the Way. This he had the Confidence to do, not only without the Privity of King Agrippa, but much againſt his Liking. It was his Extreme Avarice that tranſported him to This Impious Outrage upon his Countrymen: and after ſo Flagitious a Beginning, he ſtopp'd at no manner of Tyranny or Iniquity, but went on Debauching the Whole Kingdom. When Agrippa came to Underſtand, and to conſider the Havock Varus had made, he was loth, for Sohemus's ſake, to put him to death; but remov'd him immediately however from his Government.

The Rebels, in the mean while, got poſſeſſion of the Caſtle of Cypros, upon the Frontier of Jericho; put the Garriſon to the Sword, and Demoliſh'd the Place. THE Natives of Alexandria could never endure the Jews there, from the Days of Alexander the Great: who in Acknowledgment of the Services they had done him againſt the Ægyptians, made them Free of the City; granting them all manner of Privileges in Common with the Greeks Themſelves: and Thoſe Privileges were continu'd to them by Alexander's Succeſſors; a Peculiar Quarter aſſign'd them apart to Themſelves; where they liv'd in a manner Sequeſter'd from the Converſation of Other People: being likewiſe Entitled to the Honour of calling themſelves Macedonians. When Ægypt came afterward to fall into the Hands of the Romans, the Jews had their Old Privileges ſtill Continu'd by Cæſar, and his Succeſſors; but the Jews and the Greeks perpetually Claſhing: and though they ſuffer'd Juſtice on Both ſides for their Miſdemeanours: All This had no other Effect yet then to Enflame the Sedition.

The Jews much in favour formerly with Alexander the Great.

And no leſs afterward with the Cæſars, when Ægypt fell into the Hands of the Romans.

Things were now at This time Extremely out of Order every where; but nothing yet to what they were at Alexandria. The Greeks being met in an Aſſembly, about an Embaſſy to Nero, upon ſome Extraordinary Occaſion, there came Ruſhing into the Amphitheatre a Mixed Croud of Jews and Greeks. The Greeks ſet up an Outcry that the Jews were Enemies and Spies; and in the ſame Inſtant leapt at them in a Rage, and fell upon them. They took Three of the Company, and the reſt got away: but Thoſe Three they dragg'd along, with a deſign to Burn them Alive. This Commotion brought-in the Whole Body of the Jews to their Reſcue: who began with caſting Stones at them at Firſt; and after That, they ran with Flambeaux in their Hands up to the Amphitheatre; therat'ning the Whole Multitude to Burn them all to Aſhes. This they had certainly done, if Tiberius Alexander, the Governour of the City, had not a little Pacify'd the Fury. And He did not go a Violent way to Work neither; but employ'd ſome of the moſt Popular Men among Themſelves, to try if they could bring them to Reaſon by Gentle Means, and Perſuaſion: adviſing them to Moderation, and to have a Care how they provok'd the Roman Soldiers: the Jews all the while turning This Formal Gravity into Ridicule, and venting their Conceipts and Reproaches upon Tiberius Himſelf.

plague the Mutineers. Their Orders were, not only to Kill all Oppoſers; but to ſeize their Goods alſo; Pillage their Houſes, and then ſet Fire to them. The Word was no ſooner given but they March'd away to a Quarter of the Town that is called Delta: (where the Jews were then gotten together in a Body) and There put their Orders in Execution to the Uttermoſt Extremity. The Jews plac'd their Beſt-Arm'd Men in the Front; who for a while made a Stout Reſiſtance: but upon the Firſt Diſorder, they were Scatter'd, and Cut to pieces; though in the mean time it prov'd a Bloudy Victory. Death and Deſtruction, in fine, never appear'd in ſo many ſeveral Shapes: Fire, Sword, Pillage, without either Tenderneſs for Infants, or Reverence for Gray-Hairs, or any Diſtinction of Age or Sex: and the Whole Place flowing with Gore. There were Fifty Thouſand Dead Bodies pil'd-up in a Heap; and the reſt had gone the ſame way too, if their Stomachs had not been brought down to Beg their Lives. Hereupon, Alexander, in Pity, bad the Soldiers hold their Hands: which they did at Firſt Word, out of the Deference they paid to Order and Diſcipline. But the Hatred of the Alexandrians was ſo Implacable, that they had much ado to take Them off, even from inſulting upon the very Carcaſes. This happen'd at Alexandria.

The Vaſt Power of the Romans.

Ceſtius finding the Jews every where ſo Hateful, made his Advantage of it in a Vigorous Proſecution of the War. He drew out his Troups, and Marched for Ptolemais. He took along with him the Twelfth Legion Entire, which he had at Antioch; Two Thouſand Choſen Men out of the Other Legions, Four Wings of Horſe; beſide the King's Auxiliaries: That is to ſay, Two Thouſand Horſe, and Three Thouſand Foot of Antiochus's, Arm'd all with Bows and Arrows; a Thouſand Horſe, and Three Thouſand Foot of King Agrippa's; a Body of Four Thouſand Men of King Sohemus's: a Third Part Horſe, and the Remainder of them Foot, moſt of them Archers. The People came Trouping-in to Ceſtius out of the Cities all the way as he paſs'd to Ptolemais: not ſo Good Soldiers as his own, perhaps; but what they wanted in Conduct and Experience, was ſupply'd with Zeal to the Cauſe, and Spite to the Jews.

The Country comes in to Ceſtius upon his March to Ptolemais.

Agrippa Joins Him with his Troups and Perſon.

Agrippa aſſiſted Ceſtius both with his Troups and Councel, and ſo the General March'd away with Part of his Army to Zabulon, the Strongeſt City of Gallilee, (otherwiſe called (a) Andron) which divides Judæa from Ptolemais. When he came-up to the Place, he found all ſorts of Proviſions there in abundance, but not One Man to be ſeen in the Town; for the People were all fled up to the Mountains: whereupon Ceſtius gave his Soldiers the Pillage of the City. The General ſtood in Admiration at the Beauty and Curioſity of the Buildings; which were much after the manner of Tyre, Sidon, and Berytus: but This notwithſtanding, he burnt, and raz'd them to the Ground. From thence he Over-ran the Whole Country, deſtroying whatever fell in his Way. When he had laid Waſt the Territory, and ſet all the Neighbouring Villages in a Flame, he left them in Aſhes, and ſo back again to Ptolemais. The Syrians Hearts were ſo ſet upon the Booty, eſpecially thoſe of Berytus, that there was no getting them away; but a Great many of their Stragglers ſtay'd behind. The Jews took Courage upon the Retreat of Ceſtius; and falling upon the Plunderers by Surprize, cut them-off to the Number of near Two Thouſand.

The Romans, in fine, aſſaulted the Place both by Sea and Land, and Maſter'd it without much Difficulty. For the People were ſo far from attempting to Diſpute it by Force, that they had not Room left ſo much as for an Eſcape: but they were all put to the Sword, Men, Women, and Children; Maſters and Servants, without Diſtinction: the City plunder'd and burnt, and the Number of the Slain Computed to be ſome Eight Thouſand Four Hundred Perſons. But when the Romans came to take Compaſs, and by little and little to gain the Top of the Mountain, and to deal with them upon Even Terms; the Fugitives were preſently routed: for neither were their Ill-Arm'd Men able to ſtand the Shock; nor they that fled, to ſcape the Purſuit of the Horſe. He was there given to Underſtand, that a Groſs Body of the Jews was gotten into the Tower of (c) Aphec, and ſent a Party thither to Diſlodge them. The Jews finding now that the War was brought home to their Own Door, laid aſide the Strictneſs of a Feſtival, and ſtood to their Arms. They reckon'd upon it that they had Men enow; and in That Confidence they ſally'd-out upon the Romans, with hideous Clamours, and in a Furious Confuſion, without any regard to Seventh-Days-Scruples; (for it was now their Sabbaoth, which among Them is moſt Religiouſly Obſerv'd.) But the ſame Rage that made them forget the Conſcience of the Action, prov'd an Advantage to them upon the Execution of their Extravagancies: for they Stagger'd the Romans upon the Firſt Charge; diſorder'd their Front; and made ſo Furious an Impreſſion into their Main Body, that if they had not been ſupported by a Stand of Foot that was yet Entire, and a Party of Horſe that came in to their Succour in the very Critical Minute, Ceſtius and his Whole Army had been in Danger to be Loſt. There fell Five Hundred and Fifteen of the Roman Soldiers in This Skirmiſh: Four Hundred of them Horſe, the reſt Foot. There were kill'd upon the Place Two and Twenty of the Jews. The Two Cavaliers that Signaliz'd themſelves in This Action to the Higheſt Degree, were Monobazus and Cenedæus, Two Kinſmen of Monobazus the King of the Adiabenians. WHen Agrippa ſaw how the Jews Swarm'd every where about, upon the Hills and Eminent Places, in ſuch Prodigious Numbers; he could not think the very Romans Themſelves altogether ſafe within reach of ſo Formidable an Enemy. So that he reſolved to try, if there were any Good to be done upon them by Fair Words; flatterring himſelf that They might be reaſon'd perhaps into a Better Underſtanding one of another: or however, if he could not perfectly reconcile them, he might poſſibly be able to divide them, and abate ſomething of the Rancour of the Quarrel. Agrippa, in purſuance of This Reſolution, ſent Two of his Friends and Officers, Borceus, and Phœbus; who were Men of a Known Fame and Integrity, to Offer them a League of Allyance with the People of Rome: with an Aſſurance of Pardon and Indemnity for all that was Paſt; upon Condition only of taking up other Thoughts, and laying down Arms. The Faction, upon the hearing of This Propoſal, were ſo deſperately affraid of the People's going over to Agrippa, in Hope of This Amneſty, that they reſolv'd to take off the Heads of the Embaſſadors. They Kill'd Phœbus before he could ſo much as Open his Mouth. Borchæus was wounded, and got off: but the Multitude were ſo Enrag'd at the Baſeneſs of ſo Wicked an Action, that they forc'd the Mutineers with Stones and Cudgels into the Town.

This Inteſtine Diviſion gave Agrippa the Faireſt Opportunity in the World to break-in upon the Faction: ſo that he advanced-up to them with his whole Army; Charg'd, and Routed them; following the Purſuit up to the very Walls of Jeruſalem: and then March'd-off again to a Place call'd Scopus, ſome Seven Furlongs from the City; and there he Pitch'd his Camp: where he lay Three whole Days Still and Quiet, without ſo much as Attempting any thing upon the Place; hoping perchance, that, upon Second Thoughts, the People within might come to Themſelves again. He ſent into the Neighbourhood indeed for Corn and Neceſſaries, and That was all he did.

Ceſtius Charges, Routs, and Purſues Them to the Walls of Jeruſalem.

Ceſtius Advances with his whole Army up to the City.

On the 4th Day, being the Thirtieth of the Month Huperbereteus, he advanced with his whole Army in very good Order up to the City: where the Multitude durſt not ſo much as wag for fear of the Faction: nay, and the very Heads of the Sedition were ſo ſtartled at the Roman Conduct and Diſcipline in their March, that They themſelves quitted the Skirts and Out-works of the City, and withdrew into the Temple. Ceſtius took his way by Bezeha: and in his Paſſage forward burnt Cænopolis, and a Place call'd the Wood-Market: whence, advancing to the Upper Town, he pitch'd his Camp near the Palace. Now if he had but Puſh'd it to an Aſſault upon That Nick of Time, how eaſily might he have Carry'd the Place, and put an end to the War! But Tyrannus and Priſcus, Two of their Generals, and ſeveral other Great Officers, with the Help of Florus's Mony, diverted him from his Purpoſe: and This Falſe Step prov'd the Abſolute Ruine of the Jews, and the Source of all the Calamities that afterward befel them.

his Reſolution ſo long, whether out of Indignation, or of Diffidence, that the Plot was Diſcover'd; and Ananus with his Companions forced by Stones from the Walls, to fly for Sanctuary to their Own Houſes.

The Jews Repair upon This, to the Defence of the Walls.

The Jews diſpers'd themſelves, upon This, into the Turrets to the Defence of the Walls; which for Five Days they made good againſt the Uttermoſt Efforts of the Romans, though preſs'd with a moſt Impetuous Violence. On the Sixth Day, Ceſtius with the Choiceſt of his Troups and Bow-men gave an Aſſault to the North-ſide of the Temple; but was ſo bloudily gall'd with Shot and Stones from the Porch and Galleries, that the Romans were ſeveral times forc'd, not only to ſhrink and give way, but in the end directly beaten-off. After Theſe Repulſes, the Romans at laſt bethought themſelves of This Invention. The Front clapt their Bucklers cloſe to the Wall; and ſo covering their Heads and Shoulders with them, one after another, they join'd them in Order, Buckler to Buckler; till all together they made up a Cover like the Figure of a Tortoiſe: which being Proof againſt all the Enemy's Darts and Arrows, the Romans were now at Liberty to Sap, and Work upon the Walls without any further Danger: and the next Thing they did was to Attempt the Firing of the Temple-Gates. This put the Faction into ſuch an Aſtoniſhment, that they gave all for Loſt: and a Great Many of them quitted the Town upon it. The Honeſt Party were as much Elevated on the One Hand, as the Rebels were caſt-down on the Other: inſomuch that they call'd out to Open the Gates to Ceſtius; whom they look'd upon as their Friend and Preſerver. Thus far it went: and if the General had but kept-up the Siege never ſo little longer, the Town had certainly been their Own; but God in his Juſt Diſpleaſure would not ſuffer this Wicked and Dreadful War to go-off ſo. For Ceſtius, without ever heeding, either the Good Diſpoſition of the People in General, or the Deſperation of the Rebels in the Town, by a kind of Judicial Infatuation, drew off his Men all on a ſudden, even when their Hopes were at the Faireſt; and ſo, againſt all Juſtice and Reaſon, quitted the Siege. This Unexpected Departure of Ceſtius put the Revolters in ſuch Heart again, that they fell upon his Rear, and cut-off ſeveral of his People both Horſe and Foot. He lodg'd that Night in a Camp that he had Fortify'd at a Place call'd Scopus. The Next Day he Continu'd his March with the Enemy ſtill at the Back of him, as upon a Purſuit, and killing him a great many Men. The Romans had thrown up a Trench with Paliſadoes on Both Sides of the Way: where the Jews with their Darts and Arrows annoy'd the Romans Extremely in their March, a-croſs the Paſſage, without any Revenge, or ſo much as turning their Heads to look the Enemy in the Face. This they did, as not being in Condition to ſecure their Flanks, partly out of an Apprehenſion of their Mighty Numbers, and partly for fear of breaking the Order of their March; being heavy-Arm'd Themſelves, and the Jews on the Other hand Light, and at Liberty for Excurſions and Surprizes, upon any Occaſion. Upon the Whole Matter it was a Terrible Blow to the Romans, and coſt the Jews Nothing. The Ways, in fine, were Cover'd with Dead and Wounded Bodies, upon this Retreat. Among the Slain was Priſcus that Commanded the Sixth Legion; Longinus the Tribune, and Æmilius Jucundus a Great Horſe-Officer; beſide Common Soldiers in abundance: but they got at laſt with the Loſs of their Baggage to Gabaoh; where they had Encamped before.

The Rebels take Heart upon't, and fall upon his Rear.

A Dreadful Blow to the Romans.

Ceſtius was now at his Wits end, and took Two Days time to Conſider what to do next. Upon the Third Day, he found the Jews to be mightily Encreas'd, and the Whole Country up and down Swarming with them. He was Senſible by this time that his Delay had not only hinder'd but Endanger'd him; and that the Longer he ſtay'd, the Worſe: for his Enemies grew upon him.

Ceſtius in a Miſerable Diſtreſs.

The General, upon this, Order'd the Army to be forthwith Diſcharg'd of all Encumbrances, for the Eaſe and Expedition of the March. The Mules, Aſſes, and other Beaſts of Burden he caus'd to be all Kill'd, ſaving only enow to Carry Weapons and Machines: which he thought he might have further Occaſion for; beſide the Miſchief of their being Employ'd againſt him, if they ſhould fall into the Hands of the Enemy. This was the State and Poſture of the Army in their Advance (a) to Bethoron, and Himſelf in the Head of them. The Jews gave them no manner of Interruption, ſo long as they Continu'd in an Open Country; but when they came into Hollow Ways and Defilées, they Charg'd them Front and Rear to divide them from the Army, and to force them further into the Valley. The Jews, in the mean time, from the Rocks and the Craggs, pouring down their Shot upon the Heads of the Romans. While the Foot was in this Miſerable Diſtreſs; and Conſidering which way to turn themſelves, the Condition of the Horſe was much more Deſperate: for they could neither advance up to the Jews to Attaque them upon the Mountains, nor ſecure themſelves againſt them in the Valleys: neither could they keep their Troups in Order againſt that Shower of Arrows that was poured down among them. To ſay nothing of thoſe that periſh'd by Precipices and Other Miſadventures. They were in ſuch a Streight, in ſhort, that they could neither Fight nor Fly: aud in this Deſponding Extremity, the Romans had recourſe to all the Paſſionate Extravagances of Tears, Groans, and Outcries, that are Uſual in ſuch Caſes; while the Rocks and the Vallies rung on the Other ſide with Tranſports of Incouragement, Joy, Inſolence and Triumph. So it was, in fine, that if the Jews had had Day-light, the Whole Army of Ceſtius had been totally Deſtroy'd: but Night coming on, the Romans made a Shift to Steal away to Bethoron; where the Jews immediately ſecur'd all Paſſes thereabouts, to cut-off Ceſtius's Retreat.

The Romans not in Condition Either to Fight or Fly.

When Ceſtius found how he was Beſet, and the Impoſſibility of his getting-off in the Face of the Enemy, he Bethought himſelf of a Stratagem to aſſiſt him in his Eſcape. That is to ſay; He Poſted betwixt Three and Four Hundred of his Braveſt Men upon the Tops of the Houſes; with Orders to call-out as Loud as they could Bawl, to the Watches and the Guards, like ſo many Centinels, as if the Army were not as yet Decamped. While This was a-doing, Ceſtius ſhrunk away ſilently with the reſt of his People, and Marched a matter of Thirty Furlongs That Night. But when the Jews came the Next Morning to find the Place quitted, and the Groſs of the Army withdrawn, they fell immediately upon the Four Hundred Romans that had Betray'd them into That Miſtake; Kill'd Every Man of them, and then put themſelves upon the Purſuit of Ceſtius: But Ceſtius having gotten a long Night's March before them; and loſing no time the Next Day neither, to get-off, there was no Over-taking them. The Soldiers however fled in ſuch Haſt and Confuſion, that they dropt all their Machines, their Slings, and Other Inſtruments for Battery and Attaque, by the Way: which the Jews took up and made Uſe of afterwards againſt the Romans. They follow'd the Chace as far as Antipatris: but finding that they were got out of their Reach, they took care of their Engines; ſtript the Dead; gather'd their Booty together, and ſo return'd to Jeruſalem with Songs of Triumph in their Mouths for ſo Great a Victory, with ſo very Little Loſs. There were Kill'd of the Romans, betwixt their own Troups and their Auxiliaries, (a) Four Thouſand Foot and Three Hundred Eighty Horſe. This happen'd on the Eighth day of the Month Dius, and in the Twelfth Year of Nero.

UPon This Diſaſter of Ceſtius's, the moſt Conſiderable of the Jews in Jeruſalem quitted the City as a Sinking Ship in a Storm. Coſtobarus and Saul, (Two Brothers) and Philip the Son of Jacimus, formerly Agrippa's General, ſlipt away and Withdrew to Ceſtius; but Antipas their Fellow-Priſoner in the Palace, Scorning to ſave himſelf by Flight, was put to Death by the Faction. The Manner of it we ſhall ſhew hereafter. Now Ceſtius ſent Saul and his Companions to Nero in Achaia, with an Account of his Misfortune; but Caſting the Blame of the Whole Miſcarriage upon Florus. Ceſtius went This Way to Work, in Hope of bringing Himſelf off, and diverting the Storm upon the Other.

So ſoon as the News of This Defeat came to Damaſcus, the Inhabitants Enter'd into a Confederacy to deſtroy all the Jews of That Place; computing with Themſelves, that if they could but take them together in the Baths, or ſome other Publique Place, the Deſign might be Eaſily put in Execution. All their Fear was, leſt their Wives, who were moſt of them Jewiſh, ſhould come to get notice of it. The People, in fine, took their Opportunity, when the Jews were at ſuch a Meeting; the Place Narrow, and Themſelves without Arms; and falling upon them, cut the Throats of Ten Thouſand of them in One Hour, without any Difficulty.

The

The Jews that gave Ceſtius That Terrible Overthrow, being by This time come back to Jeruſalem, made it their Bus'neſs, both by Fair Means and Foul, to draw over as many of the Romans as they could engage, into their Party. Upon This, they had a Meeting in the Temple about the Election of Officers for the Government of the War. So they declar'd Joſeph the Son of Gorion, and Ananus the High-Prieſt, their Governours in Civil Matters and the Affairs of the City; recommending to their Care, in a more Eſpecial Manner, the Rebuilding of their Walls. As for Eleazar the Son of Simon, though he had in his Poſſeſſion a Mighty Booty that was taken from the Romans; a Conſiderable Sum of Mony from Ceſtius, and a Maſs of Publique Treaſure to a Great Value over and above; they did not think fit yet to Confer upon Him any Commiſſion at all: looking upon him as a Man of an Imperious and Tyrannical Humour, and upon his Friends and Confidents alſo, rather as Guards then Companions. But This did not hinder Eleazar however from Screwing himſelf by little and little, into the Affections and Eſteem of the People: and he ſo far wrought upon them by Popular Arts, Mony, and Addreſs, that they thought no Man ſo well Qualify'd for a Governour as Himſelf.

The Jews ſettle their Officers Civil and Military.

Eleazar makes himſelf Popular.

The Commanders that they ſent into Idumæa, were Jeſus the Son of Sapphas, one of the High-Prieſts, and Eleazar the Son of the new High-Prieſt: therewithal Commanding Niger, the Preſent Governour of That Province, to Obey their Orders. This Niger came from beyond Jordan, from whence he was call'd Perentes.

They took the ſame Care likewiſe elſewhere. As they ſent Joſeph the Son of Simon to Jericho; Manaſſes beyond the River, and John the Eſſene to Thamna. And to Theſe were added Lydda, Joppa, and (a) Emmaus, to be Adminiſter'd in the Form of Toparchies. John the Son of Ananias was made Governour of Gophnitis and Acrabatine; and Joſeph the Son of Matthias, Governour of Both the Gallilees: caſting Gamala alſo into his Command; the Strongeſt Place in the Whole Country.

Joſeph the Author of this Hiſtory.

Theſe Governours diſcharg'd their Parts with Chearfulneſs and Prudence, Every Man according to his Commiſſion. As for Joſeph, upon his Coming into Gallilee, the Firſt Thing that he propoſed to Himſelf was to make ſure of the Hearts of the People: an Intereſt, which he knew, even in caſe of the Worſt, would attone for ſmall Miſtakes. He Conſider'd further, that the Certain Way to make Great Men his Friends, was to admit Great Men into a Share of the Government; and that the Way then to Oblige the Whole Multitude, would be to Employ Natives and Popular Inſtruments in Popular Caſes. Now Joſeph's Method Was This. He choſe a Council of Seventy, out of the Elders, and the Ableſt Men of the Nation. To This Council of Seventy he Committed the Whole Government of Gallilee, under ſome Few Reſtrictions. He Diſpos'd of Theſe Seventy Judges, Seven into Every City, with a Commiſſion to Hear and Determine all Common Cauſes, in ſuch Manner and Form as he had Preſcrib'd; reſerving to Himſelf the Judgment of Capital Cauſes and Matters of Greater Importance.

His Principles, and Inclinations.

His Method and Form of Government.

A Council of Seventy.

The Seventy being thus Diſtributed, and Affairs regulated at Home; Joſeph took alſo into Conſideration what was to be done to Secure them from Abroad. He gave for granted that the Romans would certainly break into Gallilee; and therefore took Care, in the Firſt Place, to Wall-in all the Defenſible Cities; as Jotapata, Berſabee, Selamis, Breccho, Japha and Sigoh; Tarichee, and Tiberias, with the Mountain Itabur. He Fortify'd alſo the Caves about the Lake of (a) Genezareth, in the Lower-Gallilee. And in the Upper-Gallilee, Petra, of the Achabarians; Seph, Jamnith, and Mero: Seleucia, Soganes, and Gamala, in Gaulanitis. Only the Sephorites, being a Wealthy, and Naturally a Martial People, had Liberty to build their own Walls. John the Son of (c) Levi, by Joſeph's Order, Wall'd-in Giſcala too. As to the Reſt of the Caſtles, they were Fortify'd by the Direction and Aſſiſtance of Joſeph Himſelf.

The Defenſible Cities to be Wall'd in.

He got upward of a Hundred Thouſand Men out of Gallilee, and furniſh'd them all with Old Arms that he had pick'd-up here and there. He fell to Bethinking himſelf in the next place of the Mighty Power of Rome, and what it might be that made the Romans ſo Invincible: Aſcribing it in the Concluſion, to their Obedience, and Diſcipline. But Precept muſt give way to Neceſſity, and in regard that he had no time at preſent to Train his People-up to the Latter, he would at leaſt Endeavour to enure them to the Other. And no Better Method could he think of, then the Roman Way of Multiplying Officers: dividing and ſubdividing Offices of Command into ſeveral Subordinations, one under another; and That was the Courſe he took. He had his Officers over Tens, Hundreds, Thouſands: and all Theſe ſubjected ſtill to other Superiors. He taught them the Myſtery and Diſcipline of all Signals; the Points of War in the Voice of the Trumpet; to Diſtinguiſh an Allarum; a Charge; a Retreat, and One Sounding from Another: the Manner of Fighting, and the Forms of Battels; the Order of bringing-off or on; or Seconding the Weak, or Relieving the Weary'd. He read Lectures to them upon the Virtues of Fortitude, both of Body and Mind: Arming and Fortifying them at the ſame time, againſt both Dangers, and Fatigue. In all his Leſſons of War, he ſtill made uſe of the Roman Diſcipline, as an Inſtance of Authority and Example. He told his Soldiers further, that if they would have him hope well of them upon the Point of Obedience in the Time of War, they ſhould renounce to all manner of Unlawful Violences; to Robberies, Fraud, Pilferings and the like, beforehand: they ſhould do Juſtice to all People without Exception; and not reckon any thing as a Gain to Themſelves, that accrues from the Damage of a Neighbour. How is it poſſible, ſays he, for any War againſt Conſcience, to Proſper; when it is ſure to have Both God and Man for Declared Enemies! Joſeph went-on with his Admonitions after This manner: having gotten by This time the Complement of an Army to his Own Wiſh. He had Sixty Thouſand Foot; Two Hundred and Fifty Horſe; and beſide Theſe, Four Thouſand Five Hundred Mercenaries, which he much depended upon, and Six Hundred Select Men likewiſe for the Guard of his Perſon. Theſe Men were no Great Charge to the Country; for All but the Mercenaries were Maintain'd by the Cities: who ſtill as they ſent out one Half of them into the War, employ'd the Other Half to provide Neceſſaries for their Fellows; ſo that One part of them wrought for the Other: and Thoſe that were in Arms, ſerv'd for a Protection to their Purveyors.

John of Giſcala an Extravagant Impoſtor. His Character.

WHile Joſeph was in the Courſe of his Adminiſtration in Gallilee, (as you have heard) there ſtarted-up an Extravagant kind of Impoſtor. He came-out of Giſcala; the Son of one (a) Levi, and his Name John: a Fellow Falſe, and Crafty, to the Higheſt Degree, and ſo Poor formerly, that he had not wherewithal to be ſo Wicked as he had a Mind to be: never without a Lie in his Mouth; and he was as good at Believing Falſe Stories as at Spreading of them. Fraud paſs'd for a Virtue with him; and he would Couzen his Beſt Friends to chooſe. He was a Great Pretender to Good Nature, and moſt Unmercifully Bloudy, where there was any thing to be gotten by it. His Ambition had no Bounds; and the Foundation of his Hopes was laid in his Crimes. He was ſo Naturally addicted to Thievery, that he taught Himſelf the Trade: for he began Single; and ſo went-on, gathering Companions by degrees one after Another; till he came at laſt to a Train of Four Hundred Men: in which Number there was neither a Coward, nor a Man that did not Underſtand the Uſe of his Arms; ſo Scrupulouſly Careful he was of his Choice, both for Body, and Mind. The Greateſt Part of his Troup was drawn out of the Borders and Villages of the Tyrians. With This Body of Men he laid Gallilee Waſte, and put a Great many of Thoſe to the Sword that had withdrawn upon the Apprehenſion of a War. He had far Greater Things yet in his Thought, and nothing hinder'd him but want of Mony, from putting himſelf in the Head of a Form'd Army.

(a) Gr. Λευΐ υἱὸς.

When

When he found that Joſeph had a good Opinion of him for a Man of Induſtry and Bus'neſs, he Employ'd his Credit with him, in getting him to Commit the Rebuilding of the Walls of Giſcala to his Care: upon which account he drew large Sums of Mony in Contributions, from Men of Subſtance and Eſtate. And then he had Another Invention; which was in truth his Maſter-piece. He got an Order from Joſeph to all the Jews in Syria; forbidding them Expreſsly to ſend any Oyl out into the Bordering Neighbourhood, but of the Compoſition of their Own Nation. Upon This Prohibition, John Engroſs'd the Oyl, and ſold it again at Eight times the Value it coſt him. Now This being a Plentiful Year, and Gallilee a Great Oyl Country, the Monopoly of getting it all to Himſelf, and ſending ſo much of it Abroad, where there was Great Scarcity of it; brought an Incredible Sum of Mony into his Coffers: which Treaſure he Converted afterwards to the Miſchief of his Benefactor. And then Computing within Himſelf how Fair he ſtood for Next Governor, in caſe Joſeph ſhould come to be remov'd, he gave it in Charge to the Ruffians under his Command, to Harraſs and Teize the Inhabitants ſtill more and more; which would either Exaſperate the People into Practices upon his Perſon, if he Offer'd to Controul them; or elſe Expoſe him to Accuſations and Complaints, if he let them alone. For an Introduction to his Deſign he had already put it about, that Joſeph was in a Plot to betray the Province to the Romans: and a great deal of That Stuff more, that they had Muſter'd up, toward the Enflaming of the Rabble againſt Joſeph.

He makes Joſeph his Friend; and Abuſes his Favour.

A Monopoly upon Oyl.

He Tampers the Rabble againſt Joſeph.

There was at That time a parcel of Young Men of Dabarith, that kept Guard in the Great Plain: and as Ptolemey (King Aggrippa's, and Queen Berenice's Steward) was Travelling that way, Theſe Sparks ſet upon him; took away all his Boxes and Baggage, to a Great Value, in Rich Robes and Silver-Plate, and Six Hundred Pieces of Gold. This was a Prize not to be Conceal'd, ſo that they carry'd the Purchaſe, whole as it was, to Joſeph at Tarichees; who check'd them for the Violence they had Offer'd to the King's People, and Order'd the Booty to be Depoſited in the Charge of one Æneas, an Eminent Man in the City, and to be forthcoming upon Demand. This Puntillo of Honour and Juſtice had like to have Coſt Joſeph his Life: for when the Pillagers came to Underſtand that they were like to have no Share in the Prey Themſelves; and giving for granted withall, that Joſeph reſerv'd it Entire for the King's Uſe, (as in truth he did) they ran raging up and down through all the Neighbouring Cities and Villages, from Place to Place, with Clamours and Exclamations, that Joſeph had betray'd them. This Outcry raiſed ſuch an Uproar, that by Day-light next Morning, there was a Multitude of a Hundred Thouſand People gotten together, and ſo to the Circus at Tarichee, Roaring againſt Joſeph; ſome to have him Depos'd or Ston'd; Others were for burning him as a Traytor: John, and Jeſus the Son of Sapphas; who were at That time Magiſtrates of Tiberias, all this while Encouraging the Tumult. Joſeph's Friends and Guards were in ſuch a Fright, upon This Monſtrous Rage and Concourſe of People, that they all abandon'd him but Four Perſons. He was at That time faſt aſleep: and as they were juſt a-ſetting Fire to to the Houſe, his Four Friends wak'd him. Joſeph was ſtill Preſent to Himſelf through all This Hurry; and not one jot ſurpriz'd, either at the Number of his Enemies, or at the Deſertion of his Friends: but frankly preſented himſelf to the View of the People, in Rags and Aſhes; his Hands behind him, and his Sword about his Neck. This Generous Conſtancy mov'd his Friends, and eſpecially Thoſe of Tarichee, to the higheſt degree of Tenderneſs and Compaſſion: but the brutiſh Multitude and the Borderers, that thought themſelves over-tax'd, ply'd him with Curſes and Reproaches for his Treachery, and Oppreſſion: and calling upon him over and over to Reſtore the Mony, and Confeſs the Fact. They gathered, in fine, from his Behaviour, that he was now in a Diſpoſition to tell the Truth; and by ſo doing, in a Fair way to acquire both Pardon and Pity. Under Theſe Circumſtances, he could not do better, he thought, then to divide his Enemies, and ſet them at Variance one with another. With This Deſign in his Head, he promis'd them a Frank Confeſſion of the Whole Matter: ſo they gave him the Hearing; and what he ſaid was to This Effect. [It never could enter into my Thought (ſays he) either to deliver up This Treaſure to Agrippa, or to make any Benefit of it to my ſelf. No, no, Good People; far be it from me to Court the Friendſhip of any Prince that is your Enemy: or to propound the reaping of any Advantage to your Prejudice. But (ſays he to the Tarichæans) conſidering how naked your City looks without Walls, and how little able you your ſelves are to Rebuild them: and then Conſidering again, how the People of Tiberias *and ſeveral Other Cities have ſet their Hearts upon This Prize, I thought I could not do Better then to reſerve it for the raiſing of your Walls. An Artificial Inſinuation to the Tarichæans.

I have done: but if otherwiſe, I am ready to lay all that I have taken at your Feet, and to be Diſpos'd of at your Pleaſure.

The Tarichæans were Highly pleas'd with what he ſaid: the Tiberians as much the Contrary; as appear'd by their Calumnies, Menaces, and Reproaches: inſomuch that their Rage and Animoſity was now Fiercer then ever. For in the Heat of This Diviſion, the People let fall their Joynt-Quarrel to Joſeph; while the Two Parties enter'd into as Hot a Conteſt the one with the Other.

Joſeph gains upon the Multitude.

When Joſeph found that he had got the Multitude on his ſide (as there were near Forty Thouſand Tarichæans) he took the liberty to tell them plainly how much they were to blame; and that for His Part, he was abſolutely for Employing the Ready Mony they had, toward the Fortifying of the Town. [Leave it to me, ſays he, to take Care of the Other Cities too, and to ſee that you want nothing toward the Charge of the Work: if you will but follow my Direction; and take it where it is to be had, without falling foul upon Him that provides it for you. This look'd ſo Fair, that Part of the Mutineers, though Uneaſy enough, withdrew upon it: but at the ſame time, Another Party of Two Thouſand Armed Men advanced Furiouſly toward Joſeph; who preſently ſlipt into the Houſe, and made good the Paſſage; while the Rioters ſtood Preſſing and Menacing on the Wrong ſide of the Door. Joſeph was now put to his Wits once again for Another Invention, and ſo he went up-Stairs to the Top of the Houſe; and thence made a Sign to the People below for Silence: and when the Uproar was a little laid he ſpake ſomewhat to them to This Purpoſe. [Good People, ſays he, what you would have me do I know not, neither is it poſſible for us to Underſtand one another in This Confuſion of Noiſes. But This I am ſure of, that I am here Ready to do whatever you ſhall Command me; if you will but ſend any Body to me, that we may Diſcourſe the Buſ'neſs Temperately together.] Upon This Propoſal, ſome of the Chief Magiſtrates repair'd to Joſeph; where they were preſently taken into the Houſe; the Doors ſhut after them, and ſo carry'd into a Remote Quarter: where they were Torn with Rods, till their very Ribs and Guts were ſeen. The Rabble thought the Time long enough to wait all this while at the Door for the Iſſue of the Debate; imputing the Delay to ſome Difficulties in the Caſe: when all on a ſudden, the Doors were thrown Open, and the Commiſſioners diſmiſs'd all Bloudy as they were; which ſtruck the People with ſuch a Terror, that Thoſe that were Higheſt in their Menaces before, were the Firſt now to caſt down their Arms and Shift for Themſelves.

Joſeph hard put to't.

And brings himſelf off by a Wile.

This Diſappintment puts John upon other Treacherous Practices.

This Diſappointment went ſo to the Heart of John, that it Exaſperated his Envy againſt Joſeph ſtill more and more, and put him upon Other Practices. He Counterfeited himſelf Sick, and deſired Joſeph's Leave to make Uſe of the Hot Waters at Tiberias for his Health. Joſeph, upon This, gave him Recommendatory Letters to the Governours of the City, that they would be aſſiſtant to him in what he wanted: without the Leaſt Suſpicion of any Treachery That way. He was no ſooner poſſeſs'd of the Advantages he deſir'd, but within Two Days he was Tampering with ſome, and Corrupting Others with Mony and Fair Words, to Abandon Joſeph. This Practice coming to Silas's Ear; who had at That time the Charge of the City, he ſent Advice of it immediately to Joſeph: who, upon the very Inſtant of Receiving the Letter (though Late in the Night) haſten'd away for Tiberias, and got thither Early next Morning: All the People Receiving him with Great Deference and Reſpect; ſave only John, who ſuſpected the Matter, and the Faction which he had Debauch'd. But John however ſent him a Complemental Excuſe by a Friend, for not doing himſelf the Honour to wait upon him: being at That time Sick in Bed, and in no Condition to attend him. The People of Tiberias were now drawn together in the Great Place by Joſeph's Order, with an Intent to acquaint them with the Advice he had receiv'd. John got notice of it, and ſent a Band of his Bravo's to deſtroy him; but in the Inſtant of their drawing their Swords (being planted ready for the Execution) the People gave a Shrieke: and Joſeph taking the Alarum when the Weapons were juſt at his Throat, leapt down from a Standing of Six Cubits High that he had mounted for his Harangue, and ſo made his Eſcape to a little Boat upon the Lake, and only Two of his Guards along with him.

The Soldiers preſently betook Themſelves to their Arms, to avenge their General upon Theſe Traytors. But Joſeph was ſo affraid of a Civil-War and the Conſequences of it, in the Expoſure of the City upon a Private Quarrel, that he ſent a Meſſenger to his People with a Poſitive Command not to do any manner of Miſchief to the Traytors but what was of abſolute Neceſſity to their Own Preſervation: wherein they follow'd their Orders to a Tittle.

Joſeph's Moderation.

So

So ſoon as the Rumour of This Treaſon came to be Nois'd in the Country, with the Contrivance it ſelf and the Author of it, the Neighbourhood gather'd together, and put themſelves upon the March to find out John; but he was got into Giſcala, his Own Country, before they could come up to him. There was hardly ever a City in all Gallilee that did not go over to Joſeph upon This Occaſion, and many Thouſands of Armed Men along with them; who did all offer their Services againſt John, That Traytor as they call'd him, and the Common Enemy of Mankind: and toward the delivering of That Treacherous Wretch up to the Flames, with the City that Protected him. Joſeph's Anſwer was, That he was highly ſenſible of their Kindneſs and Good Will; but however for Moderate Councels, where the Caſe would bear it; and that he had rather ſave an Enemy by Temperance, and Prudence, then Deſtroy him by Force. But, ſays Joſeph, I ſhould be well enough Content to ſee Every Man by Name out of the ſeveral Cities, Excepted from Pardon, that ever Join'd with John in the Rebellion; his Goods to be Confiſcate; his Houſes burnt, and his Family Deſtroy'd: unleſs he ſhould, in Five Days after the Publication of ſuch a Decree, quit the Party and Intereſt of John, and return to his Allegeance. The Heads of the ſeveral Cities were Unanimouſly Forward in the Promoting of Theſe Conditions; a Proclamation formally publiſh'd, and all Things in Purſuance of it duly Executed. This Declaration brought over Three Thouſand of the Rebels from John; who caſt Themſelves and their Arms at the Feet of Joſeph. But John, with the Remainder, which were a matter of a Thouſand Syrian Fugitives, betook himſelf to Secret Plots and Practices, when he found he could carry his Point no further above Board. He had his Enformers privately at work up and down in Jeruſalem to Calumniate Joſeph for Extravagant Levies, upon a Deſign to make himſelf Maſter of the Place, if he were not kept in Order by a Stronger Power. They that knew any thing of the Matter gave no Heed at all to the Story: but there was yet a Spiteful Party, even of the Magiſtrates Themſelves, and Other Principal Members of the Town, that ſupply'd John with Mony toward the Maintaining of a War with Joſeph: Nay, they went ſo far as to draw up an Act in readineſs for the Removal of him from his Command. And they did not think That enough neither, but ſent a Detachment of Five and Twenty Hundred Men of War, and Four Other Perſons Famous both for Law and Eloquence: whoſe Bus'neſs was to try if they could ſupplant Joſeph in the Credit he had with the People; and with Order, if they could get him to come away by Fair Means, to offer him no Violence; but in caſe of his Refuſal, to Treat him as an Enemy. Theſe Commiſſioners were (a) Joazar, a Lawyer's Son; Ananias the Son of (b) Saddouc; Simon, and Judas, the Sons of Jonathas.

This Treaſon turns all People's Hearts againſt John.

Secret Plots and Practices carry'd on againſt Joſeph.

Joſeph's Friends gave him a General Intelligence of a Party of Soldiers ſent toward him: but the Enemy's Councels were kept ſo cloſe they could not learn the Meaning of it. So that there was no Place for a Particular Precaution; and Four Cities went immediately over to the Enemy: That is to ſay, Sephoris, Gamala, Giſchala, and Tiberias: but he was quickly Maſter of them again without Bloud. Four of the Chief Men that he had Taken, both for Arms and Councel, he ſent back to Jeruſalem; which Tranſported the People to ſo violent a Rage againſt them, that if they had not made their Eſcapes in time, they would certainly have been All cut to Pieces, as well they themſelves that were ſent, as thoſe that ſent them.

JOhn was all this While in ſuch a Dread of Joſeph, that he durſt not ſo much as ſhew his Head out of the Walls of Giſcala. Some few days after This, Tiberias revolted; and inviting Agrippa to take Poſſeſſion of the Town, acknowledg'd him for their King. The Day being appointed, Agrippa fail'd of his Time; and only ſome Roman Cavaliers appearing, they fell off from Joſeph. When the News of This Deſertion came to Tarichee; Joſeph, that had ſent his Troups out a-Forraging, was at a Stand what to do. For he durſt not Venture Himſelf out Alone among the Whole Body of the Deſerters: and he durſt not ſtay in the Town neither, for fear of being ſurpriz'd by the King's Soldiers; beſide that the next Day being their Sabbaoth, there was nothing more to be done.

Tiberias Recover'd by a Notable Stratagem.

Joſeph had no way now to ſave himſelf but by putting a Trick upon the Deſerters; and he happen'd upon an Invention that ſucceeded to his Wiſh. He cauſed the Gates of Tarichee to be all ſhut and Guarded, to prevent giving any Intelligence to Tiberias of what he was a-doing. Upon This, he Order'd all the Boats in the Lake to be gotten together, to the Number of Two Hundred and Thirty in the Whole, and Four Men to Every Boat. With Theſe Veſſels he ſet Sail early in the Morning for Tiberias: and when he was advanc'd within ſuch a diſtance of the Town, that they might eaſily diſcern the Groſs of the Fleet without diſtinguiſhing what Men they had a-board, he Order'd all his Empty Veſſels to come to an Anchor and ſtay behind; while He Himſelf with only Seven of his Guards, and Thoſe Unarmed too, row'd-up toward the Town within Ken of the Place. People were at This Inſtant raging and ſwaggering againſt him from the Walls, after their Uſual Manner; but upon the Sight of him under Thoſe Circumſtances; and taking for granted that all the Ships they ſaw were Full of Soldiers, they preſently caſt down their Arms in a Fright; and with all the Actions and Expreſſions of Submiſſion imaginable, begg'd of him only to be Merciful to a Miſerable City and People. Joſeph gave them the Hearing; but with many a Bitter Menace and Reproach at the end of it. [What! ſays he, are you engag'd in a War againſt the Romans, and at the ſame Inſtant lye Waſting your ſelves in a Civil War one upon another? The very Wiſh of your Enemies is fall'n upon ye; and nothing will ſerve ye neither, but the Deſtroying of your Preſerver. Are ye not Aſham'd to Employ your Walls to the Ruine of Him that Erected them for your Security and Defence? But This ſhall not hinder me yet from paſſing over, and Forgiving all you have done Amiſs, and ſtill Entertaining a Firm and a Sacred Friendſhip with you; if you ſhall only think Fit to ſend ſuch Commiſſioners as I like, to deſire it of me.]

Joſeph, with only Seven Unarmed Men, does the Work.

The Tiberians Render themſelves, and ſubmit.

Tiberias ſends Hoſtages for the Peformance of Articles.

They Diſpatch'd away to him immediately Ten Head-Men of the Town as their Deputies, upon This Errand; which Joſeph preſently Order'd to be put a-board a Fiſhing Veſſel there at hand, and carry'd a little out of the Way. He ſent afterward for Fifty of their Principal Senators, as a further Security, for Performance of Conditions: and ſo went-on with one Pretence upon the Neck of Another; demanding ſtill more and more, till he had the Whole Senate in his Hands, to the Number of Six Hundred Perſons: beſide Two Thouſand of the Inhabitants; which, as faſt as the Boats fill'd, were all convey'd to Tarichee, and There kept in Cuſtody.

The People lay all the Blame upon Clitus, and preſs for Juſtice upon him.

Upon This, the Multitude ſet up an Outcry againſt Clitus; and that it was His Doing, and He Alone the Author and Ring-leader of This Tumult: deſiring Joſeph, in fine, to make Him Exemplary, and to accept of His Puniſhment for Satisfaction. Joſeph was not for putting any Man to death; but however upon the People's Supplication, he Order'd (a) Levie, one of the Guards, to go out and cut-off Both Clitus's Hands. The Soldier durſt not Venture upon the Execution, in ſuch a Croud of his Enemies: which Joſeph took ſuch Offence at, that he was juſt about to Step a-ſhoar, and do it Himſelf. Clitus perceiving This, made his Suit to Joſeph to Content himſelf with one of his Hands. Joſeph granted the Requeſt, upon Condition that he Himſelf ſhould cut it off: Whereupon, Clitus drew out his Sword with his Right-Hand, and Cut-off his Left: ſuch was the Awe Joſeph had over them. This was all done, and Tiberias recover'd, with only Joſeph Himſelf and Seven Soldiers, and a Parcel of Empty Boats.

Clitus does Juſtice upon himſelf; and cuts-off the One Hand with the Other, according to the Sentence.

Not many Days after This, upon the Revolt of Sephoris, and ſome Other Cities, Joſeph gave his Soldiers the Pillage of Giſcala and Sephoris: but upon the Application of the Inhabitants, he cauſed Reſtitution to be made of all they could Diſcover, and the Like at Tiberias: Joſeph Propoſing at the ſame time both to Chaſtiſe, and to Oblige them.

Gallilee was now Quiet, ; and the Jews no ſooner at Peace one with another, but providing to embroil themſelves id a War with the Romans. Ananus the High-Prieſt, and the Great Men in Jeruſalem that ſtood in oppoſition to the Romans, haſten'd all that was poſſible the Rebuilding of their Walls ; the Procuring of Military Inſtruments and Machines ; Weapons of all ſorts, as Darts, Arrows, and the like : and all hands at work upon Warlike Preparations ; Training up the Youth alſo to the Exerciſe of their Arms. All Thiugs were in Confuſion at that time ; Men of Sobriety and Foreſight Sad at Heart, and could not forbear Weeping at the Proſpect of Calamities to come. The Countenance of Things was Afflicting to any Man that wiſh'd for Peace : and for Publique Incendiaries ; the Worſe the Better. The City, in ſhort, had Death in the very Face of it before ever the Romans came thither. Ananus was altogether againſt the Formality of theſe Preparatories for a War, in Hope to reclaim the Madneſs of the Mutineers (the Zelots of thoſe Days) and to bring them to Reaſon : but he Miſcarry'd in the Attempt, as will be ſeen hereafter. Simon the Son of Gioras was at this time in the Head of a Band of Free-booters, that liv'd upon the Spoil in the Toparchy of Acrabatena : where they not only plunder'd and pillag'd Great Men's Houſes ; but fell foul upon their Bodies too, and Treated the Maſters themſelves with Blows and Cudgels worſe than Staves : at this rate publiquely Exerciſing a Bare-fac'd Tyranny. He went on making this Havock, till he was forced by the Troups of Ananus and the Magiſtrates, to Shift for himſelf with the ſmall Party he had, among the Thieves of Maſſada : and there he continu'd till Ananus and ſome Other of his Enemies were cut-off. He made ſuch Ravage at Idumæa, and thereabouts, with his Daily Outrages of Bloud and Pillage, that for the Security of the Country, the Government was fain to Garriſon the very Villages. Nero, with a faint Heart, ſets-up for a Man of Courage. His Vanity and Oſtentation.

THE News of Ceſtius's Diſaſter in Judæa ſtruck Nero into a quaking Fit of Fear and Confuſion: but he look'd Big upon it however, and cover'd the Faintneſs of his Heart with an Affectation of Dignity and Stomach. This, ſays he, was the Fault of my Own Officer, not the Bravery of the Enemy: and ſo carry'd it on at ſuch a Huffing rate, as if it were not for the Honour of the Empire, or of his Sovereign Station above all Other Princes, to be ſo much as Toucht with the Common Accidents of Humane Life, or the Iniquities of Fortune. But after all this Oſtentation of an Invincible Courage, the Cares he had in his Head betray'd the Weakneſs of his Mind, by the Uneaſineſs he was in for want of a General Equal to the Mighty Neceſſities of the Empire. For the Eaſt was at this time Wavering, and falling-off; the Jews deep in a Rebellion already; Other Nations Staggering, and the Empire all over Sick of the ſame Diſeaſe. Now how to keep the One Quiet; reduce the Other, and to prevent the Ill Humour in the Third, from Fainting the Whole Body: This was the Queſtion; and the Great Work that was now Neceſſary to be attended. Veſpaſian, in fine, was the Inſtrument pitch'd upon, as the Only Perſon that Nero could think Competent for the Diſcharge of ſuch a Truſt. He was now in Years, and had ſpent the whole Courſe of his Life in Arms, from Firſt to Laſt. This was the Man that Settled the Peace of the Empire in the Weſt, upon the Revolt of the Germans. This was He that finiſh'd the Conqueſt of Brittany: which before that, was neither perfectly Subdu'd, nor Known: and he preſented his Father Claudius alſo with the Honour of a Triumph for it, without either Sweat or Bloud. Now conſidering Veſpaſian under all theſe Circumſtances; his Years, Reſolution, Faith, and Conduct: ſo many Children as he had, ſo many Hoſtages for his Fidelity; and in a Vigour of Youth to Execute their Father's Orders: beſide the Concurrence of God's Secret Providence, with Other Incidents for the Good of the Empire. All this together mov'd Nero to make Veſpaſian General of his Forces in Syria: and for his further Encouragement, his Commiſſion was accompany'd with a great many Fair Words, after the Practice of the World, when they have need of a Man. Veſpaſian had no ſooner receiv'd his Commiſſion from Nero, in Achaia, but he preſently diſpatch'd away his Son Titus for Alexandria, to draw-off the Fifth and the Tenth Legions there; while He Himſelf Croſs'd the Helleſpont, and ſo took his way by Land into Syria: where he came to a Rendezvous with all the Roman Troups, and the Auxiliaries that were ſent-in by the Princes bordering upon that Province.

Veſpaſian and Titus draw together a Mighty Army.

The Jews, in the mean time, were ſo Tranſported with the Unexpected Advantage they had got over the Romans under Ceſtius, that they behav'd themſelves like ſo many Madmen; puſhing on the War beyond all Bounds of Moderation and Prudence. They drew-up what Strength they were able to make out of the Beſt Troups

The Defeat of Ceſtius makes the Jews Raſh and Inſolent.

Troups they had, and with that Body Marched towards Aſcalon; an Ancient City, ſome Five Hundred and Twenty Furlongs from Jeruſalem. The Jews had ever an Averſion to theſe People: and for that Reaſon, they made Choice of that Place for their Firſt Attaque. They had for their Leaders Three Famous Captains: Niger, of Peræa; Silas, a Babylonian; and John, an Eſſene: Men Eminent for Strength of Body, Reſolution, and Good Government. They Advance towards Aſcalon.

Aſcalon had a Wall of a Prodigious Strength, if there had but been Men to Defend it: the Whole Garriſon Conſiſting only of One Company of Foot and a Troup of Horſe, under the Command of Anthony. The Jews thought it long till they could come to Blows with the Romans; and ſo made a Running March of it to fall upon them by Surprize: but Anthony getting an Inkling of it, had drawn his Horſe out of the Town beforehand to be in readineſs for the Encounter, without much heeding, either their Numbers, or their Courage. Upon their Advance, he received their Charge with Great Bravery; and ſo put a Stop to their Progreſs toward the Walls of the Town. Now the Romans by the Advantage of Veterans againſt Raw Soldiers; Horſe, to Foot; Order, to Confuſion; Troups well-appointed, to People without Arms; Councel and Conduct, againſt Rage and Paſſion; and Men, in fine, of Obedience and Reſignation, againſt a Looſe Head-ſtrong Multitude: the Romans, I ſay, by theſe Advantages, made no Difficulty of putting the Jews to the Rout: for their Firſt Ranks were no ſooner broken by the Roman Horſe, but they fled ſeveral Ways; ſome toward the Town, where they were Cruſh'd to death by Crouds of their Own People; and needed no Worſe Enemy: Others Scatter'd all over the Plain, with the Roman Cavalry at their Back; and Field-Room enough for the Horſe to Play in. Upon this Confuſion they were all at Mercy; ſome one Way, ſome Another: for which Way ſoever they fled, the Romans were upon them: Overtaking ſome; Croſſing upon Others: and ſome again they Surrounded, and Diſpatch'd with their Darts. In this Calamitous State of Deſperation, their Vaſt Multitudes were no more then ſo many Single Men: and the Romans, at the ſame time, fluſht with Victory, out of their ſmall Number, had enow and to ſpare. The Jews, on the Other Hand, as they were aſham'd of having turn'd their Backs, ſo they did all that was poſſible toward the Recovery of their Honour: but the Romans, in the Courſe of their Succeſs, without either Wearineſs or Intermiſſion, purſu'd their Victory the Greateſt Part of the Day; kill'd Ten Thouſand Jews upon the Spot: Two of their Generals, John and Silas, being of the Number: the reſt were moſt of them Hurt, ond made their Eſcape with Niger (the Only Survivor of the Three Generals) to (a) Salis, a Town in Idumæa: and all this while there were only ſome Few Wounded on the Roman Side. The Bodies Engage, and the Jews Totally Routed. The Jews not a Match for the Romans. Ten Thouſand Jews kill'd upon the Place.

This was a Terrible Loſs: but ſo far were the Jews yet from Sinking under the Burden; that on the Contrary, betwixt a Deſponding Sorrow, and the Thirſt of Revenge, their Spirits were rais'd upon it: inſomuch that inſtead of a Diſcouragement drawn from the Laſt Defeat, they gather'd Matter of Hope and Comfort from the Remembrance of Former Succeſſes. This Confidence drew after it a Second Overthrow. When they had paus'd a little, and ſcarce long enough to dreſs their Wounds, the Jews in a moſt Outrageous Indignation, got together all the Power they were able to make, and in a much Greater Body Attempted Aſcalon once again; under the ſame Diſadvantages of want of Skill and Diſcipline, and with the ſame Fortune as before: for they fell at Unawares into an Ambuſh of Anthony's by the way they were to paſs; where they were beſet, charg'd and routed by Anthony's Troups before they could put themſelves in Order of Battel; and Eight Thouſand Slain upon the Place: The reſt got all-off with their General Niger; who acquitted himſelf ſeveral times upon that Occaſion like a Great Captain, and a Man of Honour. But the Enemy following them Cloſe at the Heel, they were driven for Sanctuary into a Strong Caſtle belonging to a Village call'd Bezedel. This Caſtle was look'd upon to be Impregnable; ſo that Anthony, to make ſhort Work of it, ſet Fire to the Fort; as the only way to Deſtroy the Caſtle and the General Both at once. Upon this Exploit, the Romans went their Way Triumphing and Rejoycing; making no Doubt but Niger was Deſtroy'd in the Flames. But He, it ſeems, to avoid the Fire, leapt down from the Top of the Caſtle into a Deep Vault: and as ſome of his Friends were Searching for his Body Three Days after, to give it Funeral Rites, he preſented himſelf before them yet Living: which Tranſported the Jews, out of an Affliction almoſt Inconſolable, into the moſt Surprizing Exceſs of Joy that can be Imagin'd, to find ſo Neceſſary an Inſtrument of their Well-being deliver'd by ſo Signal a Providence. Eight Thouſand Jews more Slain upon a Second Overthrow Niger Preſerv'd by a Wonderful Providence.

(a) Σάλις Gr.

Veſpaſian being now come with his Army to Antioch (the Capital of Syria) and without all Diſpute, for Beauty and Situation, the Third City in the Roman Empire; he found in this City King Agrippa, with all his Own Troups, expecting him. He paſs'd from thence to Ptolemais, and there were the Inhabitants of Sephoris, a Town of Gallilee, waiting to receive him. Theſe were a Well-meaning People; but ſo well Underſtanding their Own Intereſt too, and the Formidable Power of Rome; that, without ſtaying for the coming of Veſpaſian, to ſhew their Good Affections to the Government, they had by Anticipation promis'd and proteſted as much to Ceſtius Gallus: receiving a Garriſon from him, and acknowledging him for their Governour; and binding themſelves to Serve him Chearfully, even againſt their Own Country-men. Veſpaſian did likewiſe grant them, at their Requeſt, ſuch a Body of Horſe and Foot for a Garriſon as might be a Sufficient Security againſt Incurſions, if the Jews ſhould make any ſuch Attempt. Now Sephoris being both the Largeſt and the Strongeſt City of all Gallilee, Veſpaſian judg'd it a Matter of High Importance to have it in good Hands.

The Two Gallilees, with a Deſcription of them. A Deſcription of Samaria. Jeruſalem ſtands in the Middle of Judæa. A Diviſion or Diſtribution of Judæa.

The Two Gallilees, with the Situation and Deſcription of them.

THere are Two Galliles, known by the Names of the Upper and the Lower-Gallilee: which are Encompaſs'd by Phœnicia and Syria. They are bounded on the Weſt, by the City and Territory of Ptolemais, and by Mount Carmel; formerly belonging to the Gallileans, at preſent to the Tyrians: and next Adjoyning to (a) Gaba, or the City of the Horſe-men; ſo call'd, from the Plantation of Herod's Horſe-men that were there Settled, upon their Diſmiſſion. On the South, with Samaria, and Scythopolis, as far as the River Jordan. On the Eaſt, with Hippene, Gadaris, and Gaulanitis; together with the Borders of the Kingdom of Agrippa: and on the North, with Tyre, and the Frontiers of the Tyrians.

The Lower Gallilee

The Lower-Gallilee Stretcheth Length-ways from Tiberias to (b) Zabulon, near Ptolemais on the Sea-Coaſt. It reaches in Breadth from Xaloth on the Great Plain as far as Berſabé: and there begins the Breadth of the Upper-Gallilee, and ſo goes up to Village of Baca: which divides it from the Territory of the Syrians. And as to the Length of it, they reckon it from Thella, a Village near Jordan, to Meroth.

Theſe Two Provinces are of a large Extent, and Surrounded with Neighbouring Princes of ſeveral Diſtinct Nations: and yet upon all Occaſions of Controverſy, they have ſtill made Head againſt them. For, over and above that they are Mightily Peopled; their Inhabitants Bold and Warlike, and Train'd up from Children to Exerciſes of Arms; the Men neither wanted Courage, nor the Country Proviſions. Their Lands are Fruitful to Admiration, and ſuch Nurſeries of all manner of Plants, that it would make any Man in love with Husbandry. The Grounds are all over Inhabited and Dreſs'd; and not One Foot that lies Idle. There are Cities and Villages in Abundance; which muſt needs be Populous in ſo Plentiful a Country: for they account upon Fifteen Thouſand Inhabitants, and more, in the Leaſt of them. So that though Gallilee falls ſhort of the Country beyond Jordan, in the Compaſs of Ground, it is yet much Superior to it in Strength and Value: for over and above the Fertility of the Soil, Every Spot of it is ſo Improv'd, that there's no Ground Loſt: Whereas in that Vaſt Tract of Land beyond Jordan, the Greater Part of it is Dry and Barren, and not ſo Proper for Corn, and ſeveral Other Neceſſaries for the Life and Service of Man. Not but that in ſome Particular Places, as Peræa for One, the Soil is Better-Condition'd, and as well Stored with Excellent Fruits as any Other Place: Witneſs the Vines, Olive-Trees, Palm-Trees, and Other Plants that we find up and down in the Fields, in great Abundance, and Perfection: and they are all Water'd and Refreſh'd with Torrents from the Mountains, and with Quick Springs in the Exceſſive Heats. The Length of this Country lies from Machærus to Pella: the Breadth from Philadelphia to Jordan; with Pella on the North; the River Jordan on the Weſt; the Land of the Moabites on the South; and Arabia, (c) Silbonitis, Philadelphene, and (d) Geraſa on the Eaſt.

Sama-

Samaria is Situate betwixt Judæa and Gallilee; beginning at a Village call'd Gi-næa, upon the Plain, and extending to the Toparchy of Acrabatena. The Country is much of the Nature with that of Judæa; Mountainous and Rich; Excellent Land, and Eaſily Till'd, or Menag'd; Great Plenty of Fruits, both Wild, and Meliorated, or Domeſtique; it is Naturally Dry, but abundantly ſupply'd with Show'rs: beſide the Beſt Water in the World; incomparable Paſtures, and Milk no where ſo Plentiful. But the Superlative Excellency and Advantage of theſe Two Provinces is yet behind: That is to ſay, the Incredible Number of Inhabitants. And to Conclude, the Boundary to them both is Annath, otherwiſe call'd the Village of Borceus. A Deſcription of Samaria.

The ſame Village bounds Judæa likewiſe on the North: and the Length of it runs from the South-ſide to a Village upon the Borders of Arabia, call'd Jardan: the Breadth from the River Jordan to Joppe. In the Middle of it ſtands Jeruſalem; which has been call'd, aptly enough by ſome, the Navil, or the Centre of the Province. Judæa, in fine, wants nothing to make it as Delicious as it is Fruitful: and that by Sea too, (all the way to Ptolemais) as well as at Land. It is divided into Eleven Parts; Jeruſalem the Firſt, as the Sovereign Head of all the reſt: the Other Ten are diſtributed into as many Toparchies; Gophna, the Second, and ſo Acrabatane, Hamna, Lydda, Ammaus, Pella, Idumæa, Engadi, Herodion, and Jericho. The Neighbouring Countries are under the Juriſdiction of Jamnia, and Joppe; as Gamalitis Gaulanitis, Batanæa, and Trachonitis, are comprized in the Kingdom of Agrippa; but excepted out of the Parts Firſt before ſpoken of. This Country that is Inhabited by the Syrians and the Jews promiſcuouſly, Extends it ſelf in Breadth from Mount Libanus and the Sources of Jordan, to the Lake of Tiberias: and in Length, from the Village of Arphas to Julias. Jeruſalem ſtands in the Middle of Judæa. A Diviſion or Diſtribution of Judæa.

WE have been as Brief upon Judæa, with the Boundaries and Confines of it, as the Matter would bear.

The Supplies that Veſpaſian ſent to the Sepphorites, being a Thouſand Horſe and Six Thouſand Foot under the Command of Placidus the Tribune, were Diſtributed after the drawing of them-up in the Great Plain, into Two Diviſions. The Horſe continu'd in the Camp, and the Foot were Quarter'd within the Walls, for the Security of the City; but not without Daily Excurſious up and down into the Neighbourhood: which made Joſeph and his Companions Uneaſy enough, though without any Act of Hoſtility, either by Aſſault, or Surprize: beſide that they pillag'd both City and Country of whatever they could come at; and fell ſo ſeverely upon the Inhabitants at every Sally they made, that they durſt not ſo much as ſhew their Heads any more out of their Gates. Veſpaſian ſends Relief to the Sepphorites, under the Command of Placidus.

Joſeph, for all this, put it to the Puſh in a Bold Attempt upon the City; but finding to his Coſt that He Himſelf, before his going-off from the Gallileans, had made the Place as good as Impregnable againſt himſelf, and that it was not to be gain'd from the Sepphorites either by Fair Means or by Foul, he let fall his Enterprize. This Practice however (out of a Natural Averſion the Romans have to Treachery) made the War Ten times Fiercer, and the Enemy much more Outrageous then before: Depopulating the Country night and day with Fire and Sword; Pillaging whatever they could lay their Hands on; putting all to Death without Mercy, where they found Reſiſtance; and making Slaves of the reſt. Gallilee, in fine, was all Cover'd with Fire and Bloud; and not a Creature but had their Part in this Calamity, and nothing left them to Truſt to, but the Towns that Joſeph Himſelf had Fortify'd. Gallilee at the Mercy of Fire and Sword.

Titus was by this time come up to Veſpaſian at Ptolemais with the Troups he brought from Alexandria: and his Arrival was much ſooner then upon a Winter's March could have been Expected. And there he join'd the Fifteenth, the Fifth, and the Tenth Legions; which were reputed the Braveſt Troups of the Empire. They were follow'd alſo with Eighteen Companies, and Five more to them out of Titus comes up to Veſpaſian at Ptolemais with a Vaſt Army.

Cæſarea, with one Troup of Horſe; and five Troups of Syrian Horſe. Ten of theſe Cohorts had a Thouſand Men each, and the reſt Six hundred and Thirteen Foot, and Sixſcore Horſe; beſide a very conſiderable Enforcement of Auxiliaries from the Neighbour-Princes, as Antiochus, Agrippa, and Sohemus, who ſent their Two thouſand Foot a-piece, and a Thouſand Horſe: Malichus, the King of Arabia, Five thouſand Foot, moſt of them Arm'd with Bows and Arrows, and a Thouſand Horſe. Theſe Troups altogether made up a Body of Sixty thouſand Horſe and Foot: beſide the Train of Baggage, and Servants that followed the Camp; who, for Experience, Courage, Military Skill and Application, (for the moſt part) fell not much ſhort of their Maſters themſelves.

The Order and Policy of the Roman Diſcipline.

The Policy and Wiſdom of the Romans in this way of Ordering their Servants, can never be ſufficiently Admir'd: for it makes them at the ſame time not only Serviceable to Private Families, but to the Common-wealth alſo in Offices of War and Government. And then Whoever Conſiders the Excellency of the Roman Diſcipline and Conduct in the Matter of Military Order and Execution, will find that Fortune had the Leaſt Share in the Succeſs of their Arms; and that they Advanced themſelves to the Command of the World upon the Foundations of their Own Honour and Virtue. They were not then to learn the Art of War, when they came to fall under the Neceſſity of Uſing it: but they made it their Exerciſe and Practice in Times of Peace, and handled their Arms as naturally as if they had been Born with them: ſo that Peace or War was, in that Reſpect, all a Caſe to Them; and they were ever in Readineſs without Troubling their Heads about Times or Seaſons. Their very Tryals of Skill look'd like Real Combats; and not a day paſs'd, but Every Man went through all his Exerciſes; which kept them both in Diſpoſition and in Breath. By This Means they were always in Order, without feeling the Inconveniences either of Fear or Fatigue. Now for men that keep themſelves upon the Guard of this Habit and Diſcipline, a Looſe Enemy is not able to deal with them. But, as I was a ſaying, their Exerciſes are effectually but Combats without drawing Bloud: as their Fierceſt Encounters are but Bloudy Exerciſes.

The Roman Way of Encamping.

To ſecure themſelves from ſurprize, upon Entring into an Enemy's Country, the Firſt Thing they do, is to Pitch and Fortify their Camp, not ſlightly or diſorderly, but with a regard to the Condition of the Place: Levelling the Ground where it is uneven, and for the Figure of it, in the Form of a Quadrangle. In Order to the Diſpatch and the Execution of all This, they have their Smiths, Carpenters, Pioneers, and other Workmen for Fortifications, to attend the Army. The Inner Part of the Camp is Diſtributed into Quarters or Lodgments for the Officers and Soldiers: and the Outſide carries the Reſemblance of a Wall; where they raiſe Turrets at an Equal Diſtance one from another: and in the Intervals, they have all ſorts of Weapons to be Us'd at a Diſtance, as Darts, Arrows, Stones, &c. and Inſtruments or Machines alſo for the Caſting of them. This Camp hath Four Large Gates for Horſe and Man to paſs and repaſs at pleaſure, as there ſhall be occaſion. On the Inſide of it there are ſeveral Streets orderly Diſpos'd, with Lodgments in the middle, for the Head-Officers: and within them again, a Tent Erected for the General, after the Form of a little Temple; a Market-Place, with Shops and Standings for Artificers and Tradeſmen; Courts of Juſtice and Tribunals, for the Hearing of Cauſes as well Military as Civil: and taking it all together, it looks like a City of a matter of One Night's Growth; ſo Wonderful is the Diſpatch, where there are Great Maſters to Direct, and many Hands to Execute. And if This, in fine, be not enough for the ſecuring of the Quarter, 'tis but running a Line of Circumvallation about it at laſt, with a Trench of ſome four Cubits deep, and as many over to finiſh the Work. The Soldiers have their Arms ſtill about them, and live in a kind of Military Brotherhood, Orderly and Peaceably one with another. Upon any occaſion of fetching Wood, Water, Forrage, &c. they go out in Parties: and ſo for their Times of Repaſt, they do not Eat now and then by Snaps as every Man pleaſes, but all together; and the Trumpet directs them, when to Sleep, when to riſe, when to ſet the Watch, &c. So it is, in fine, that they do nothing but by Rule and Command. In the morning the Soldiers wait upon their Captains; the Captains upon the Tribunes: and then both Captains and Tribunes upon the General: from whom they receive the Word or Signal; and ſuch other Orders to be Commuicated to their Subordinates, as the Occaſion requires: to the end that every Man may be Inſtructed in his Duty, and how to behave himſelf upon Action; how and when to Sally out, or to Retreat, and to do all things in Order whatever they do.

The Trumpet gives every Man his Orders.

The Roman Way of Decamping.

The Trumpet tells them when they are to Decamp; and then they take up their Tents, pack up their Baggage, and prepare to be gone. Upon the ſecond Sounding, they load their Carriages and their Sumpters, and ſtand ready to move: watching for the Word of Command, as People do for the Sign at a Horſe-Race Race when to ſtart; and at the ſame time ſetting Fire to the Camp: which may be eaſily repair'd by throwing up another; beſide that the Enemy ſhall make no Benefit of it. Upon the third Sounding, the Army marches; and all poſſible Care is taken to prevent Straglers, and to move every Man in his Rank.

On the Right-Hand of the General ſtands the Herald; who with a loud Voice puts this Queſtion thrice over to the Army: Are you ready for a Battle? The Soldiers in a Martial Tone and Action return him this Anſwer as often over: We are ready for a Battle. Nay, many times they prevent the very Demand, by ſtretching forth their Right-Hands, and other Signs of Joy and Satisfaction, in hope of coming to That Iſſue. After this, the Army Advances with as much Manly Gravity, and Compoſure as if it were in the Face of an Enemy. The Word given for a Battle.

The Foot-Arms are Pot and Breſt; Two Swords, one on each Side, and the Left much longer then the other; which is about the Size of a Dagger. The General's Guards carry Javelins and Targets: and all the reſt, Pikes and long Bucklers: a Saw, a Basket, a Pick-Ax, a Hatchet, a Rein, a Sythe, a Chain, and Bread for three Days: ſo that the Men carry'd little leſs Burden then the Beaſts. The Horſe-Men wear Long Swords girt to their Right-Sides. They carry a Launce in their Hand; a Buckler in a Scarf hanging a-croſs the Horſe-ſide; a Quiver with three Darts or more in't, Broad-pointed, and about the Length of a ſhort Javelin; their Helmets and Corplets like thoſe of the Foot. And for the Cavaliers that attend the Perſon of the General, their Arms are the very ſame with the reſt: only being choſen by Lot, the Troup that has the Luck to be ſo Pitch'd upon has a Right of Precedence. The Roman Way of Marching.

This is the Roman Way of Marching and Encamping, with the various Manner of their Arming. They do nothing in their Military Enterprizes and Combats that is Raſh and Inconſiderate; but their Actions are the Reſult of Deliberate Councels: by which means, either their Failings will be fewer, or thoſe that happen will be more eaſily Redreſs'd: For, provided that Matters be well-weigh'd and digeſted, they had rather ſuffer a Diſappointment by the ill Succeſs of a well-grounded Enterprize then become Indebted to Fortune for an Advantage contrary to Reaſon. For theſe Blind Events give People an ill Habit of Abandoning all to Chance without any Precaution or Foreſight: whereas Men are the Wiſer and the Better for Inſtructive Examples, though in Caſes of Miſcarriage: beſide the Comfort of falling with Honour and a Good Conſcience, by a Calamity which Humane Prudence could not prevent.

This Continual Uſe and Exerciſe of Arms does not only Harden and Strengthen the Bodies of men, but Elevates their very Minds alſo into Reſolutions more Courageous and Firm: beſide that People are kept in Awe under the Apprehenſion of Penalties and Rigour. It is Death by the Martial Law for a Soldier not only to Deſert his Station or betray his Truſt; but for the very Leaſt Neglect of his Duty. Now this is a Terrible Rigour, and yet the Officers are ſtill more Inexorable then the Laws themſelves: for they make amends, they think, in the Honours and Rewards that they Confer upon Men of Merit for the Cruelty of Puniſhing Criminals. And ſuch is the Reverence they have for the Authority of Military Order and Diſcipline, that a Roman Army is certainly the moſt Glorious Spectacle under the Sun, in a Time of Peace; and in a State of War, the moſt Dreadful: for every Individual of the whole Army moves but as a Member of the ſame Body; and at the ſame time in ſuch a Harmony of Motion, as if they were all govern'd by the ſame Mind. Their Ears are always open to attend the Word of Command; their Eyes watching to receive the Signal, and their Hands ever in readineſs to execute the Orders of their Superiors, in Contempt of all Difficulties and Dangers. When they come to the Encounter, and that the Battle is once reſolved upon, they never trouble their Heads with the Enemies Numbers, or Conduct; the Difficulties or Dangers of Paſſes; nay, nor with the Malice of Fortune it ſelf: but break through all Obſtacles, and make themſelves as good as ſure of the Victory before they ſtrike a Stroke. Now if their Councels and Delibertions be govern'd altogether by Political Prudence, and ſound Advice; and follow'd with an Anſwerable Vigour of Execution: what Wonder is it to ſee the Roman Empire Miſtriſs of the Univerſe! and ſtretching it ſelf as far as the Euphrates, on the Eaſt; the Ocean on the Weſt; and the Fruitful Countrey of Africa, on the South; and the Rhine and Danube, on the North: and yet when all is ſaid, the Dominion ſeems ſtill too Narrow for the Great Souls of the Profeſſors of it. The Extent of the Roman Empire.

It is not my Purpoſe in what I have here deliver'd, to write a Panegyrick to the Honour of the Romans; but rather for the Comfort of thoſe that are Overcome, to ſhew they have no reaſon to be Aſham'd of their Maſters, and to divert Raſh In-Innovators and Malecontents from Attempting Impoſſibilities. Beſide that this Diſcourſe may perhaps be of ſome Service to the Curious in the Light it will give them toward a Better Underſtanding of the Roman Methods of Government and Diſcipline.

Placidus breaks into Gallilee.

WHile Veſpaſian was with his Son Titus at Ptolemais, he gave all Neceſſary Orders for the Supply and Government of the Army: and in this Interim, Placidus made an Inroad into Gallilee; Over-ran the Whole Country; took a World of Priſoners, and put the Greater part of them to the Sword. Now theſe were only a Timorous Faint-Hearted ſort of People; but the more Daring Part of the Gallileans were Obſerv'd to take Sanctuary ſtill in Cities and Other Strong Holds that Joſeph had Fortify'd: which when Placidus took Notice of, he reſolv'd to ſet upon them by Aſſault, and to begin with Jotapata; which was the moſt Defenſible Place they had: making no Doubt at all of Carrying it upon the Firſt Attaque by Surprize: beſide the Reputation it would give him among the reſt of the Generals, and open a way to the Taking of Other Places: for the very Example of Jotapata, being the Tougheſt Piece in all Gallilee, would probably draw the Remainder after it. But Placidus was much Miſtaken in his Conjecture: for the Inhabitants being Precaution'd of his Deſign; and that he was already upon his March, went out of the City to Encounter him; and falling upon the Romans at Unawares, with a Conſiderable Body, and in Good Heart, (their Country, Wives, and Children being all at Stake) they put them to the Rout; but kill'd only Seven of them, being Well-Arm'd, and making an Orderly Retreat. Of the Jews there were only Three Slain, and ſome Few Wounded; for being Ill-Arm'd, they were fain to Content themſelves with Darts and Launces at a diſtance, without Venturing a Diſpute hand to hand. Upon this Repulſe, Placidus left the Place.

Veſpaſian Marches from Ptolemais into Gallilee. The Order of his March.

VEſpaſian, being now reſolv'd upon an Incurſion into Gallilee, leaves Ptolemais, and gives the Army their Marching-Orders, according to the Inſtitution of the Roman Diſcipline; the Auxiliaries, being light-Arm'd, and the Bow-men advancing before the reſt to keep the Enemy at a diſtance; and, by Scouting out into the Woods, and Other Suſpected Paſſages, for Diſcovery of their Ambuſhes, to prevent Surprizes. Theſe were follow'd with a Party of Roman Horſe and Foot: and after them, a Detachment of Ten Men out of Every Company, with their Arms and Neceſſary Proviſions for the Forming of a Camp. The Next in courſe were the Pioneers, to level and mend the Ways, and cut down the Trees and Buſhes that incommoded them in their March. After theſe, came the General's Baggage, with that of his Great Officers, and a Strong Party of Horſe for their Convoy. Veſpaſian Himſelf Marching next, with a Select Body of Horſe and Foot; ſome Troups of Launces, and Sixſcore of his Own Men drawn out of ſo many Groſs Squadrons. The Engineers with their Machines and Inſtruments for Battery and Aſſault took their Place next; and then follow'd the Tribunes and Other Officers with a Choice Body of Troups about them. Next came the Imperial Eagle, in the Head of all the reſt of the Roman Enſigns; as the Prince of the Birds for Authority and Power; an Embleme of Government, and a Good Omen of Succeſs in Arms. After the Sacred Enſigns, follow'd the Trumpets: and after the Trumpets, the Body of the Army, Six in Front, with the Proper Officers to keep them in Rank and File, according to Order and good Diſcipline. The Servants of Every Legion March'd along with the Infantry, and took care of the Carriages and Baggage. In the Laſt Place were the Purveyors, and Other Mercenaries, for the Service of the Army, under a Convoy of Horſe and Foot.

In this Order Veſpaſian advanc'd to the Frontiers of Gallilee, and there Encamp'd with his Soldiers about him, Earneſtly preſſing for Action: but partly in Confidence dence that the Enemy's Hearts would fail them upon the very Approach of the Army; or otherwiſe, that they might Change their Minds yet before it came to a Battle, he gave them time to bethink themſelves; and in the Interim, went in hand with his Preparations for a Siege.

This Great General was ſo far in the Right, that the Jews fell into ſuch a Conſternation with Dread and Terrour upon the very Report of his coming; that Joſeph's People, who were then Encamped near Sepphoris, abandon'd their Captain not only without a Blow Striking, but without ſo much as a ſight of the Enemy. Joſeph finding himſelf thus deſerted, and out of Condition to Encounter the Romans; the Hearts of the Jews quite ſunk; the greater part of them gone over to the Enemy, and the Remainder in all Appearance ready to follow; he quite gave over any further Thought of the War; and ſo, Conſulting his own Security, with ſome Few that ſtood by him, he withdrew to Tiberias.

Veſpaſian Takes Gadara by Aſſault. The Romans put All to the Sword. Joſeph puts it to the Council of Jeruſalem, whether to Fight, or Treat.

THE Firſt Place that Veſpaſian Attaqu'd, was Gadara: and he carry'd it, without any Difficulty, for want of Men in it to make a Conſiderable Defence. The Romans, upon Forcing the Town, put all to death without Diſtinction, betwixt Hatred to the Jews, and Revenge for the Overthrow of Ceſtius. They ſet Fire, not only to the City it ſelf, but to the Little Towns and Villages about it: laying them utterly Waſt, and making the Inhabitants Slaves.

Veſpaſian takes Gadara by Aſſault. The Romans put all to the Sword.

Joſeph's retiring for Sanctuary, put the Tiberians all to their Wit's End, to Conſider, that if the Caſe had not been Deſperate, he would never have fled for it. And they were not miſtaken neither in their Opinion; for Joſeph was by This Time ſenſible of the Hopeleſs State of the War; and that the Jews had no way in the World to come-off but by Submiſſion and Repentance. As for his Own Part, he made no Doubt of Obtaining Fair Quarter from the Romans if he ſhould deſire it: but rather then betray his Country and his Truſt, he would ſuffer a Thouſand Deaths; without Endeavouring to make a Particular Friend of a Publique Enemy. He wrote, upon This, to the Principal and Leading Men of Jeruſalem, a Naked State of the Caſe; without making the Romans either Greater or Leſs then in truth they were, for fear of Puffing them-up into Inſolence upon the Jews for Cowardice, one way; or Provoking the Jews to be Raſh and Inconſiderate in the Oſtentation of their Power, another. Joſeph, in fine, remitted the Matter to the Council to Conſider of; deſiring them either to ſend him Word immediately if they had a mind to Treat: or, if they were reſolv'd to Proſecute the War, they had no more to Do, then to ſend him an Army without Delay to give Battle to the Romans. This was Joſeph's Letter; which he ſent forthwith by an Expreſs to Jeruſalem.

Joſeph puts it to the Council of Jeruſalem, whether to Fight, or Treat.

JOtapata was generally look'd upon as the Strongeſt Place in all Gallilee; and Veſpaſian taking notice of it, and finding how the Jews in all their Difficulties fled thither for ſanctuary, he reſolved the Next Thing he did to Attempt the Place; and ſo ſent Horſe, Foot, and Pioneers a-croſs the Mountains to Clear the Ways; which were at That Time Craggy, and Extream Difficult even for Foot; but for Horſe utterly Impaſſable. Theſe Pioneers, in Four Days, cut out a Paſſage for the Whole Army to March without any Trouble.

Joſeph ſlips away out of Tiberias into Jotapata. A Deſerter gives Veſpaſian Notice of it, and that Joſeph was in a Trap.

On the Fifth Day, being the 21ſt of the Month Artemiſius, Joſeph ſlipt out of Tiberias, and Convey'd himſelf into Jotapata: which, in ſome meaſure, Reviv'd the Spirits of the Jews. A Certain Deſerter preſently carry'd away the News to Veſpaſian of Joſeph's being come into the Town: adviſing him by all Means to make Haſte Haſte and fall-on; for Joſeph was now in a Trap, and if he were but ſure once, the War with the Jews would quickly be at an End. Veſpaſian was ſo Tranſported at the Tidings, that he look'd upon it as an Immediate Providence from Heaven; ſo far to Blind, and Infatuate the moſt Conſiderable Enemy they had, as to Inveigle him into the Nooſe of a Voluntary Bondage. Veſpaſian, upon This, Commanded Placidus away with a Thouſand Horſe; and Æbutius along with him, (one of the Greateſt Captains for Councel and Execution in the Whole Army:) giving them Orders, without Delay, to Inveſt the City, and to look to Joſeph that he ſhould not make his Eſpape.

The Siege of Jotapata.

Veſpaſian follow'd the Next Morning with the Whole Army, and got-up to Jotapata in the Afternoon: where he drew-up his Army on the North-ſide of the City ſome Seven Furlongs from the Town; Encamping upon a Hill within View of the Enemy: on Purpoſe to Startle them with ſo Dreadful a Sight. This was done accordingly; and the People all ſeized with ſuch an Aſtoniſhment, that not One Creature durſt ſo much as look out of the Walls. The Romans had had ſo Hard a March that Day, that they Attempted nothing further at Preſent. But Veſpaſian however order'd the Begirting of the Town with Two Great Bodies, and a Third Troup of Horſe to be Poſted at a Diſtance to cut off all Communication with the Place. When the Jews ſaw how they were Streighten'd and Coop'd up; their very Deſpairs enflam'd their Courage: as there's no Daring like That which ariſes from Neceſſity.

The Next Morning the Romans began to Batter the Walls; and the Jews at Firſt made a Generous Reſiſtance: but when Veſpaſian let looſe his Bowmen and Slingers upon them, with all Other Weapons of the ſame Kind, to Force them from the Walls: and when He Himſelf at the ſame time with a Body of Foot aſſaulted the Wall upon a Hill over againſt the Other, which lay more Expoſed to the Danger of a Battery; this put Joſeph into ſuch a Fright for fear of the Town, that He Himſelf, in the Head of the Whole Body of the Jews, fell outrageouſly upon the Romans; beat them from the Walls, and follw'd the Advantage with a Deſperate Reſolution. And yet the Miſchief they ſuffer'd was not Inferior to what they did; being Both ſides equally provok'd and enflam'd: the Jews, by Deſperation; and the Romans, by Indignation and Shame, to find the Others ſo near their Match. There was Skill and Valour on the One ſide, againſt a Brutal Rage on the Other.

A Deſperate Fight all Day, till Night parts them.

The Fight was Maintain'd all the Day till Night parted them. Of the Romans there were ſeveral Wounded and Thirteen Slain: and a Matter of Six Hundred of the Jews Wounded, and Seventeen Kill'd upon the Place.

The Beſiegers fell-on Next Day again; and in This Encounter, they did Both ſides out-do themſelves: the Jews took Courage from the Repulſe they had given the Enemy already beyond all Expectation, and the Romans from the Shame of being held ſo long in Play: for the very Delay of a Victory was little Leſs to Them then an Overthrow. They Fought it out Five Days at This Rate; the Beſiegers preſſing ſtill harder and harder upon them: and the Jews on the Other hand, not only ſupporting the Defence, but at the ſame time making Sallies over and above; without ſo much as minding the Prodigious Numbers they were to Encounter. Neither did the Romans abate any thing of the Vigour of their Attaques, for the Difficulty and Hazzard of the Enterprize.

A Combate of Five Days ſucceſſively.

The Situation of Jotapata.

As to the Situation of Jotapata, it ſtands upon a Rock utterly Inacceſſible; ſaving only upon One Quarter: and it is Encompaſs'd on Three ſides of it with ſuch Precipices of Steep and Profound Valleys, that it is enough to turn a Man's Brain and Dazzle him, but to look down from Top to Bottom. There is no coming at it but upon the North; where Part of the City is built upon the Brow of the Mountain: and That way it might be Approach'd. But then Joſeph had cauſed This Place to be Fortify'd, and Taken into the Town, to ſecure a Mountain that Overlooks and Commands it: which, with Other Mountains thereabout, kept the Place ſo Cloſe that there was no ſeeing of it till a Body was juſt upon it. This was the Situation and Strength of Jotapata.

Veſpaſian plies the Siege with all poſſible Vigour.

The Manner of the Attaque and the Defence.

Veſpaſian finding that he had the Natural Difficulties of the Place, and the Rugged Surlyneſs of the People to Contend withall, he took-up a Reſolution of Puſhing the Siege forward with more Vigour, and call'd a Council of his Officers together to adviſe in what manner to carry-on his Attaque. The Debate came to This Iſſue, that there ſhould be Erected a Huge Terraſs on the Weakeſt Part of the Town. The Reſolve being Taken, Veſpaſian preſently ſet his Whole Army at Work to provide Neceſſaries and Materials for the Raiſing of ſuch a Mount: as vaſt Quantities of Stone and Timber from the Neighbouring Mountains, with Proviſions for Hurdles to ſhelter the Beſiegers againſt Darts and Shot from the Town. Under the Cover

Cover of Thoſe Defences, they advanc'd their Deſign, though the Weapons from above fell down as Thick as Hail upon them. As for the Earth they made Uſe of, they had it out of the Neighbourhood; and ſo handed it from One to Another: inſomuch that what with the Vaſt Number of Hands to aſſiſt them, (for the Whole Army was Engag'd) and the Attempt going on ſtill without Intermiſſion, the Work could not but Advance Exceedingly. The Jews in the mean while did all that was Poſſible by Darts and Arrows from the Walls, and by Heavy Stones upon their Wattles, to divert them from their Bus'neſs: but all they were able to do, was only to make a Noiſe and Interrupt the Proceeding, but no way to Defeat or Diſappoint it.

Veſpatian had by This Time Sixty Engines at Work; Caſting Launces at the Defendents: beſide Larger Machines to throw Stones and Javelins; Artificial Fires, Arrows, &c. which were all Menag'd by Arabians, and Other Maſters of That Launcing Faculty; and made not only the Wall it ſelf, but the Whole Space alſo betwixt That and the Terraſs, too Hot for the Defendents. This did not hinder the Jews yet from ſallying out upon the Romans, in Troups, like Thieves: Stripping them of all their Defences, and then ſallying upon them as ſo many Naked Men, and ſetting Fire to Every Thing about them that was Combuſtible: and by This Means Undoing all they had done. Veſpaſian finding the Miſchief of the Jews breaking in upon them; and that there was no way to prevent it, but by making their Work all of a Piece, and filling up the Intervals, that there might be no Room for them to paſs, he went That way to Work; and Joyning his Troups in a Cloſe Body, put a Final End to their Excurſions.

The Mount being now brought up almoſt to the Height of the Town-Wall, Joſeph did not think it Honourable, to have more done, on the One ſide, to Deſtroy the Town, then on the Other, to Defend it. So that he call'd the Work-men together, and gave Order for the Raiſing of the Wall, and keeping it up ſtill above the Height of the Terraſs. But they Excuſing themſelves upon the Impoſſibility of advancing any Work under all That Shot; Joſeph bethought himſelf of a Contrivance to Fence both againſt Stones and Fire: which was by driving ſeveral Great Stakes faſt into the Ground, and Stretching up ſo many Raw Hides againſt them: and Theſe to be Interpoſed betwixt the Enemy and the Bodies of the Beſieged; the Moiſture of the Skins would reſiſt and Damp the Flame, and the Yielding Diſpoſition of them would ſhoot-off the Stones or Lances with little or no Impreſſion. Under the Protection of This Cover, the Workmen follow'd it ſo hard Day and Night, without either Fear or Danger, that in a ſhort time they rais'd a Wall of Twenty Cubits, and Fortify'd it with Turrets and Strong Embattlements. The Romans look'd upon themſelves by This time to be as good as Maſters of the Town: and it was therefore the Greater Surprize to meet with ſo Confounding a Policy, and ſo Invincible an Obſtinacy at the ſame time.

THE Jews took ſuch Heart upon This Stratagem, and the Succeſs of it, that they paſs'd not a Day without Incurſions, Skirmiſhes, and all ſorts of Violences, by Fire, Sword, and Pillage. Veſpaſian was equally troubled at the Diſgrace, and at the Diſappointment: and therefore, upon Second Thoughts, gave Over the Aſſault, and contented himſelf to Endeavour the Starving of the Place inſtead of Storming it; Reaſoning the Matter with Himſelf, either that Want would bring them to their Knees, or if they ſtood it out, that Famine in the mean time would do the Bus'neſs of the Sword; either by Weakening or by Waſting them, and putting them out of Condition of Defence. Veſpaſian, upon This, blockt them up ſo Cloſe, that there was no Paſſing-in or out.

Veſpaſian Attempts by Starving, what he could not Compaſs by Force.

No Proviſion wanting in Jotapata but Water.

They had in This Town, Corn, and all manner of Neceſſaries in abundance; ſave only Salt. As for Water, 'tis True, they had not ſo much as One Fountain about the City, and only Rain-Water for their Common Uſe: which, in That Hot and Dry Country, was very ſcarce; eſpecially in Summer; and This was their Preſent Caſe. It was a Great Affliction to them, the very Thought of a Drought; and the Diſtreſs they were already falling into for Want of Water. The Place being plentifully Stor'd with all Other Proviſions, and the Men in Good Heart, Joſeph put the Garriſon to their Allowance, to Husband the Little Water they had, and make the Stock hold out ſo much the Longer. This Order for the Stinting of their Drink, put the People out of all Patience; for it look'd as if they were almoſt drawn Dry: and they began to be Froward upon it, and would work no longer. This Peeviſh Humour of the Jews could not be well kept from the Knowledge of the Romans; who were within diſtance of Obſerving from Another Hill near hand there, whatever paſs'd among the Jews: as the Tumultuary Thronging together; the Meaſuring of their Portions, and their Uneaſineſs about it: ſeveral of the Jews being cut-off too, upon the Place, at That very Inſtant, by the Roman Shot. The Pit-Water being by This Time well-nigh ſpent, and Veſpaſian in an Hourly Expectancy of the Town falling into his Hand; Joſeph put This Amuſement upon him. He caus'd a Great many Parcels of Cloaths to be hung up Dropping-wet, upon the Battlements of the Walls within View of the Romans; wherein he gain'd his End of Inducing them to believe that there could not be ſuch a Scarcity of Water in a Place where they were ſo Laviſh of it: and upon That Preſumption, they fell into a Direct Deſpondency of ever Taking the Place for want of Water. Nay, Veſpaſian Himſelf gave over all Hope of Carrying it by a Siege; and ſo had Recourſe once again to Arms. The Jews, on the other ſide, were Heartily Glad of it; for They Themſelves, and their City, were Both brought to the Laſt Extremity: and deſir'd nothing more then to Exchange a Starving Calamity, for want of Bread and Water, for an Honourable Death in the Field. While Joſeph was beating his Brains about ſome Expedient, it came into his Head, that, on the Weſt ſide of the Town, there was a Forlorn Hollow Gutter that lay quite out of the way, ſo as no Body heeded it. Joſeph propounded by the Convenience of this Paſſage to get Relief into the Town; as Water, and whatever elſe they wanted: and to That End, he wrote to ſome of the Out-lying Jews that liv'd toward That Quarter, to ſend him from time to time what Supplies he had Occaſion for; together with Expreſs Inſtructions to Cover the Meſſengers with Hair-Skins, and then to have them creep upon all Four: ſo that if the Watch ſhould get any Glimpſe of them, they might paſs for Dogs, or ſome Other Four-Footed Animals. This way of Intelligence went-on till the Correſpondence was Diſcover'd, and the Communication cut-off.

Joſeph finds out a way for Relief.

Joſeph ſaw by This Time that it was a Thing utterly Impoſſible to defend the City; and that it would be Certain Death to him if he ſtay'd: ſo that He Himſelf, and ſeveral Other Great Men, met preſently in Council upon it, and laid their Heads together how to make an Eſcape. The People had already a Jealouſie of what they were about; and ſo came Trouping to Joſeph in Throngs, and begging him above all Things in This World to take Care of them: for they had no Other Friend to Truſt to but Himſelf. They could never be Loſt, they ſaid, ſo long as he was Safe; nor their Lives better ſpent then at his Feet: Or, if they ſhould be All ſeiz'd upon, it would be Recorded to his Eternal Honour, that he was too Brave either to Fly from his Enemies, or to Abandon his Friends: which would be much the Caſe they ſaid, as if a Man ſhould leap out of a Ship in a Storm, which he had taken Charge of in a Calm: telling him that This Caſe of a Veſſel was the very ſame with That of their City; for, ſaid they, who ſhall ſtand up to defend Us and our Country, when we have loſt the Single Man, whom we look upon as the Only Means and Hope of our Safety?

Joſeph propounds an Eſcape.

The Jews beg of him to Stand by them.

Joſeph was not willing to have it thought that he Conſulted altogether his Particular Security: and ſo gave them to Underſtand in a Plauſible Diſcourſe, that it was more for Their ſakes then his Own that he had any Thought of Withdrawing; for either you will be made Priſoners, ſays he, or you will not: and now take it which way you will. If the Latter, what will you be the Better for my Staying with you? If the Other, what will you be the Better for my Dying with you? Whereas, if I were then at Liberty and Abroad, I might bring an Army into the Field out of Gallilee time enough to Raiſe the Siege. Now ſo long as I lie coop'd-up here in the Town, I ſhall certainly do you a Great deal of Miſchief without any ſort of Good; for it will make the Romans ſharper upon the Siege, ſo long as they are ſure of Joſeph for a Prize; but if I were out of the way once, they would look no further after you perhaps.

Joſeph Reaſons the Matter with Them in a Plauſible Diſcourſe.

The

The People were ſo far from coming over to him, upon This Diſcourſe, that they came ſtill preſſing upon him with more and more Importunity: Men, Women, and Children; Mothers with their Infants at their Breaſts, all in Tears, Embracing his Knees, and Caſting themſelves at his Feet; begging of him with Outcries and Supplications not to forſake them in their Diſtreſs. And This they did not, I preſume, out of Envy to His being at Eaſe; but upon ſome Secret Impulſe, as if the very Preſence of Joſeph would be a kind of Protection to his Friends. The Jews continue their Importunities.

Joſeph's Heart was ſo far ſoften'd toward Theſe People, betwixt Gratitude and Compaſſion, that he put it to a Queſtion within Himſelf whether to Stay or Go. [If I appear to ſtay Willingly, ſays he, it will be taken as the Power of the Aſcendant they have Over me. But what if I ſhould refuſe, and then be forc'd to do it at laſt by being made a Priſoner?] Upon This Deliberation, Joſeph reſolv'd to ſtand it out with them, and bear His Part in the Common Deſperation of the City. [This, my Good Friends and Countrymen, (ſays he) is the True Time to ſhew themſelves Brave in, when there's no Hope of Safety but in their Arms: When they are ſure to receive Honour in Exchange for their Lives; and for Acting like Good Patriots, have their Memories Celebrated to Poſterity for their Country's Devotes.]

From Theſe Words, Joſeph advanc'd to Action; and putting himſelf in the Head of the Braveſt Men he had, Charg'd the Enemy's Guards, beat them from their Trenches, and puſh'd them up to the very Camp: one while Tearing their Skins to pieces that Cover'd them in their Works; another while ſetting Fire to the Works Themſelves: and This they did time after time, for Three or Four Days and Nights together, with an Inſuperable Boldneſs, and an Indefatigable Labour. Joſeph Deliberates, and Enters into Action.

When Veſpaſian ſaw how hard it went with the Romans upon Theſe Encounters: for when they were Worſted, they were aſham'd to turn their Backs; and when they got the Better of it at any Time, they were too Heavy-Arm'd to purſue the Advantage: ſo that the Jews never Sally'd but they did ſome Miſchief or Other before they went back again. When Veſpaſian, I ſay, found upon what Terms they were, he commanded his Troups to give over the Attaque, and not caſt away their Lives againſt Men that did but deſire to Dye; under the Provocation of an Incurable Deſpair. Their Rage, he ſaid, was but like a Blaze that would go out of it ſelf, if it wanted but Matter to Entertain it: beſide, that the Caſe of the Romans was quite a Different Thing from That of the Jews; the Former Fought only for Dominion; the Other, for Life and Liberty; and the One had a great deal more need of Victory then the Other. But in the mean time the Arabian and the Syrian Slingers, Archers, Engineers, &c. were all at Work with their Stones, Arrows and Launces: (and Nothing, in fine, of That Kind was Idle, as the Jews found to their Coſt.) But all This was ſo far from Staggering the Jews, that on the Clear Contrary, they preſs'd through all Difficulties to ſingle out the Romans, Body to Body; and there Fought it out, without Quarter on either Hand; and the Living, on Both ſides, ſtepping up to ſupply the Place of the Dead. BEtwixt the Length of the Siege, and the Perpetual Excurſions of the Beſieged, Veſpaſian was as good as beſieg'd Himſelf: but having now carry'd up his Works near the Height of the Walls, he reſolved to bring it then to an Iſſue by the Dint of Battery, and Order'd a Ramm to be brought up to the Place of Action. This Ramm is a Machine of a Prodigious Bulk and Size, like the Maſt of a Ship, Fortify'd with a Strong Piece of Iron at the Top of it, like the Head of a Ram: from whence, and from the Manner of Puſhing in the Uſe of it, like the Butting of That Creature, it took the Name. This Engine is hung up by the Middle, with Great Cables or Ropes, Faſten'd to Croſs Timbers, well Cramp'd together and ſtrongly ſupported. There it lies upon a Poyſe, like the Beam of a Pair of Scales: and as it hangs Ballancing thus in the Air, it is Mov'd back and forward by the Force of Many Hands, and falls with ſuch a Violence upon the Place, where it is A Deſcription of the Ramm.

to Batter, that no Wall is able to Stand the Continu'd Repetitions of That Attaque.

Delay was now Death to Veſpaſian, and the Siege a kind of Idleneſs to the Romans: whereas the Jews at the ſame time were ſtill doing of Miſchief; ſo that the General's Heart was now ſet altogether upon Diſpatch. The Firſt Thing he did in Order to it, was to bring his Slingers, Archers, and Ordinary Machines Cloſer up to the Town, to beat the Defendents from the Walls, and to make way for the Ramm; which was then immediately brought-on: That is to ſay; ſo ſoon as the Bow-men, and their Companions had made the Wall too Hot for the Jews to ſhew their Heads upon. It was Cover'd with Hurdles and wrapt up in Hair-Skins, for the Security both of the Managers and of the Machine. The very Firſt Stroke of it put the People into an Uproar, as if the Town had been Taken; and Joſeph, finding that their Battering ſtill in the ſame place would bring down the Wall over their Heads in a very ſhort Time, he Order'd ſeveral Sacks of Chaff to be provided, and let down by Ropes from the Battlement againſt the Place where the Engine play'd: and ſtill as the Romans Chang'd their Battery, the Jews Encounter'd them with their Sacks; by which Means they did Generally either Miſs their Mark, or fail of the Effect.

The Manner of Ordering the Ramm.

A Contrivance to Defeat the Force of the Ramm.

This Invention was a Mighty Hindrance to the Romans; for which way ſoever they Pointed the Engine, the Jews would be ſure to meet them with their Chaff-Bags; and the Wall never the Worſe for the Blow, till the Romans found out Another way to Defeat the Contrivance. That is to ſay, they got a Proviſion of Long Poles, with ſharp Iron-Hooks faſten'd to the Ends of them, like Paring Knives; and with Theſe they immediately cut the Strings of the Bags; and, upon This Diſappointment, the Machine did its Office again; and the Wall being but newly repair'd, and not yet ſettled, could not poſſibly hold out any longer. Joſeph and his Companions had now nothing left them to Truſt to but Fire; ſo that getting together all the Combuſtible Matter they could lay hand on, beſide Pitch, Sulphur, and the like; they divided it ſeverally into Three Parcels, and ſet Fire to the Roman Machines, Huts, and all Matterials that would take it, in Three ſeveral Places at the ſame time. The Rage of the Flames and of the Jews was ſo Terrible, that there was no Place for Relief, and the Danger Equal of Periſhing Both Ways. The Conflagration, in fine, was ſo Dreadful, that it Deſtroy'd all in a moment that the Romans had been ſo long a-doing, and with ſo much Labour and Hazzard.

The Jews have Recourſe to Fire.

There was One Samæas of Paab in Gallilee, and the Son of Eleazar, who ſignaliz'd himſelf upon This Occaſion by an Action never to be Forgotten; and hath Conſequently a Right to a Part in This Hiſtory. He took up a Mighty Stone and caſt it down from the Wall upon the Machine, with ſo Prodigious a Force, that he brake-off the Iron-Head of it: and then leaping down into the Middle of his Enemies, carry'd it off without any Apprehenſion of Danger, to the Foot of the Wall; where he ſtood a while, unarmed as he was, a Common Mark for the Enemy, till he had Five Arrows ſtuck in his Body. In This Condition, he remounted the Wall; where he ſtood for a ſhort time a Glorious Spectacle without any Change either of Countenance or Behaviour, till at laſt he dropp'd down Dead with the Anguiſh of his Wounds; and the Head of the Machine in his Arms, which he would never quit to the Laſt.

The Bravery of One Samæas.

There were alſo Two Brothers of Ruma in Gallilee, (a) Netiras and Philip, that were as Brave as it was poſſible for Men to be. They fell once upon the Soldiers of the Tenth Legion, with ſuch an Impetuous Fury, that they brake into the Roman Army, and drove all before them that made Head againſt them: while Joſeph in the Head of a Troup of Men, with Firebrands, burnt the Machines, Huts, and Works of the Fifth and likewiſe of the Tenth Legion; and Thoſe that follow'd, made the ſame Havock with what was left.

Two Glorious Heroes.

By the Evening of the ſame Day, the Romans were at Work with the ſame Engine again, upon That Part of the Wall that had been ſhatter'd and broken before: Veſpaſian at the ſame time receiving a Shot upon the (b) Ankle by an Arrow out of the Town; but it prov'd a ſlight Wound however, for the Arrow was ſpent. They that were within diſtance of ſeeing their General's Bloud, put the Whole Army into ſuch a Fright with the Alarum, that the very Commanders Themſelves quitted their Poſts, and came thronging to the Head-Quarter to learn the Truth of the Matter: Titus Himſelf, in the Firſt Place, out of an Impatient Tenderneſs for his Father; but This Generous Zeal caſt the Multitude into a Conſternation. Veſpaſian however put them all quickly out of their Pain, both Titus and the Army, by ſhewing himſelf frankly, and upon the main making little or nothing of the Diſaſter. So that the Anxiety and Sorrow they labour'd under before, for fear of a Mortal Calamity, was now turn'd only into the Tranſport of an Honourable Revenge: Veſpaſian Encouraging the Soldiers, and They one and another, to fall-on and Renew the Aſſault, in Defiance of all Oppoſition. The Enemies Stones and Arrows deſtroy'd Great Numbers of the Jews; but Joſeph and his People made good the Wall ſtill; and with Fire, Sword, and Other Inſtruments of Miſchief, lay galling the People that had the Government of the Battering Engine. The Jews now, with all their Bravery, advanc'd little yet; in regard that they were forced to Fight in ſight of the Enemy; and the Fire they made uſe of againſt the Romans, gave the Enemy Light againſt Themſelves: ſo that they ſtood ſo Fair a Mark, that there was no Miſſing it on the One ſide, and no Avoiding it on the Other; for they could not ſo much as ſee the very Machines from whence the Weapons came. By the Force of Stones from Thoſe Engines, the very Battlements and the Corners of the Towers were broken down; and where they fell into a Body, they carry'd away Whole Files before them. But whoever would be Enform'd of the Wonderful Effect of Theſe Machines, needs never look further then into the Hiſtory of That Night.

The Strange Force of Theſe Battering Engines.

There was a Friend of Joſeph's that, as he was upon the Walls of Jotapata with him, had his Head Struck-off with a Stone from One of Theſe Engines; which was carry'd Three Furlongs from the Place, as if it had been thrown out of a Sling. And Another, coming croſs a Big-belly'd Woman, carry'd the Child within her half a Furlong from the Body. Now taking All This together; the Prodigious Violence and the Terrible Clattering of Theſe Machines, and of the Weapons they Caſt; the Frequent Noiſes of the Dead and Wounded falling from the Walls; the Shrieks and Groans of Women within the Town, anſwer'd by Other Miſerable Creatures from without; the Town-Ditch flowing with Blood and fill'd with Piles of Carcaſſes, ſufficient to Mount an Enemy to the Aſſault; and the Eccho's from the Mountains, after all This, doubling the Miſerable Story: there was Nothing wanting that Sorrowful Night, in fine, that might Strike the Eye or the Ear with an unexpreſſible Horrour. There was a Huge Slaughter of Brave Men in That Night's Action, in a moſt Heroical Defence of the Liberty of their Country; which they Maintain'd all Night againſt the Uttermoſt Efforts of the Enemy's Machines, till Break of Day; and then the Wall fell to pieces. But the Jews even in This Diſmal Extremity made the Breach good yet, with their Bodies and their Arms, before the Romans could paſs their Men over the Ditch to the Attaque.

WHen the Roman Army had a little refreſh'd themſelves next Morning after the Fatigue of ſo Severe a Night, Veſpaſian put Every Thing in a Readineſs for an Aſſault; taking Care in the Firſt place to keep the Jews from daring to ſhew themſelves in the Breach. To This End, he diſmounted a Party of the Beſt Horſe he had; Armed them at all Points, and ſo ranged them in Three Diviſions, with Pikes in their Hands, to make good the Breach: and They Themſelves, upon the Advance of the Bridges, to be the Firſt to Enter the Town. Theſe Horſe were to be Seconded by a Body of Choice-Foot; and the Remainder of the Horſe to be Diſtributed quite round the Mountainous Parts of the City, to make ſure that, upon the Taking of it, no Creature ſhould ſcape. The Next, in Order, were the Archers, with their Bows and Arrows, fix'd, and at Hand; and ſo for the Slingers and Engineers. Others were Employ'd with Ladders to attempt the Scaling of ſome Parts of the Wall that were Entire; which was intended only for an Amuſement, and to draw-off Aſſiſtance from Other Places that more needed it, and to force them by This Diverſion to abandon the Attaque.

Joſeph was ſo well Enform'd of the Roman's Purpoſes and Deſigns, that he Employ'd only Men that were either Over-wrought or Superannuated for the Guard of Thoſe Parts of the Wall that were ſound; as, who ſhould ſay, There's no Danger upon upon This Quarter. But wherever there was the Leaſt Crack or Flaw, not a Man was made uſe of for That Duty but of a Try'd Integrity and Courage: and he Himſelf, with Five more, in the Head of them to receive the Firſt Shock of the Enemy; giving them in charge not ſo much as to mind the Outcries of Inſulting Clamours, but rather to ſhut their Ears againſt them: for they were all but Noiſe. As for their Archers, the Shields over their Heads were the Beſt Defence againſt their Arrows: or they might withdraw a little till they had Empty'd their Quivers. But ſays Joſeph, if they come once to lay over their Bridges, there's nothing then to be Thought of but Fighting: and not as People in the Defence of a Country that is to be Preſerved, but for the Honour and Vindication of a Country that is already Loſt: and to make the Authors of your Ruine pay Dear for their Purchace. For what can you Expect, upon the ſubduing of your City, but that your Adverſaries will Gratify their Cruelty with the Bloud of your Fathers, your Wives, and your Children? After This Manner Joſeph divided himſelf.

And gives his People their Leſſon.

When the Common People, the Women and the Children ſaw the Town Surrounded by Three Armies, (and no Force ſent out to Encounter them) the Enemy Marching up with their Drawn Swords toward the Weak Side of the Wall; the Mountains round about Glittering with Arms, and the Arabians ready with their Arrows: they ſet up ſuch a Howl, as if the City were not only in Danger of Ruine, but already Taken. Theſe Clamours were ſo Moving, that Joſeph preſently Order'd the Women to their Houſes, and to Silence at their Peril, for fear of Diſheartning the Soldiers: while He Himſelf went away to that Part of the Town that fell to his Lot; paſſing by the Scaling Ladders without ſo much as minding them: his Thoughts being altogether taken up with the Enemy's way of Attaque by their Darts and their Arrows.

A Horrid Confuſion of Outcries on the Approach of the Army.

Upon the Sounding of the Trumpets; the giving of the Signal, and the Military Shout of the Army: the very Sky was Darken'd with a Cloud of Arrows. Joſeph's Companions did not forget their Leſſon, but ſtopt their Ears againſt the Clamours, and Cover'd themſelves with their Shields againſt the Shot. But upon the Leaſt Advance of the Bridges, they flew upon the Romans like Light'ning, to put a Stop to the Deſign, either by keeping them off, or by beating them off, and diſputing Every Inch of the Poſſeſſion. For as faſt as the Romans Endeavour'd to Mount the Bridge, the Jews violently puſh'd them down again, with Signal Inſtances both of their Skill, and Courage, in the Conduct, and Execution, ſhewing themſelves as Bold and Fearleſs in the Extremity of Danger, as the Romans were where there was None at all; nay, the Greater the Hazzard, the Firmer was their Reſolution: and when they were once Engag'd, there was no parting them without the Death of the One or the Other. But the Jews being kept upon Perpetual Duty, and no Enforcements to relieve them; whereas the Romans had their Men Freſh and Freſh ſtill; and as One Party was Weary'd, or Worſted, Another at hand to ſupply the Place: Numbers muſt of Neceſſity carry it at the long run. The Romans were Senſible of the Advantage they had; and ſo preſſing as Cloſe together as One could ſtand to Another, they threw their Long Bucklers over their Backs; and making an Impenetrable Figure, they drove the Jews before them; as if the Strength of the Whole Army had been United into One Entire Body: and ſo advanced-up to the very Wall.

Joſeph's Men keep to their Orders.

A Bloudy Conflict betwixt the Jews and the Romans.

The Romans Advance up to the Wall, under Cover of their Bucklers.

In this Diſtreſs, Joſeph, upon Advice with his Neceſſities and Deſpairs, reſolved upon a Trial of this Experiment. The Jews having a great deal of Oyl by them, Joſeph Order'd the Boiling a Conſiderable Quantity of it; and ſo to caſt it down Scalding Hot upon the Soldiers under the Wall, together with the very Pots and Veſſels it was Boil'd in. This was done accordingly; and paſſing between the Bucklers, and over the Bodies of the Romans, it utterly broke their Order, and deſtroy'd the Men; by forcing them down from the Wall in their Extreme Miſery. For the Oyl, flowing under their Arms from Head to Foot, and ſo all over the Body, Conſum'd the Fleſh like Fire it ſelf; being Naturally apt to take Heat, and long a Cooling. And then their Armour being brac'd and buckl'd to their Bodies, there was no getting clear of the Torment: ſome of them leaping and ſpringing in their Pains; Others drawn Double, and All falling from the Bridge down to the Ground. And for thoſe that Attempted to get-off to their Own People, they were Eaſily Maſter'd by the Jews at their Backs.

The Jews pour down Scalding Oyl among them.

In the Whole Courſe of theſe Calamitous Circumſtances, there was no Failing either of Courage in the Romans, or of Prudence in the Jews. For the Romans, notwithſtanding the Miſery they Endur'd by the Scalding Oyl, had the Heart yet to preſs upon thoſe that pour'd it among them, and not without a Competition who ſhould be Foremoſt. The Jews, after this, put Another Check to the Progreſs of the the Romans, by caſting Boil'd Fenugreek upon the Bords of the Bridge; which made them ſo Slippery that the Romans could not keep their Feet upon them: ſo that they could neither Fight nor Fly. Some fell at their length upon the Planches, where they were Trampled upon by their Own People: Others fell Lower, where they lay at the Mercy of the Jews Shot. Veſpaſian found his People ſo haraſs'd out by this way of Fighting, that toward Evening he call'd them off; having loſt ſeveral Men, and more wounded. Of Jotapata there were only Six Men Slain, and upwards of Three Hundred Hurt. This Action paſſed the Twentieth of the Month Dæſius.

Veſpaſian was ſo Senſible of the Miſcarriage of this Aſſault, that he Treated the Army with an Excuſatory Complement upon that Occaſion: But finding the Soldiery ſo far from being Dejected, that they were rather Enflam'd, and that they had more Mind to be doing then Talking, he Order'd the Raiſing of his Platforms, and the Erecting of Three Wooden Towers upon them, of Fifty Foot a-piece; Cover'd all over with Iron to keep them ſteady with the Weight, and make them Proof againſt Fire. In theſe Turrets were the Choiceſt of his Markſmen and Engineers, with their Machines, Inſtruments and Arms. The People in them had this Advantage of the Beſieged, that they were out of Sight and Reach of the Others: whereas thoſe upon the Wall were Eaſily ſeen and wounded from the Turrets. So that the Jews being neither able to Avoid the Arrows from above, nor ſo much as to ſee who Hurt them, quitted the Breach; but ſtill upon all Attaques made a Vigorous and a Brave Reſiſtance. At this Rate did Jotopata defend it ſelf, though with Daily Loſs of Men, and with much more Hazzard and Miſchief to Themſelves then to the Enemy.

Veſpaſian Orders the Raiſing of his Platforms.

Veſpaſian being given to Underſtand that Japha, a Neighbour-City to Jotapata, after the Example of the Other, was Grumbling toward a Revolt; eſpecially encourag'd by the Famous Defence of that Place, that held out beyond all Expectation: he ſent Trajan the Commander of the Tenth Legion with Two Thouſand Foot and a Thouſand Horſe to reduce them. But finding the Town impregnably Fortify'd, (for beſide the Natural Strength of the Situation, it was Encompaſs'd with a Double Wall) he was Encounter'd upon the way, by the Inhabitants of the Place, in a Poſture to give him Battle. The Bodies join'd; and, after a Slight Reſiſtance, Trajan put them to Flight, and purſu'd them ſo Cloſe upon the Heel to the Out-Wall (which was the Place they made to) that they fell with them Pell-mell into the Firſt Encloſure; but upon preſſing up to the Second Wall, the Townſmen ſhut the Gates upon them for fear of Taking-in both Friend and Foe, one with another. This Extraordinary way of delivering up the Gallileans into the Hands of the Romans, was a moſt Judicial Providence of Heaven: for theſe Men to be ſhut out of their Own Gates by their Own People, and given up for a Sacrifice to an Enemy that thirſted for their Bloud. They Crouded in Throngs up to the Gates; call'd to the Officers by their Names, and begg'd Admittance; having their Throats cut at the ſame time, with their very Prayers betwixt their Lips. The Romans kept One Gate, and the Citizens the Other; and of thoſe that were Coopt up in this Encloſure: Some laid Violent Hands upon themſelves; Others fell by the Swords of their Companions; and thoſe not to be Number'd that fell by the Hands of the Romans: and not One Creature of all theſe at laſt that had the Heart to lift up a Hand or ſo much as Offer at a Revenge: for over and above the Dread of an Enemy, their Spirits were taken down with a Senſe of Treachery among themſelves. They dy'd, in fine, to the Number of Twelve Thouſand Perſons; and all Curſing the Jews, not the Romans.

Trajan gave it now for granted that their Martial Men were in a manner all cut-off; and for thoſe that were left, they would take Warning by their Companions: ſo that he ſent away preſently to deſire Veſpaſian that his Son Titus might have the Honour of Finiſhing the Work. Veſpaſian Underſtood it of ſomewhat Conſiderable that that was yet to be done; and ſo Titus was Diſpatch'd away accordingly, with an Enforcement of Five Hundred Horſe and a Thouſand Foot; which he divided immediately, upon his Arrival, into Two Attaques: that on the Left-Hand he gave to Trajan, and the Right-Hand Diviſion he Commanded himſelf. The Firſt Thing that the Romans did, after this, was to plant Scaling Ladders, and then to Mount the Wall upon all Quarters at the ſame time. The Gallileans made ſome Faint Reſiſtance for a while; but ſoon quitting the Wall, Titus with his Party preſently leapt down after them and Enter'd the Town. It came now to a Deſperate Street-Fight; which, betwixt Ambuſhes, and Sallies from Nooks and Narrow Paſſes; where a Great Number of Sturdy Fellows were got together; and Annoyances of all Sorts that they receiv'd from the very Women upon the Tops of the Houſes: laſted a matter of Six Hours. But the Daring Men being by this time cut-off; the Remainder of the Multitude, whether at Home or in the Field, Young Men and Old, were all Deſtroy'd Indifferently; and not a Male left alive but Infants, who were carry'd away Captives with the Women. The Number of the Slain in the City and in the Firſt Encounter was Fifteen Thouſand, and Two Thouſand One Hundred and Thirty Priſoners. For they were never the Wiſer for Example and Experience: but without conſidering either their Own Weakneſs, or the Mighty and Proſperous Power of the Romans, they were at that time running Head-long into a Rebellion: but Veſpaſian took an Early Care to prevent the Miſchief. For though the Whole Province of Samaria was in a manner beſet with Garriſons, he was not yet without ſome Apprehenſion of what ſuch a Multitude of People, and ſuch a Conſpiracy of Ill Affections might Produce: ſo that for fear of the Worſt, he ſent away (a) Cerealis a Tribune of the Fifth Legion, with Six Hundred Horſe and Three Thouſand Foot, to take care of the Publique.

It ſo fell out that being now in the Height of Summer, and a very Hot Seaſon, the Samaritans were in great want of Water (the Country having made no Proviſion to Supply it:) inſomuch that there dy'd ſome or other of them daily of a Parching Drought: Others went over to the Romans, chuſing rather to ſuffer the Slavery, then ſo Miſerable a Death. Cerealis being Enformed by Deſerters, that they that ſtay'd behind were as much broken and out of Heart as their Fellows, he advanced up the Mountain; and drawing out his Army round the Enemy, did not only Offer them Life and Liberty, upon Condition of laying down their Arms; but beſought them with all the Courteſy imaginable to accept of the Indemnity that was Offer'd, upon an Aſſurance that it ſhould be made good. But they were not to be prevail'd upon; and ſo they were All put to the Sword, to the Number of Eleven Thouſand Six Hundred Perſons. THE People of Jotapata held out a Long time, and ſtood Firm againſt all Extremities; with a Conſtancy to Admiration. But upon the Forty-ſeventh Day, when the Romans had carry'd up their Works to Over-top the Walls, Veſpaſian had an Account brought him by a Deſerter, of the State of the Town: which was, that what with the Loſs of Men, Watching, and Hard Duty, the Garriſon was ſo weaken'd, that with one ſharp Aſſault more, the Romans might certainly carry the Place: Or, which would be the Eaſier way, it was but taking the Right Opportunity to ſurprize them. So the Deſerter adviſ'd Veſpaſian to take his Time about Break of Day; when he might be ſure to find them Supine and Careleſs; and the Guard ſo Drowſy and Tir'd, that He could hardly fail of Carrying his Point.

The Romans Works being now Finiſh'd, a Deſerter gives Veſpaſian Notice of the State of the Town; And Adviſes him to Fall on about Break of Day.

Veſpaſian was ſo well Acquainted with the Obſtinate Fidelity of the Jews One to Another, and with the Greatneſs of their Stomachs in caſe of Force or Torments; that he gave little or no Credit to This Fugitive; for the ſake of an Inſtance he had ſeen of a Wonderful Conſtancy of Mind in One of That City already. He was a Priſoner of Jotapata; and being put to the Queſtion about the Condition of the Town, he ſtood all manner of Tortures, even to Fire and the Croſs it ſelf, to the Contempt of Death in all Forms, rather them make the Leaſt Diſcovery. But the Thing not being very Unlikely, Veſpaſian thought with Himſelf that it might yet poſſibly be True: Or, at the Worſt, that he ſhould run no Riſque at all in ſeeming to believe it. Upon This Conſideration, he Order'd the Enformer to be taken into Cuſtody, and Every Thing to be made Ready for the Aſſault.

Veſpaſian Conſiders of it, takes his time, and carries his Point.

At the Hour aſſign'd, the Army made a Silent March up to the Walls: Titus in the Head of it, with Domitius Sabinus, and ſome pickt Men out of the Fifteenth Legion. They Kill'd the Sentinels; cut the Throats of the Guards; Enter'd the City; and after them follow'd Sextus Cerealis the Tribune, and Placidus, with the Troups under their Command. The Romans were now in Poſſeſſion of the Fort; Maſters of the Town; Broad Day-light; and yet the Garriſon ſo Spent and Mop'd with Labour and Overwatching, that to this Inſtant they did not ſo much as know the Town was Taken. Nay, Thoſe that were Awake, were almoſt as much to ſeek too as the reſt: for there fell ſuch a Miſt in that very Inſtant, that either they ſaw nothing at all, or they did not know what they ſaw. This Fogg continu'd till the Whole Army were Enter'd the Place: the People never Waking till they felt the Danger, and till they were Convinc'd by Dying that they were Undone. The Romans had ſuffer'd too much in the Siege, to have any Senſe of Mercy or Tenderneſs upon the Storm. Some were thrown Head-long down, in the Scuffle, from the Top of the Fort to the Bottom; Others, that wanted neither Good-will, nor Reſolution, to revenge themſelves, were either preſs'd to death in Crouds, or forced down Precipices, or paſh'd to pieces with Ruines from over their Heads. This was the Caſe of ſeveral of Joſeph's Select Friends; who choſe rather to Die by their Own Hands, then by the Hand of an Enemy; and to Kill themſelves in Private, when they could not have the Satisfaction of taking a Roman along with them. This was it that mov'd divers of them to withdraw together into a Remote Part of the City, and there to do the Laſt Office One for Another.

The Particulars of the Action.

A Mercyleſs Cruelty without ſparing ſo much as One Man.

Thoſe of the Guard that took the Firſt Notice of the Town's being Loſt, got into a Certain Turret toward the North; where they were Aſſaulted, and for a while made it good: but being Over-born with Numbers, they Offer'd to Treat; and finding no Terms would be allow'd them, they were cut to pieces upon the Place, and fell like Men of Bravery and Honour. This Action clos'd the Siege; and the Day had paſs'd without One Drop of Roman Bloud, if it had not been for the Death of Anthony a Centurion; who was Baſely and Treacherouſly Kill'd. There were ſeveral of the Jews that fled into Caves; and One of them call'd out to Anthony for Quarter, and his Right-Hand upon it, as an Obligation of Honour for the Performance of the Condition. Anthony unwarily Stretching forth his Right-Hand for the Jews Satisfaction, the Other Stabb'd him into the Groyne with a Dagger, and ſo Deſtroy'd him.

A Baſe and a Treacherous Murder.

The Romans kill'd all they met that day, without ſparing ſo much as one Man: and for ſome Days following, they ſearch'd all the Hiding-Places, Vaults, and Sellars they could hear of, for Fugitives; putting all to death they could lay hand on, ſaving only Women and Children. There were Twelve hundred Priſoners, and Forty thouſand Men ſlain, from one End of the Siege to the other. Veſpaſian Order'd the City to be rais'd, and the Caſtles to be all burnt. Jotapata, in fine, was Taken the Firſt of the Month Panemus, in the Thirteenth Year of Nero: and this was the Manner of Taking it.

Forty thouſand Men Kill'd in the Siege; The City rais'd, and the Caſtles burnt.

THE Romans were every where Hunting up and down for Joſeph, partly out of a Perſonal Animoſity to him, and in part out of an Officious Forwardneſs to pick a Thank with Veſpaſian; who look'd upon him as the Main Support of the War. They ſearch'd for him among the Dead and among the Living, and in all Places where the Body of a Man might be Conceal'd. But it wat his good Hap, upon the Taking of the Town, to make his Eſcape through the very middle of his Enemies, and to get at laſt into an old deep Pit with a Paſſage that led out of it into a Large Cavern; which was not to be diſcern'd from above. In this Cave, Joſeph found Forty Eminent Perſons under his own Circumſtances, with Proviſions about them for ſeveral Days. Now the Enemy being Maſter of the whole Country thereabouts, Joſeph was fain to keep cloſe in the Day-time; but went abroad ſtill in the Night, to Obſerve the Enemies Guards, and ſee what Poſſibility of making an Eſcape. The Watches, it ſeems, were ſo Strict and Vigilant, that there was no getting away; and that it was for his Sake too that they made this Scrutiny. Upon this, he went back again to his Retreat, and there lay ſtill a while. On the Third Day after this, he was betray'd by a Woman that was taken up; and Veſpaſian immediately, upon this Diſcovery, ſent Two Tribunes to him, Paulinus and Gallicanus, to invite him out of his Hole; with an Aſſurance, upon the General's Word and Honour, that he ſhould be fairly Treated. Joſeph durſt not Truſt ſo far to the Roman Generoſity as to Venture Himſelf upon the General's Parole; but being Conſcious to himſelf of the Miſchief he had done them, he had more Reaſon he thought to Expect a Revenge then a Favour; and ſo Excus'd himſelf from Complying with the Propoſal. Veſpaſian, after this, ſent him a Third Tribune, One Nicanor, Joſeph's Old Friend and Acquaintance. This Nicanor Treated Joſeph at large upon the Generous Humanity of the Victorious Romans towards thoſe they have ſubdu'd: aſſuring him moreover that they were ſo far from bearing him any Ill-will for the Hurt he had done them, by the Bravery and Conduct of a Gallant Man; that, on the Contrary, they had a High Eſteem of him for his Virtues. And beſides, ſays Nicanor, What ſhould Veſpaſian need to ſtand Expoſtulating with Joſeph upon Conditions, when he has it abſolutely in his Power to do whatever he will with him aleady? Veſpaſian loves a Worthy Man, and he has a Mind to Oblige Joſeph, as a Perſon of that Character. Or can you imagine now, that, if the General had any mean Falſe Thing to do, he would ever have Employ'd a Friend in the Office of a Raſcal: or have wrapt up ſo Black a Villany under ſo Illuſtrious a Cover? Or do you think again, that even I my ſelf, if I had been put upon it, would ever have ſubmitted to be an Inſtrument in ſo Foul a Treachery? The Caſe was ſo Clear, and Joſeph made ſuch Difficulties of coming over to the Reaſon of it, that the Roman Soldiers had certainly ſet Fire to the Cave, if Veſpaſian had not taken them off by a Suggeſtion that he was reſolved to get Joſeph Alive into his Hands. Nicanor all this while lay preſſing Joſeph to a Complyance, with Inſtances ſtances more and more: the Rage and Menaces of the Soldiers ſtill Encreaſing with the Number. This brought to Joſeph's Mind Certain Dreams he had had; wherein God had revealed to him the Miſerable Calamities that were to betide the Jews; and the Proſperity and Greatneſs of the Romans. For Joſeph had an Extraordinary Gift of Expounding Dreams, and the Faculty of Unriddling many of thoſe Secrets that God had been pleaſed to Couch under Veil and Miſtery. As he was a Prieſt Himſelf, and of the Sacerdotal Race he was a Perſon perfectly well-skill'd in the Writings of the Holy Prophets: and in this very Inſtant, as if the Spirit of God had taken Poſſeſſion of him, the Whole Courſe and Order of his Viſions came into his Head; and particularly Thoſe Horrid Images that he had lately ſeen, as well as the reſt. And in This Rapture, he addreſs'd himſelf in a Prayer to Almighty God to This Effect. [Great God! ſays he, ſince it is Thy Bleſſed Will to Depreſs the Jews, and to Exalt the Romans; and to make Me the Inſtrument to foretell Thy Purpoſe: I ſubmit my ſelf to Thy Providence, and to the Acceptance of my Life upon Condition of Rendring my ſelf to the Romans: but in the Preſence of thy Sacred Majeſty, I do likewiſe declare, that I do it as the Miniſter of thy Good Pleaſure, and not as a Betrayer of my Country.]

Joſeph calls to Mind Dreams and Revelations of Times paſt.

Joſeph Delivers himſelf up to the Romans.

Joſeph had no ſooner given himſelf up to Nicanor, but all his Companions in the Cave came Ruffling up to him with Clamorous Invectives and Exclamations. [What is become of the Laws of our Country, they cry'd, or of the Honour of our Profeſſion? The Spirit of our Anceſtors, and That Primitive Vigour of the Jews, that with the Firſt Breath of Life drew in a Contempt of Death? And can Joſeph be ſo Fond of That Life too, as ever to think of looking the Sun in the Face, and ſee himſelf a Slave? Why does he not act according to his Doctrine, and Practiſe as he Teaches? He Preaches, and Recommends Liberty to Others, and Renounces it Himſelf. You were certainly very much Miſtaken, they cry'd, in the Meaſures you took of True Wiſdom and Courage; either if you could hope for Quarter where you have ſo little deſerv'd it, or if you can ſink ſo low as to accept of Life upon Diſhonourable Terms. But however the Fortune of Rome may Fright you into a Forgetfulneſs of your ſelf, it ſhall never make us depart from the Duty we Owe to the Good of our Nation: and we have yet Hearts and Swords Ready to Stand by you in That Quarrel. Or if you are Otherwiſe reſolv'd, you have it now at your Choice; whether you will Dye a General of the Jews, or the Death of a Coward and a Traytor. Fall upon your own Sword, and you do the Former; Or leave it to Us, and it will be the Latter: for the Work is to be done however.]

A Generous Invective againſt Joſeph.

The Word was no ſooner out, but they all drew upon him, and threaten'd to Kill him That Inſtant, if he ſubmitted to the Romans. Joſeph had ſo Scrupulous a Fear upon him, leſt he ſhould be taken-off before he could acquit himſelf of what he had in Charge from Almighty God to Communicate to the Nation of the Jews, that he Enter'd into a Reaſoning of the Caſe in Words to This Effect.

The Deſperate Reſolution of the Jews.

What can be the Meaning, My Good Friends and Companions, of This Deſperate Phancy you have taken up of laying Violent Hands upon your ſelves, and in ſetting the Two Dearеſt Friends in Nature at Variance, the Soul and the Body? But am I Chang'd, do you ſay? Ask the Romans. Is it a Glorious Fate to Dye in War? It is ſo Undoubtedly, if it be in a War that is Menag'd according to the Law of Arms: That is to ſay; where a Man falls by the Hand of the Conquerour. Neither ſhould I make any more Conſcience of Killing my ſelf then of deſiring a Roman to do it; but yet if the Romans have a Mind to ſpare an Enemy, ſhall That Enemy on the Other hand be ſo Cruel as not to ſpare Himſelf? Or ſo Fooliſh, as to be more Rigorous in his Own Caſe, then he would have an Enemy to be. No Man dyes ſo Great, 'tis true, as he that Sacrifices his Life to his Liberty: but then it muſt be in Arms, and in the Act of Contending for it: and That Life taken away, in the Conteſt, by the Competitor that would take away That Liberty. But we have to do with an Enemy at preſent that neither Kills us, nor Fights with us; for the Quarrel is over. Now he is as Faint-Hearted a Wretch that preſſes to Dye when he ſhould not, as he that is afraid to Dye, when his Honour calls him to it. And pray'e what is it at laſt but the Fear of Death that keeps Us from going up to the Romans? and ſhall we caſt our ſelves into a Certain Death, one way, for fear of an Uncertain Death, Another? But it is, you'll ſay perhaps, to Avoid Slavery: And do you reckon your ſelves now to be at Liberty? But it is look'd upon as the Part of a Brave Man to take away his Own Life with his Own Hand. And what would you think of the Maſter of a Veſſel now, that, for fear of a Storm a-coming, ſhould ſink the Boat before it comes? Would you account that Man a Brave Captain? To ſay nothing of the Affront that is Offer'd to the Common Inſtinct of Providence in the Nature of Things; for the Deſire of Self-Preſervation is a Principle implanted in all Living Creatures; and for any thing to Deſtroy it ſelf, it is contrary to Nature, and Conſequently a Sacrilegious Wickedneſs againſt God Himſelf. There is no Creature that ſeeks or covets its Own Death, in Oppoſition to the Univerſal Joſeph Expoſtulates the Matter with his Companions.

Againſt Self Murder.

Impulſe of a Deſire to Live: and therefore we pronounce Thoſe People our Enemies that would take away our Lives, and Puniſh Thoſe that lie in wait to deſtroy us. It is from God that we have receiv'd Life, and it is to Him again, in his good time, that we are to Render it: and what can be more Provoking and Ungrateful now, then the Deſpiſing of his Gift? Our Bodies are all Mortal, and ſo are the Materials of which they are Compounded: but the Soul is a Divine Particle, infuſed into the Fleſh by God Himſelf, and it can never Dye. If any Man ſhall Imbezile or Abuſe a Depoſitum betwixt Man and Man, we can ſay nothing Bad enough of him: Now the Soul is effectually but God's Depoſitum; and ſhall we preſume to Rob the Divine Majeſty, and think to come-off at laſt without either Diſcovery or Puniſhment? We find it Reaſonable Enough to Puniſh Run-away Servants, though it be from the Worſt of Maſters: and ſhall we at the ſame Time, that Forſake a Gracious and a Righteous God, pretend to Juſtifie our ſelves? As for Thoſe that Govern themſelves according to the Inſtinct of Nature, and pay the Debt of Life back again to Him that gave it, whenever he Commands it: Do not you know that Everlaſting Honours attend the Memory of Thoſe Bleſſed Souls from Generation to Generation; which after a Certain Number of Ages in the Heavenly Manſions provided for them, ſhall return and Animate Bodies, Pure, like Themſelves? whereas the Deepeſt Pit of Hell is reſerv'd for Self-Murderers; and God will revenge the Iniquities of the Fathers upon the Children in After-Ages. They are Hateful to God, and the Wiſdom of our Great Law-giver hath been ſo ſevere upon them, that He that Kills Himſelf is not allow'd Burial till after Sun-ſet; though a Privilege never deny'd to an Enemy. In Other Places the Right Hand is cut-off from the Body of the Dead, as Arm'd againſt Himſelf: for it was Reaſonable that the Hand that parted the Soul and the Body, ſhould be divided from the Body, it ſelf. It is a Great Bleſſing, My Good Friends, to make a Right Judgment of Things, and not to render our Condition Worſe then it is, by Blaſpheming and Incenſing our Maker. If we have a mind to live, what hinders us; for Life can be no Diſhonour to us, where we have given ſo many Signal Proofs of our Virtue. But if nothing will ſerve us but Dying, let us fall by the Hands of Thoſe that have Maſter'd us. I am not for going over to the Enemy in ſuch a manner, as to Fool my ſelf out of my Life, by doing the ſame Thing to my Deſtruction, that a Deſerter does to ſave himſelf. If the Romans ſhould be Treacherous, and break Faith with us, it would be no more, in ſome reſpects, then what a Body might Honeſty wiſh for; as it yields Matter for a Steady and a Generous Mind to Work upon; not only in the Sufferance, but in the Contempt of Death: for the very Baſeneſs of the Perfidy will be ſome ſort of Comfort to us, when we Conſider, that the Authours of our Ruine have made themſelves Infamous and Odious to Eternity.

The Jews not to be Reclaim'd.

Joſeph was in Hope, by This, and a great deal more to This Purpoſe, to have diverted his Companions from the Impious Reſolution of Deſtroying Themſelves: but he found them Deaf to all ſober Councels, as Men abſolutely devoted to Deſtruction; and in ſuch a Tranſport of Rage, that they preſs'd upon him with their Swords drawn one after another, and with Menacing Words and Actions, accompany'd with the Vileſt Reproaches in Nature. In This Extremity, Joſeph menag'd with all the Skill and Addreſs imaginable, Treating them one while in the Style and Character of his Commiſſion; (as Authority carries a kind of Reverence along with it:) Diſcourſing One Man by his Name; taking Another by the Hand; ſolliciting a Third; Reaſoning with Another: ſo that in the Concluſion, by This Prudent Application to the Diſtracted variety of Humours, he diverted the Blow. It was much with Him, in fine, as it is with a Wild Beaſt in the Middle of a Troup of Huntſmen, that turns his Head ſtill to Him that is Next. This did not hinder yet but that, when it came to the Point of Execution, ſeveral of the Mutineers Hearts fail'd them: and the Veneration they had for their General made them drop their Swords, even in the Depth of his Diſtreſs.

They draw Lots for their Lives.

But Joſeph acted all this while, like a Wiſe, as well as a Good Man; and caſting himſelf upon the Providence of the Almighty, he determin'd at laſt to put his Life to the Hazzard. [Well! ſays he, ſince Death is the Thing you are reſolv'd upon, What have we more to do now, then to caſt Lots, one after another, for our Lives; and He ſtill upon whom the Lot falls, to be Kill'd by the Next Man: and ſo Every Man to take his Fortune round, after This Method. This will prevent the Self-Murder; for it would be Unreaſonable, when part of us are Dead, that any of the reſt ſhould repent and ſcape.] They were all pleas'd with the Equity of the Expedient: and ſo according to the Propoſal, they caſt Lots; and the Perſons upon whom they fell, were ſucceſſively put to death by the next Men: not doubting but it would come to the General's Turn at laſt, and pleaſing themſelves with the Hope of Dying in his Company; which they Valu'd more then life it ſelf.

It came to This at laſt (whether by Fortune or by Providence) that there was only Joſeph, and one more remaining, of the Whole Number. Hereupon Joſeph enter'd into This Deliberation. If we caſt Lots once again, ſays he, either my Friend muſt Kill Me, or I muſt Kill Him, and dip my Hand in the Bloud of my Countryman. So that Joſeph, in This Difficulty, prevail'd with his Companion to ſubmit to Live, upon His Engagement for his Security. Joſeph and One more ſubmit to Live.

When Joſeph was now deliver'd out of all his Troubles, as well from the Romans, as from his Own People, he gave himſelf up to Nicanor; who Conducted him to Veſpaſian. There was a Prodigious Preſs of People gotten together to ſee him; and a ſtrange Confuſion of Humours. Some were Overjoy'd that he was Taken; Others threatening him: ſome Crouding to get nearer him; and Others, at a diſtance, crying out for Juſtice upon him as a Publique Enemy. They that were gotten near enough to Obſerve the Perſon of the Man; and at the ſame time reflecting upon the Wonderful Things he had done, and the State of his Preſent Condition, were in Amazement at the Change. But, after all This, there was not any One of the Generals, how much ſoever Prepoſſeſs'd againſt him before; but, upon the very ſight of him, relented: Titus, eſpecially; who was a Perſon, above all the reſt, that had the Greateſt Eſteem for Joſeph's Character and Perſon, and the Inſuperable Dignity of his Mind in the Worſt of Accidents; Comparing alſo what he remember'd of him in the War, with what he ſaw of him now in the Hands of his Enemies, he could not but make his Obſervation upon the Power of Fortune; the Variable Chance of War, and the Uncertainty of Humane Affairs. Theſe were Titus's Thoughts of Joſeph: and he brought over all that heard him to be of the ſame Opinion; not Excepting his Own Father: with whom he was very Inſtrumental toward Joſeph's Preſervation. Joſeph ſet at Liberty, and Conducted by Nicanor to Veſpaſian. All the Diſcourſe is of Joſeph. Titus hath a High Eſteem for Joſeph.

Veſpaſian Order'd Jeſeph to be kept in Cloſe Cuſtody; as if he intended to ſend him to Nero, who thereupon deſired a Word in Private with him. Veſpaſian, upon This Intimation clear'd the Room of all but Himſelf, Titus, and Two Friends; and then gave him his Audience; Joſeph delivering himſelf in Terms to This Effect. [Sir, ſays he, you have now in your Hand, Joſeph, a Priſoner; and your Preſent Thought perhaps looks no further: but I am here a Meſſenger ſent by God Himſelf, about a Matter that much more Concerns you. And if it had not been for This Commiſſion, I could not have been here at preſent, contrary to the Duty of a Jewiſh General, Alive, in the Hand of an Enemy. But what am I to be ſent to Nero for, when Veſpaſian Himſelf is ſo near the Empire that I can hardly diſtinguiſh betwixt Veſpaſian and the Emperour, or Cæſar? beſide that his Son Titus is to come after him. Keep me as Cloſe as you pleaſe, provided I may be Veſpaſian's Priſoner; who is not only My Maſter, but in effect the Lord of the Univerſe. This is the Truth of what I have in Charge to deliver: and whenever I ſhall be found ſo Sacrilegious an Impoſtor as to make Uſe of God's Name to a Cheat, make an Example of me.] Joſeph kept a Cloſe Priſoner. Veſpaſian ſpeaks with Joſeph in Private. Joſeph foretells the Succeſſion of Veſpaſian and Titus to the Empire.

This Diſcourſe of Joſeph's look'd ſo like an Invention to ſave Himſelf, that Veſpaſian did not ſeem to give much heed to it at Firſt; till upon laying together certain Impulſes that he had Himſelf, with Other Tokens and Predictions looking the ſame way: and then Comparing This Story, with Joſeph's Exactneſs in Other Caſes, he came by degrees to give Entire Credit to the Preſage. A Friend and Confident of Veſpaſian's (one of the Two above-mention'd) was Expoſtulating with Joſeph about the Credibility of what he had declar'd. If you are ſo good at Divining, ſays he, how came you to know nothing of the Deſtruction of Jotapata, and of your own Impriſonment; which would have ſav'd you a great deal of Trouble? Well! ſays Joſeph, I foretold the Inhabitants very particularly what was to befall the Town and My ſelf: that the Former was to be Deſtroy'd upon the Forty ſeventh Day, and that I my ſelf was to be Taken Priſoner by the Romans. Veſpaſian cauſed a Strict Enquiry to be made, in Private, of the Truth of This Relation; which he found verify'd by the Priſoners: and ſo came to have a Better Opinion of the reſt. But Joſeph was not at all Eas'd yet in the Strictneſs of his Reſtraint; but, to all Other Purpoſes of Accommodation and Convenience, treated with great Courteſy and Reſpect by Titus in a more Peculiar manner. Veſpaſian gives little heed to it. The Truth of Joſeph's Predictions Confirmed.

On the Fourth of the Month Panemus, Veſpaſian return'd to Ptolemais, and thence went to Cæſarea on the Sea-Coaſt; which is the Faireſt City of Judæa. The Greater part of the Inhabitants were Greeks: ſo that Veſpaſian and his Army were Welcome upon a Double Account; partly out of the love they had for the Romans, and partly out of the Averſion they had for the Jews. The Latter was ſo Violent, that they preſs'd Veſpaſian with Clamorous Importunities to put Joſeph to death. The General conſider'd This Tumultuary Way of Proceeding, only as the Act of a Raſh Multitude; and ſo diſmiſs'd the Petitioners without an Anſwer. He look'd upon it Veſpaſian Returns to Ptolemais, and ſo to Cæſarea.

Joppe a Neſt of Rovers, and Mutineers.

THere was now a Huge Multitude of People got together: partly Revolters from the Romans, and partly Fugitives out of ſome Conquer'd Cities of the Jews. This Rabble was at Work upon the Rebuilding of Joppe, which Ceſtius had demoliſh'd; and for want of Subſiſtence in the Country, which he had laid waſte, they reſolv'd to try their Fortunes at Sea: and put out with a Fleet of Privateers; ſcowring Syria, Phœnicia, and the Coaſts of Ægypt; pillaging all Traders in Thoſe Seas, and wholly Obſtructing the Commerce. Veſpaſian, being well Enform'd what they were a-doing, ſent a Body of Horſe and Foot to Joppe; which being looſely guarded, they Enter'd the Town in the Night with much Eaſe. The Inhabitants were ſo Diſorder'd upon This Surprize, that, without daring to Attempt any thing upon the Romans, they went all a-board in a Hurry, and lay That Night off at Sea, ſomewhat more then a Flight-ſhot from the Town.

Veſpaſian Takes the Town by Surprize. The Inhabitants put themſelves aboard their Shipping.

As to the Deſcription of the Place, it is a Sea-Town without any manner of Port; the Shoar Steep and Craggy; with Two Pointed Rocks, one on each ſide, ſtretching out a good way into the Sea, and a little bending, in the Form of a Half-Moon: which makes a very Tempeſtuous Sea there in Foul Weather. Here are the Marques ſtill to be ſeen of Andromeda's Chains, for the Credit of the Old Fable. A Croſs Wind upon That Quarter daſhes the Waves and the Rocks together in ſo Dreadful a manner, that nothing can be more Hideous or Dangerous.

The Deſcription of Joppe.

A Furious Storm.

While the Men of Joppe were Riding in This Station, there aroſe a Furious Storm by break of Day; which is known to the People of the Place by the Name of the Black-North. This Wind batter'd their Veſſels to pieces: ſome againſt one another; Others againſt the Rocks: and then there were Great Numbers of them; that, labouring againſt the Tide to put out to Sea, were Overturn'd and ſwallow'd-up. So that their Choice was Certain Death, either to Fly or Stay: the One, for the Rocks; the Other, for the Enemy. This was their Condition, betwixt the Winds, at Sea, and the Romans, a-ſhoar. It was a Diſmal Hearing, the Shrieks and Outcries of the People, and the Clattering of the Veſſels: But upon the Whole, ſome were drown'd; Others dy'd a-board the Wrecks: ſome fell upon their Swords, as if it had been to prevent the Sea; ſeveral were waſh'd away by the Billows, and beaten to pieces againſt the Rocks; till the Water was diſcolour'd with the Bloud, and the Whole Coaſt cover'd with Dead Bodies: the Soldiers waiting all this while upon the Land to Diſpatch Thoſe that were driven a-ſhoar. They reckon'd, in fine, upon Four Thouſand Two Hundred Bodies caſt up with the Tide.

Joppe Taken the Second time by the Romans.

The Romans being now Maſters of Joppe without a Stroke, ras'd it to the Ground: and This was the ſecond Taking of it by Them, in a very ſhort Time. But Veſpaſian, for fear it might come to be a Neſt of Pirates yet once again, Fortify'd the Caſtle, and put into it a Foot-Garriſon ſufficient to Maintain it; leaving there alſo a Conſiderable Body of Horſe, to ſcowre, burn, and lay waſte all the Towns, Villages, and Country thereabouts: which Orders Day after Day were Executed accordingly.

The Caſtle Fortify'd, and Garriſon'd.

The Action of Jotapata not believ'd at Jeruſalem, at Firſt.

When the News of Jotapata's being Taken came to Jeruſalem; the Story was ſo Extraordinary, and the Fact ſo Ill-atteſted, that little or no Heed was given to it. Now there was not, in truth, ſo much as One Man of the Place left Alive to Carry the Tidings: but the Fame of it brake looſe among the Neighbourhood, as Ill News commonly ſpreads apace. But how Doubtful ſoever it might ſeem at Firſt, it came by little and little to paſs for current; and to ſuch a degree of Credit, that People believ'd more then All, and ſwallow'd the Whole Truth with Additions. For it was confidently given out; that, upon the Taking of the City, Joſeph was ſlain, to the Infinite Affliction of Jeruſalem, and of all that was Conſiderable in That City.

Not a Man left alive to carry the News.

Joſeph ſaid to be Slain and Univerſally Lamented.

Some

Some were lamented by Particular Families; Others, by Friends, Relations, or their Own People: but the General, being a Publique Loſs, was the Subject alſo of an Univerſal Mourning: inſomuch that for Thirty Days there was no Intermiſſion of the Solemnity, and no Coſt ſpar'd for the Celebration of the Funeral Ceremony and Pomp. But when Time brought Truth to Light, and gave the World the Hiſtory of Jotapata juſt as it was in Fact: That is to ſay; when it came to be known that Joſeph was not Dead as reported, but yet Living; and in ſo Great Credit with the Romans, that their Generals inſtead of Treating him as a Slave, Crown'd him with all the Honours they could Confer upon him: the Veneration they had for him, while they look'd upon him to be Dead, was now turn'd into the moſt Venomous Envy and Hatred. How many Cowards and Traytors did they call him for abandonning the Cauſe! And how did the Whole City join with his Detractors in the Calumny and Reproach! It is the Part and Practice of Wiſe Men to make uſe of one Misfortune for a Precaution againſt Another, and to keep themſelves upon their Guard: but Theſe People, on the contrary, when they are once out of their way, purſue their Error, and make the End of One Miſchief the Beginning of Another. At This Rate the Jews were now Tranſported into a Greater Rage againſt the Romans then ever; as if the Wreaking of their Malice upon Them, were Their neareſt way to Revenge upon Joſeph. Theſe were the Troubles of Jeruſalem at This Time.

Joſeph as much Hated, when They found him Living, and in Credit with the Romans.

KIng Agrippa having Invited Veſpaſian to paſs away a little Time with him in his Country, and to bring his Army along with him, partly out of Generoſity and Kindneſs, and partly in Hope by His Means to bring ſome Mutinous Malecontents into Better Order: the General embraced the Motion with Great Reſpect, and Marched from Cæſarea upon the Sea Coaſt to Cæſarea Philippi; where he ſtay'd Twenty Days refreſhing Himſelf and his Troups, and giving God Thanks with Feaſting and Rejoycing for the Bleſſings of his Succeſſes. Veſpaſian was there given to Underſtand that Tiberias was at that time Wavering, and Tarichee already Revolted, (Both Places being Dependences upon the Kingdom of Agrippa) he thought he could not have a Fairer Opportunity of Acknowledging his Obligations to Agrippa, then by reducing Thoſe People to their Allegeance; eſpecially being reſolved within Himſelf to preſs hard upon the Jews. So he ſent away his Son Titus for the Troups that were Quarter'd at Cæſarea to bring them to Scythopolis: a Place not far from Tiberias, and much the Largeſt Town in the Canton of Decapolis. Veſpaſian got thither Firſt, and there ſtay'd for his Son: advancing afterwards with Three Legions within Thirty Furlongs of Tiberias, and There Encamped at a Place call'd (a) Ennabris, within ſight of the Rebels. From thence he Order'd out Valerian, a Captain with Fifty Horſe, to try what might be done with Fair Words toward the bringing of them toward their Duty. His Inſtructions were to tell them, that the General took the People to be Peaceably enough inclin'd, if it were not for ſome Seditious, Pragmatical Sticklers in the Head of them. When Valerian was come up almoſt to the Town, he alighted from his Horſe, and Commanded his Companions to do the like, that there might be no Colour of any Jealouſie of an Ill Intention. The Faction, under the Command of Jeſus the Son of Tobias, a Captain of a Ban of Rovers, fell furiouſly upon Valerian and his People, without giving them time for ſo much as One Word. Valerian was not a little Startled at the Affront; but durſt not ſtrike a Stroke however, contrary to his General's Order; even if he had been ſure to have got the Better of him: beſide, that there was no Venturing an Encounter upon That Odds. Valerian, in fine, and Five of his Men, made their Eſcapes a-Foot, being forced to leave their Horſes behind them; which Jeſus and his Crew carry'd-off in Triumph into the Town, as the Trophees of a Victory rather then a Scandalous Booty.

The

The Mean and Unmanly Courſneſs of This Action put the Senſible and the Sober Men of the Town into ſuch an Apprehenſion for fear of a Revenge, that they went preſently out to the Roman Camp, under the Countenance and Conduct of King Agrippa, and caſt themſelves at Veſpaſian's Feet for Mercy, and Pardon: begging of him not to impute the Crimes of Particular Perſons to the Whole Body of a People that never wanted Veneration for the Romans; and likewiſe to ſpare the Innocent, and Puniſh the Authors and Promoters of the Defection. Veſpaſian could hardly forgive the Town the Seizure of the Horſes; but however, for Aggrippa's ſake, and upon His Mediation, he granted their Requeſt. So ſoon as This Act of Grace was paſt, Jeſus and That Faction found that Tiberias would be quickly too Hot for Them; and ſo they ſlipt away to Tarichees.

Veſpaſian, at the Inſtance of Agrippa pardons the Affront.

Veſpaſian ſent Trajan the Day following with a Party of Horſe to take Poſſeſſion of the Caſtle, and to ſound the Common People if they were of the ſame Peaceable Diſpoſition with their Deputies. Upon finding that they were Well-Diſpos'd, Veſpaſian March'd up to the City with his Whole Army; the Citizens Opening their Gates to bid him Welcome, and receiving him upon the Way with Gratulations and Acknowledgments as their Benefactor and Protector. But the Gates being too Narrow for the Troups to March at liberty, Veſpaſian cauſed a Part of the South-Wall to be beaten down to Widen the Paſſage; but with a Command, upon the Uttermoſt Penalty, not to Offer any ſort of Violence to the People whatſoever. This was for Agrippa's ſake, he ſaid; and ſo it was alſo, that he ſpar'd the Remainder of the Wall, upon the King's Undertaking for the People's Good Behaviour for the Time to come. This was the End, for the preſent, of the Troubles of Tiberias.

Veſpaſian was now gone from Tiberias, and Encamped betwixt That and Tarichee; where he Fortify'd his Camp with a Wall, upon an Opinion that the Taking of That Place would be a Work of Time. For it was Wonderfully Strong both by Art and Nature; and beſide that it was Fortify'd by the Lake of Genezareth, it was look'd upon as the Reſeptacle of of all the Deſperate Turbulent People of the Faction. It ſtands like Tiberias, upon a Mountain; and Joſeph had run-up a Strong Wall round about it, ſave only on the Lake-ſide: but ſomewhat Leſs then That of Tiberias. At the Beginning of the Revolt, there wanted neither Men, Moneys, nor Proviſions for the making of it Impregnable: and there was over and above to ſpare alſo, for Tarichee. The Beſiegers had likewiſe a Fleet of Armed Boats in Readineſs upon the Lake, for a Retreat, in caſe of a Blow at Land; or to ſerve for a Naval Fight, if there ſhould be Occaſion.

Tarichee a Nurſery of Seditious People. The Strength and Situation of the Place.

The Faction breaks in upon the Roman Pioneers.

While the Romans were Fortifying and Intrenching, Jeſus and his Fellows made a Furious Attaque upon them; ſcatter'd the Pioneers, and Overthrew a good Part of their Works; without any Dread either of the Roman Diſcipline, or of their Numbers. But upon their Advancing toward them in a Groſs Body, they got-off ſafe to their Party without any Damage: the Romans purſuing them to the Lake, where they caſt themſelves a-board their Veſſels; and when they were gotten out of the Reach of the Roman Darts and Arrows, they came to an Anchor: and there they lay ranged in as good Order of Battle againſt their Enemies a-ſhoar, as if they had been drawn-up in Form for a Combat.

The Romans purſue the Jews up to their Shipping.

A Vaſt Number of Jews in a Body, and Titus ſent out for Diſcovery.

While This was a Doing, Veſpaſian had an Account brought him of a Great Body of Jews gather'd together on the Next Plain: and thereupon ſent out his Son with a Detachement of Six Hundred Choice-Horſe for Diſcovery. Titus March'd; and finding himſelf ſo Mightily Over-Number'd, he gave his Father Notice of it. This Vaſt Multitude Stagger'd ſeveral of the Party; but Titus finding the greater part of his People Chearful and Hearty, in deſpite of all Inequality and Diſproportion; he took up a Standing where he might beſt be heard, and ſpake to his Soldiers after This Manner.

RO-

ROMANS, ſays he, for I cannot begin my Diſcourſe more Auſpiciouſly then by put-ting you in mind of your Race; and by telling you Whence and What you are, and Whom you have to do withall. As to the Romans, the Whole World allows Them to be Invincible upon Undeniable Proof, and Experience: And I have This to ſay for the Jews too; that though they have been often Conquer'd, they would never Own themſelves to be Overcome: ſo that We have no more to do, then to ſtand as Firm at leaſt in Our Proſperity, as They do in their Adverſity. I Read Chearfulneſs and Courage in the very Faces of you, and it Joys me to ſee it: but yet I am Uneaſy ſometimes for fear the Vaſt Numbers of your Enemies ſhould ſtrike a ſecret Damp into That Reſolution. Wherefore let every Man duly conſider his Own Force, and That of his Adverſary. The Jews, 'tis true, are generally Bold, and Fearleſs of Death; but utterly to ſeek in Military Conduct, and Diſcipline; and may be more properly call'd a Croud of People then an Army: whereas Nothing can be more Regular, or Inſtructive, then Our Order, and Experience. What are We the Better for the Practice of Arms in Time of Peace, if it does not help us to ſupply the Want of Numbers, by Skill and Addreſs? Or, What's the Benefit of a Perpetual Exerciſe of War, if it gives us no Advantage over Men that are Raw and Unexperienc'd? Do but Conſider what it is to Encounter Naked Bodies with Men in Arms; Foot with Horſe; Men that Underſtand Nothing of Government, with Eminent Commanders; and that we are as good as Double the Number we appear to be, at That rate of Advantage, and the Enemy not half ſo ſtrong as we take him for. It is not Number alone that does the Buſ'neſs in War, let the Combatants be never ſo Stout; but True Courage, as we ſee every Day, does Wonders with a Few; for Moderate Numbers are Menageable to the Beſt Advantage of the Party: but great Bodies are liable to Diſorder and Confuſion, and more Miſchievous to Themſelves many times then an Enemy. The Daring, Deſperate, and Brutal Fierceneſs of the Jews does a great deal, I muſt Confeſs, in a Proſperous Courſe of Fortune; but, upon the Leaſt Check of a Diſaſter or Diſappointment, that Impetuous Ardour abates and comes to Nothing: whereas Virtue, Reſignation, Obedience, and True Valour, will ſupport us in all our Fortunes Good or Bad, without ever puffing us-up, or deceiving us. Beſide that we have a Greater Intereſt at ſtake then the Jews; for Their's is only a Popular Quarrel, for Liberty, and their Country: but we contend for Glory, and for the Fame of an Immortal Memory: and not without ſome Indignation neither, after the Conqueſt of the Whole World beſide, to find our ſelves hamper'd in a Competition with the Jews. You may Obſerve again, even in caſe of the Worſt, that we ſhall run no Great Riſque neither in the Conteſt; being ſure to be Well-ſeconded with ſo many of our Allies, ſo Strong, and ſo Near us. But what have We more to do now then to Anticipate the Victory, and Ingroſs the Honour of it to our ſelves, without waiting for the Enforcement we expect from my Father? The Glory will be the Greater when it comes home to us Entire, without Sharing. The Point at preſent in Queſtion is no Leſs then the Character of my Father, my ſelf, and my Fellow-Soldiers: That is to ſay; whether or no my Father deſerves the Honour the World has done him. And am not I His Son then, and are not you my Soldiers? My Father hath been ſo wonted to Victory, that I ſhould never dare to look him in the Face again, after one Baffle: and would not you be as much aſham'd of a Foil on the Other Hand, where the General leads the Way? The Firſt Poſt of Danger ſhall be Mine; do but you ſtand by me, and commit the reſt to God's Providence: Only remember what I tell you, that a Cloſe Fight will be the beſt of our Play. Titus to his Soldiours.

The Soldiers were ſo Elevated, and ſo Heroically diſpos'd upon This Diſcourſe, that it look'd as if they had been Inſpir'd with quite Another Soul. Only Trajan's coming up with Four Hundred Horſe before the Battle, put them a little out of Humour to think of having Partners in the Glory of the Day. Veſpaſian at the ſame time ſent Antonius Silo, with Two Thouſand Archers, to take Poſſeſſion of a Mountain over againſt the Town, and to beat the Defendents from the Wall; which was perform'd accordingly. Titus that had a mind to be thought ſtronger then he was, drew-up his Army in a Line to Anſwer the Front of the Enemy; and was the Firſt Man Himſelf that Charg'd-in upon their Body; his Men following him with Exultations and Outcries. The Jews were not a little Surpriz'd at the Boldneſs and Manner of This Attaque; but yet at Firſt, made ſome Faint Reſiſtance, till they were beaten down, and trampled upon by the Horſe; and ſo diſpers'd; ſhifting away into the City the beſt they could; and a Great many Kill'd upon the Place. Titus all this while preſſing upon the Backs of ſome of them; croſſing upon Others, and cutting them over the Faces; Overtaking ſome, and Forcing Others back again that made for the Walls, and tumbling them one over another: inſomuch that Few or None ſcap'd, but thoſe that got into the Town. The Utter Deſtruction of the Jews.

There happen'd at this time a Terrible Faction in the City, betwixt the Natives and the Strangers: The Former were troubled both for their own ſakes and for the City's. They were ever againſt the War, they ſaid; but yet their Greateſt Quarrel was to the Succeſs. But the Strangers that were very Violent and Numerous, brake- A Violent Faction in the City.

out into Clamours and Outrages, as if they were already at Daggers-drawing. They were ſo Loud in the City, and Titus ſo near the Wall, that he was within hearing of them; and upon That Occaſion, call'd-out to his People. The Time is now come, My Fellow-Soldiers, ſays he, if we have but the Hearts to make Uſe of it; for God hath deliver'd up the Jews into our Hands, and we may have a Victory for the taking of it up. Do you not hear the Brawls and Squabbles of the very Men that have ſcap'd our Hands, and are at This time Ready to cut one another's Throats? The City is our Own, if we do not ſlip the Opportunity. But This is a Buſ'neſs that requires Reſolution as well as Diſpatch: and Great Things are not to be done without Hazzard. Why do we not take the Advantage of This Mortal Animoſity, and fall upon them before their Neceſſities force them to Unite? And why do we not fall upon them too, before our Auxiliaries come-up, to Rob us, not only of the Credit, but of the Profit alſo of the Action? For beſide the Reputation of ſo Gallant an Exploit with ſuch a Handful of Men, we ſhall have both the Credit and the Spoil to Our ſelves.

Titus within hearing of it; and Improves the Occaſion.

With Theſe Words he Mounted his Horſe, and gallop'd away to the Lake; where he was the Firſt Man that Enter'd the Town, and his Troups follow'd him. The Defendents were ſtruck with ſuch an Aſtoniſhment at the Hardineſs of This Enterprize, that not a Man had the Heart either to Oppoſe his Perſon, or to Obſtruct his Paſſage. Jeſus and his Companions made away into the Fields: ſome fled toward the Lake, and fell into the very Mouths of the Romans; Others endeavour'd to ſave themſelves by their Boats, but were cut-off by the way: Others again, by Swimming; but ſunk in the Attempt: and the Slaughter yet more Terrible in the Town. The Strangers that could not get-off with Jeſus, made ſome Reſiſtance; but the Natives, none at all: in Hope that the Romans would conſider Them as only Paſſive in the Caſe, and forc'd into the War contrary to their Judgment and Inclination.

Titus Enters the Town by the Lake, and carries all before him.

So ſoon as Titus had Maſter'd and Deſtroy'd the Faction, he gave Quarter to the Natives. The Town being now Taken, Thoſe upon the Lake withdrew as far from the Enemy as they could; and Titus immediately ſent a Party of Horſe Expreſs to his Father, with the Welcome Tidings of This Glorious Exploit: for the Main Difficulty of the War was look'd upon to be now over in the Reducing of This City. The Next Thing Titus did, was the Clapping of a ſtrict Guard round about the City, and ſetting a Watch upon all the Avenues to prevent Eſcapes. The Day following he went to the Lake, and Order'd Veſſels to be built, and ſent-out in Purſuit of Thoſe which had got-off That Way. Theſe Boats were quickly put together; for they had Workmen and Materials in abundance at hand.

Titus ſends his Father Notice of the Exploit.

And Orders Veſſels to be built to look after the Fugitives.

The Quality and Deſcription of the Lake of Genezareth. The River Jordan; with the Head and Courſe of it. Genezareth Famous for Fruits and Plants. The Fountain of Capernaum.

THE Lake of Genezareth, is ſo called, from the Country about it. The Breadth of it is Forty Furlongs; a Hundred in Length; and the Water Sweet and Potable, without any thing of Mooriſhneſs, either in the Taſt or Colour. It lies upon a Gravel, and ſo more Conveniently to be Drawn, and Gentler then either a River or a Fountain-Water. And with all This, it is ſo Cold that the People of the Place cannot Warm it by ſetting it in the Sun in the Hotteſt Seaſon of the Year. It hath in it Great variety of Fiſh; which, for Taſt and Shape, are not to be found any where elſe; and the River Jordan runs through the Middle of it. The (a) Head of This River hath been thought to be Panion; but, in truth, it paſſes hither under-Ground; and the Source of it is Phiala, a Hundred and Twenty Furlongs from Cæſarea, a little on the Right-hand, and not much out of the Way to Trachonis. It is called Phiala, from the Round Figure of it; and the Water in it ſtands always at a Stay; the Baſin brim-full, without either Shrinking or Overflowing. The Firſt Diſcovery of This Secret was from Philip the Tetrarch of Trachonis, by caſting Straws into Phiala, that came out again at Panion; which till That time was taken for the Head of the Jordan. This Panion is naturally Lovely by Situation; but moſt Magnificently Beautify'd and Enricht by the Royal Bounty of Agrippa. This River, in fine, that ſeems to take its Original from This Receſs, croſſes the Bogs and Fens of the Lake Semechonitis: and after a Courſe of a Hundred and Twenty Furlongs further, paſſes under the City of Julias, and ſo over the Lake of Genezareth a great way into the Deſert, till it Empties it ſelf into the Lake of Aſphaltitis.

This Lake takes the Name of Genezareth from the Country that ſurrounds it; which is Fruitful and Agreeable to Admiration. As to the Fertility of the Soil, no Plant comes amiſs to it; beſide that it is Emprov'd by the Skill and Induſtry of the Inhabitants to the Higheſt Degree: and by a Strange Felicity of the Climate, every Thing proſpers there; as Nuts, Palms, Figs and Olive-Trees; that Flouriſh here in Perfection: though they require a quite Different Temperature of Air in the Nature of them; which looks as if Providence took Delight in This Place to reconcile Contradictions; and as if the very Seaſons Themſelves were in a Competition which ſhould be moſt Obliging. And the Production of Strange Varieties of Excellent Fruit is not all neither; but the Conſerving of them ſo long Quick and Sound is Another Curioſity. Figs and Grapes hold in Seaſon there Ten Months in the Year; and Other Fruits the Whole Year about. And the Place is not more Famous for a Delicious Air, then it is for a Chryſtalline Flowing Fountain, called by the Natives, Capernaum. Some take it for a little Gut of the Nile, becauſe of a Certain (a) Fiſh in it, that is no where elſe to be found but in Alexandria. The Length of the Country along the Lake is Thirty Stadia; and the Breadth, Twenty. Let This ſuffice for a Deſcription of the Place.

Veſpaſian Encounters the Enemy upon the Lake. The Miſerable State of the Jews. Veſpaſian Calls a Great Council, where Sentence is paſt upon the Priſoners.

WHen Veſpaſian's Boats were all Ready, he went a-board Himſelf, and took as many Men along with him as he thought ſufficient to deal with the Fugitives that had ſhifted away to the Lake: ſo that there was now no Poſſibility of their coming-off; for the Whole Country a-ſhoar was their Enemy: and they were in no Condition upon the Water for a Sea-Fight: Their Boats being rather for Piracy then Combat, and neither of a Size nor of a Strength to come to a Shock with the Romans: beſide that they were better Mann'd and in Better Order. All they could do was by Inſults off and on; one while pelting them with Stones; Another while, provoking them to Handy-Strokes: while They Themſelves were the Greateſt Sufferers Both Ways ſtill; for the Romans being Well-Arm'd, the Stones made only a Noiſe and a Clatter where they fell, without any Effect; while the Other lay Open and Expos'd to the Roman Arrows. Or, if they attempted any thing nearer hand, they were cut-off before they could Execute it; their Boats over-turn'd, and their Men drown'd. The Enemy diſpatch'd ſome of them at a diſtance with their Darts; Others they boarded, and deſtroy'd them with their Swords: ſome again were hemm'd in, and taken, Veſſels and all, as they were lock'd-up betwixt the Two Fleets. As for Thoſe that were tumbled over-board, and dabbling for Life, they could no ſooner ſhew their Heads above Water, but they were immediately taken-off by a Lance, or over-run by the Enemies Boats and ſunk: Or if any of them in the Rage of their Deſpairs did but make toward their Adverſaries, they were ſure to have their Hands or their Heads Chopt-off. There was nothing, in fine, to be ſeen but Death and Deſtruction in all the Varieties of Horrour; till they were totally broken and Routed, Preſſing through the Middle of their Enemies to get a-ſhoar. In This Confuſion, there were abundance of them Kill'd upon the Water; a World more at Land; and nothing to be ſeen upon the Lake, or the Borders of it, but Bloud and Carcaſſes: for not a Man ſcap'd. Theſe Putrid Bodies in a Few Days teinted the Air, to ſuch a degree of Malignancy, that the Caſe was not only Dreadful to the Sufferers of the Calamity; but the very Actors Themſelves had an Abhorrence for the Barbarity of it. This was the Iſſue of the Naval Battle: and the whole Number of the Slain in Both Actions was Six Thouſand Five Hundred Perſons.

The Miſerable State of the Jews.

When the Fight was over, Veſpaſian took his Place upon the Tribunal; and ſeparating the Strangers that were the Cauſe of the War from the Natives, who were only Paſſive in it, he call'd a Great Council of his Officers about him to conſider what was to be done with Theſe People; and whether or no they were to be Treated all alike. The Council was againſt the ſaving of the Strangers; for they would never be Quiet, they ſaid; They had no Home to truſt to, and would be Dangerous and Troubleſome to what Prince ſoever ſhould receive them. Veſpaſian was throughly ſatisfy'd that they deſerv'd to Dye; and that they would Rebel againſt their Preſervers: but the Difficulty was, in what manner to get rid of them; for the Inhabitants would lay it to Heart to ſee ſo many People put to death after a Promiſe of Quarter upon their Mediation: beſide Veſpaſian's Scruple upon a Point of Honour and Juſtice of breaking Faith with his Priſoners. But his Council inſiſted upon it, that he was not ty'd up to Thoſe Puntillo's with the Jews; and that where Strict Honeſty and Policy are Inconſiſtent, the Common Good ought to have the Preference. Veſpaſian was overrul'd by his Friends, and gave the Strangers leave to depart, upon Condition they kept the Way that led to Tiberias. People are apt to Believe what they Wiſh; and in This Confidence, they March'd for Tiberias, without the Leaſt Apprehenſion of any Violence in their Paſſage, either upon their Perſons or Goods. Now the Romans had ſo beſet the Way that it was Impoſſible for any Creature to Scape. When they had them in the Town, they made them all Priſoners; Veſpaſian cauſing them afterward to be ſhut-up in the Amphitheatre: where he Order'd both Old and Young, to the Number of Twelve Hundred, that were not able to bear Arms to be put to death; 6000 of the Strongeſt Body'd Men among them to be ſent away to the Iſthmus to Nero. 30400 were ſold for Slaves, beſide what Veſpaſian gave to Agrippa: whom he left at liberty to do what he would with his Own Subjects; but the King Sold Them too. The reſt were Trachonites, Gaulanites, Hippenians, and a great many Gadarites; Moſt of them Incendiaries and Fugitives, and Promoters of War, becauſe they could not live in Peace. CHAP. I.

The Siege of Gamala, and the Manner of it; with the Situation and Strength of the City. Veſpaſian Advances up to the Place. The Romans take Gamala by Aſſault, and are Beaten out of it again with a Prodigious Loſs. The Generoſity of Veſpaſian, and his Preſence of Mind. A Notable Action of Gallus a Centurion. A Glorious Speech of Veſpaſian to his Soldiers. A Second Attempt upon Gamala.

THE Towns and Places in Gallilee that went-off from the Romans upon the Taking of Jatapata, came back again to their Duty, upon the Loſs of Tarichee: ſo that the Romans were now Maſters of all the Cities and Strong Holds, but Gariſchala, and the Mountain of (a) Itabyr. And there joined in the Rebellion with Theſe alſo, the City of Gamala; which ſtands upon the Lake over-againſt Tarichee, and belongs to the Government of Agrippa, Sogane revolted likewiſe, and ſo did Seleucia, after Their Example: which were Both of the Province of Gaulanitis: Sogane, in the Upper-part of it, which is called Gaulana; and Gamala, in the Lower. Seleucia ſtands upon the Lake Semechonitis; which is Sixty Furlongs in Length; and Thirty, Over: and the Mooriſh Borders of it reach as far as Daphne. This is a Delicious Country in many reſpects; but more eſpecially for the Curious Springs in it, that feed the Leſſer Jordan, as they call it; and then take their Courſe to the Great Jordan, at the Foot of Jupiter's Golden Temple. King Agrippa, at the beginning of This Defection, enter'd into an Alliance with the People of Sogane, and Seleucia; but Gamala, depending upon its own Strength, as being much a Tougher Piece then Jotapata, refuſed to be of the Party. This Gamala is Erected upon the Cliff of a Rock that riſes out of the Middle of a High Mountain; and in That Poſture of Elevation, with Crags before and behind it, has ſome Reſemblance of the Figure of a Camel; from whence Originally it took its Name: but Time and Cuſtom have Corrupted the Way of Writing it. Upon the Front, and the Two ſides, are deep inacceſſible Valleys. The part that joins the Mountain is not of it ſelf ſo Hard of Acceſs; but as the Inhabitants have Fortify'd it with Trenches and Defences, it is next to Impregnable. The Houſes ſtand ſo Thick, and Tickle, upon the Steep of the Hill to the Southward, as if they were ready to drop into the Precipice. And there is alſo a Hill of ſo Prodigious a Height, that it may ſerve for a Cittadel to the Valley in the Bottom. And there was alſo a Fountain within the Circuit of This City; and There the Town Ended.

The Situation of Gamala, and the Impregnable Strength of the City.

But ſtill, after all that Nature had done toward the Making of This Place Invincible, Joſeph was not yet ſatisfy'd without running a Wall about it, and caſting up Artificial Works, Trenches, and Fortifications, for a further Security. The Inhabitants were much more Confident in the Defencible Condition of the Place, then the Men of Jotapata; though neither ſo many, nor ſo Martial: But the Difficulties of the Attaque made amends for the want of Numbers. Not but that the City was well Mann'd; for it was made the Sanctuary of all the Refugie's: inſomuch that King Agrippa ſpent Seven Months before it without any manner of Advantage.

Veſpaſian at This time Decamped from (b) Ammaus near Tiberias; ſo call'd from a Hot Fountain there, of a Sovereign Virtue againſt ſeveral Diſeaſes: and ſo came to Gamala; where he found it Impoſſible to draw a Regular Line of Circumvallation about it:

it: but he ſet Guards however upon all the Paſſes he could come at, and Poſſeſs'd himſelf of the Mountain above. The Romans, according to their Cuſtom, Fortify'd their Camp; carry'd-up a Wall about it, and ſo Intrench'd. The Fifteenth Legion was Poſted againſt a Tower, Eaſtward, upon the Higheſt Part of the Town; the Fifth, toward the middle of the Town, and the Tenth was appointed to level the Ditches and other Hollow Places.

King Agrippa hurt with a Stone from a Sling.

While Things were in This Poſture, King Agrippa drew cloſe up to the Wall, to try if he could bring the People to Render the Place, and Reaſon them into a Senſe of their Duty. But in This Inſtant he received a Terrible Blow with a Stone from a Sling, upon his Right Elbow: his Friends thronging immediately about him to bring him off; and the Romans in a direct Rage to Conſider how Barbarouſly Theſe People would Treat Strangers and Enemies, that could be thus Inhumane to their Own Prince, their Country-Man, and a Friend that advis'd them for their Good. In This Heat they preſs'd the Siege with all poſſible Vigour.

Betwixt many Hands, and Diligent Applications, the Works were not long a-raiſing: And the next Thing to be done, was the Mounting of their Machines. Chares and Joſeph (Two of the moſt Conſiderable Men in the Town) had the Ordering of the Defence; and ſo led up the Soldiers to the Wall, with Exhortations and Encouragements to behave themſelves like Men of Honour. But wanting Water and other Neceſſaries, they had no Great Stomach to the Action; for they found they could not hold it out long. Upon the Advance of the Roman Machines, they made ſome ſort of Reſiſtance at Firſt; but ſo ſoon as ever they came to throw their Stones and their Arrows among them, they ran away preſently into the Town. They batter'd the Wall with their Ramms upon Three Attaques; and upon Diſputing a Breach, what with the Outcrys Without and Within the Town; the Clang of the Trumpets, and the Clattering of Arms, Nothing could be more Hideous. The Defendants ſtood the Firſt Shock with Great Bravery, and put the Romans to a Stand; but being Over-born in the End by the Force of Numbers, they all fled, and betook themſelves to the Higheſt Parts of the City; with the Romans all this while at their Backs. But the Jews finding themſelves preſs'd, turn'd ſhort upon their Purſuers; drove them down Precipices before them, and through Difficult Paſſages; where they did Execution upon them at Pleaſure. The Romans finding the Diſadvantage of Contending with Enemies over their Heads; and that there was no Avoiding them as they lay puſhing at them from an Upper-Ground: they caſt themſelves for Sanctuary into ſome of the Enemy's Houſes below: but they were ſo Crouding Full that they ſunk under the Weight; ſo that the Fall of one brought down Another; and That, a Third. There were a Great many Romans that Periſh'd under the Ruins, and yet in This Extremity they choſe rather to commit themſelves to the Hazard of Thoſe Tottering Houſes, then to lie Open and Expos'd for a Publique Mark. Some there were that were Cruſh'd all to Pieces with the Timbers; others Maim'd in attempting to Eſcape; and ſome again that were Choak'd with the Duſt. At This Rate there periſh'd a World of the Romans, ſome One way; ſome, Another. But the People were ſo far from being troubled at the Loſs of their Habitations, that they reckon'd themſelves Gainers by the Fall of ſo many of their Enemies, in Exchange: and ſtill as One Houſe fail'd, they preſs'd the Romans into Another to bring down That too. As any of them loſt their Foot-Hold, they were ſure to be taken-off with Weapons from above; which the very Walls and Dead Bodies furniſh'd them with in abundance: the One, with Stones; and the Other, with Arrows: for the Swords of Thoſe that were Kill'd, were made uſe of to Diſpatch the reſt: and every Thing contributed to the Common Fate. Some caſt themſelves down Head-long from the Tops of the Houſes to avoid being ſqueez'd to Death in the Fall of them. Others had a Mind to Fly, if they had but known How or Whither: but being Strangers to the Paſſages and Ways, and blinded with the Duſt in This Confuſion, they fell foul one upon another. Some there were however that had the Good Fortune to ſcape and get out of the Town.

The Romans Take Gamala by Aſſault.

And are forced out of it again with a Terrible Loſs.

Veſpaſian's Bravery and Preſence of Mind.

It went to the Heart of Veſpaſian to ſee his Army thus broken by the Ruines of a City that they had Taken; ſo that without any regard to the Safety of his Own Perſon (as it was his Practice to be Foremoſt ſtill in all Hazzards) he ſlipt Himſelf privately into a Poſt on the Upper-part of the Town; where he was left with ſome Few Reſolute Men about him, in the Greateſt Diſtreſs imaginable: his Son Titus being broad at This Time in Syria, upon a Commiſſion to Mutianus. His Condition was ſuch, that it was neither Safe nor Honourable for him to turn his Back. So that calling to mind the Glorious Hiſtory of his paſt Actions, and reſolving to make his Life all of a Piece, he had a Thought come into his Head for the Obvi-

Obviating of the Preſent Difficulty; which look'd liker a Divine Inſpiration then a Common-Council of Fleſh and Bloud. That is to ſay; he planted himſelf with the Few People he had, as Cloſe One to Another as they could Croud together; and Covering themſelves with their Arms, ſtood Firm againſt all Attempts of Violence from Above. The Jews were ſo Startled at This Prodigious Obſtinacy, that they look'd upon it as a Providential Impulſe; and in Dread of Oppoſing a Divine Power, abated ſomewhat of the Vigour of the Action. Veſpaſian taking Notice that the Fury of the Enemy ſlacken'd, drew-off by little and little, and never turn'd his Back till he was got out of the Walls. There fell a great many Romans, both Officers and Common Soldiers, in This Combat: and among others, Æbutius a Decadarch, who liv'd and dy'd Great, and had given the Jews many Senſible Proofs of his Courage. A Bloudy Fight.

There was one Gallus, a Centurion, that with Ten Syrian Soldiers lay cloſe together in a Houſe: As the People of the Family were talking together at Supper what courſe they intended to take with the Romans; Gallus and his Company being all Syrians, Over-hearing and Underſtanding them, fell upon them in the Night; Kill'd every Man of them, and got-off ſafe with his Company to the Romans. A Great Action of Gallus a Centurion, and the Occaſion of it.

This was the Severeſt Blow that ever the Romans had as yet received: and Veſpaſian finding the Soldiers caſt-down upon it; and their Confuſion was the Greater too for leaving their General in the Lurch; he bethought himſelf how he might give them ſome ſort of Comfort, without either telling his Own Story, or intermixing any Thing of Reproach. Well! (ſays Veſpaſian) ſince Misfortunes cannot be Avoided, let them be Generouſly Born: and it is not for any One ſort of Men to expect an Exemption from the Common Lot of Mankind. Whoever conſiders the Nature of War, will find, that Victory is not to be gain'd without Bloud, and that Fortune is Variable; and that This Loſs is but a Repriſal for the Thouſands of Jews that we have ſlain before. But as it is Vanity and Weakneſs to grow Inſolent upon Proſperity; ſo it is the Mark of as Mean a Soul to be caſt down with Adverſity. Conſider again, ſays he, how Inſenſibly the Change paſſes from One Extreme to the Other, and that No Man is truly Great but He that ſtands his Ground, and keeps-up the ſame Dignity of Mind in all Conditions; correcting the Malignity of the One, by the Prudence of the Other. We are not now to Impute our preſent Miſcarriage either to the want of Reſolution on our Parts, or to the Valour of the Jews. For, if They fought Better then Uſual; or We, Worſe: the True Reaſon was the Odds of the Ground we fought upon. But if You were to blame for any thing in This Encounter, it was in truth for your Raſhneſs in purſuing the Enemy, when they fled up the Town from you. You ſhould have held your Hands, and contented your ſelves with the Poſſeſſion of the Lower-Town; till Neceſſity ſhould have forced Them down to Engage you upon ſafer, ſurer, and more equal Terms. But you were ſo Impatient to have the Thing Done, that you never minded the Right Way of doing it. Now the Romans are a People of Order and Diſcipline, and not for This Impetuous and Inconſiderate way of making War, like the Jews and Barbarians. Wherefore let us have Recourſe to our Own Methods of Sobriety and Reſolution, and Act like Men that are rather Animated with an Indignation for what they have done amiſs, then ſinking under the Burden of it. Every Man hath this Satisfaction in his Own Power, if he will but ſet his Own Hand to the Work, and give himſelf the Comfort of Revenging the Loſs of his Friends upon the Heads of Thoſe that deſtroy'd them. In This Proſpect and Confidence you ſhall find Me ſtill, as you have done already, the Firſt and the Laſt in all Dangers. This Diſcourſe of Veſpaſian's put a New Life into the Army. A Glorious Speech of Veſpaſian to his Soldiers.

The Men of Gamala could not but take Heart at Firſt upon the Fluſh of ſo Unexpected a Succeſs: but when they came afterterward, upon Advice with Second Thoughts, to find that they were now paſt all Hopes of Agreeing upon Terms, and no Poſſibility of Eſcaping; for their Proviſions fail'd them: their Spirits ſunk again, and their Deſpairs put them to their Wit's End: but they went on nevertheleſs, doing all that was poſſible to be done for the Defence of the Place, by ſetting their Beſt Men to look to the Breaches, and Others in General to take care of the reſt.

The Romans, by This time, having repair'd their Platforms, and made ready for another Attaque; divers of the Citizens ſtole away by Paſſages ſo Intricate and Uncouth, that they thought it Superfluous to ſet any Guard upon them. Others convey'd themſelves into Sinks and Vaults, where they lay Starving for fear of being Taken; the Proviſions being wholly reſerv'd for Thoſe that bore Arms. But Theſe Miſerable People ſtood Firm yet in all their Diſtreſſes. Another Attempt upon Gamala.

A Faction in a Body upon Mount Itabyr. Veſpaſian ſends Placidus with a Party to Reduce them, who Deſtroys them all, by Encountering One Wile with Another.

Veſpaſian had Work enough upon his Hands in This Vexatious Siege: but he found Time yet in That very Hurry to ſend-out Placidus with a Party of Six hundred Horſe to Mount (a) Tabor, to diſperſe a Multitude of People that were gotten together there. This Mountain lies betwixt the Great Plain and Scythopolis: The Aſcent of it is reckon'd to be ſome Thirty Stadia; no coming at it on the North-ſide; and on the Top of it an Open Plain of Twenty Furlongs over; the Whole Encompaſs'd with a Wall, which, as Large as it was, coſt Joſeph but Forty Days the Building: he brought Water and Other Neceſſaries up to it from below; for the People had none but Rain-Water for their Uſe.

When Placidus was come to the Place according to his Order, and found that there was no geting up the Mountain to them; he held them in hand with Hopes of Peace and Pardon, and brought ſeveral of them down to him; upon a Pretence that they were wrought upon by the Reaſon of his Addreſs: but in truth they had a Deſign to draw him into a Snare, and to Surprize him: as Placidus had the ſame Plot upon Them too, if he could but get them off into the Plain Field, and Sieze them at Unawares. They made a Countenace of Complying with the Fairneſs of what he ſaid: but Placidus, for all This, was too Cunning for them in the Concluſion. The Jews began the Fray; and Placidus and his Men, as in a Fright, betook themſelves preſently to their Heels: and the Jews after them, continuing the Chace till the Purſuers were diſpers'd all over the Field. Placidus took his Time; and turning quick upon them, Kill'd ſeveral, put the reſt to Flight: and not One Man of them could get back to the Mountain. Some of them quitted Itabyr, and fled to Jeruſalem; but the Natives render'd Themſelves and the Place to Placidus, upon Security for their Good Behaviour.

CHAP. III.

The Deſtruction of Gamala. The Fall of a Tower puts the People into a Panick Terrour. Titus Enters the Town without any Oppoſition. A Dreadful Execution.

THE Boldeſt of the Gamalites were now glad to hide their Heads; the Meddling Sort ready to ſtarve: but the Men of Action ſtill perſiſting in the Defence of the Place; till the Two and twentieth of the Month Hyperbereteus; upon which Day Three Soldiers of the Fifteenth Legion ſecretly Stole out before break of Day to the Foot of the Higheſt Tower that was upon their Quarter, and undermin'd it ſo privately, that the Guards (but it was Dark Night) took no Notice of them either Coming or Going. They made no Noiſe; but only Tumbling down Five Mighty Stones that they had looſen'd in the Foundation, they leap'd away in that Inſtant and retir'd. The Turret immediately fell to the Ground with a moſt Dreadful Clatter; Daſhing the Guards and all that were in it under the Ruines. The Horrour of this Accident frighted all the other Guards from their Poſts that were within Hearing of it; ſome of them falling into the very Mouths of the Romans: in which Number, there was One Joſeph that was ſhot Dead with a Dart from a Broken Wall. But in the City the Terrour and the Hubbub was ſo Amazing, that One would have thought the Whole Roman Army had been Enter'd the Town. Chares was at that Time very Sick, and took ſuch a Phancy upon this Blow, that it was believ'd it haſten'd his End.

An Obſtinate Defence.

The Fall of a Tower ſtrikes the People with a Panick Terrour.

This was a Tempting Occaſion to Invite the Romans into the Town; but they pay'd ſo Dear for their Late Temerity, that they ſtood ſtill till the Three and twentieth of the ſame Month without any further Attempt upon the City. Titus, it ſeems, was now come up; who found himſelf ſo gall'd at the Thought of the Diſaſter the Romans had receiv'd in his Abſence, that he drew-out a Body of Foot, and Two hundred Choice-Horſe, and in a Grave Sober March Enter'd the City without any Oppoſition. The Watch were the Firſt that took and gave the Alarum; and the News was all over the Town in a Moment. No ſooner was it certainly known, but the Citizens, in a Confuſion, like ſo many Mad-Men fled Yelling and Exclaming up to the Caſtle; lugging their Wives and their Children along with them. Some were cut-off by Titus's Soldiers; Others that could not get into the Caſtle, and went they knew not whether, fell into the Hands of the Roman Guards. There was nothing, in fine, but Death to be ſeen or heard of, in all Forms; Wounds, and Groans; and the very Streets flowing with Bloud.

The next Thing Veſpaſian had now to do was to Attaque the Caſtle: to which End he drew-up his Whole Army thither. It ſtood upon the Point of a Rock prodigiouſly High and Steep; and well-nigh Inacceſſible, with a Multitude of Crags and Precipices round about it. Upon this Diſadvantage, it was Impoſſible for the Romans either to avoid the Stones and Shot of the Jews that were caſt-down upon them from Above, or to reach the Jews from Below. But by a Wonderful Providence, in favour of the Romans, and for the Deſtruction of the Jews, there blew a Violent Guſt of Wind that drove the Roman Arrows directly in the Face of the Defendents, and kept-off the other from the Romans, or skew'd them beſide the Mark. The Blaſt at the ſame time was ſo Strong too, that the Beſieged could not ſtand ſteady where they were to make their Defence, nor ſo much as ſee the People they had to cope withal. So that the Romans, with the Help of theſe Advantages, made Themſelves Maſters of the Mountain; which they ſurrounded immediately, and in a Rage of Revenge for their former Miſcarriage upon that Attaque; they put all they met with to the Sword, indifferently, whether they reſiſted or not: beſide that, in the Horrour of this Deſperation, there were that caſt themſelves with their Wives and Children down the Precipice from the Caſtle, to the Number of Five thouſand Perſons; That of the Slain being only Four thouſand: ſo much more merciful were the Romans to the Jews, then the Jews were to themſelves. The Romans, in this Heat of Fury, threw the very Infants down the Rocks, without ſparing ſo much as one Single Creature; Two Women only excepted, the Daughters of the Siſter of Philip, who was the Friend of One Joakim, a Man of Eminent Quality, and formerly a General under Agrippa. Now theſe Two Siſters were not ſo much beholden to the Clemency of the Romans for their Preſervation, as to the Good Hap of lying Undiſcover'd till the Rage of the Hot Bloud was over. The Rebellion of Gamala brake-out the Four and twentieth day of the Month (a) Gorpiæus: and the Place was deſtroy'd the Three and Twentieth of the Month Hyperberetæus.

A cruel Execution.

THE Province of Gamala was now wholly reduc'd, ſave only Giſchala; where the People of Themſelves, were, upon the Main, peaceably inclin'd: being moſt of them Husband-Men, whoſe Hope and Intereſt lay in Plantations and Tillage. Not but that they were Teinted alſo with a Conſiderable and Seditious Mixture of Libertines that liv'd upon Robbery; and there were ſome Citizens alſo of the Firſt Quality that were corrupted with that Leaven. The Chief Leader of This Faction, and the Perverter of the People, was one John; a Wicked and Deceitful Man, a Rank Impoſtor; Unſteady and Ambitious; a Great Maſter in the Art of bringing his Ends about; a Wretch of no Conſcience, and certainly known to be a Promoter of Broils for the making of his Own Fortune. He was, in fine, the Son of one Levi, and the Head of the Rabble in Giſchala. If it had not been for Him, the People would probably have ſent their Deputies to the Romans, with Propoſals of an Allyance; but upon His Inſtigation, they were prevail'd upon to put it off, till the War ſhould be brought-on.

Giſchala ſtands out.

The People well diſpoſed, but ſeduced by a Seditious Impoſtor.

Veſpaſian, upon This Juncture, ſent away Titus to Giſchala with a Thouſand Horſe; and the Tenth Legion to Scythopolis; returning Himſelf with the Other Two Legions to Cæſarea for Refreſhment, by preparing both their Bodies and their Minds for Difficulties that were yet to come. For Veſpaſian foreſaw that Jeruſalem would find him work enough; not only as it was a Powerful, Populous, and the Capital City; but as it was a Place of Refuge to all the Fugitives of the Faction from elſewhere: a Nurſery of Jeruſalem a ſtrong and populous City.

Bold and Daring Men; naturally Strong, and over and above, Well-Wall'd; though next to Impregnable in the very Situation of it. Veſpaſian took all Theſe Things into his Thought, and Train'd-up his Soldiers, like Champions, in the Practice and Exerciſe of their Arms, to keep them in Breath and Heart for the Prize.

Veſpaſian Provides againſt all Hazzards.

Titus went-up to Giſchala on Horſe-back; and finding upon the View that it was not a Place to ſtand an Aſſault, he reflected upon it at the ſame time, that the Soldiers would undoubtedly Treat Giſchala as they had done Gamala; confounding the Innocent with the Guilty, if ever they ſhould come to take the Town by Storm: ſo that out of a Generous Compaſſion for the People, and the Horror he had for Thoſe Inhumane Cruelties, he rather bethought himſelf how he might gain the Place by Treaty. The Walls being now cover'd with Soldiers, and the Majority within the Town being of the Faction; Titus call'd-out; and raiſing his Voice, ſpake to them after This manner. It is a Wonderful Thing to me, ſays he, that when all the reſt of your Towns are gone; and Places much better Mann'd and Fortify'd then yours is, and Taken without any Difficulty too (Many of them at the very Firſt Attaque): you ſhould be now ſo Inconſiderate as to think of ſtanding-out: eſpecially when you may yet be Safe, Eaſie, Free, and Happy, upon a Fair Return to your Duty. And This, I dare Undertake, ſhall be made good to you; and all your Inſolencies Pardon'd, and paſs'd over, and imputed only to an Inordinate Deſire of Liberty. But if you do not know when you are Well-Offer'd, and refuſe to caſt your ſelves upon the Faith and Honour of the Romans: if you ſhall reſolve at laſt, I ſay, to run Head-long on to your Certain Deſtruction, and to Contend with Impoſſibilities, you muſt expect to feel the Weight of the Romans Power and Diſpleaſure: and you will find, before you are aware, that your Paper-Walls will fall like Dirt before their Engines: ſo that This is the Way to ſhow your ſelves to be the moſt Arrogant Slaves of all the Gallileans.

The Generous Tenderneſs of Titus.

Titus offers them a Peace and an Amneſty: and the Exerciſe of their Religion.

This paſs'd without One Word from the Town in Anſwer, or any One Creature of the Inhabitants ſuffer'd to come up to the Wall; for the Faction were Maſters; and had Clapt Guards upon all the Gates, to ſee that none ſhould paſs in or Out, to promote a Treaty. But John at laſt Cry'd-out to Titus, in the Name of the People, That he accepted the Conditions; and that the Town ſhould agree to them likewiſe, or he would force them to it. Only he made him This Requeſt, in regard of the Inviolable Strictneſs of the Jewiſh Law for the Obſervance of their Sabbaoth, which would no more ſuffer them to Treat of Peace, then to Fight a Battle; that he would Indulge them That Day: it being a Caſe wherein either the Complying on the One Hand; or, as the Romans knew very well, the Enforcing them on the Other, would be Equally Unwarrantable: beſide, that there could be no Danger in putting-off the Treaty to Another Time; for, if they imagin'd that any Man would Attempt to make an Eſcape That Night, it would be an Eaſie Matter, by clapping Guards upon all the Avenues, to Prevent it: over and above the Reputation he would get by ſhewing himſelf as Tender of their Laws as they were of their Own, and of their Conſciences as well as of their Perſons; which was a Favour beyond their Expectation.

John of Giſchala ſeemingly Accepted the Offer, upon one Certain Condition.

Now it was not ſo much a Scruple for the Sabbaoth, as an Apprehenſion for his Particular Safety that put John upon This Menage with Titus; for he was in a manner Certain to be abandon'd and given-up, if the Town ſhould be Taken: and Nothing left him to Truſt to but the Night, and his Heels, for the Saving of his Life. But the Preſervation of John was Manifeſtly an Act of Divine Providence toward the Deſtruction of Jeruſalem; as being the Occaſion, not only of the Truce, but likewiſe of Titus's Encamping farther off the City, at Cydæſſa, one of the Strongeſt and moſt Populous Places in Tyria, and a Mortal Enemy to the Gallileans.

John makes his Eſcape in the Night.

The Night being now come, and the Town without any Guards upon it; John laid hold of the Opportunity, and made his Eſcape to Jeruſalem; taking not only his Military People, but ſeveral Subſtantial Men of the Town, together with their Families, along with him. The Old Men, the Women and the Children, that were frighted into This Reſolution, made a Shift to keep-up with their Leader for the Firſt Twenty Furlongs; but finding themſelves ſpent, and not able to continue the March, they had no more to do but to betake themſelves to Crys and Lamentations; Panting and Trembling after thoſe that had Outſtript them and were gone before: and the further their Friends were advanc'd from them, One way; the Nearer did they account themſelves to their Enemies, the Other; and upon the very Point of being Taken Priſoners. Nay, the very Noiſe of their own Feet, they Phancy'd to be the Tread of their Adverſaries; and ſtill looking behind them, they took their Own People for their Purſuers. In this Imaginary Flight they fell one over another, and the Way was Cover'd with the Bodies of Women and Children, that were Cruſh'd to death in the Croud, preſſing who ſhould get Foremoſt. There was Little more to be heard then the Crys of Miſerable Creatures to their Husbands and Friends to ſtay for them. But John call'd-out to them on the Other Hand to think think of no Other Way of Saving themſelves, but by taking Sanctuary in ſome Place, where they might be reveng'd of the Romans, in caſe of any further Miſchief; and John's Advice carry'd it. The Multitude, upon this, diſpers'd themſelves, and ſhifted away the beſt they could.

It was now Day-light, and Titus was by this time come to the Walls of the Town, to Execute the Treaty; where he found the Gates Open, and the Inhabitants and their Wives Ready with Acclamations to Receive and Acknowledge Titus for their Benefactour and Preſerver. They gave him alſo to Underſtand that John was run away; begging his Pardon for the Innocent, and Imploring his Juſtice upon thoſe left in the Town that ſhould be found to have been the Authors of the Revolt. Titus, upon their Requeſt, ſent out a Party of Horſe after John; but he was already gotten into Jeruſalem before they could get up to him. They Kill'd a matter of Two Thouſand of his Party, and brought back again near Three Thouſand Women and Children that they found Wandring up and down.

Titus Receiv'd into Giſchala: which puts an End to the Conqueſt of Galilee.

Titus was not a little Troubled at the Scape of this Impoſtor; and that they had not made him ſuch an Example as he deſerv'd to be, when they had him in their Hands: But then ſetting the Advantages of the Priſoners; the Slain, and the Taking of the Town, againſt the Diſappointment of miſſing the Single Perſon of ſuch a Wretch, Titus ballanc'd the One with the Other, and Enter'd the Place in a Friendly Diſpoſition toward the People: taking Poſſeſſion of it in Form by the Ceremony of his Soldiers breaking-off a Piece of the Wall; and reducing the Authors of the Sedition rather by Menaces then by Actual Puniſhments. For Titus was of Opinion, that in a Caſe where ſo many Family-Feuds, Perſonal Piques and Paſſions were Concern'd; it might be a Dangerous Thing to make uſe of Puniſhment, as a Common Rule of Diſtinction betwixt the Good and the Bad, for fear of Expoſing the Peaceable to Calumnies, as well as the Seditious to Juſtice. So that, upon this Deliberation, Titus thought it more Honourable and Humane, rather to let ſome Criminals live, then to run the Riſque of Expoſing ſome Innocents: there being no Place left for Remedy and Attonement, in the Latter; whereas, in the Other Caſe, there may be Hope of Amendment: whether out of a Fear of Puniſhment, a Senſe of Shame, or an Impulſe of Virtue.

Titus Reaſons the Caſe, and Acts accordingly.

But Titus however in the Concluſion put a Garriſon into the Town, partly to keep Turbulent Spirits in Order, and partly to ſecure Thoſe that had a mind to be Quiet. This Action finiſh'd the Conqueſt of Gallilee, after the Expence of ſo much Labour and Bloud.

Gallilee Totally Subdu'd.

UPon John's coming up to Jeruſalem with a Train of the Faction at his Heels; the People in Vaſt Throngs and Multitudes Gather'd about them to know how Matters went abroad; and in a Word, to Learn the very Worſt of Things. Now John and his Company had run themſelves ſo out of Breath, betwixt Fear and Flight, that they were ſcarce able to ſpeak; and that Difficulty might have paſs'd for an Anſwer. But the Party kept up the Pride and Vanity of their Stomachs yet, with a Pretence that they were not run away from the Romans; but came of their Own Accord; to find out ſome Place for the Encounter, where they might Engage upon Equal Terms: for None but Fools and Mad-men would caſt themſelves away, they ſaid, for the Defence of Giſchala, and Two or Three more perhaps of thoſe Pityful Miſerable Places, when the Metropolis it ſelf was at Stake; and Every Brave Man Oblig'd, in Duty, and in Honour, to do his Beſt to defend it. John and his Crew colour'd the Diſgrace the beſt they could; but the People ſaw through the Diſguiſe, and that John's Honourable Retreat was no Other then a Downright Running-away. This Diſcovery, and the Story of the Priſoners the Romans had taken, put the People into ſuch a Terrour as if the Ruine of Giſchala had but been the Prologue to the Deſtruction of Jeruſalem it ſelf. But John all this while, without any Shame or Remorſe for the Poor Creatures he had abandon'd upon the way, went Officiouſly and Pragmatically from One to Another; Animating the Multitude to a Proſecution of the War: Derogating from the Romans, on the One hand; and Arrogating to Themſelves, on the Other; by which Arts of Quirks and Impoſture, they gained Mightily upon the Silly People. Why, do you think, ſays he, after ſo many Baffles put upon the Roman Power and all their Engines, by Two or Three Paultry Places in Gallilee : and ſo much Difficulty in the Maſtering of them at laſt: do you think, I ſay, after all this; even if the Romans had Wings, that they could ever be able to Take Jeruſalem? Theſe Flouriſhes wrought upon a World of the Hot-headed Youngmen; but at the ſame time all People of Foreſight, Senſe and Experience, gave themſelves utterly for loſt.

John of Giſchala the Great Incendiary of the War.

This was the Confuſed State and Face of Things in Jeruſalem at that time; but the Country led the way to the Sedition that follow'd afterward in the City. For Titus being gone from Giſchala to Cæſarea, Veſpaſian went alſo from Cæſarea, to Jamnia, and Azotus; and Subdu'd them Both; Settled Garriſons in them, and ſo return'd: bringing a Vaſt Multitude of People along with him that were now Enter'd into a League with the Romans. The Cities were all peſter'd with Tumults and Inteſtine Broils; and no ſooner at Peace with the Romans, but immediately together by the Ears among Themſelves: and War or No War was the Single Queſtion; for the Two Oppoſites fought for the One againſt the Other. The Quarrel began in Private Families that had been a long time Adverſaries, upon the Score of Hereditary Feuds. It paſs'd thence into divided Multitudes, that of Friends became Enemies: and it Terminated at laſt in Matter of Faction and Opinion; where Men of the ſame Mind ſided into an Oppoſition of Party to Party, and ſo Incorporated in a Rebellion. This Diſorder, in fine, was General. The Men of Action, Youth and Heat, were Violently bent upon Arms and Innovations: the Men of Senſe and Gravity, on the Other ſide, were for Moderate Councels; but the Former carry'd it.

Jeruſalem in a Confuſion.

The Jews Divided among themſelves

The Riſe and Progreſs of the Quarrel.

This Confuſion began with an Univerſal Licence, that Every Man took to Himſelf, of Robbing his Neighbour, without any regard to Law or Conſcience. They proceeded afterwards to do the ſame Thing in Bands and Parties; and to do it bare-fac'd too up and down the Country: in which Practice, the Jews Themſelves did one another as much Miſchief, upon the Matter of Cruelty and Injuſtice, as the Romans; beſide that the Calamity was much more Tolerable from an Enemy then from a Friend.

The Fruit of an Univerſal Liberty.

The Garriſons, that conſulted their Own Eaſe, and mortally hated the People, never troubled their Heads for what they ſuffer'd: till in the Concluſion ſome of the Principals of the Faction Enter'd Jeruſalem with a Great Body of their Party, that they had pick'd up here and there. Now the City being under no Rule of Government, theſe Ruffians met with no Oppoſition: beſide that according to Ancient Cuſtom, the Gates were open to all Jews without Exception; and at this time more eſpecially, when they took all People that came in to them for Friends, and Aſſiſtants. This was the Caſe, and this Liberty in the Concluſion prov'd the Ruine of the City; when the Infinite Numbers of Idle and Unprofitable Mouths devoured the Neceſſary Proviſions that were laid-up for the Soldiers that had the Guard of the Town: by which means, the Miſeries of Sedition and Famine were added to the Calamities of the War.

The Outrages of the Robbers.

There came at the ſame time Another Party of Thieves out of the Country; that, Joining with thoſe they found in the Town (who were yet Worſe then Themſelves) ſtuck at no manner of Inſolence, though never ſo Flagitious and Cruel. Robbery and Pillage was as Nothing with them, unleſs it was Seaſon'd with downright Murder: and that not by Stealth neither, and in the Dark; or upon ſome Common Perſons; but in the Face of the Sun, and upon the moſt Conſiderable Men in the City. As they began with the Impriſoning of Antipas, a Perſon of the Bloud Royal, and of ſuch Credit and Authority, that he was entruſted with the Charge of the Treaſury. They treated Levias afterwards, and Sophas, the Son of Raguel; with divers Others of the moſt Conſiderable Perſons they could lay their Hands on, after the ſame manner. Theſe Horrid Violences made the Town look like a Prize in the Hand of a Common Enemy, and put all People to ſhift for Themſelves.

Another Band of Thieves Worſe then the Former.

Nay, and theſe Profligate Wretches did not ſtop here neither; but finding their Priſoners to be Men of Power, Intereſt, Credit and a Vaſt Acquaintance, they did not know but it might be Dangerous to keep them longer in Cuſtody; for fear of either a Reſcue, or a Revenge, from their Friends, or of a Popular Tumult, upon ſo Deſperate a Provocation. Wherefore they proceeded to a Formal Sentence of Death upon upon them, and ſent a Bloud-thirſty Hireling of their Own Crew (one John the Son of Dorcas) with a Train of Ten Other Bravo's at his Heels to do the Execution; and it was done accordingly. Now for a Colour to this execrable Villany, they gave it out that theſe People were in a Conſpiracy to deliver up the City to the Romans; and not without valuing themſelves upon the Merit of a Publique Service, for doing ſo Neceſſary an Act of Juſtice upon the Betrayers of the Common Liberty.

A Bloudy Sentence and Execution.

The Faction was now ſo Daring and Arrogant, and the People's Hearts ſo Low, that they aſſumed to themſelves the Diſpoſing of the Pontificat; took the High-Prieſthood out of the Right Line; Abrogated the Succeſſion, and Promoted Creatures of their Own, without either Bloud or Virtue, to the Office: and ſo by this Choice of Miniſters like Themſelves, they made the Government all of a Piece: well knowing that the Wicked Inſtruments of Wicked Men would not fail of Obſerving their Maſters.

They Create and Depoſe High-Prieſts at Pleaſure.

There was Nothing wanting all this while of Artificial Calumnies, and Feigned Stories, to Create Miſunderſtandings among thoſe that had it in their Power to croſs their Deſigns, and ſo to make Advantage of their Diſagreements: till in the end, when they had glutted themſelves with putting Affronts and Indignities upon Men, they tranſported their Impieties even againſt God Himſelf, and againſt his Laws and his Holy Sanctuary. But upon this Audacious Extravagance, the People, at the Inſtigation of Ananus the High-Prieſt, made Head againſt them; a Perſon no leſs Venerable for his Years, Piety and Wiſdom, then he was for his Character; and One that probably might have preſerv'd the City if he could but have got clear of the Train of a Conſpiracy that was then laid againſt him.

Putting Indignities upon GOD Himſelf. Ananus the High-Prieſt makes Head againſt them.

The Faction took Sanctuary in the Temple, and made uſe of it both for a Place of Defence againſt the Multitude, and for the Seat of their Tyranny and Uſurpation. But the moſt Senſible Part of the Calamity was the Mockery and Contempt that attended it, in the Wanton Experiment of their Own Strength, and the Heartleſs Deſpondency of the People. As for Example, They took upon them to Elect a High-Prieſt by Lot; according to the Preſident, as they pretended, of Former Times: whereas, in truth, there was no ſuch Preſident; but the Sacerdotal Function was Originally a Family-Privilege, and Deſcended in a Line by Succeſſion. Now this Practice of theirs was only a Self-ended Invention of their Own, to get the Power into their Hands. But they were taken in their Own Snare; for upon Summoning One of the Holy Tribes (called Eniacim) in order to a Choice, the Lot fell upon a Perſon that ſufficiently diſcover'd the Iniquity and the Corruption of the Proceeding. His Name was (a) Phanes; his Father's Name Samuel; born in a Village call'd Aphthas; a Man, in fine, brutiſhly Ignorant, and ſo far from having any Relation to a Sacerdotal Family, that he did not ſo much as know what belong'd to the Office. They forc'd him away however from his Country-Affairs in ſpite of his Heart; and, dreſſing him up in his Prieſtly Robes, as if it had been for the Stage. They gave him his Leſſon how he was to behave himſelf: making no more in ſhort of the Whole Story then if it had been the Foolery of a Farce, or of a Frolique. This could not but go to the Hearts of the Prieſts that ſtood all this while at a diſtance, Spectatours of theſe Indignities; to ſee their Holy Laws Trampled upon, and their Worſhip and Profeſſion Ridicul'd, (as they expreſs'd their Senſe of it in Tears and Groans.) But the People were ſo Tranſported with the Senſe of this Oppreſſion, that they had no longer any Patience for ſo Scandalous a Slavery; but join'd as One Man in a Reſolution to depoſe the Tyrants, and caſt-off the Yoke.

The Faction draws into the Temple.

Phanes Choſen High-Prieſt by Lot.

A Perſon wholly Unqualify'd for the Function.

The Solemnity turn'd into a Mockery.

The People bent upon a Revenge.

The Two Forwardeſt in this Commotion were Gorion the Son of Joſeph; and Simeon the Son of Gamaliel; who made it their Bus'neſs to go up and down from Man to Man, inculcating the Doctrine of Liberty and Revenge, and Provoking the People at the ſame time, One and All, to ſtand up for the Vindication of their Religion, Laws and Freedoms, againſt their Prophane and Sacrilegious Enemies.

Gorion and Simeon the Heads of the Party.

There was alſo Jeſus the Son of Gamala, and Ananus the Son of Ananus; Two Prieſts of the Firſt Note for Men of Singular Piety and Virtue: Theſe Two Holy Men labour'd their Diſciples as Heartily too, in Frequent Diſcourſes upon the ſame Subject; Upbraiding them with their Sloth and Cowardice, and Enflaming them by all manner of Reproaches againſt the Zelotes. I call them Zelotes, as the Name that they aſſumed to Themſelves, out of an Hipocritical Oſtentation of Holineſs; though at the ſame time, in their Lives, and Practice, the Lewdeſt of Men. The People being now gather'd together, were all raging mad to ſee the Havock theſe Miſcreants made in the Holy Places, and how they went on Pillaging and Murdering without Controll.

Jeſus and Ananus do their Parts alſo.

Zelote is only another Word for Hipocrite.

(a) Gr. Φανιας

But

But yet in the Height of an Outrageous Horrour and Indignation, there was not One Blow ſtruck all this while; for the People did not as yet think themſelves in Condition to Encounter theſe Zelotes by downright Force. (As in truth they were not). Ananus the High-Prieſt was at this time in the Midd'e of the Croud; and caſting many a Sorrowful Look toward the Temple, with Tears in his Eyes.

Ananus ſets forth the Whole State of the Caſe in a Speech to the People. The Cauſe Notably Reaſon'd from One End to the Other.

Why did not I rather Die, ſays he, then Live, to ſee the Houſe of God thus Polluted and Prophan'd, and the Wickedeſt of Men admitted promiſcuouſly into thoſe Sacred Places of Privilege, that were only reſerv'd for the High-Prieſt? Why do I live, and ſee all This? in my Sacerdotal Robes too, and with the Venerable Name of the Great God Written on my Forehead? What do I live any longer for, after ſo Glorious an Opportunity now in my Age of ending my Days with Honour? What have I more to do, in fine, under my Circumſtances, but to fall Alone, and give up my Life to my God and my Duty? What ſhould any Man deſire to live for, in an Inſenſible Generation, and among People that have neither the Prudence to Foreſee Calamities, nor the Courage to Reſiſt them? You ſtand ſtill to ſee Your Selves Robb'd; Beaten and Abus'd; and your Friends and Companions Murder'd before your Faces; without ſo much as one Look, Word, or Action of Tenderneſs or Compaſſion that you dare Own. A Shameful, and an Inſupportable Tyranny! But what do I talk of the Actors of the Tyranny, and not rather of Thoſe that ſuffer it? And that train'd up the Tyrants Themſelves to the Power of Exerciſing what they now Practice. Why did you not cruſh them when you might have done it? When they were but a Few, Weak, and Inconſiderable? No no, it was your Patience and Nothing elſe that made theſe People your Maſters. But when you ſhould have turn'd your Arms againſt your Enemies, you muſt be Cutting of Throats among Your Selves. You ſhould have call'd them to an Account betimes, for the Outrages they put upon your Brethren. And you ſhould have Conſider'd that the Sufferance of One Affront naturally draws-on, and Encourages Another; as appear'd in what follow'd. For when they found that they might Commit all manner of Inſolences without Controll, they advanc'd a Step further, and put ſeveral of the Beſt Men of the City in Chains (who were effectually betray'd by your Tameneſs) and dragg'd them to Priſon, not only Unheard, and without a Sentence; but without ſo much as an Accuſation. No matter for their Names or Qualities; but all This was done, and not One Creature appearing in their Favour. After the Loſs of their Eſtates and Liberties, there remain'd Nothing more to be taken away but their Lives: and that was done too, and their Throats cut, like ſo many Beaſts drawn out of the Herd for Sacrifices, before our very Faces: and not a Mouth Open'd, or a Hand lifted up in their Defence. And after all theſe Sufferings, One upon the Neck of Another; can you have the Patience now to ſee your Holy Altars Prophan'd, and your Religion Expos'd to Scorn; without ſhewing ſome Reſentment Worthy of your Profeſſion? And what is it that you are affraid of, at laſt, but Monſters of your own Creating, and the Profeſs'd Enemies of all that's Good and Holy? If they ſtop here, it is not for want of Good Will to be yet more and more Wicked; but for want of Freſh Matter to Work upon: for it is impoſſible for them to Outdo the Ill Things they have done already. They are poſſeſs'd you ſee of the Strongeſt Place of the City; and That which you call the Temple, ſerves them only for an Impregnable Caſtle, Maintain'd againſt You. Conſidering now the Strength of the Place, and your Enemies the Maſters of it, (as That you ſee is the Caſe) What is it that you propoſe to Your Selves? or what do You imagine will be the End of theſe Things? Unleſs You Phancy that the Romans will Eſpouſe the Cauſe of Your Religion, and Ceremonies; and in truth ſuch is the Miſery of our Preſent Condition, that our very Enemies cannot but Pitty us. Why, if ſo many Beaſts were in Your Places now; Hunted, Aſſaulted, and Wounded, as You Your Selves are, they would have the Spirit to turn again upon their Purſuers, and to Revenge themſelves upon their Enemies; while You at the ſame time ſuffer all Tamely, without ſo much as the Senſe or Apprehenſion of Brutes. But will You bear This always? And ſink in Infamy, under the Affronts, Publique and Private, that have been put upon You, without Avenging Your Selves? This Abject Patience looks as if you had no longer any Senſe (in truth) of the moſt Natural and Powerful of Humane Affections, the Deſire of Liberty: and as if you had taken up on the Contrary the Love of Slavery, inſtead of it: a Temper, which I am ſure you never Inherited from your Anceſtors; Witneſs the Many, and the Dangerous Wars they Underwent againſt the Medes, and Ægyptians, to Aſſert their Freedom. But what Need of looking back for Preſidents, when the very War we are now Engag'd in againſt the Romans, (whether it Succeed Well or Ill) is advanced evidently upon the ſame Foot? And ſhall We now that Diſpute our Liberties with the Maſters of the Whole World, Crouch and Truckle like Slaves to Our Own Countrymen? To be Overcome by Strangers is but the Chance of War, and may be Imputed, without Loſs of Honour, to the Iniquity of Fortune: but for People to give themſelves up in Subjection to their Own Brethren and Countrymen, and to the very Worſt of Them too, betrays a Sordid Servility of Spirit, and a Soul prepar'd for Bondage.

But

But now I am ſpeaking of the Romans, I have ſomewhat comes into my Head upon This Occaſion. Make it the Caſe that we were all actually now, their Priſoners: (which Heaven forbid!) Whether would our Condition, in Probability, be Better, or Worſe, then it is now? For what Miſery could an Enemy Inflict upon Us, that we have not ſuffer'd already? Can any Man ſtand a Spectatour, to look upon the Jews, and to ſee them Robbing the Temple of the Oblations and Donatives that the Romans beſtow'd upon it: Defacing the moſt Glorious City under the Sun; and dipping their Hands in the Bloud of Thoſe Heroes, which the Romans Themſelves, in the very Triumph of their Victories, would have had a Veneration for: Can any Man ſee all This, I ſay, without Tears in his Eyes and a Bleeding Heart? Whereas the Romans, on the Other ſide, made a Conſcience of paſſing the Bounds of Sacred and Prophane; and of breaking-in upon the Solemnities of Holy Cuſtoms; or but ſo much as Caſting a Look, unleſs with Reverence, and at a diſtance, toward the ſacred Incloſure? But we have a ſort of People among our ſelves, train'd-up after our Way too, and calling themſelves Jews; that make no more Scruple of Walking in the Temple, then in a Common Place; and that, while their Hands are yet Reeking with the Bloud of their Fellow-Citizens. Shall any Man, after This, ſtand in Dread of a Foreign War, Compar'd with ſuch a Domeſtique one? The Enemy is in truth (to call Things by their Right Names) the Greater Friend of the Two: for while the Romans ſhew'd themſelves the Preſervers of our Laws, Our Pretended Friends that were in our Bowels deſtroy'd them. Certain it is, that theſe Tyrants have betray'd your Liberties, and that no Puniſhment can be Equal to their Crimes. I tell you no more in This now, then what You all knew before I Open'd my Mouth: and you need no Other Inſtigation againſt Theſe Men, then the Senſe of your Own Sufferings. But You were affraid of their Numbers perhaps; the Daring Boldneſs of Theſe Men, and the Advantageous Poſt they are now Poſſeſs'd of. Well! and what was it, I beſeech you, but your Want of Reſolution, that rais'd them up to This, and made them ſo Conſiderable? And you have no Way left you now but a Speedy, a Generous and a Joint Aſſociation among Your Selves, to bring them down again; for Delay gives Time to Settle; Opportunity to Encreaſe, and Heart to gather Courage: like will to like, and the Whole Faction will flow into the Party; which will make them Numerous: and then they have Nothing to fear, where they meet with no Oppoſition, and That makes them Bold; and ſo for Deferring the Attempt, the Longer it is put off, the more Time they have to Fortify, and Intrench. Now 'tis but One Bold Puſh, to ſhew that You are in Earneſt, to bring down their Stomachs; and you will find that betwixt the Terrours of a Guilty Conſcience, and the Infamy of Baſe Actions, they will have little Joy of their Station. As who knows but Theſe Impious Wretches may be cut-off by the Juſt Judgment of a Righteous God, as a Vengeance upon them for their Contempt of his Divine Majeſty? and that the very Weapons they Launce at Us, may, by a Providential Miracle, be turn'd againſt their Own Hearts and Faces; ſo that they ſhall not be able to ſtand the very Sight of us, but with Confuſion: Or to put Matters at Worſt; What if we ſhould Fall Every Man of us in the Conteſt, could any thing be more Glorious, then to lay down our Lives at the Gates of the Temple, for the Honour of God, and in the Service of his Holy Houſe and Cauſe? As to the Conduct of the Enterprize, you ſhall have my Heart, Hand, Example, and Advice along with you.

The Romans much Eaſier to the Jews then the Zelotes.

Ananus makes a Party againſt the Zelotes.

This Diſcourſe of Ananus's irritated the People ſufficiently againſt the Zelotes; but yet Ananus was ſo well Enform'd of their Number, their Choice of Men, and their Courage; with the Circumſtances of the Place and the Poſture they were in, and finally their Deſpair of Pardon in caſe they ſhould happen to be Worſted; that he could not promiſe Himſelf any Preſent Advantage from the Effect of This Menagement: but he was nevertheleſs reſolv'd to run all Hazzards, rather then Abandon his Country in This Diſtreſs; the People in the mean time deſiring Nothing more then ſome Body to lead them-on againſt Theſe Miſcreants, in Defyance of all Dangers whatſoever.

Ananus finding the Multitude in ſo good a Diſpoſition, made a Cull of the Beſt Men he could pick-out, and ranged them preſently in ſuch Order as the Time would bear. The Zelotes had their Spies about Ananus; and, upon Intelligence of his Deſigns and Motions, they March'd immediately toward him; One while, in ſmall Parties, and then again, in Groſs Bodies; without giving Quarter to any One Creature that fell into their Hands. Ananus had his Men quickly together, and outnumber'd the Other; but the Zelotes however had the Advantage of being better Arm'd: though what was wanting One way, was ſupply'd on Both Sides with Heart and Good Will Another. The Rage and Indignation of the Citizens doubled their Valour againſt the Zelotes: and That of the Zelotes alſo, on the Other hand, Enflamed their Reſolution againſt the Multitude: The Inhabitants found they could not be ſafe, unleſs they clear'd the City of the Faction: and it was Certain Death to the Zelotes not to come-off Victorious. In This Diſpoſition, Both Parties Engag'd; gag'd; and a Skirmiſh began not far from the Temple by pelting One another with Stones. Thoſe that fled were cut-off by the Swords of their Enemies; ſo that there were a Great many Dropt on Both ſides. As any of the Inhabitants happen'd to be Wounded, their Friends carry'd them off into their Own Houſes; but the Zelotes were Convey'd up to the Temple, where they Polluted and Prophan'd the Holy Place and Religion with their Bloud. But the Thieves came off ſtill in all their Sallies and Excurſions with Advantage.

An Encounter in the Temple.

The People were now grown Strong and Numerous, and out of all Patience with the Fugitives for not ſtanding their Ground: inſomuch, that cloſing up the Way behind them in their Flight, they turn'd them back again upon the Enemy; ſo that they were forced to cut out their way Forward in their Own Defence. By This Means, they were brought every Man of them to the Combat; and the Faction not being able to ſtand the Shock of the Whole Body, gave way by little and little toward the Temple; and Ananus, with his Troups, preſſing-on Pell-Mell along with them. When he had driven the Zelotes before him out of the Firſt Court, they got in a Fright into the Second Incloſure; ſhutting the Gates after them in a Hurry upon the Purſuers.

Ananus's Scruples.

Ananus had too Great a Reverence for the Holy Place to make uſe of any ſort of Violence for the Forcing of his Paſſage: though the Enemy did all that was Poſſible to be done, by their Darts, and Launces, from over their Heads, to provoke him to it. But ſuch was the Conſcience the High-Prieſt made of Polluting the Holy Temple with the Mixture of an Unpurify'd Multitude; that, if he might have gain the Main Cauſe by ſuch a Diſpenſation, he would not have Admitted it.

Ananus Erects a Standing-Guard.

So that all he did at preſent was to Order a Standing Guard of Six Thouſand Choice-Men upon the Porches of the Temple, and ſo Succeſſively Six Thouſand more after Them to do Duty, and to be Reliev'd by Turns; not Exempting the Beſt Men of the Town from their Part in This Service: only when it came to Their Lot, they were allow'd to Hire Men of an Inferior Quality to watch in their ſtead.

The Character and Hiſtory of John of Giſchala.

His Falſe and Perjurious Practices in ſeveral Reſpects.

The Popular Party at This Time carry'd all before them; but John of Giſchala, the Fugitive before-ſpoken of, ſpoil'd all again. He was a Falſe, Crafty Wretch; Ambitious beyond Meaſure; an Enemy, and a Traytor to the Publique, of a Long Standing. In order to his Ends, he began with making himſelf Popular by ſetting-up for a Patriot. No Man ſo Aſſiduous at Councel with Ananus, in the Day-time, as Himſelf; nor any Man ſo Careful of the Guards and Watches by Night. And he was at the ſame time ſo Neceſſary a Spy for the Zelotes, that there was ſcarce any thing ſcap'd his Knowledge: and what He knew, They knew ſo ſoon as he could tell it them. And for the Better Diſguiſe of his Pretended Zeal for Ananus, and the People, he was moſt Officiouſly Nice and Forward in all his Reſpects to the High-Prieſt, and the Great Men he had to do withal. But ſo it fell-out, that the very Over-doing of his Part laid him under a Jealouſy; for it was too Much to be True, and too much Labour'd, to be Natural: beſide, that the Flatteries were too Groſs. Another Thing that encreas'd the Suſpicion was This; that he thruſt himſelf into their Councels ſtill, without being call'd. Ananus found that his Secrets were betray'd, and none ſo likely as John to do it. But This Wretch had play'd his Game ſo Artificially; and was ſo Rooted in the Good Opinion of ſeveral Great Men, that there was no Thought or Poſſibility of removing him from his Poſt: ſo that they could think of no Better Expedient for the putting of him to the Teſt, then to give him an Oath of Faith and Secrecy, to keep all the People's Councels, and to ſerve them againſt all Rebels to the Uttermoſt of his Power. John made no Difficulty of Swallowing This Oath; and Ananus and his People as little of believing him without any further Scruple: and thereupon, they did not only take him immediately into their Councels, but ſent him ſoon after upon a Commiſſion to the Zelotes, with Propoſals of Peace. The Thing they fear'd was, leſt the Temple ſhould come to be defiled with the Bloud of the Jews, and the Blame laid at their Door. This Perfidious Impoſtor went his way to the Zelotes with quite Another Story; and told them, that the Oath he had taken was ſo far from being againſt them, that, on the contrary, it was much in their Favour. I have, ſays he, run all manner of Hazzards for your Sakes, in the Care I have taken to Enform you of all the Deſigns and Practices of Ananus and his Party againſt you. But I am now to tell you that Neither You nor I were ever in ſo Great Danger as at This Preſent, if God in his Providence does not Avert it. For Ananus hath prevail'd with the People to ſend Deputies to Veſpaſian to deſire him to come away forthwith, and to take Poſſeſſion of the City; having Order'd the People to Purify Themſelves the Next Day, to the End, that, under a Pretext of Religion, they might either by Fair Means, or by Foul, get into the Town. I do not find, ſays he, under their Circumſtances, how they ſhould be able to hold-out long againſt ſo Prodigious a Number of Men:

John Artificial and Malicious to the Higheſt Degree.

but

but however, as God hath been pleaſed to Order it, I am at preſent Deputed to bring you a Project of Peace; which in truth is no Other then a Trick of Ananus's to hold you in hand with the Amuſement of a Treaty, and then to fall upon you by Surprize, when you think your ſelves moſt Secure. But as to what you are to do now, you have no Other Choice before you, that I can ſee, then either to Caſt your ſelves at the Beſiegers Feet; or to call-in a Forreign Force to your Reſcue. For, ſays he, if you are Taken, the very Memory and Conſcience of what you have done, (appear as Penitent as you pleaſe) puts you out of all Hope of Mercy; beſide, that Criminals prove the Worſe many times for Repentance: over and above that the Thirſt for Revenge encreaſes with the Power of Taking it with Security. Conſider again what you are to Expect from the Friends and Relations of Thoſe you have Slain, and from a Furious Multitude in the Height of their Rage for the Diſſolution of their Laws and Cuſtoms. Not but that here and there a Single Man perhaps may have ſome Senſe of Humanity and Tenderneſs; but what will That avail againſt the Impetuous Violence of a Brutal Multitude? This Diſcourſe of John's ſtartled the People; which was the Thing he aim'd at. As to the Forreign Force he hinted at, he meant it of the Idumæans; though he durſt not venture to ſpeak it out in Plain Terms. After This, he took ſome of the Heads apart, and gave them ſome ſhort Touches of Ananus's Cruelty, and of the Implacable Malice of his Heart toward Them in Particular.

CHAP. VI.

The Zelotes write to the Idumæans for Aſſiſtance, which is Granted them in a Supply of Near 20000 Men. Jeſus Diſcourſes the Matter with Them. Simon, the Son of Cathlas to the High-Prieſt. The Idumæans Reſolve to make Good the Siege.

Eleazar the Son of Simon, and Zachary (a) the Son of Amphicalus, were look'd upon as Two of the Ableſt Men the Zelotes had in their Councel, and the Beſt Qualify'd for Buſineſs, either to Adviſe, or to Execute: and they were Both of the Sacerdotal Race. Theſe Men, taking for granted, that beſide Menaces in General, their Particular Lives were threaten'd; and that Ananus and his Party had call'd in the Romans to their Aſſiſtance, as John had Order'd the Story; they found themſelves ſo Hamper'd under ſeveral Difficulties, that they could not reſolve which way to turn themſelves: Phancying in the Firſt Place that the very People would tear them to pieces. As to Forreign Succours, there were None to be Expected time enough to prevent the Execution of the Plot: for the Blow would be Struck before their Allies could have any Notice of their Diſtreſs. But in the Concluſion, they reſolved to apply themſelves to the Idumæans, and wrote them a Letter upon That Occaſion to This Effect. Finding that Ananus, having firſt Seduced the People, hath deſigned the Betraying of Jeruſalem to the Romans; we have retired into the Temple in Defence of the Common Liberty: where we are now Beſieged, and upon the very Point of falling into the Hands of Ananus and the reſt of our Enemies; and the City it ſelf into the Hands of the Romans, without immediate Relief.

The Zelotes in Diſtreſs, write to the Idumæans for Help.

The Bearers of This Letter had ſeveral Things in charge to deliver by Word of Mouth to the Principals of That Nation. The Perſons Choſen for This Commiſſion, were Two Ananias's; Both Reſolute Men; Good Speakers, and Perſons that had the Faculty of Perſuaſion; and (which was Equal to all the reſt upon This Occaſion) Men of Speed and Diſpatch. They made no doubt of the Idumæans Ready Aſſiſtance toward the Promoting of ſuch an Affair; being a People fond of Broils and Changes; Brutal and Churliſh, and ſuch as needed no Great Art to Engage them in any Thing of This Nature; for they are a People that go to War as Other People do to a Banquet. Expedition was now the Main Bus'neſs, and the Meſſengers did their Parts.

The Letter is no ſooner Read then the Requeſt Granted. In a Levy of near 20000 Men to their Aſſiſtance; and upon their March towards Jeruſalem.

Upon their coming to the Governors of Idumæa, and to the Reading of their Letters and Inſtructions, the People went Raving up and down like ſo many Mad-men; Provoking and Encouraging one another to take up Arms: inſomuch that they had gotten together a Party of near Twenty Thouſand Men, that were all rais'd for the Relief of the Mother-City. This Army was rais'd in a Trice and diſpatch away to Jeruſalem, under the Commond of John and James, the Sons of Soſas; Simon, the Son of Cathlas; and Phineas, the Son of Cluſoth.

Ananus and his People knew nothing of the fore-mentioned Deputation of the Two Meſſengers to the Zelotes; but he was better Enform'd however of the Idumæan Expedition, and ſo Order'd the Gates to be Shut-up, and the Walls well-Guarded; but no Act of Hoſtility to be Committed, till he had firſt try'd what might be done by Reaſon and Fair Words toward the Compoſing of the Broil: ſo that Jeſus (the Firſt Prieſt next Ananus) mounted a Tower over againſt the Idumæans, and within hearing of them, and ſo ſpake as follows.

(a) Gr. υἱὸς Φαλέκου.

Jeſus's Reaſonings and Propoſals to the Idumæans.

'Of all the Calamities, (ſays he) that ever befell This Famous City, Nothing a-'mazes me more then to ſee Fortune in a Conſpiracy with the Lewdeſt People in 'Nature to deſtroy it. Who could ever have thought to have ſeen you joyning 'with a Band of Miſcreants againſt Us; even more Heartily then would have be-'come you toward Barbarians Themſelves, if Jeruſalem had deſir'd your Aid: but if 'you are of the ſame Mind with your Superiors, This you have to ſay for your 'ſelves: That a Similitude of Manners, naturally begets an Agreement of Affections. 'But This cannot be the Caſe betwixt You and Them. For if you conſider their 'Lives and Actions, you will not find one Man of them that does not deſerve a 'Thouſand Deaths. As to their Quality, they are the very Scum and Sink of Man-'kind: and then for their Manners: After their Squandring away their Fortunes in 'Luxury and Debauche, they proceeded to Rapine and Pillage; and ſtealing after-'ward into the City, like Thieves, they advanced to Sacrilege and Bloudſhed; even 'in the Holy-Temple it ſelf: Wallowing in Drink and Surfeits, at the very Altar, 'without either Fear or Shame; Devouring the Spoils of Thoſe they have Murder'd, 'and Prophaning the Sacred Place with all Manner of Pollutions. Now in the Mid-'dle of This Confuſion, I find your People here in as Regular a Formality of Or-'der and Equipage, as if your Army had been brought-in at the Requeſt of the 'Whole Body of the City againſt a Forreign Enemy. What ſhall I call This now, 'but the Iniquity of Fortune, to ſee your Whole Nation United in ſo Infamous 'a Confederacy againſt your Own Brethren? I cannot but admire, I muſt confeſs, 'at the Suddenneſs of your Reſolution as well as at the Thing it ſelf. It muſt be ſome 'Great Matter ſure that could move You to take up Arms for Thieves and Vaga-'bonds, againſt your Allies. But you have gotten a Story among you, I perceive, 'of our calling-in the Romans, and betraying the City to them; and upon That Pretence, 'you take upon you to ſet up for Aſſertors of the Liberties of Jeruſalem againſt 'a Forreign Power. Now though This was a Groſs and a Malicious Calumny, it 'was yet Pertinent enough to the Purpoſe of the Inventers of it: for our Enemies 'could never have gain'd their Ends upon Men that value Liberty at the rate that 'you do, and would venture ſo far for the Preſerving of it, but by poſſeſſing you 'with a Rage againſt us, as the Baſe and Unmanly Betrayers of a Bleſſing and a 'Privilege that you have ſo Great a Veneration for. But you ſhould do well now to 'Conſider, who they are that thus Bely and Traduce us; and then make a Judgment 'upon the Whole, not upon the Credit of plauſible Tales and Hearſays, but upon 'the Force of Clear Truths and Convincing Reaſon.

'How will it conſiſt that We ſhould Diſpute our Liberties thus long with the Ro-'mans, and juſt now Own them for our Maſters? How came it that we fell-off from 'them at firſt? Or how came it that we did not go Over to them again, before our 'Lands, Towns, and Villages were totally laid Waſte and Deſtroy'd? Neither is 'This a Time for a Treaty, if we had never ſo Great a Mind to it; for the Con-'Conqueſt of Gallile hath made them too Proud to hearken to any Conditions. And 'then to go out Crouching to them to beg a Peace, ſo ſoon as they ſhew themſelves 'before our Walls, would be an Infamy more Inſupportable then Death it ſelf. For 'my Own Part, I am rather for Peace then War; but, on the Other ſide, when the 'War is once Begun and Inevitable, I am rather for a Glorious Death, then the Life 'of a Slave.

'But how ſtands the Caſe, I beſeech you, of our ſending to the Romans? Is it 'that the Ring-leaders have privately ſent ſome Particular Perſons out of their Own 'Number, or Families: or will you have it to be a Deputation as the Common Act 'of the People? If This was done by a Particular Commiſſion, why are we not told 'the Names of the Commiſſioners? Are there any Letters to be produc'd in proof 'of This Suggeſtion? Or hath any Man been taken-up going or coming upon This 'Errand? How comes it that among ſo many Thouſands of People as we daily Con-'verſe with in the City, not ſo much as One Man ever heard of it? And how comes 'it again, that This Secret that has been Menag'd with ſo much Caution out of the 'City, ſhould be only known to a Few Perſons that are lock'd-up in the Temple, 'and not at liberty ſo much as to ſtir out of the Walls? Is it not a Strange Thing 'too that This Treaſon ſhould never be heard of, till the Reporters of it were in 'danger Themſelves, and in Dread of being call'd to an Account for their Own 'Crimes? Neither could it be call'd the Peoples Act, without paſſing the Vote of a 'General Aſſembly; which would have made it Impoſſible to be kept ſo long a Se-'cret.

'cret. Or to what end ſhould there be a Deputation too, when the Thing was re-
'ſolv'd beforehand, and no Room left for a Treaty? And then, as I ſaid before,
'they ſhould have done well to have Nam'd the Commiſſioners. But drowning 'Men will catch hold of any Thing: and all This Shifting and Shuffling is only for 'the Saving of their Own Skins. But if it muſt be the City's Fate at laſt to fall by 'Treachery, None ſo likely to bring it to That End as our Accuſers Themſelves:
'for 'tis but adding Treaſon to Bloud, Sacrilege, and the reſt of the Impieties they 'are Guilty of already, to fill up the Meaſure of their Iniquities.

'But ſince you are here upon the Place with us, and in Arms, What can you
'do better then to Joyn with us in the Relief of the City, and in the Rooting-out 'of Theſe Tyranical Monſters? Wretches that have trod all our Laws under Foot,
'to make way for Tumult, and Violence; Treated our Governours worſe then Bond-
'ſlaves, or Common Criminals, in Jayls, Chains; nay, and with Death it ſelf,
'though never ſo Innocent: and which is Worſe, without ſo much as any Pretence
'to the Contrary; and without any Place at laſt for Prayers or Interceſſions in Fa'vour of the Miſerable. This is no more then what you may be Eye-witneſſes of 'your ſelves, if you will but Enter the City as Friends, and believe your Senſes.
'There you ſhall ſee the Gutting of Houſes, and the whole Town in Mourning
'for their Maſſacred Kin'red and Friends; your Ears entertain'd with nothing but 'Crys and Lamentations, and not one Creature to be found, upon the Whole, but 'has his Part in This Oppreſſion. And they have carry'd up the Inſolence to ſo Ex'travagant a Pitch too; that after the Barbarous Robberies and Outrages Committed 'in the Country-Towns and Villages, they have brought the Scene likewiſe into the 'Mother-City it ſelf; though the Head and Glory of the Nation: carrying the Out-
'rage from thence alſo, into the very Temple it ſelf; which they have made the 'Seat of the War. From thence it is that they make their Sallies; and Thither,
'their Retreats; There they keep their Guards; their Stores, and their Magazines:
'and at this Rate it is, in fine, that Theſe Profligates, (of our Own Tribe and Ex'traction too) Prophane, Diſhonour, and Trample upon God's Holy Habitation;
'and the Place that is Venerable all over the World, ſave only among our Own 'People. They are never ſo Deſperate, but in the Depth of their Deſpairs, they
'ſtill take Delight in Forcing all things to Extremities, and in ſetting Cities and Nati'ons together by the Ears; and running all into a Confuſion of Civil Broils. Now
'the moſt Righteous and Reaſonable Thing that you can do, (and That which might 'beſt become you too) would be, as I ſaid before, to go hand in hand with Us in 'delivering the Nation from Theſe Firebrands, and in taking your Revenge upon 'them for the Impoſture they have put upon you, and for preſuming to Invite you
'into their Party for Aſſiſtance: whereas They ſhould rather have dreaded the Ven'geance and Juſtice from you, that belongs to a Common Enemy. Or if you take it 'to be Matter of Decency, and Reſpect, to pay ſome ſort of Deference to their Re-
'queſts, be but you pleaſed to paſs into the City as Friends; leave your Arms at the 'Gates; make your ſelves Neuters; give the Cauſe a Fair Hearing, and be You Your-'ſelves the Judges of the Controverſy. But now for theſe People that have ſo many 'Notorious Crimes to Anſwer for Themſelves; and after the Hurrying away of ſo
'many Men of Quality to Death, without ſo much as the Forms of either Charge or 'Defence: for Theſe People, I ſay, to be admitted to ſo Impartial and Eaſy a Way
'of Tryal, will be a Condeſcenſion very Extraordinary, and it will become them to 'acknowledge the Obligation they have to you for the Favour. But if you will nei'ther Joyn with Us in the Equity of the Cauſe, nor appear in the Quality of a 'Judge betwixt us, Pray do but Withdraw from Both Parties, without either In-
'ſulting over Honeſt Men in their Affliction, or Siding with Traytors and Uſurpers
'againſt your Mother-City. Or if you are not as yet thoroughly Satisfy'd of our 'Innocence, as to any Secret Correſpondence with the Romans, do but ſend out your 'Scouts and Agents to Spy upon the Paſſes and Avenues: and when ever you find
'One Creature of us Guilty of ſuch a Practice, ſpare neither the Actor nor the Party.
'Now That will be the only Proper Time for you to ſtand up for your Metropolis:
'and there is no Danger in the mean time; for as you are Poſted, it is not poſſi-
'ble for any Enemy to Interpoſe to your Prejudice. If This may Work upon you,
''tis Well; but if Otherwiſe, you cannot think it Reaſonable for Us to Open our 'Gates 'till you lay down your Arms.

The Idumæans were ſo Incens'd at their being ſhut out of the Town, that they gave little or no Heed to what Jeſus ſaid: and then for laying down their Arms, it look'd ſo like a Conqueſt, that the Commanders would not ſo much as Endure the Thought of it. The Multitude, upon This, fell into a kind of Uproar; but Si- mon the Son of Cathlas, One of the Officers, with much ado appeasing it, took a Standing upon an Advance-Ground within Hearing of the High-Priest, and deliver'd himself to them after This Manner.

Simon the Son of Cathlas, to the High-Priest.

'I do not wonder, says he, to see the Defenders of our Country's Liberties shut-
'up here in the Temple, when the very Besiegers of Those Patriots have likewise
'shut-up the City it self; which ought to be Free and Open to the Whole Nation:
'but at the same Time ready enough perhaps to Entertain the Romans with Garlands
'and Acclamations. 'Tis enough for Us, you think, to talk to us from your Towers;
'advise us to lay down our Arms (though taken-up in the Common Cause) and not 'to trust our Neares Friends with the Guard of the City. But instead of defending
'our Capital, we are held in hand with Proposals of being made Judges of the Mat'ter in Question: and in the same Instant, while you are laying load upon Others
'for destroying your Fellow-Citizens without any Colour of Law, You your selves
'pronounce Judgment at Will and Pleasure upon the Whole Nation, and Violently
'keep your Own Brethren out of a City that gives admittance, upon the Account of 'Piety and Devotion, to all Mankind beside. But is This your way then of Ac'knowledging Obligations? Do you call it an Expedition against you, and a Siding
'with your Enemies, to make all the Haste we could to your Rescue? At the same 'rate are Those in the Temple your Enemies: and you have just as much to say 'against Us as against Them. You have at present the very Supporters of the Com'monwealth, Prisoners in the Temple, and we are to be flamm'd-off with a Pretence,
'that the End of your keeping all the World out of the City, is to avoid Their 'Tyranny. When in truth the very Tyranny you Complain of, You Your selves
'Practise. Now This is too Gross to pass upon any Man that hath Eyes in his Head.
'And Keeping us out of the City is not all neither; for we are barr'd by That Ex'clusion, from the Exercise and Enjoyment of the Religious Rites and Ceremonies
'of our Profession. And it is the same Case again with Those that are besieg'd in 'the Temple, for punishing Certain Traytors that you are pleas'd to Honour with 'the Title of Honest Men and Persons of Quality; for the Credit of the Confederacy.
'Now the Only Thing that they were to blame for, was, that they did not begin 'with you: That is to say, at the Root of the Conspiracy. But if They were Over
'Tender, it will concern Us to act with more Vigour, for the Maintenance of the 'House of God, and of the Rites of our Country, as well within the City as with'out, and against all Opposers. So that This Siege we are resolved to make good,
'till either the Romans deliver you, or the Conscience of what you have done amiss
'bring you back again to your Duty.

The Idumæans Resolve Finally to make Good the Siege.

CHAP. VII.

The Idumæans Encamp under the City Walls. A Furious Tempest; and the Idumæans shelter themselves under their Bucklers against it. Several Fore-bodings upon it. The Zelotes Advise in Councel how to Secure their Friends. The Idumæans Enter the City by Night; and Joyn the Zelotes. A Bloudy Massacre. Ananus and Jesus are put to Death.

THE Multitude gave to Understand by Shouts and Clamours, how much they were pleas'd with what was said. But Jesus, on the Other hand, went away Pensive and Sorrowful, not only for the Untractable Temper of the Idumæans; but likewise to find that the Citizens had now a Double War upon their Hands. And the Idumæans were not much Easier neither; partly out of an Indignation at the Affront of such a Repulse, and partly to find themselves so much Mistaken in the Strength of the Zelotes; for they were not so Strong as they imagin'd; and the Difficulties of the Undertaking made them half repent their Coming. But the Shame of returning just as they came, and without making any Attempt, carry'd it against all Other Scruples:. So that they resolved (Rashly enough) to take up their Station where they were, and to Encamp under the very Walls of the City.

Th y Post themselves under the Walls of the City.

On the Night following, there blew a Dreadful Tempest of Wind and Rain, accompany'd with such Terrible Flashes of Lightning, Tearing Claps of Thunder, and such Bellowing of Earthquakes, as put all People to their Wits End, to think what These Prodigies might portend.

A Furious Tempest. Several Judgments and Forebodings upon it.

The Inhabitants and the Idumæans were Both under the same Apprehension; That is to say: that God was Incensed against them for the War, and that some Vindictive Judgment threaten'd them Both, if they went-on with it against their Mother-City. Ananus and His Party looking upon it all this while as a Declaration from Heaven in their Favour; taking for granted that God would fight for them, and give them them a Victory without a Battle. But the Event ſhew'd them to be Falſe Prophets; for That which they apply'd to the Enemy befell Themſelves in the Concluſion.

All that the Idumæans were able to do in the Fury of This Storm, was to Edge one to another as cloſe as they could preſs, and Cover themſelves with their Bucklers; which by This Means they made Tight againſt Wind and Weather. The Zelotes all this while were in more pain for the Idumæans then for Themſelves; and ſo laid their Heads together, to Adviſe which way it was poſſible for them to bring their Friends off. The more Daring Part of the Councel were abſolutely for ſetting upon the City-Guards; and, after the Gaining of That Point, for Downright Forcing the Gates, and making way for the Idumæans: arguing, that ſuch a Surprize upon Raw-Soldiers, and Men Ill-Arm'd, would ſo Diſorder them that they would find it a Hard Matter to appear in a Body again; beſide, that they had moſt of them Hous'd themſelves, to be out of the Weather. But let the Danger be what it would, Nothing (they ſaid) ſhould ever make them ſo Baſe as to Abandon their Friends and Allies, that came ſo Generouſly to their Succour.

The Zelotes in Councel how to Secure their Friends.

The Moderate Men were utterly againſt That Way of Adventure; giving for granted, that the Guards at This Time were Undoubtedly doubled upon ſo Critical a Juncture; a Stricter Watch then Ordinary ſet upon the Walls, in regard of the Idumæans; beſide, that Ananus would be every where up and down, at all Hours, upon his Rounds, to keep the Soldiers to their Duty. And ſo it would have been any Other Night but That, when Ananus went to Refreſh himſelf; not ſo much out of Negligence and Lazineſs, as by a Judicial Fatality that Over-rul'd him upon That Critical Inſtant, to the Ruine of Himſelf, and his People: for the Night being now far ſpent, and the Tempeſt Encreaſing, the Guards upon the Temple-Gates fell all faſt aſleep.

It came now into the Zelotes Heads, that if they could but deſtroy the Bolts and Bars of the Gates, the Work were done: whereupon they took down certain Saws and Other Inſtruments, dedicated to the Service of the Holy Temple, with which they Fil'd and Cut them to Pieces: and it fell out ſo luckily, that betwixt the Raging of the Wind and the Roaring of the Thunder, the Beſiegers heard Nothing of the Noiſe. Upon This, they ſlipt away privately toward the City-Gates, next to the Idumæans; which they Open'd, as they had done the Former. The Idumæans took it at firſt for Ananus, upon ſome Motion toward a Sally, and Every Man with his Sword in his Hand made toward the Paſſage; but upon finding their Miſtakes, the Idumæans Enter'd the City; and with ſuch a Rage, that, if they had Diſcharg'd it upon the People, as they were about to do it, they muſt have put the Whole Body of them to the Sword. But the Zelotes earneſtly beſeeching them not to leave their Friends in the Temple in Diſtreſs; for whoſe Sakes they came thither, and ſo Expoſe them to ſtill Greater Dangers: and likewiſe Reaſoning with them how much Eaſier they would find the Enterprize, if they began with the Guards; whereas, if the Inhabitants took the Alarum firſt, they would gather in Multitudes, and diſpute every Inch of Ground upon ſuch Advantages, that they could never carry their Point. The Idumæans were of the ſame Mind, and ſo made it their Firſt Bus'neſs to paſs directly thorough the City to the Relief of their Friends that were Priſoners in the Temple; where the Zelotes waited their Coming with Great Impatience. The Idumæans were no ſooner Enter'd, but the Zelotes advanced out of the Inner-Temple, and joyn'd with them in a Sally upon the Guards. Some they Kill'd in their Sleep; while Others took the Alarum at the Outcrys of the People: and the Multitude ſtood to their Arms, though with all the Confuſion in the World. But taking it at firſt to be only a Party of the Zelotes, they made little doubt of running them down with Numbers, and took Heart upon it; but when they ſaw how Others came powring-in upon them from Abroad, and that the Idumæans had joyn'd the Zelotes; the Greater part of them betook themſelves to Cries and Lamentations, dropping their Courage and their Arms both at once. Some few Brave Young Fellows there were however, that had the Hearts yet to Encounter the Idumæans, and to Cover the Timorous Common People: while Others went raving up and down from place to place, making Proclamation as it were of the Ruine of the City. But not One Creature more to ſtrike a Blow after it was known that the Idumæans were Maſters of the Town. The Streets rung of Vain and Fruitleſs Exclamations, and Mournful Complainings; the Shrieks of Women in Frights for the Loſs of their Guards, and all theſe Clamours were made much more Dreadful by the Shouts of the Idumæans and Zelotes, and the Tempeſtuous Violences of the Winds and Thunder. But ſuch, in fine, was the Natural Barbarity and Fierceneſs of the Idumæans, together with the Vexatious Thought of being ſhut out of the City, and Expos'd to the Streſs of Weather; that they ſpar'd not a Creature: and whether they were in Arms or upon their Knees, it was the ſame Caſe. Some pleaded Reli-

Religion; Others, Kin'red: but Death ſtopp'd all their Mouths; and their Condition was ſuch, that they could neither Fight nor Run away. Nay, the very Fear of Death contributed as much to the Execution of it, in ſome ſort, as the Rage of the Enemy. For by preſſing ſo hard one upon another, they blockt up all Poſſibility of Retiring; and brought them ſo thick together, that their Adverſaries made not One Blow in Vain. In This Extremity of their Diſtraction, ſome of them, to avoid One Death, leapt headlong down a Precipice into Another. There was a Floud, in fine, of Bloud quite around the Temple: and by the time it was Fair Day-light, they computed Eight thouſand five hundred Dead Bodies upon the Place.

And This was not enough yet to quench the Drought of the Inſatiable Bloud-thirſty Idumæans, without turning their Rage againſt the City: where they pillag'd all Houſes indifferently, and kill'd all the People they found in their Way. As for the Rabble, they look'd upon them as below their Anger; but their Main Bus'neſs was to wreak their Malice upon the High-Prieſts: which they did, by cutting off their Heads ſo ſoon as they found them, and then Trampling upon their Bodies; making ſport with Ananus for his Popularity, and with Jeſus for his Harangue upon the Wall, in a way of Mockery and Deriſion. Nay, they were come to That Pitch of Impiety, as to forbid them the Rites of Burial; though the Jewiſh Laws, out of a Reverence to the Dead, have provided for the taking down even of Executed Criminals from the very Croſs, and Burying them before Sun-ſet. If I ſhould now Date the Deſtruction of This City from the Death of Ananus, and reckon that Ananus and Jeruſalem fell Both on the ſame Day, I believe I ſhould not be much out in my Account. For in the Loſs of This Man they loſt the Support of their Government and all Hope of Safety; and Jeruſalem was effectually as much put to death as Ananus: beſide that, over and above the Dignity of his Character and Extraction, he was a Man highly Eſteem'd in the World for his Perſonal Virtue and Juſtice; and his Humility was yet the Crown of all the reſt. He was a Famous Aſſertor of Liberty and a Common-wealth; for he had no Intereſt of his Own but to ſerve the Publique: a Lover and a Promoter of Peace above all Things; for he knew well enough that the Romans were not a People to be baffled, and that Nothing could ſecure the Jews but a Fair Underſtanding with the Other. To ſpeak all in a Word; if Ananus had liv'd, the Romans and the Jews would have come to an Agreement. He was a moſt Powerful Speaker, and had the Talent of Moving his Hearers to a Miracle. He had already Humbled Thoſe Incendiaries: (the Zelotes, falſly ſo call'd) and the Jews, with ſuch a Captain in the Head of them, would have found the Romans Work Enough to do. He was ſo Happy alſo as to have Jeſus for his Second: a Perſon as much above all Other Men as he was Inferiour to Ananus. But it was God's Will to purge This Holy City as by Fire, for all the Pollutions and Abominations that had been Committed in it: and This was done by taking away Theſe Two Illuſtrious Perſons, which were the Only Means of Preſerving it: Two Perſons, that but yeſterday were Venerable for their Prieſtly Robes; the Heads and Protectors of the moſt Glorious Religion under the Sun; and the Darlings, not only of their Own People, but of all Forreigners that had the Honour to know them: and now, in the Turn of a Hand, Expoſed Naked for a Prey to Dogs and Wild-Beaſts, to the Aſtoniſhment and Heart-breaking of all Good Men: to ſee Virtue Trampled upon, and Iniquity Ride Triumphant.

CHAP. I.

The Cruelty of the Idumæans and the Zelotes. 12000 Eminent Men put to Death. Zachariah charged with Treaſon before a Mock-Court of Juſtice. The Court Acquits him; and the People Murder him in the Temple. The Practice is Diſcover'd; and the Idumæans Diſcharge their Priſoners, and leave the City. Gorion and Niger of Peræa are put to Death. Divine Juſtice overtakes the Tyrants.

AFter the Horrid Butchery of Ananus and Jeſus, (as aforeſaid) the Common People were treated at the rate even of the Worſt of Beaſts, both by the Zelotes and Idumæans; who cut them to pieces as faſt as they found them: but for Men of Quality and Thoſe that were in the Vigour of their Youth, they kept them only in Cuſtody; in hope that for the ſaving of their Lives they might be brought over to Their Party: but they choſe rather to dye every Man of them then to join in a Conſpiracy with Traytors againſt their Native Country. And Death was the Leaſt Part of their Miſery too; for it was brought on with the moſt Exquiſite of Torments: and when the Bodies of Men were Torn and Mangled with Scourges, till they were all over Ulcers, and could hold out no longer, they had recourſe then to the Sword, for the finiſhing of the Work. Thoſe that they took up in the Day, were Crowded into Priſons at Night; and as any of them Dy'd there, their Bodies were thrown out to make Room for more; and the next Comers to be ſerv'd after the ſame Manner. Theſe Horrid Maſſacres put the People in ſuch a Dread, that they durſt not own ſo much as a Sigh or a Tear for the Loſs of a Friend, or any ſort of Funeral Rites for the neareſt Relations they had in the World: Nay, they durſt not ſo much as Weep or Mourn in their Own Houſes or Chambers without ſearching all the Holes and Corners firſt, to be ſure that no Body was within Hearing: for Humanity was become ſo Dangerous a Crime, that it was Death even to ſhew a Tenderneſs for the Memory of Thoſe that were gone. All they could do, was now and then in the Dark, and by Stealth, to caſt a Handful of Earth or Two upon the Body: though ſome few were ſo Bold as to venture upon it in the Day too. This Perſecution coſt the Lives of Twelve Thouſand Men of the Firſt Quality.

The Barbarous Cruelties of the Idumæans and the Zelotes.

12000 Men of the Beſt Quality put to Death with Infamy.

Theſe Bloud-thirſty Monſters began now to be almoſt ſurfeited with This Bare-fac'd, Cut-throat way of Murder, and had the Confidence to ſet-up a Mock-Court of Juſtice, and to do the ſame thing over-again under a Form of Law and Equity. There was one Zachariah the Son of Baruch, a Man of the Firſt Rank; a Friend to all Good Men, and an Enemy to the Wicked: a Man, in ſhort, of Great Authority and Virtue, and Wealthy over and above. This Zachariah was look'd upon by the Zelotes, as a Man ſo Dangerouſly Popular; that They Themſelves could not be ſafe they thought, without removing him. So they reſolv'd to take away his Life; or, which was all one, to put him upon his Tryal for it. To This Purpoſe they call'd together Seventy of the Better ſort of the People, under the Name of Judges; but without any ſemblance of a Commiſſion to Authorize them. This Pretended Court being met, the Zelotes exhibited a Formal Charge againſt Zachary, for being in a Conſpiracy to betray Jeruſalem to the Romans, and Treating about it with Veſpaſian. There was not the Leaſt Colour either of a Proof, or ſo much as any Inducement to the believing of it; but the Zelotes ſaid it was ſo, and therefore it muſt be ſo.

Zachary

He makes an Honourable Defence.

Zachary pereceiving manifeſtly that his Life was at Stake, and that the Whole Menage was a Cheat (for he had nothing to do with Veſpaſian) he gave himſelf without more Ceremony for loſt: but ſtill in the Abandon'd State of his Deſpair, he govern'd himſelf in his Defence with a Serenity of Mind and a Freedom of Spirit, well-becoming the Character of a Man of Honour and Virtue. He began with Contemptuous Reflexions upon the Shameful Practices and Pretences of his Accuſers; and ſo proceeded to the Evident Calumnies and Inconſiſtences of their Suggeſtions; briefly laying Open the Vanity of all their Objections, and turning their Arguments in their Own Faces; ſetting forth in Order the Whole Courſe of their Iniquities; and Complaining by the By of the Troubled State of Things. This Generous and Daring Behaviour of Zachary tranſported the Zelotes into ſo Malicious a Rage, that they had certainly Murder'd him upon the Place, if it had not been to keep up the Credit of their Pretended Judicature; by putting it to the Experiment, whether their New Judges would venture their Heads or no, upon ſo Dangerous a Point of Juſtice. When it came to the Iſſue, the Whole Court pronounc'd the Priſoner Innocent, without ſo much as One Man of the Seventy that did not chuſe rather to run the Hazzard of his Own Life, then to deſtroy ſo Good a Man by a Sentence againſt all Conſcience and Equity. This Judgment of Acquittal put the Zelotes into ſuch an Uproar, that they were all raging Mad at the Judges for being ſuch Blockheads as not to Underſtand to what end they were ſet there. Upon This, Two of the Rankeſt Ruffians of the Crew fell outrageouſly upon Zachary, and Murder'd him in the Middle of the Temple with This Inſolent Railery in their Mouths. [Now, ſays One of them, We have given you our Diſcharge too, and you are much ſurer of This, then you were of the Other:] Caſting the Body at the ſame time down the Precipice under the Temple. As to the Judges, their Lives were ſpar'd, and their Puniſhment only a Judgment of Infamy, to be beaten out of the Temple with the Flats of the Swords that were to Execute the Sentence. By This Means there were diſperſed up and down ſo many Eye-Witneſſes of the Slavery of the Capital City at That time.

The Whole Court Acquits him.

Zachariah Murder'd by the Rabble in the Temple.

One of the Zelotes Repents and Diſcovers the Whole Practice.

The Idumæans Themſelves were ſo Diſguſted at This Way of Proceeding, that they Curs'd the Hour of their Coming; and ſo Conferring about it, they had ſecret Intelligence given them by One of the Zelotes, of the Whole Hiſtory of the People that Invited them-in. [True it was, he ſaid, that they did take up Arms upon the Credit of a Report that the High-Prieſts were Treating with the Romans for the betraying of the City; however, upon further Enquiry, they found nothing at all in it; but, on the Contrary, the Pretended Aſſerters of our Liberties were actually the Subverters of them, and They Themſelves the Tyrants that ought to have been timely ſuppreſt. But, ſays the Zelote, ſince it hath been your Unhappy Lot to join with them thus far in their Iniquities, it will be High Time for you to break-off ſo Criminal an Alliance with the Profeſt Enemies of your Laws and Country. You took it ill to be kept out of the Town: and are you not ſufficiently reveng'd, do you think, upon Thoſe that Excluded you; in the Death of Ananus, and ſo many Thouſands of the Citizens in One Night? An Action, ſays he, which many of your People will live to repent. But I ſpeak This only to ſhew you the Barbarity of your Confidents, that had the Impudence to Commit Theſe Shameleſs Cruelties even before the Faces of their Preſervers, and by doing the Baſeſt Things that ever were heard of in the ſight of their Allies, to Tranſfer the Infamy from the Zelotes to the Idumæans; who in truth ſhould either have hindred them, or left them. Now, ſays he, ſince it is as Clear as the Sun that the Whole Story of the Conſpiracy is nothing but a Calumny, and that there's no ſuch Thing in Proſpect as the Dread of a Roman Army; beſide the Impregnable Strength of This City, if it were True to it ſelf: ſince Thus it is, I ſay, What have you more to do then to Return whence you came; and by abandoning Theſe Monſters, to Expiate in ſome ſort for the Ill Things you did in their Company? Wherein you are thus far Excuſable, that you were rather Paſſive under a Well meaning Miſtake, then Voluntary Actors at your Own Liberty and Choice.] This Diſcourſe had ſuch an Effect upon the Idumæans, that they forthwith ſet all their Priſoners at Liberty, (which were near Two Thouſand;) left the City; and ſo went to Simon, (of whom hereafter) and then Home.

Upon This Diſcourſe the Idumæans Diſcharge their Priſoners and leave the City.

This Unexpected Departure of the Idumæans was Equally a Surprize both to the Inhabitants and to the Zelotes; though upon ſeveral Accounts. For the People, that knew nothing of the Other's Repentance, took Heart upon it, and Comforted themſelves in the Thought of ſuch a Deliverance. The Zelotes, on the Other hand, grew as Inſolent upon it, in a Confidence of their Own Strength; and to Conſider that the Check being now taken-off that kept them in ſome ſort of Awe of the Idumæans, they were now at liberty to go their own way to Work without any Reſtraint of Scruple, Conſideration or Delay: ſo that Every thing was now done done in a Hurry without Deliberation or Council. They ſtuck at nothing, though never ſo Wicked; and whatever came in their Head, it was no ſooner Thought then Executed.

But their Deadly Spite was againſt Men of Bravery and Honour; and Thoſe they perſecuted to the Uttermoſt Extremity; the Nobility, out of Envy; the Men of Reſolution and Virtue, out of Fear: for they could never think themſelves ſafe ſo long as any Man of That Character was Alive. This was it that made them put Gorion to death; (with ſeveral Others) a Man Well-Principled and Well-born; a Man of Courage, and a Lover of the People and of Liberty, no Creature more; and, in fine, This Spirit of Liberty, (together with his Other Virtues) was his Ruine. Niger of Peræa fell alſo under the ſame Diſaſtrous Fate: a Man of a try'd Valour and Conduct againſt the Romans; Shewing and Glorying in the Wounds and Scars he had receiv'd in the Service of his Country, as they dragg'd him along the Streets. When they had him out of the Gates, and that he gave himſelf for Dead, he made them This One Requeſt, that his Body might be bury'd: but it was deny'd him; and ſo they put him to death, with this Prophetical Imprecation in his Laſt Breath, that the Romans might come to Avenge his Bloud; and Divine Juſtice Overtake them with Famine, Sword, Peſtilence and Mortal Diviſions among Themſelves, anſwerable to the Enormity of their Crimes.

Gorion and Niger of Peræa put to Death.

Divine Vengeance Overtakes them.

It was not long before God in his Righteous Providence powred down all Theſe Plagues upon them, as Foretold: beginning with their Inteſtine Broils. The Death of Niger ſet their Hearts at Eaſe as to any further Danger that way. But there was not yet ſo much as One Common Man that they did not find ſome Occaſion or other to pick a Quarrel with. Some they put to death for Things gone and paſt, and for Diſaffections of old Date. In Other Caſes, where there was no Matter of Fact againſt a Man, a Bare Jealouſie or Poſſibility was enough to Deſtroy him. If they made Court to the Faction, they were Spies; if they kept off, it was Interpreted Envy and Contempt: but whether the Pretended Crime was Great or Small, the Penalty was ſtill the ſame; and nothing ſcap'd them that had either Mony or Honour.

CHAP. II.

The Jews Miſerably Confounded. The Officers preſs Veſpaſian to Rigour, but Veſpaſian is for Moderation. The Zelotes go over daily to the Romans. Horrid Perſecution and Oppreſſion. The Deſtruction of Jeruſalem Fore-told by an Ancient Prediction.

THE Roman Officers having their Hearts ſet upon Jeruſalem, could not Wiſh a Fairer Opportunity for the Advancing of their Deſign, then by laying hold of the Diſtractions in the City: to which end, they apply'd themſelves to the General, Veſpaſian, by all means to Emprove the Providence of the Preſent Occaſion, without allowing the Jews one Moment of Time to bethink themſelves: for they would either Agree, or Tire, or Repent, or ſomething or other; and the Work would be then to begin again: repreſenting alſo at the ſame time, that the Hand of God did moſt Evidently appear, upon theſe Factions, in Favour of the Romans. The General gave them This Anſwer. [That their Bravery was more then their Policy; and that they conſider'd the Glory of the Action in the Oſtentation of their Courage, (as if it were to Fight a Prize) more then the Prudence and the Advantage of it. For (ſays he) to attaque the City, hand over head, would be the Ready way to make them all Friends again, and to draw their Forces upon Us, which are very Conſiderable, into a Conjunction as againſt a Common Enemy; Whereas if we do but wait a while with a Little Patience, they'll do our Bus'neſs to our Hands, in ſpending their Numbers and their Spirits one upon another. For God does Better for Us then we could do for our ſelves, in delivering-up the Jews to the Romans without Labour or Peril; and giving us Victory without ſo much as a Battle. Are they not already up to the Ears in a Civil War; (which is the Heavieſt of all Judgments) and Cutting Throats among Themſelves like ſo many Mad-Men? And who but a Mad-man then, will enter into a Needleſs Conteſt with Mad-men, and run the Riſque of bearing a Part in a Tragedy, when he may do his Bus'neſs better in the Quality of a Spectatour? Theſe People, I tell you, are Hot-headed, and rather then not be deſtroy'd they'll Kill one another. As for Thoſe that look upon a Cheap Victory to be Inglorious, they ſhould do well to ſet the Advantages of a Temperate Accommodation without Bloud againſt the Uncertain Chance of War. This is not to Derogate from the Honour of Military Virtue; for provided the ſame Thing be done, what matters it whether by Arms or by Councel? But yet undoubtedly that muſt needs be the Beſt way of doing it, which at the ſame time Weakens the Enemy, and keeps our Own Men by Daily Exerciſe in Diſcipline and in Breath. Neither (ſays he) is This a Time for Us to propoſe to our ſelves the Fame of a Glorious Exploit, when the Jews are playing our Game for us, and mind neither their Arms, their Works, or their Walls, or the making of Intereſt and Friends; but by Tearing one another's Hearts out, and doing the Part of the Worſt of Enemies one to another; till they have brought themſelves into ſuch a Condition, that the Beſt they can Hope or Wiſh for, is to be our Slaves. Now as to the Prudence and Honour of the Matter in Queſtion; if they have a Mind to Worry one another, why ſhould we hinder them? Nor is there, in fine, any Reputation to be gotten by a Victory that was rather Caſt upon us by the Faction of the One ſide, then gain'd by the Valour of the Other; and This is effectually the Truth of the Caſe.]

This was Veſpaſian's Senſe of Things, and the Officers were of the ſame Opinion with their General; as it appear'd they had Reaſon to be by that which follow'd ſoon after. For there came over Deſerters to him from the Zelotes in Great Numbers, Day after Day; though the Ways and Paſſes were ſo beſet, that it ſeem'd almoſt Impoſſible to Eſcape. They put Every Man to the Sword that they took, upon a pretence that he was running away to the Romans: That is to ſay; unleſs he redeem'd himſelf for a Sum of Mony, and That brought him off. So that there was no Treachery but where there was no Caſh; for the Rich Compounded, and the Poor were left in the lurch. The Maſſacre was ſo Outrageous, that the Dead Bodies lay pil'd-up in Heaps upon the High-ways; and many that were thinking to get-off, chang'd their Minds, and Choſe rather to Periſh in the City, only in Hope of a little Earth to Cover them. Nay ſuch was the Extravagant Barbarity of Theſe Monſters, that they would not allow Burial to any Creature either within the City or without: but like Profeſs'd Enemies to the Inſtincts of Nature, as well as the Rites of their Country, they affronted God and Man Indifferently, and expoſed the Bodies to lie Rotting above-ground in the Face of the Sun. Nay, and it was as Unpardonable a Crime to attempt the Burying of a Friend, as to go over to the Enemy: and he that had but newly bury'd Another, wanted a Friend the next Moment to do the ſame Office for Himſelf. There was no ſuch Thing left among them as Compaſſion; (the moſt Humane of all our Affections) but it was wholly Extinguiſhed in the Hearts of Theſe Miſcreants; and Miſery was made rather a Provocation to Rage, then a Motive to Pitty.

Deſerters go over daily from the Zelotes to the Romans. Tyranny and Oppreſſion to the Higheſt Degree.

The Spectacle, in fine, was ſo Frightful, that it made the Living Envy the Dead; and the Want of a Grave was nothing to the Miſeries of a Priſon: and they did not only Trample upon all that was Sacred among Men, but trifled with Divinity it ſelf, and made no more Account of the Oracles of the Prophets, then of ſo many Dreams or Fables. But yet after the Contempt of all the Laws and Precepts of their Forefathers, concerning the Meaſures of Good and Evil, they found the Denouncing Predictions to be yet made good in the Concluſion againſt Themſelves and their Country. For there was a Traditional Prophecy handed down to them from Antiquity, that in time to come there ſhould break-out a Violent Sedition in Jeruſalem; and that the Jews Themſelves with their Own Hands ſhould Prophane the Holy Temple: the City to be afterwards Taken, and all that was Sacred belonging to it laid in Aſhes. The Zelotes made no Doubt of the Authority of This Prophecy, and put their Own Helping Hands to the Execution of it.

THE Ambitious Heart of John of Giſchala was grown now too Big to content it ſelf with any thing Leſs then Sovereign Power; (a Freak that he had had a long time in his Head) ſo that withdrawing Inſenſibly from the Fellowſhip of his Companions, and Liſting by little and little, a Party of Profligate Ruffians into his Intereſt; his Bus'neſs was now to ſet-up for Himſelf. He had a Humour of Impoſing his Own Orders and Opinions Imperiouſly upon Others, and of Treating Theirs

John of Giſchala ſets up for Sovereign Power.

A Man of an Impoſing Imperious Humour.

Theirs again with Contradiction and Contempt: and This he did out of a Manifeſt Affectation of a Sole and Abſolute Power. Some join'd with him out of Fear; and ſeveral, out of Affection and Good Will: for he was the Greateſt Maſter of Words in Nature; and in the Art of Moving the Affections. Many follow'd him for their Own Security, in Hope that All the Ills that they had done would be laid at His Door as the Firſt Mover of them, whenever they ſhould be call'd to an Account for their Evil Doings. The Martial Part of his Train ſtuck to him as he was Stout, and a Man of Parts: But divers yet of the Adverſe Party fell off from him: ſome, out of Envy and Greatneſs of Stomach, in a kind of Diſdain to Own Him for their Maſter that had ſo lately been their Enemy. But the Thing that wrought more upon them then all the reſt, was the Averſion they had to a Single Perſon, and the Deſpair of getting him out again if he were once poſſeſs'd of That Dignity: beſide, that he would never forgive Thoſe that Oppos'd him in his Pretention at the Beginning. The People, upon Theſe Deliberations, came at laſt to a Reſolution, rather to ſtand the Worſt of a War, then to periſh under the Infamy of making themſelves Voluntary Slaves. The Faction, upon This, divided into Two Parties; John putting himſelf in the Head of the Anti-Zelotes. They ſtood Both upon their Guards one againſt the Other; and not without ſome ſlight Skirmiſhes too: but rather againſt the People then betwixt Themſelves; for the ſingle Point in Queſtion was only This, which of the Two Parties ſhould get the Greater Booty.

A Ready Wit, and an Excellent Speaker.

The Factions divided into Zelotes and Anti-Zelotes. John ſides with the Latter.

Jeruſalem being at this time labouring under Three Terrible Judgments; War, Tyranny and Sedition; the People taking the War to be the moſt Tolerable of the Three; quitted their Habitations, and fled from their Own Country-men for Sanctuary to Strangers, and found afterwards, That Safety and Protection among the Romans, which they could not obtain one from Another.

Three Heavy Judgments upon the Jews.

The Three Judgments above-mentioned were now follow'd with a Fourth; which contributed as much to the Deſtruction of the Jews as any of the reſt. There ſtood a Caſtle not far from Jeruſalem called Maſſada: a Picce of Great Antiquity, and of Mighty Strength and Importance. It was Erected, and made uſe of, by our Kings in Former Times for a Royal Treaſury; and a Magazine of all maner of Stores, and Neceſſaries for War; and for an Impregnable Retreat in a Time or Caſe of Danger. It was now in the Poſſeſſion of a Band of Bravo's, commonly call'd Sicarii. There were not enough of them to Kill, Burn and Overrun the Country Bare-fac'd; but the Miſchiefs they had done hitherto were by Treachery and Surprize. It happen'd, upon This Juncture, that the Roman Army lying Quiet and out of Action, and the Jews at the ſame time ſplit into Factions, and tearing out one another's Throats among Themſelves; Theſe Aſſaſſins took Advantage of the Occaſion to make a Bolder Attempt then ever they durſt venture upon before. It was now the Feaſt of Unleavened-Bread; a Feſtival Celebrated by the Jews with Great Solemnity, in Memory of their Deliverance out of the Ægyptian Bondage; and their Tranſlation into the Land of Promiſe. On That Night, the Ruffians brake into Engaddi by Surprize; ſcatter'd the People, and Maſter'd the Place before the Inhabitants could recover their Arms. They drove them out of the Town; and after Killing upward of Seven Hundred Perſons upon the Chace, moſt of them Women and Children, they rifled their Houſes, and carry'd away all the Fruits that were ripe and in Seaſon, to Maſſada: depopulating all the Towns, Villages, Caſtles and Country thereabouts after the Like manner. Their Numbers encreas'd daily by the Acceſſion of a Looſe Abandon'd Rabble that came Flocking-in to Join them. Judæa, that till now lay Eaſy and Quiet, became the very Scene of all Manner of Violences upon that Inroad, from One End of the Country to the Other. But as it is in our Bodies; when any of the Nobler Parts are Indiſpos'd, all the reſt feel of it; juſt ſo it fares in the Caſe of a Seditious and Diſorderly City. When the Capital is Sick, all the Parts Suffer by Conſent; as well as they Tranſgreſs by Example. When they had plunder'd all within reach, they March'd-off with the Booty into Solitudes and Deſerts; where they aſſociated in Conſpiracies, and gather'd together Multitudes of Free-booters, little Inferiour to Formidable Armies, and ſufficient to deſtroy Cities, and lay Temples Deſolate. The Sufferers did not forget (as it is Natural enough, and Common Practice) to revenge themſelves upon their Oppreſſours, when ever they could come at them: but That was very rarely; for the Thieves were too Nimble for the Honeſt Men, and got-off with the Prey, before the Purſuers could reach them. But ſo it was, in fine, that there was not One Inch of Ground in Judæa that did not partake in the Calamities of the Capital City.

And a Four h yet Worſe.

Maſſada a Strong Piece in the Hands of the Sicarii.

Theſe Cut-Throats Take Engaddi by Storm; and lay the Whole Country Waſt.

Judæa becomes the Scene of the War.

The Faction had Guarded all the Avenues with the Uttermoſt Strictneſs and Caution Imaginable: and not a Creature could Stir without the Hazzard of his Life. But all this Precaution and Rigour did not hinder ſeveral Deſerters yet from Stealing away privately, day after day, with Intelligence of the State of the Town to Veſpaſian; and to Implore his Relief in the Names of the Miſerable Remainder of a Diſtreſſed City: Great Numbers of the Citizens having loſt their Lives already for their Good Will to the Romans, and a great many more at preſent in Danger of periſhing by the ſame Fate. Veſpaſian, in a Generous Tenderneſs for the Caſe and Condition of an Unhappy People, advanced with his Army nearer the Town: not, as ſome imagin'd, to lay a Cloſe Siege to't; but upon a Proſpect (in truth) of delivering them from any Siege at all, by reducing all Strong Holds about it in the Firſt Place, ſo as to leave no Obſtacle from Abroad to thwart him in his Deſign.

The Jews hold Secret Intelligence with Veſpaſian: and Sue to him for Relief.

Veſpaſian in a Generous Tenderneſs draws toward the Town.

When he came to Gadara, the Richeſt and the Strongeſt Town beyond Jordan, and the Metropolis of That Province; he enter'd the Place (a) on the Fourth of the Month Dyſtrus, upon an Invitation from ſome of the Leading-Men by their Deputies to come and take the Town into his Protection: which they did to ſave both their Lives and Eſtates, being a very Wealthy People. The Faction knew Nothing of this Menage, but as they gueſs'd at it by Veſpaſian's drawing nearer the Walls. They were now in a Great Streight, and knew not which way to turn themſelves, or what to do. They found it utterly Impoſſible for the Town to hold-out againſt ſo many Enemies both within and without; the Majority of the Citizens againſt them, and the Roman Army at hand. So that they had nothing now to truſt to but Flight; which was a Point that in Honour could not be reſolved upon, without taking a Revenge firſt upon ſome of the Authors of their Ruine. Upon this Conſideration, they took-up Doleſus, the firſt Man of the City both for Bloud and Merit; over and above that he was the Authour and the Adviſer of the aforeſaid Embaſſy. They took him, in fine, into Cuſtody, and cauſed him to be put to death; ordering the Dead Body to be whipt and ſcourg'd; and that being done, they ſlipt away all out of Town.

Gadara Invites and Receives him.

The Faction betake themſelves to Flight.

Upon the nearer Approach of the Romans towards the City, the Inhabitants met Veſpaſian upon the Way, and Conducted him into the Town with Gratulatory Acclamations: and beſide the Ceremony of Oaths of Fidelity, and other Common Aſſurances of that kind, in the like Caſes, they made it their Own Act to demoliſh their own Walls; as a further Security for their Good Faith and Peaceable Intentions, by putting it out of their Power to do Miſchief if they would never ſo fain. Veſpaſian, after this, gave them a Garriſon of Horſe and Foot for their Safeguard; ſent away Placidus with 500 Horſe and 3000 Foot after the Fugitives; while He himſelf with the reſt of his Troups went back to Cæſarea.

Placidus follows the Purſuit; and puts them all to the Rout.

When the Fugitives found themſelves purſu'd, and a Party of Horſe at their Heels; they turn'd-off into a Village call'd Bethennabris, before the Romans could come-up to them: where there was a Parcel of Stout Young Fellows, to a Conſiderable Number. Some of them they engag'd by Fair Words to join with them; Others they forc'd: and with this Party they ſally'd out, and made a Raſh and a Deſperate Charge upon Placidus; who gave ground upon the very Firſt Puſh, but it was only to draw their Adverſaries a little further from the Town: which ſucceeded accordingly; for Placidus got them out into a Place of Advantage, and there ſet upon them, and put them to the Rout. Thoſe that fled for their Safety were intercepted by the Romans; Thoſe that fought were cut-off by their Foot; they were beaten, in ſhort, quite off their Mettle. When they attaqu'd the Romans, they might as well have Charg'd a Wall or a Rock; for they ſtood ſo Firm and Cloſe, that there was no Breaking the Body: and they lay upon ſuch a Guard under their Arms too, that no Launce or Dart could touch them. Whereas the Jews, on the other hand, lay Expos'd to all ſorts of Weapons, and to all Manner of Aſſaults; till in the end, being teized into a Brutal Rage, they caſt themſelves like the Fierceſt of Wild-Beaſts upon the Points of their Enemies Swords, and ſo periſh'd: ſome were ſlaſht over the Faces; others diſperſed by the Horſe, and trampled under Foot. Now Placidus made it his Particular Care, as far as poſſible, that none of the Fugitives ſhould get back into the Town. Wherefore as any of them offer'd at it, he and his People put-in with their Horſes betwixt them and Home, and ſo forc'd them off again. Thoſe that were within reach, they Kill'd with their Launces, and others at a diſtance, they Intercepted: but ſome yet that were Fleeter and Stronger then the reſt, made their way to the very Wall; and now the Watch were at their Wit's End, whom to let-in and whom to keep-out: for it would be hard they thought to open the Gates to the Townſmen, and refuſe Entrance to thoſe of Gadara: and then, on the other ſide, they were afraid leſt by opening to all indifferently, they might endanger the Loſs of the Place; as it came afterwards very near the Matter. For the Romans having purſu'd ſome of the Fugitives up to the Wall, were within a very little of falling into the Town with them Pell-Mell: but with much ado they made a ſhift to get the Gates ſhut, and ſo prevented it. Placidus, upon this, gave a Vigorous Aſſault to the Place; and follow'd it ſo cloſe, that he made himſelf Maſter both of the Wall and of the Village, that afternoon. The Wretched Common-People that had no Means of Defence were all put to the Sword, and the reſt did what they could to ſave themſelves by Flight; and carry'd the Terrour along with them, where-ever they came, all over the Country. But now to finiſh the Calamity, they firſt pillag'd the Houſes, and then laid the Village in Aſhes.

Placidus Rifles the Place, and lays it in Aſhes.

The Miſery was very Great in the Truth of the Fact; but made much Greater in the Report yet then it was. For they gave it out all the Way they paſs'd, that the Whole Roman Army was coming toward them. This Alarum put the Country into ſuch a Fright that they quitted their Habitations upon it, and in Prodigious Numbers retir'd to Jericho; being a Strong, a Populous, and a Well-Fortify'd Garriſon, and conſequently the Safeſt Retreat they could think of. Placidus, in the Courſe of his Succeſſes and Good Fortune, purſu'd them to the River Jordan; putting Every Creature to the Sword that they Overtook upon the Way. When the Fugitives came to the River-ſide, the Waters were ſo Out upon a Great Fall of Rain, that there was no Paſſing; nor, as the Caſe ſtood, any Poſſibility of getting away. In This Difficulty they found themſelves under an Abſolute Neceſſity of putting it to a Battle. The Jews poſted themſelves along the Bank of the River; which they made good for a While: but when they came once to be broken; What betwixt Thoſe that were Drown'd and Others that were Slain, the Loſs of the Men was not to be Computed. They reckon'd upon Fifteen Thouſand Kill'd upon the Place; about Two Thouſand Two Hundred Taken, beſide a Mighty Booty of Sheep, Camels and Oxen.

The Country frighted with a Falſe-Alarum.

The Jews forced upon a Battle.

A Prodigious Victory and Booty.

This Diſaſter was not only the Greateſt that the Jews had ever yet receiv'd; but in ſome ſort even beyond it ſelf. The High-ways where they March'd were all Cover'd with Dead Bodies; the River Jordan ſo Choak'd with Carcaſſes, that there was no Croſſing it; and vaſt Numbers floating down ſeveral Channels that led into the Lake Aſphaltitis.

Placidus being now in the Train of his Good Fortune, reduced Abila, Julias, Beſemoth, and Other Places as far as the Lake: where he ſettled Garriſons of the Beſt and Truſtieſt Men he could pick out of Thoſe that came over to the Romans: His next Work was to put his Soldiers aboard, and Clear the Lake of all the Fugitives that fled thither for Refuge: which he did ſo Effectually, that the Romans were by This time abſolute Maſters of all beyond Jordan, as far as Machærus.

Placidus Reduces ſeveral Places; and ſettles Garriſons in them.

Gaul Revolts. Veſpaſian's Marches and Motions: He comes to Jericho. A Deſcription of the Place. The Lakes of Aſphaltitis and Tiberias. Eliſha's Fountain.

WHile This paſs'd in Judæa, came News out of (a) Gaul of a Revolt there from Nero; and that Vindex with ſeveral Principal Men of the Country were the Heads of it, (but of This more particularly elſewhere.) Veſpaſian, upon This Intelligence puſh'd-on the Preſent War with more and more Vigour; for he did not know how many Revolts might follow one upon the Neck of Another, and the Whole Empire come to be in Danger at laſt by a Civil War: whereas if the Troubles in the Eaſt were but firſt Compos'd, Italy would have the Leſs to fear. But Winter not being a Seaſon for it, all that could be done toward it at preſent was only to Garriſon the Towns and Cities he had ſubdu'd; Erect Proper Officers in Every City, and to Order Reparations where they were Needful.

Gaul Revolts.

The Firſt thing he did was to March with his Army from Cæſarea to Antipatris; where he ſtay'd Two Days to put things in Order; and on the Third laid all the Neighbourhood Waſt with Fire and Sword, together with the Borders of the Toparchy of Thamna: and thence to Lydda and Jamnia. Theſe Two Places ſubmitted to him. And then when he had Peopled them with Inhabitants from Other Towns, ſuch as he thought he might beſt Conſide in, he advanced to Ammaus; and poſſeſſing ſing himſelf there of the Paſſage that leads to the Capital City, he pitch'd his Camp and ran a Wall about it: and leaving the Fifth Legion there, he mov'd with the reſt of his Troups [a] into the Toparchy of Bethlepton; which he burnt and deſtroy'd, together with the Neighbouring Country and the Borders of Idumæa; ſaving only ſome Strong Caſtles that he Mann'd and Fortify'd.

There were Two Towns that he took in the Middle of Idumæa; (b) Bethabri and Caphartoba: where he Kill'd upward of Ten Thouſand Men, reſerving near a Thouſand for Slaves; drove out the reſt of the People, and left a Conſiderable Part of his Troups to ſally-out and Commit Outrages upon the Mountains.

He returned, after This, with the Remainder of his Army to (c) Ammaus; and paſſing from thence by Samaria, and Neapolis, (which the Natives call (d) Mabartha) he came the ſecond of the Month Deſius to Corea; where he Encamped, and ſhew'd himſelf next day before Jericho. At Jericho, Trajan, one of his Chief Officers, join'd him with the Troups under his Command, after the Entire Reduction of all beyond Jordan: but moſt of the Inhabitants were withdrawn to the Mountains over-againſt Jeruſalem before the Arrival of the Romans; and a Great Part of Thoſe that ſtay'd behind were put to the Sword.

Veſpaſian comes to Jericho.

Veſpaſian, in fine, found Jericho a Deſolate and a Forſaken City. It ſtands upon a Plain that is Overlooked by a Naked and a Barren Mountain; and of ſuch an Extent, that it reaches upon the North-ſide to the Region of Scythopolis; on the South, as far as Sodom and the Borders of the Lake Aſphaltitis; a Country ſo wretchedly poor and barren, that there's no Living there. Over-againſt This, and on the further ſide of the River Jordan, there lies another Mountain; which begins at Julias toward the North, and ſtretches Southward up (e) to Gomorrha, and ſo Borders upon Petra a City of Arabia. There is alſo another Mountain which they call the Iron-Mountain, and runs out as far as the Land of the Moabites. Betwixt Theſe Mountains lies a Place called the Great Plain: It begins at (f) Gennabara, and ſtretches out to the Lake Aſphaltitis; the Length of it is Two Hundred and Thirty Furlongs; a Hundred and Twenty over, and the River Jordan croſſes the Middle of it.

A Deſcription of the Place.

The Great Plain.

The Lakes of Aſphaltitis and Tiberias.

There are Two Remarkable Lakes: the One, call'd Aſphaltitis; the Other, the Lake of Tiberias; but of very Different, if not Contrary Qualities: the Former being Salt and Crude without Fiſh; but the Other, Sweet, Kindly, and Fruitful. The Summer-Heats there are Intolerable; the Country burnt-up with them; and the Air Hot and Sickly, without any Refreſhment but from the River of Jordan: as appears by the Palm-Trees, which thrive much better upon the Banks then at a diſtance.

At or near to Jericho it ſelf, there is a Large and a Plentiful Fountain; which Overflows all the Grounds thereabouts, and takes its Riſe not far from an Ancient City; the Firſt Place that Jeſus, the Son of Nave, the Famous General of the Hebrews, gain'd from the Chanaanites by the Sword. There goes a Tradition, that This Fountain in time paſt was ſo Dangerous, that it did not only Corrupt the Fruits of the Earth, as well Grain, as Plants; but likewiſe cauſed Abortions in Women, and teinted with a Blaſting Infection whatever it touch'd that was capable of ſuch an Impreſſion. But it ſays further, that from the Days of the Prophet Eliſha, the Illuſtrious Succeſſour of Elias, the Waters of This Fountain became not only Innocent but Nouriſhing and Wholeſom; and upon This Occaſion: Eliſha having been Treated with Great Hoſpitality and Reſpect by the People of Jericho, bethought himſelf of ſuch an Acknowledgment as They Themſelves, their Country and Poſterity might be the Better for to the End of the World. The Prophet, upon This, went out to the Fountain; and cauſing a Pitcher of Salt to be let down into the Bottom of it, he advanced his Right-Hand toward Heaven; and preſenting his Oblations at the ſide of it, he beſought God in his Goodneſs to Correct the Waters, and to ſweeten the Veins that paſs'd from them; to ſoften the Air, and make it Temperate and Fructifying; to beſtow Children as well as Fruits upon the Inhabitants in abundance, and never to withdraw theſe Bleſſings ſo long as They continu'd in their Duty. Upon the Offering-up of this Prayer, with all Due Ceremony, and according to Form, the Quality of the Fountain was chang'd; and inſtead of Sterility and Famine, the Waters were now become an Efficacious Means of Plenty and Encreaſe: inſomuch that the Bare touching of the Ground with them gives every thing a more ſavoury Relliſh; but then let them lie never ſo long upon it, the Effect is much the ſame; eſpecially if it ariſes from any Diffidence of the Miracle. And over and above all This, there is not another River in the Country that runs ſuch a Tract of Ground.

The Country is Seventy Furlongs in Length, and Twenty in Breadth; furniſh'd with Curious Gardens and Thick Groves in abundance; with Palm-Trees along the Brooks, of Different Kinds, Names, and Taſts. They preſs out of ſome of them Great Quantities of a ſort of Honey not much inferiour to Other Honey; which they have there alſo in Great Plenty. And then for Balſam, which is the Choiceſt Fruit they have, there is Great Store of it; and ſo for Cyprus, and Myrobalanus: a Bleſſing from Heaven undoubtedly, for a Country to produce not only the Choiceſt of all the Fruits of the Earth, but the Largeſt and Beſt of the ſeveral ſorts. And they are not behind the Happieſt of all Other Countreys neither for the Production of other Fruits, and for the Emproving of them as well in Growth as in Virture. This may be aſcrib'd in my Opinion to ſome Peculiar Property and Diſpoſition in the Water, and to a certain kindly Warmth in the Air. The Latter to draw out and diffuſe the Vertue of the Subject Matter it hath to work upon; as in the Diſcloſing of Leaves, Flowers, and the like. The Other ſerves to bind and confirm the Roots, and to Fortify them by Encreaſing the Sap againſt the Parching Rages; which are ſo Furious in That Country, that nothing would be able to Sprout or Bud without it. But yet in the Extremity of Theſe Burning Heats, they have likewiſe every Morning ſuch Refreſhing Breezes, that the very Breath of them makes the Water that is drawn before Sun-riſe quite another thing. In the Winter it is Warm, and Comfortable to Bathe in. Such, in fine, is the Temperature of the Climate, that when it is Froſt and Snow in Other Parts of Judæa, the Natives of This Place go clad only in ſingle Linnen. It lies a Hundred and Fifty Stadia from Jeruſalem, Sixty from the River Jordan, and the Whole Country betwixt That and Jeruſalem is all Rock and Deſert. It lies Lower indeed betwixt This Place and Jordan, and ſo to the Lake Aſphaltitis; but every jot as Rude and Barren as the Other. This is enough ſaid of the Happy Situation, and the Natural Advantages of Jericho.

A Deſcription of the Country.

CHAP. V.

Nothing ſinks in the Lake of Aſphaltitis. Veſpaſian tries the Experiment, and finds it ſo. Several Wonderful Qualities in This Lake. It borders upon Sodom. A Fair Fruit there to the Eye, but falls to nothing upon the Touch.

IT will become me now to ſay ſomething of the Aſphaltitis, and the Nature of That Lake. It is ſalt to the Taſt, and no Fiſh will live in it; nor hardly any thing ſink that is thrown into it, let it be never ſo Heavy: ſo that a Man would find it a hard matter to drown himſelf in This Lake, if he had never ſo Great a mind to't. Veſpaſian having heard of the ſtrange Quality of This Water, took a Journy on purpoſe out of a Curioſity to ſee it: and Order'd ſeveral Perſons that could not Swim to be caſt into it from above, with their Hands ty'd behind them; and they all came up again, as if they had been rais'd by a Puff of Wind, and ſo floated on the ſurface of the Water. There is a Wonderful Secret in This Lake; which is, that it changes Colour thrice a-day, according to the various Refractions of the Light of the Sun-beams upon it. There are alſo to be ſeen in ſeveral Parts of it, up and down a-drift, large Lumps of a Dark Bituminous Matter, not much unlike the Bodies of Bulls without Heads. The People of the Country fiſh them up into their Boats; but the Subſtance of them is ſo Viſcous, and one Part ſo glew'd to another, that there is no getting the Veſſel off again but by Diſſolving the Lumps, and ſeparating that Part without the Boat from the Other within; which Diſſolution is to be wrought by the Means of Urine and the Menſtrua of a Woman. This Bituminous Matter ſerves both for Shipping, and for Medicines; for it ſtops Leaks, and Cures many Diſeaſes. The Length of This Lake is Five Hundred and Eighty Furlongs; the Breadth of it a Hundred and Fifty, and it runs out as far as Zoar in Arabia.

Nothing ſinks in the Lake of Aſphaltitis.

Veſpaſian makes the Experiment, and finds it ſo.

Several Wonderful Secrets in This Lake.

It borders upon the Land of Sodom; a Country once Famous both for the Wealth of the Inhabitants, and for the Fruitfulneſs of the Soil. But at preſent it lies totally Deſolate; having been deſtroy'd by a Judgment of Fire from Heaven for the Wickedneſs of the People. There are yet to be ſeen there ſome Remains of the Ruines of Five Abominable Cities that periſh'd in That Conflagration: and there there are Mock-Fruits to be ſeen to This day ſpringing out of the Aſhes; Fair and Lovely to the Eye, but reſolving into Smoak and Aſhes upon the Touch. So that we have not only Tradition, but Ocular Teſtimony alſo for the Credit of This Hiſtory.

Jeruſalem Inveſted by Veſpaſian.

Veſpaſian being reſolved to Inveſt Jeruſalem on every ſide, raiſed Two Forts, at Jericho, and Adida; putting into each of them Garriſons both of Auxiliaries and Romans. The General then ſent Lucius Annius with a Body of Horſe and Foot to Geraſa; which he took by Storm upon the Firſt Attaque. He put a Thouſand Young Men to the Sword; which he intercepted in their Flight; carrying away Whole Families Priſoners, and giving the Soldiers the Pillage: and This being done, he ſet Fire to the Place, and ſo went Forward. The Rich fled; Thoſe that could not get away, were cut to pieces; and whatever they took, they burnt. Nothing, in ſhort, ſcap'd them; neither Mountains nor Valleys; Places, or People; but all ſuffer'd in the Outrages of the War. As for Thoſe that were ſhut up in Jeruſalem, there was no ſtirring out: the Zelotes keeping ſo ſtrict a Watch upon Thoſe that were Friends to the Romans; and the Town being ſo beſet by the Enemy, that the Zelotes Party durſt not venture for fear of falling into their Hands.

Geraſa taken by Storm, and put to Fire and Sword.

The News of Nero's Death comes to Veſpaſian, on his March toward Jeruſalem.

When Veſpaſian was now return'd to Cæſarea, and preparing to advance with his Whole Army againſt Jeruſalem, News was brought him of the Death of Nero; who had now Reign'd Thirteen Years and Eight Days. It is not my Buſ'neſs to arraign his Memory for the Diſhonour he put upon the Government, in ſuffering himſelf to be Impos'd upon, and led like a Child by Nymphidius and Tigillinus; Two of the moſt Scandalous Varlets that he had about him: how he was betray'd by Theſe Infamous Wretches; abandon'd by his Senatours and Guards, and being forc'd to fly for ſafety into the Suburbs, only with Four of his Freemen (all that ſtood by him:) how he there laid Violent Hands upon Himſelf, and what became of Thoſe in the Concluſion that brought him to his End: What was the Iſſue of the War with the Gauls; Galba's being declar'd Emperour; and afterwards, upon his coming out of Spain to Rome, his being Calumniated by the Soldiery for a Man of a Mean Spirit, and by them ſlain in the Middle of the Great Market-place: how Otho was then created Emperour, and then March'd with his Army againſt Vitellius. This is all little or nothing to my Purpoſe: neither is it worth my while to Enlarge upon the Troubles of Vitellius; the Combat before the Capitol; or how Antonius Primus, and Macianus, after they had ſlain Vitellius, defeated the German Troups and put an End to the Civil War. I am the leſs Particular upon Theſe Points, in regard that ſeveral Famous Hiſtorians, both Latin and Greek, have already done That Work ſo accurately to my Hand: ſo that I ſhall content my ſelf with Theſe ſhort Touches, provided only that I do not break the Order, and Diſcontinue the Thread of my Hiſtory.

The Ends of Nero, Galba, Otho, and Vitellius.

Veſpaſian upon This Revolution ſuſpends his Deſign.

Veſpaſian, upon This Intelligence, put a ſtop at firſt to his Expedition againſt Jeruſalem; till he might know what became of the Government after the Death of Nero; and finding the Succeſſion ſettled upon Galba, he did not yet think it prudential to act in an Affair of That Quality without Orders. So that he ſent his Son Titus immediately away to Galba, both to Congratulate his Acceſſion to the Government, and to receive his Inſtructions, and Commands, what Meaſures to take. King Agrippa would needs put himſelf a-board with Titus upon the ſame Errand; ſo that they Embarqu'd together. But as they were upon their Paſſage near Achaia, they were given to Underſtand that Galba was Slain, after a Government of Seven Months and Seven Days: Otho ſucceeding him, who Govern'd Three Months. This Alteration did not hinder Agrippa from Proſecuting his Journy to Rome: But Titus by a Divine Impulſe ſail'd from Achaia into Syria, and from thence very ſeaſonably got back to Cæſarea to his Father.

The Surprize puts all Things to a Stand.

The Surprize of This Extraordinary Revolution put all things to ſuch a ſtand, that the very Empire it ſelf ſtagger'd at it. There was no more Talk now of the Jewiſh War; nor was it a Time to think of Enlarging the Empire, when they were ready to Tear all to pieces at Home.

A New War in Jeruſalem upon This Occaſion.

Simon of Geraſa, an Ill Man, makes Head againſt Ananus.

He is Worſted, and takes Sanctuary among the Sicarii in Maſſada.

They find him a Man fit for their Turn.

Simon's Way of Conduct and Menage, upon the Death of Ananus.

UPon This Revolution there brake-out a New War in Jeruſalem. There was one Simon the Son of Gioras; a Geraſene Born, and in the Prime of his Age, though not ſo Dextrous and Artificial as John; who was now in Poſſeſſion of the City: but Younger, Stronger, and much the Hardier of the Two. He was ſo Dangerous a Perſon, that Ananus the High-Prieſt drove him out of his Government in the Toparchy of Acrabatena, and made him fly to the Thieves in Maſſada for Refuge. They were ſo ſuſpicious of him at firſt, that they would not truſt him any further then the Firſt Floor of the Fortreſs, among the Women he brought along with him; while the reſt of the People kept above. But upon further Acquaintance, and finding how Fit he was for their Turn, they had a Better Opinion of him; and who but Simon to Command Parties upon Adventure, and to join the reſt of the Troups in Pillaging and Depopulating the Territory of Maſſada. He did all he could to put Greater Things in their Heads too; but nothing Leſs then Sovereignty would ſerve his Turn; though to no Purpoſe, till the News was brought him of the Death of Ananus. And immediately, upon the Removal of That Obſtacle, he took his Courſe into the Woods, and iſſu'd out Proclamations of Liberty to all Slaves, and Rewards to all Freemen, that would Liſt themſelves in his Party. This brought over to him a great many Diſorderly and Licentious People; and with That Rabble he ſack'd and deſtroy'd the Villages upon the Hills; augmenting his Numbers daily, till in the End he marched down directly to the Plains, and kept the Cities in Awe wherever he paſs'd. So that Simon was no longer a Captain of Thieves and Slaves: but a Great many Men of Power, and Quality upon the Reputation of his Valour and Succeſſes, were come over into his Intereſt; and the Generality of the Better ſort of the People made their Applications to him with the Reſpect and Reverence of Subjects to their Prince. He made ſeveral Excurſions into the Toparchy of Acrabatena and the Greater Idumæa; where he made Choice of Nain, (a Town that He Himſelf had Wall'd in and Fortify'd) for his Retreat. In the Valley of Pharan he found many Caverns fitted to his hand; and Others that he Enlarg'd, for Granaries, Stores, Magazines, and Places of Stowage (in ſhort) for what he got by Pillage and Booty. By This Proviſion of Men and Neceſſaries, every Body gave it for granted that his Main Deſign was upon Jeruſalem. The Zelotes were of the ſame Opinion too; and finding it Dangerous to let him go-on Strengthning himſelf every Day more and more, they made one Bold Puſh of it to try how they might prevent him in the Progreſs of his Ambition, before it was too late. Upon This, they advanc'd in a Full Body to Charge him in the Head of his Troups; who Encounter'd them with Great Courage; made a Conſiderable Slaughter among them, and put the reſt to the Rout.

He begins with Idumæa.

Now Simon did not think himſelf Strong enough yet to meddle with Jeruſalem; but choſe rather to begin with the Conqueſt of Idumæa, and ſo March'd away preſently Twenty Thouſand Strong toward the Borders. Upon This Appearance, the Heads of the Idumæans quickly got an Army together of near Twenty Five Thouſand Choicemen; leaving alſo a Competent Number to ſecure the Country againſt the Excurſions of the Cut-throats in Maſſada. The Idumæans waited for Simon upon the Borders; where, upon his Advance, the Two Bodies engag'd, and the Battle laſted from Morning till Night; upon Terms ſo Equal, that no body could ſay which of the Two had the Better or the Worſe. But they had Both enough of it; for Simon drew-off quietly to Nain, and the Idumæans return'd to their Own Home.

An Obſtinate Fight betwixt Simon and the Zelotes.

It was not long after This that Simon took the Field again with the Reinforcement of a much Stronger Army; and Encamping near the Village of Thecuë, he ſent Eleazar, one of his Companions, with a Summons to the Governour of Herodion, requiring him to deliver the Caſtle into his Hands. The Officers receiv'd him at firſt with all the Niceties of Military Honour and Reſpect; but upon coming to Underſtand his Commiſſion, they all drew upon him in That very Inſtant; and Eleazar ſends a Plauſible ſummons to Herodion, and the Garriſon Receives him.

Eleazar detected, and caſts himſelf over the Wall into the Ditch.

Eleazar finding it Impoſſible to make an Eſcape, leapt down the Precipice from the Wall, where he was daſh'd to pieces.

The Treachery of James of Idumæa under the Colour of a Spy.

The Idumæans were poſſeſs'd with ſuch an Apprehenſion of Simon's Stomach and Power, that they had no mind to grapple with him; till they might firſt be perfectly well Enformed in the State and Strength of his Army. James, one of their Commanders, very readily, and of his own accord, (but with Treachery in his Heart) took upon Himſelf the Office of an Enformer. Upon This Commiſſion he went away from Olurus, (where the Idumæan Army lay at That time Encamp'd) and ſo to Simon. After ſome Diſcourſe upon the Bus'neſs, he enter'd into a Solemn Contract with Simon to deliver up his Country into his Hands, upon Condition to be Treated after the Performance of it, as his Firſt Miniſter and Favourite; and Undertaking in the next Place, to make all Idumæa for him. When Simon had ſufficiently ſweeten'd This Treacherous Inſtrument with a Splendid Treat, Fair Words, and Large Promiſes, he went his way back again to his Own People: where he made Simon Twenty times more Conſiderable then in truth he was; for Strength, Conduct, Number, Order, Every thing: which, by little and little, made ſuch an Impreſſion, not only upon the Ignorant Multitude, but upon the Officers Themſelves too, that they were all prevail'd upon not to diſpute the Matter any further by Arms; but rather to lay all at Simon's Feet, for fear of Worſe Conſequences: James ſending away Meſſengers to Simon at the ſame time to come away immediately, and not to loſe ſo fair an Opportunity, for he would be Anſwerable for it that Idumæa ſhould be his Own without Bloud: which he made good accordingly. Upon the Approach of the Army, James was the Firſt Man that took Horſe; and away he Spurr'd, as in a Fright, with the reſt of the Faction at his Heels. This ſtruck ſuch a Terrour into the Hearts of the People, that they ran their ſeveral ways; and ſo diſpers'd upon it, that the Whole Army was diſſolv'd without ſo much as one Stroke.

Chebron ſurpriz'd. A Deſcription of the Place.

Simon being now poſſeſs'd of Idumæa, without Bloud; which was little Leſs then a Miracle, he ſurpriz'd the Town of Chebron; with Corn in it and Other Booty to a Prodigious Value. This City is of Great Antiquity, and not only the Eldeſt of the Province; but, if we may believe the Natives, Ancienter then even the Ægyptian Memphis it ſelf; being computed to be of 2300 years ſtanding. They have a Tradition that Abraham, the Original Father of the Jews, took up his Habitation there, upon his leaving Meſopotamia; and that his Poſterity remov'd from thence into Ægypt: where there are Monuments to be ſeen at This Day, with Marble-Inſcriptions curiouſly Wrought, in Confirmation of what I deliver. There is likewiſe to be ſeen, within Six Furlongs of the Place, a Wonderful Turpentine-Tree; which, according to the Tradition of the Place, was created with the World it ſelf, and is yet Sound and Firm.

Idumæa and the Whole Country about it laid Waſte.

From This Place Simon made his Inroads quite through Idumæa, with a Train of Forty Thouſand Men at his Heels beſide his Men of Arms; deſtroying, and depopulating, not only Towns and Villages, but whole Territories and Countreys wherever he came. The Marching of his Army was the ſame Thing to the People, that a Flight of Locuſts are to a Wood: not a Leaf or a Spire of Graſs, nor any thing more then a Deſert that they left behind them. It was a Thing utterly impoſſible to find Proviſions for ſo many Mouths: and then the Natural Fierceneſs of Simon, and the Malicious Animoſity of his Rage againſt the Idumæans was ſtill a Further Aggravation of the Pinching Neceſſity. In fine, what with Burning, Demoliſhing, Devouring the Fruits of the Earth, or Trampling them to Dirt; Simon's Troups did not leave ſo much even in a Fruitful Well-Cultivated Country, as the Leaſt Sign or Memorial of what it had been formerly.

The Inhumanity of This Proceeding ſtuck in the Stomachs of the Zelotes, though they durſt not bring it to an Open War; but contented themſelves with what they got now and then upon the Snap, by Surprize; and it was their Fortune at laſt to make a Conſiderable Purchace, as they accounted it: for they took Simon's Wife Priſoner, and ſeveral of his Domeſtiques, and carry'd her away to Jeruſalem, with as much Joy and Triumph, as if it had been the Husband Himſelf; making no doubt but Simon would now lay down his Arms and Compound for his Wife. But This Violence upon the Woman wrought it ſeems a quite contrary Effect upon the Husband; and inſtead of moving him to Tenderneſs and Compaſſion, Tranſported him into the Furious Extravagances of a Mad-man.

Simon's Wife taken Priſoner by the Zelotes.

He went immediately to the Gates of Jeruſalem: and there like a Wild-Beaſt that's wounded, and cannot come at the Man that did it, he diſcharg'd his Outrageous Choler upon whatever came in his way; Men, Women and Children, that only went out of the Town for Sticks and Herbs, he cauſed to be taken-up and whipt whipt to death; Young and Old, without Diſtinction: Only he was ſo Merciful as not to eat their Fleſh when he had Kill'd them. He cut-off the Hands of a Great many of them for a Terrour to his Enemies, as well as to fright the People from their Party, and ſent them to the Town ſo Maim'd with Theſe Words in their Mouths; [That Simon Swore by the Great God, who governs the Univerſe, if they did not immediately ſend him his Wife again, he would force their Walls, and put Every Creature in the Town to the ſame Extremity; whether they were Young or Old, Guilty or Innocent.] The Dread of Theſe Menaces did not only Work upon the Multitude, but upon the Zelotes Themſelves: inſomuch that they return'd him his Wife upon it; and ſo far pacify'd his Wrath, as to Obtain ſome ſort of Reſpite to his Daily Cruelties.

And upon Thoſe Menaces they ſend him his Wife again.

IT was not Judæa alone that was harraſs'd with the Sedition of a Civil War; but the Subborn Humour was gotten into Italy too; Galba ſlain in the very Heart of Rome it ſelf; Otho declar'd his Succeſſour; and then up ſtarts Vitellius; who, being Elected Emperour by the German Legions, diſputes his Title with him. They had Two Battles for it near (a) Bebriacum in (b) Lombardy. Otho had the Better of it the Firſt Day; and Vitellius carry'd it the next, under the Command of his Two Generals, Valens and Cecinna. There was a Great Slaughter: and Galba, who was then at Brixellum, upon the News of This Defeat, Stabb'd himſelf with a Dagger; after a Reign of Three Months and Two Days. His next Remove was toward Jeruſalem; where he took and Kill'd a World of Jews by the way.

Cerealis, in the mean time, one of the Principal Officers, with a Body of Horſe and Foot, over-ran the Upper-Idumæa; took and burnt the Caſtle (c) Caphetra by the way; laid Siege to Capharis, a Strong Wall'd Town; and they were in Hope it would have made a good Defence: but beyond all Expectation, the Townſmen opened their Gates; threw themſelves at their Feet, and ſo gave it up. Having thus carry'd every thing before him, he went to Chebron; the Ancient Town upon the Mountains, formerly ſpoken of; not far from Jeruſalem: which he attaqu'd and carry'd at the Firſt Aſſault. He put all the People in it to the Sword; ſack'd and burnt the City. There were yet Three Caſtles in the Poſſeſſion of the Faction; Herodion, Maſſada and Machæus: and Veſpaſian wanted nothing after This to put a Final End to This Terrible War but the Taking of Jeruſalem.

ſo Bloudily with haraſſing and hunting them up and down, that divers of them, in a Deſperation, fled to Jeruſalem for Sanctuary: Simon purſuing them to the very Foot of the Wall, and Killing all Comers and Goers that came within his reach. So that Simon without the Town was a Worſe Enemy then the Romans. And the Zelotes within, worſe then Both. But the Gallileans all this while taught them their Leſſon, and Emprov'd them in all the Arts of Wickedneſs, by Inſtruction, Encouragement, and Example. Now John being their Creature, thought it but Reaſonable to Employ the Power they had procured him to the Satisfaction of his Patrons; and ſo left them at liberty to live without Controll according to their Luſts. In the matter of Rapine, and Pillage, their Avarice was Inſatiable. They made no more of taking away the Lives of Men, and the Honour of Women, then of a Common Frolique, or Diverſion: and when they had ſated themſelves with Bloud and Oppreſſion, they went on Wallowing in the Brutality of their Carnal Appetites: Powdering and Curling their Hair; Diſguiſed in the Dreſs and Habit of Women; Painting, and ſetting themſelves-off with Dawbs and Waſhes. Nor did they imitate Women only in their Clothes and Ornaments, but in their Impudence alſo; for they Converſed with no more Reſtraint in the Face of the Sun then they would have done in a Common Stews: preſſing and practiſing Unnatural Luſts, and polluting the Whole City with Impurities not to be Nam'd, or ſo much as thought of. But all this while, with the Faces and Impudence of Women, they had the Hearts and Hands of Cut-throats: and how Effeminate and Mincing ſoever they were in their Gate and Motions, they had yet their Martial Weapons about them, and their Swords out in a trice upon any ſudden Occaſion to Kill the Next Man they met. He that Scap'd John, fell into the Hands of Simon, the Bloudyer Monſter of the Two: and he that got clear of the Domeſtique Tyrant, was deſtroy'd by the Other before the Town: beſide that all the Paſſages were ſo blockt-up, that there was no coming-off for Thoſe that had a mind to go over to the Romans.

Betwixt the Envy of John's Power and the Deteſtation of his Barbarous Cruelties, the Eyes of the Idumæans were by this Time Open'd; for they brake-out into a Direct Revolt, and made Head againſt him. It came to a Battle, and a great many of the Zelotes were Slain upon the Spot; the reſt fled into the Palace-Royal, which was Originally Erected by one Grapte, a (a) Kinſwoman of Izata the King of the Adiabenians. The Idumæans puſh'd-in along with them; and ſo beating the Zelotes into the Temple, they made themſelves Maſters of the Whole Maſs of John's Treaſure for a Booty; which was there Depoſited under the Roof of his Own Habitation. The Zelotes up and down the Town gather'd together, upon This, to join Thoſe of their Companions that were got into the Temple; and John immediately put himſelf in a Poſture for a Sally upon the Idumæans, and the Citizens: not that they had any Apprehenſion of their Number, for they were too many for them; but for fear of their Slipping out of the City by Night, and at the ſame time cutting of Throats and ſetting Fire to't. Upon this Occaſion they call'd a Councel, and deliberated with the High-Prieſt what Meaſures they were to take. But it pleas'd God to infatuate their Policies, by giving them over to a Remedy Worſe then the Diſeaſe; ſo they reſolv'd among themſelves to caſt-off John, and to ſet-up Simon in his Stead: and in ſo doing they did but Clear their Hands of One Tyrant, and lay themſelves at the Feet of Another. But the Vote paſs'd however, and Matthias the High-Prieſt was ſent to invite Simon into the Town for their Governour, whom they had been ſo often in Dread of. There were divers Others alſo that had been forced out of Jeruſalem by the Zelotes, and would gladly have been at Home again, that join'd with Matthias in the ſame Requeſt. Simon gave them a Magiſterial Anſwer that their Petition was granted, and ſo Enter'd the City in the Quality of their Preſerver: the People receiving him alſo with Acclamations in the ſame Style and Character. This happen'd in the Third Month that they call Xanthius. Simon had no ſooner Enter'd Jeruſalem with his Troups, but his Head was preſently at work how to Settle himſelf; for he look'd upon Thoſe that call'd him in, and Thoſe againſt whom he was call'd, to be Equally his Enemies.

A Civil War in Rome; and Vitellius in the Head of a Vaſt Army there. The News of Vitellius being choſen Emperor goes to the Heart of Veſpaſian. An Invective againſt Vitellius and his Party, to the Honour of Veſpaſian and Titus. The Soldiers are bent upon a Change; and Veſpaſian takes the Army into his Care.

A Civil War in Rome; and Vitellius there with a Vaſt Army.

IN the very Heat of Theſe Broils in Jeruſalem, there brake out a Worſe Miſchief in Rome it ſelf: That is to ſay, a Civil War. Vitellius was now come out of Germany, and ſo Prodigious a Multitude of Foreign Troups along with him; that, for want of Room in the Lodgments that were aſſign'd them, they were fain to take-up in Private Houſes, and to turn the Whole City into One General Quarter. The Sparkling of the Romans Gold and Silver was ſuch an Eye ſore to Strangers that were not us'd to Thoſe Sights, that they could hardly keep their Fingers off, either from taking Things by Force, or Killing Thoſe that hinder'd them. This was the Condition of Italy at that time.

Veſpaſian meets the News at Cæſarea of Vitellius's being Choſen Emperour. This Report goes to the Heart of Veſpaſian.

Upon Veſpaſian's Return to Cæſarea, after laying Waſt all about Jeruſalem, the News was brought him of Strange Tumults in Rome, and that Vitellius was declar'd Emperour. Now though Veſpaſian was a Man of Order, and knew as well how to Obey, as to Command, it went ſore againſt his Stomach yet, to think of Owning that Man for his Maſter, that came to the Empire, as to a Prey rather then to a Dignity. This Wonderful Turn was ſo Great a Mortification, and Diſtraction to him, that he could not ſo much as think of any Forreign Wars, at a time when his Country lay labouring under ſuch Miſerable Circumſtances at Home. But as his Indignation ſpurr'd him on to a Revenge on the One Hand; ſo the Difficulties of ſo long a Journey in order to the Execution of it (eſpecially in Winter too) put a Check to him on the Other: for many Strange Things might fall out for ought he knew before he could reach Italy. Theſe, and ſuch Thoughts as Theſe, brought him by degrees to Himſelf again. While This was in Agitation, the Officers and Soldiers drew into Clubs and Cabals, in Parties; and ſo Diſcourſing freely upon Matters of State and Government, they bolted out their Opinions for Another Change; roaring out of all Meaſure againſt the Roman Soldiers: a Company of Diſſolute Effeminate Wretches (they cry'd!) that would not ſtand ſo much as the Noiſe of a War. Theſe were pretty Fellows indeed, they ſaid, to diſpoſe of Empires; or, in truth, rather to ſell them to the Faireſt Bidder. Can they ever think that we, that after the Fatigues of ſo much Duty and Hard Labour, till we are grown Old under our Arms; —that We, I ſay, will ever ſubmit to an Emperour of their Chuſing, when we have ſo much a Worthier Prince of our Own? Over and above, that if we loſe This Opportunity of Expreſſing our Gratitude for the Generous Obligations Veſpaſian hath laid upon us, 'tis odds we ſhall never have the Fellow of it again. Beſide that Veſpaſian is in Himſelf as much Superiour to Vitellius, with a reſpect to the Character of an Emperour, as We our Selves are to Thoſe that made him One. Have not We run as many Riſques and born as Great a Part in the War, as the German Legion that brought this Uſurper into the Capital City? Are not We as well Skill'd in the Art and Diſcipline of War as They? Now for Veſpaſian, there can be no Diſpute or Competition; for the Senate and the People of Rome are all for him, and will never endure the Licentious Debauches of Vitellius to be put in the Ballance againſt the Modeſty and Temperance of Veſpaſian; which would be the Exchanging of a Gracious

Prince for a Mercyleſs Tyrant. (a) Nor is it to be Expected that the Son Titus, though a Prince of Extraordinary Virtue, ſhould be Choſen in Preference to his Father. But let it ſuffice that it is the Honour and Juſtice of a Prince that Eſtabliſhes the Peace of the Throne. Now if either Maturity of Experience, or Vigour of Youth, may Entitle a Prince to the Choice, you have the One in Veſpaſian, and the Other in Titus: and all the Advantages that attend Wiſdom, Force and Reſolution. It is further to be conſider'd that in Electing the Admirable Father of this Incomparable Son, the Three Imperial Legions and Auxiliaries will be Enforced with the Whole Power of the Eaſt; That Part of Europe that lies out of the reach of Vitellius; and all the Intereſt that Veſpaſian's Friends; his Brother, and his Other Son can make in Italy: the One being Præfect of Rome, a Charge of Great Influence and Credit; eſpecially at the Beginning of a Reign; and the Other ſo Popular, that which way ſoever he went, the Flower of the Nobility would be ſure to ſide with him. But now after All (They cry'd) What if tha Senate it ſelf ſhould put-up Veſpaſian for Emperour, and take the Glory and the Merit of the Action out of our Hands; while We ſtand upon Forms and Niceties to no manner of purpoſe: ſhould not We be finely deceiv'd then? We, that of all Men living have the Greateſt Obligation to him.

The Army preſſes Veſpaſian to take them into his Protection: which with much ado they Obtain'd.

This was the Soldiers Talk among Themſelves, at Firſt only in Knots, and Corners: but their Confidence encreaſing with their Numbers, they came Unanimouſly to the Point; and one and all cry'd-up Veſpaſian, Emperour; begging him at the ſame time to take the Tottering Empire into his Protection. This Great Man had been a long time the Supporter of the Empire; but for the Style of Emperour, he abſolutely refus'd it; (though in that very Refuſal he deſerv'd it) declaring that he had much rather ſpend the Remainder of his Days in the Freedom of a Private Life, then among the Snares and Difficulties of a more Illuſtrious Station. The more Veſpaſian ſtood-off, the more the Officers preſs'd him: till at length, upon his Obſtinate Denial, they came all up to him with their (b) Swords drawn, and threaten'd to Kill him; unleſs he would ſubmit to accept of the Honour that he deſerv'd. He held-off a long time; but in the end, when he ſaw they would not be deny'd, he yielded to the Importunity.

Mucianus urges Veſpaſian to March with his Army againſt Vitellius.

Veſpaſian was no ſooner advanced to the Empire, but Mucianus and the reſt of the Officers that invited him to the Government, with the Whole Army, called out with One Voice to March againſt Vitellius; but Veſpaſian was rather of Opinion for beginning with Alexandria; Ægypt being One of the moſt Neceſſary and Conſiderable Branches of the Empire, in reſpect of the Vaſt Quantities of Corn it produces: inſomuch that if he could but make himſelf Maſter of That Country, he was in Hope that Rome it ſelf would rather turn out Vitellius then run the Hazzard, if they ſtood it out, of Starving for his Sake; as of Neceſſity they muſt without Relief from Ægypt. He deſired alſo an Enforcement of Two Legions that lay at Alexandria to join him.

Of Ægypt and the Situation of it.

He propounded alſo the making of the Province a Secure Place of Retreat in the Worſt of Fortunes. There is hardly any coming at it by Land, and no Ports to the Sea. It is bounded on the Weſt with the Parching Land of Lybia: On the South, Syene divides it from Æthiopia and the Unpaſſable Cataracts of the River Nile: On the Eaſt, the Red-Sea ſerves it for a Rampart as far as the City Coptos; and on the North, it ſtretches out as far as Syria, and That which they call the Ægyptian Sea, and the Coaſt quite thorough wholly deſtitute of Ports: ſo that Nature hath provided for the Security of Ægypt in the very Situation of it. From Peluſium to Syene they reckon Two Thouſand Stadia; and Three Thouſand Six Hundred by Sea, from Plinthine to Peluſium. The Nile is Navigable (c) as far as Elephantine; but, as I ſaid before there is no paſſing further for the Cataracts.

Water,

Water, that he muſt be a very Exact Guide that knows all the Turnings. On the Left Hand it is Encompaſs'd with a Dike, like an Arm about it; on the Right, lies the Iſle of Pharos; which hath been ſo Celebrated for a Famous Sea-mark. The Light of it is ſeen Three Hundred Furlongs off at Sea, and ſerves for a Direction to Mariners what Courſe they are to Steer. About this Iſland there are Mighty Defences of Strong Keys and Thick Walls to break the Violence of the Waves that beat upon that Quarter, and the Rage of the Billows daſhing one upon another makes the Paſſage yet more Hazzardous. But after all Theſe Difficulties in the way, there is not a Safer Port in Nature when you are once over the Bar. The Length of it is Thirty Furlongs, and it is furniſhed with Conveniencies of Storehouſes for all manner of Goods, to be either Imported, or Exported.

The Tower of Pharos; a Famous Sea-Mark.

Veſpaſian was much in the Right when he pitch'd upon Alexandria in Order to the Eſtabliſhment of the Empire: and upon That Occaſion, he gave the Governour Tiberius Alexander to underſtand, that, being prevail'd upon by the Importunity of the Soldiers to take Charge of the Government, he could not do betteer then to deſire the Favour of his Aſſiſtance and Advice in the Adminiſtration. Alexander had no ſooner read the Letter, but with all Frankneſs and Alacrity, he (a) gave the Legions and the People the Oath of Fidelity to Veſpaſian; who took it with the Greateſt Inſtances of Joy and Affection imaginable: being abundantly Satisfy'd before-hand in the Certain Knowledge and Experience of his Honour and Virtue. Alexander in the mean time made a Juſt and a Generous Uſe of the Power that was given him for the Service of the Publique, and apply'd himſelf in the Firſt place to provide Neceſſaries for the Reception of the New Prince.

THE News flew like Lightning every where up and down the Eaſt of Veſpaſian's being advanced to the Empire; and it was ſo Welcome wherever it came, that all the Cities made Holiday upon the Arrival of it, with Vows and Sacrifices for Veſpaſian's Happy Reign.

The News of Veſpaſian's Advancement gives an Univerſal Satisfaction.

The Legions that were Quarter'd in (b) Mæſia and Pannonia, and were lately up in Arms againſt Vitellius, for his Tyrannical Inſolence, took the Oath to Veſpaſian with all the Chearfulneſs in the World,

Upon Veſpaſian's Return from Cæſarea to Berytus, there were ſeveral Embaſſadors from Syria and Other Provinces that met him upon the Way, with Garlands and Gratulatory Addreſſes in the Name of the Cities and People: Mucianus the Governour of Syria among the reſt, with Aſſurances of the Faith and good Affection of all in General; Expreſs'd by Oaths and Otherwiſe, to the Perſon and Authority of Veſpaſian.

Now Veſpaſian being ſo Fortunate in all his Undertakings, that whatever he did, ſucceeded to his Wiſh, he began to bethink himſelf, that ſuch a Concurrence of ſeeming Accidents making for him, look'd liker a Providential Diſpoſition of Things in the Order of Cauſes and Effects, then the Work of Chance; and that it was the Hand of God, not Fortune, that rais'd him up to the Enterprize. It came then into his Head what Strange Prophetical Hints and Touches he had Obſerv'd in the Courſe of his Life; and all Pointing to the ſame End: as a Paſſage particularly of Joſeph's; who had the Confidence in the very Life of Nero, to give Veſpaſian the Title of Emperour. This Remarkable Prediction made ſuch an Impreſſion upon Veſpaſian, (eſpecially from a Perſon that was yet his Priſoner) that calling Mucianus and ſeveral of his Friends and Officers about him, he took Occaſion to make Mention of the Bravery of Joſeph, and how hard he had put them to it at the Siege of Jotapata: and ſo from One Thing to Another till he came to his Predictions; which, ſays Veſpaſian, I took to be only Inventions to keep himſelf in a Whole Skin; till Time and the Event of Things have now made it Evident that they were Inſpirations. And what a Shame is it for me now, ſays Veſpaſian, to treat the Miniſter and the Meſſenger of God that brought me the Tidings of my Preferment, at the Scandalous rate ſtill of a Priſoner?

He had no ſooner paſs'd This Reflection, but Joſeph was immediately ſent for, and ſet at Liberty: from which Generous Gratitude his Officers took their Meaſures what They Themſelves might Expect from ſo Gracious a Maſter, that were his Faithful Friends and Servants. Titus being then preſent, told his Father with Submiſſion, that in barely ſetting Joſeph at Liberty, the Work was but half done; for his Chains ought to be broken as well as taken-off, to pronounce him an Innocent, and to leave him as he found him; according to Common Practice when Men are Wrongfully Impriſon'd: for Otherwiſe he is only diſcharg'd of the Bondage, but the Diſhonour ſticks upon him ſtill. Veſpaſian thought it but Reaſonable, and Order'd his Chains immediately to be cut to pieces with an Ax. So that Joſeph did not only get his Freedom, but the Reputation of a Great Prophet alſo for what he had foretold; and Credit enough to be further believ'd in Whatever he ſhould ſay for the future.

Veſpaſian quits the thought of Alexandria, and takes Antioch in his way to Rome.

WHen Veſpaſian had given the Embaſſadours their Anſwers, and Settled all his Governments, in the Hands of Fit and Careful Officers, he chang'd his Mind, and went to Antioch; and ſo forward to Rome, rather then Alexandria, as he thought to have done; the Latter being Safe and Quiet, and the Other Miſerably Embroil'd by Vitellius, and ſtanding in more need of him of the Two. So he ſent Mucianus over-Land into Italy with an Army of Horſe and Foot, by the way of Cappadocia and Phrygia; for he durſt not venture his Troups upon a Winter-Sea.

He ſends Mucianus into Italy with an Army.

Among Others, there was (a) Antonius Primus, the Governour of Mæſia, with the Third Legion that lay in that Province; who deſir'd nothing more then to come to an Encounter with Vitellius. And ſo Vitellius, on the Other hand, ſent Cæcinna in the Head of a Strong Army againſt him. As he was upon his March for Rome, he met Anthony upon the Borders of Italy not far from Cremona; where he ſtopt at gaze upon the Numbers, the Order and the Diſcipline of the Enemy; but durſt not Engage them. He was now at a ſtand what to do. Fight he durſt not, and he could not run away with Honour: ſo that he choſe the Part of a Deſerter rather then of a Coward. He call'd his Centurions, Tribunes, and in ſhort, all his Officers together, and made uſe of That Occaſion to Enter into a Deſcant upon Veſpaſian and Vitellius, ſtill Derogating from the One, and Elevating the Other; and with a Deſign all this while to draw Vitellius's People over to Veſpaſian. The Former, he ſaid, had but the Name of an Emperour; the Other, the Right and Authority, and the True Stamp of an Imperial Character in his very Perſon: over and above the Odds of Veſpaſian's Choice of Men, and Numbers; to ſuch a degree, in fine, that there was no Contending with him. And if it be ſo, ſays he, why ſhould not We now do the ſame Thing beforehand, by Choice, that we ſhall be forc'd to do but the Next Hour by Neceſſity? Not but that Veſpaſian is able to do his Buſ'neſs, to all manner of Purpoſes, without your Help: Whereas Vitellius is not able to ſtand upon his Own Leggs, or to Protect any Party that adheres to him. Cæcinna ply'd his Argument ſo far, till he gain'd his Point, and carry'd the Soldiers over to Anthony. But the Next Night, Cæcinna's Men, betwixt Repentance for what they had done, and for fear of Puniſhment in caſe Vitellius ſhould get the Better of it, came in a Rage with their Swords drawn up to Cæcinna to kill him; and they had certainly done it, if the Tribunes had not paſſionately interpos'd on his Behalf. So that they ſpar'd his Life; but however Order'd him to be kept in Chains, and ſent away to Vitellius for a Traytour. So ſoon as This came to Anthony's Ear, he preſently Commanded out a Party to fall upon them as Deſerters. They made a ſhort Stand; but after the Firſt Shock, they gave ground, and took their Flight toward Cremona. But Anthony put-in with his Horſe betwixt Them and the Town; and begirting them a-round, made a Great Slaughter upon the Place, and gave the Soldiers the Pillage of the Town. There periſh'd promiſcuouſly cuouſly in This Ravage, Foreign Merchants and Towns-men in abundance; with the Whole Army of Vitellius, to the Number of Thirty Thouſand and Two Hundred Perſons. There fell of Anthony's Men that he brought out of Mœſia, Four Thouſand Five Hundred; who ſetting Cæcinna at Liberty, ſent him away to Veſpaſian with the News of the Victory: where he was receiv'd with Great and Unexpected Honours to ballance the Diſgrace of being Falſe to his Maſter.

Cæcinna ſet at Liberty; and ſent to Veſpaſian with the News of the Victory

When Sabinus, Veſpaſian's Brother, underſtood that Anthony was upon his March toward Rome, it put New Life into him; ſo that drawing together the City-Guards, that Night he ſeiz'd the Capitol: Great Numbers of Perſons of the Firſt Quality coming-in to them the Next Day; and among the reſt his Nephew Domitian, who had a Great hand in the Glory of That Action.

Sabinus ſeizes the Capitol.

Vitellius never troubled his Head about Anthony; but his main Spite was at Sabinus, and the reſt that join'd with him in the Revolt: And being naturally Sanguinary and Cruel; eſpecially where there was Noble Bloud in the Caſe, he ſent a Body of his Own Troups to attaque the Capitol; and there was Great Bravery ſhew'd betwixt Them and Thoſe in the Temple; but in the end, the Germans, overpowring their Adverſaries with Numbers, gain'd the Hill. Domitian and ſeveral Romans of the Higheſt Quality Scap'd in a manner by Miracle; but Sabinus was carry'd to Vitellius, who Order'd him immediately to be put to death; and all the reſt were cut to pieces; the Soldiers ſeizing the Plunder of the Temple, and then ſetting Fire to it.

Anthony came up the Next Day with his Army, aud the Vitellians gave him Battle. They fought in Three ſeveral Parts of the City, and were all Slain. After This, came Vitellius out of his Pallace, Wallowing-Drunk and overcharg'd with a Gluttonous Exceſs, (according to his Cuſtom;) where he was taken up and Dragg'd through the Streets; Vilify'd with all ſorts of Scurrilous Outrages, and in the Concluſion, Stabb'd to death in the Middle of the City. He had now Reign'd Eight Months and Five Days; and ſuch was his Profuſion, that if he had liv'd longer, the Revenue of the Empire would not have anſwer'd the Charge of his Debauches. They reckon upon upward of Fifty Thouſand Men Slain, over and above Thoſe already mention'd: and This Great Action happened upon the Third day of the Month Apellæus.

A Bloudy Battle.

Vitellius Dragg'd thorough the Streets Stark Drunk, and Stabb'd to Death in the City.

Mucianus next day enter'd Rome with his Army: and after ſome ſort of Stop put to the Mercyleſs Rage of Anthony's Soldiers (who were ſtill ſearching in all Corners up and down for Vitellius's Men, whom they Kill'd as faſt as they found them, without ſo much as Examining whether they were Guilty or Innocent) intimated to the People that they ſhould do well to chuſe Domitian for their Governour till his Father came up. But the People being now out of Danger, and Nothing further to fear, would not hear of any Other Governour then Veſpaſian: and ſo crying him up to the Skies with Acclamations, they made a Double Feſtival of it; One, for the Bleſſing of Veſpaſian's coming to the Government; the Other, for their Deliverance from the Tyranny of Vitellius.

The People Declare Every where for Veſpaſian.

Veſpaſian Courted at Alexandria with Addreſſes from all Quarters.

Veſpaſian, at his coming to Alexandria, was entertain'd with the Whole Hiſtory of what had paſs'd at Rome; and ply'd with Gratulatory Embaſſies and Applications from all Quarters, to Joy him of his Exaltation to the Empire. Alexandria is look'd upon as One of the Largeſt Cities in the World, next to Rome it ſelf: and yet upon This Occaſion it was too Little for the Company. The Imperial State of Rome being now Settled and Secur'd; the People Quiet and Eaſy, beyond all Expectation, and the Winter over; Veſpaſian began to bethink himſelf of looking toward the Remainder of Judæa, and to prepare for his Journey to Rome. When he had put every Thing in Order in Alexandria, he ſent away his Son Titus with his Beſt Troups, upon an Expedition againſt Jeruſalem. He went as far as Nicopolis by Land (a matter of Twenty Furlongs from Alexandria:) and then Embarquing his Troups upon Long Boats, paſs'd down the Nile, along the Banks of the (a) Mendeſian Canton, to the City of Thmuis: and went a-ſhore at Tanis. From thence he went to Heracleopolis, and ſo to Peluſium: where he ſtay'd Two Days to refreſh his Troups, and then March'd away Croſs the Deſert, and Encamped by the Temple of Jupiter Caſſius. The Next Day he went to Oſtracine; a Place ſo Extremely Dry, that the Inhabitants have no Water at all but what they fetch from Abroad. CHAP. I.

Three Factions in Jeruſalem. Eleazar began the Breach, by ſetting-up the Zelotes againſt the People. John of Giſchala puts in for himſelf. A Fight betwixt John and Eleazar. An Encounter betwixt John and Simon. The Deplorable State of Jeruſalem, that has neither Humanity left in it, nor Conſcience. The March and Order of Titus's Army.

WHEN Titus had paſs'd the Deſarts betwixt Ægypt and Syria, in ſuch manner as is already ſet forth, he came to Cæſarea; with a Reſolution to draw his Troups together there, and to Form his Army. While he was, as yet, with his Father Veſpaſian at Alexandria, giving Orders about the Adminiſtration of the Empire which God had put into their Hands; the Factions in Jeruſalem were divided into Three Parties, and each againſt the Other: which, for an Ill Matter, was Well enough, to ſee a Common Enemy doing Juſtice upon it ſelf. As for the Domineering Faction of the Zelotes (whoſe Inſolence was certainly the Ruine of This City) we have ſpoken both of the Riſe and Encreaſe of it very particularly elſewhere: and it was no more, in ſhort, then One Sedition bred out of Another. It had ſomewhat in it of the Rage of a Wild Beaſt, that, for want of other Matter to work upon, preys upon its Own Bowels, rather then not be doing ſome Miſchief or Other.

Three Factions in Jeruſalem.

Eleazar the Son of Simon was the Firſt that began the Separation in the Temple, by ſetting-up the Zelotes againſt the People, upon the Pretence of being wonderfully Offended at the Daily Inſolencies of John of Giſchala; but at the ſame time doing the ſame Cruel Things Himſelf, and in truth, the Main Exception was no more then This: that the Greater Tyrant of the Two could not bring his Heart down to ſubmit to the Leſs: So that betwixt an Inſatiable Thirſt after Power, and an Ambitious Impatience of having any Body above him, he fell-off from his Companions and ſet-up for himſelf, with Judas the Son of Chelcias, and Simon the Son of Ezron; Two Perſons of Great Quality and Intereſt; and likewiſe with Ezechias the Son of Chobar, a Man Nobly Deſcended; and every One of them a Train of Zelotes at his Heels. With This Party they took Poſſeſſion of the Inner-Temple, and put Guards upon the Sacred Porches and Doors; in confidence that the Proviſions of the Place, by reaſon of the Multitude of their Daily Oblations, would ſupply them with all Neceſſaries: and putting no Difference, in fine, as to the Common Uſe of Things, betwixt Sacred and Prophane. Being thus Poſted, the Only Thing they fear'd was Want of Men for the Execution of any Conſiderable Deſign. John was much the Stronger of the Two; but what Eleazar wanted in Number, was abundantly made good to him by the Advantage of the Place; for he had his Enemy under him. Now John could not attempt any Thing upon him but to his Loſs; ſo that betwixt the Fear of doing a Raſh Thing on the One Hand, and the Impatience of Standing ſtill to do nothing at all on the Other, he was not a little divided how to behave himſelf. But his Stomach and Animoſity carry'd it in the End however from his Diſcretion; and he made ſeveral Attacques both with Darts and Other Weapons of That Quality, till the Temple was polluted with the Gore of Dead Bodies.

Eleazar began the Breach; by Setting-up the Zelotes againſt the People.

A Fight betwixt John and Eleazar.

On the Other ſide, Simon the Son of Gorias, whom the People in their Diſtreſs had Invited and Entertained for their Governour and Protectour, having in his Poſſeſſion the Upper-Town, and the Greater Part of the Lower; carry'd-on the Aſſault againſt John and his Party with the Greater Vigour, when he ſaw how he was preſs'd at the ſame time from above by Eleazar. But John had the ſame Advantage of Simon, that Eleazar had of John; who effectually had a Double War upon him, and as much the Better of the One as the Worſe of the Other: for juſt ſo much as Eleazar was too Hard for John, whom he had under him; ſo much was he too hard for Simon, who was below Him again. So that John had little or no Difficulty to repulſe the Attempts of Simon from the Lower Ground: as he defended himſelf the beſt he could from Eleazar that was over his Head, with Slings and Machines to caſt Darts and Stones. And Theſe Engines did Execution not only upon the People in Arms; but upon Thoſe alſo that came out of Devotion to Worſhip. For it muſt be acknowledg'd that Theſe Miſcreants, even in the Outrage of their Impieties, gave admittance to All that offer'd themſelves upon the account of Religion; ſaving only that the Jews were more Expos'd to ſtrict Searches and Examinations. And for the Strangers that were ſo Happy as to ſcape the Malice of a Military Fury; they fell here and there by Caſualty and Miſchance: That is to ſay; by the Random-ſhot of Stones and Launces, that reach'd the very Altar, and cut-off the Sacrificers Themſelves in the Exerciſe of their Holy Function, together with a Multitude of Common Worſhippers. Some, that came from all Quarters of the Earth out of Devotion to Worſhip in This Holy Place, fell Themſelves the Sacrifices; and defiled That Altar with their Bloud, that not only the Greeks, but even the Wildeſt of Barbarians had a Veneration for. The Dead Bodies of Strangers and of Natives; Perſons Holy and Prophane, were here promiſcuouſly Confounded, and their Bloud flowing up to the very Altar.

The Temple Polluted with Bloud.

Ah, Miſerable, Miſerable City! The Fire and Sword of the Romans, when they enter'd Thee by Force, and endeavour'd the Purging of thee by Flames for the Iniquities of thy Faction and Apoſtacy, with all the Deſolation that enſu'd upon it: All This, I ſay, was Nothing to the Miſery of thy Preſent Caſe. Thou wert no longer the Seat of God, after turning his Holy Houſe, by thy Civil Broils, into a Shambles or a Common Charnal-Houſe; nor could'ſt Thou ever expect to come-off Unpuniſh'd for Theſe Impious Provocations. But it is not yet Impoſſible; not Impoſſible, (I ſay) by a True Repentance to appeaſe the Incenſed Juſtice of a Righteous God that laid This Heavy Judgment upon thee. But This were better let alone; for Private Paſſions and Complaints are not the Bus'neſs of an Hiſtorian: ſo that I ſhall betake my ſelf to my Text, and proceed to the Matter of Fact that follow'd upon This Uproar.

Jeruſalem (as I have ſaid already) was divided into Three Factions. Eleazar and his Party, that had the Charge of the Firſt Fruits and Oblations, got Drunk and fell upon John. John Sally'd-out upon Simon; and the People that aſſiſted him with Proviſions, againſt Himſelf and Eleazar. When John happen'd to be Attacqu'd at the ſame time by Eleazar and Simon, Both together, he divided his Forces, and held Thoſe in play that Aſſaulted him on the City-ſide, with Darts from the Tops of the Porches; plying Thoſe in the Temple above him with Stones and Arrows from his Machines. When at any time his Enemies over-head gave him a little Reſpite (as they did frequently, when Eleazar and his People were either Tir'd or Drunk) he was then at liberty to make Stronger Sallies upon Simon and his Complices; and ſtill as he beat him further and further into the Town, he burnt all before him: Magazines, Granaries, Stores, and all Houſes indifferently with whatever was in them, that ſtood in his Way. Upon his Retreat, Simon follow'd him upon the Heel: and then it was His Turn to do the ſame thing over again. They could have done no more if they had been in a Direct Conſpiracy for the Betraying of Jeruſalem to the Romans, by putting it out of Condition of Defence, in deſtroying all that was Neceſſary to Preſerve it. And to Encreaſe the Calamity, Every Thing was burnt to the Ground quite round the Temple; the City turn'd into a Deſart by the very Natives of the Place, and a Field of Battle One againſt Another. The Proviſion of Corn, in fine, and Other Neceſſaries ſufficient to have Maintain'd a Siege for ſeveral Years, was almoſt totally Conſum'd; which led inevitably to a Famine, and the Ruine of the City that they brought upon Themſelves.

The Deplorable State of Jeruſalem.

Jeruſalem in the mean time, betwixt the Faction within the Town, and the Beſiegers without, was like a Great Body Worry'd and Torn to pieces for a Prey. Old Men and Women under ſuch an Aſtoniſhment for what they ſaw and ſuffer'd, that they pray'd for the Succeſs of their very Enemies, the Romans, and for a Forreign War in Exchange for a Civil? They lay under the Impreſſion of a moſt Scandalous Dread and Terrour. It was now paſt Adviſing-Time, and there was no Place left either for Repentance, Compoſition, or Flight. All Paſſages were Guarded, and the Heads of the Factions, how Mortal Enemies ſoever in Other Caſes, were all of a Mind yet in the Agreement of Killing any Man that deſerv'd to live. They ſuffer'd not One Man to ſcape, that was but ſuſpected to be a Well-willer to the Romans; but they were all Treated like Common Enemies. The Clamour of Shouts, and the Claſhing Claſhing of Arms was heard Day and Night. The Fear it ſelf of Evils to come was a Great Miſery: but then the Senſe of Thoſe Evils being come upon them was much a Greater, and their Daily Lamentations were never yet without a juſt Ground to Work upon. Their Fears made them Smother their Sorrows. Grief is Dumb when it comes to be Stupifying; and That is the Tormenting Affliction that lies gnawing, like a Canker, at the Heart, without making any Noiſe. There was no ſuch Thing left as Reverence for the Living. The Relation was loſt betwixt Superiour and Inferiour; and as little regard had to the Humanity of Burying the Dead. And what was the Reaſon of all This, but an Univerſal Deſperation; for he that hath Nothing to Hope for, hath Nothing to Fear. Every Man that was not of the Faction, gave himſelf for loſt, and carry'd his Life in his Hand, as if he were the Next Moment to Die. The Faction all this while fought on, with heaps of Carcaſſes under their Feet, in a kind of Triumphant Vanity of Oſtentation; as if the Horrour of the Spectacle had made the Living as Hard and Inſenſible as the Dead. But their Heads and their Hearts were bent upon Wickedneſs: and whatever came into their Thought that they were able to Compaſs, let it be never ſo Bloudy and Cruel, they made no Scruple to Execute it. Witneſs John's Perverting to Prophane Uſes Thoſe Sacred Materials that were ſet apart for the Service of God's Houſe. There was once upon a Time a Reſolution taken up by the People and the High-Prieſts, to raiſe the Temple Twenty Cubits Higher, and to carry-up an Arch to Support the Work. To This End King Agrippa, with Incredible Charge and Labour, brought from Mount Libanus certain, Admirable Pieces of Timber, both for Length, and Size. But the War breaking-out interrupted the Deſign. So that John having Occaſion for the Materials, had the Trees cut-out into Lengths for his Own Proper Uſe, and then fram'd into Turrets for his Security and Defence againſt Eleazar. They were raiſed along the Wall to the Weſtward over againſt the Great Hall, as the Only Place Capable of ſuch a Structure, by reaſon of ſo many Stair-Caſes in the Way. John Flatter'd himſelf that This Impious Contrivance of his would have laid his Enemies at his Feet. But God in his Providence Diſappointed him, by bringing the Romans-in upon him before he could perfect his Work.

Neither Humanity nor Conſcience.

When Titus had gotten together One Part of his Army, and Order'd the Remainder of it up to Jeruſalem, he went to Cæſarea; where he had with him, over and above the Three Legions, that had formerly made ſuch Havock in Judæa under his Father, the Twelfth Legion alſo; which was nevertheleſs Brave for That Unlucky Encounter under Ceſtius; but on the Other ſide, burning with Impatience for the Opportunity of a Revenge for That Diſaſter. He Order'd the Fifth Legion to meet him by the way of Ammaus; and the Tenth, by Jericho: while he Himſelf March'd with the reſt, in Conjunction with a Body of Royal Auxiliaries, Larger then ever heretofore, and a Great Number of Syrians. The Detachments that were ſent by Veſpaſian under Mucianus into Italy, out of the Four Legions, he made Good out of Two Thouſand Choice Men of the Alexandrian Army that he brought along with him, and Three Thouſand more that follow'd him from the Euphrates: and there was the Beſt of Friends alſo, both for Integrity and Councel, Tiberius Alexander, formerly the Governour of Ægypt, but now made Choice of to Command the Army; being the Firſt Man that Own'd and Stood-up for Veſpaſian in the Infancy of his Government: enter'd into a League with him, and ſtood Firm to it in deſpite of all the Hazzards of an Uncertain Fortune. He was likewiſe Qualify'd with all the Natural Advantages for Martial Undertakings that Reſolution, Generoſity and Wiſdom could give a Man.

TITUS being now advancing into an Enemy's Country, This was the Order of his March. The Auxiliaries went firſt; after Them, the Pioneers; and in the next Place, Thoſe that were to Mark-out the Camp; which were follow'd with the Officers Baggage, and a Convoy: and Then, came Titus Himſelf with his Guards; the Choiceſt of his Men, and his Enſign-Bearers about him; a Body of Horſe following Them in the Head of the Machines. The Next in courſe were the Tribunes, and other Officers, with a Train of Choice-men under their Command: the Roman Eagle after Them, with the Enſigns of the Legions about it, and Trumpets before them; them; the Body of the Army marching in Rank and File, Six in Front; and the Common Soldiers, every Man following the Legion he belong'd to, with their Luggage before them. The Mercenaries and their Guards brought up the Rear. In This Order Titus advanced according to the Method of the Roman Diſcipline, by the way of Samaria up to Gophna; a Place that his Father Veſpaſian had formerly taken: and there he found a Garriſon, where he took-up his Lodging That Night, and proſecuted his March next Morning to a Place that the Jews call (a) The Valley of Thorns, near the Village of Gabath Saul, or, The Valley of Saul; where he Encamped That Evening near Thirty Furlongs from Jeruſalem.

Titus Marches with a Party to take a View of Jerulal m.

At This Place Titus put himſelf in the Head of ſome Six Hundred Choice-Horſe, and led them toward Jeruſalem to take a View of the Town, and learn what he could of the State and Diſpoſition of the Jews. For being well-aſſured that the People were altogether for Peace, and as weary every jot of their Oppreſſors as they were of the Oppreſſion it ſelf; and that they wanted nothing (in fine) but Strength and Opportunity for a Revolt; he did not know but that upon the Sight of Him and His Army, they might perhaps bethink themſelves of bringing the Matter to Terms of Accommodation before it came to Blows. With This Phancy in his Head Titus advanced toward the City; and ſo long as he went forward in the Ready way to the Walls, there was not One Creature appear'd upon the Battlements. But upon croſſing over toward the Turret call'd Pſephinos, there ſally'd out a vaſt Number of Jews from the Gate over againſt the Sepulchre of Helena, on the Quarter they call the Woman's Tower, that brake quite through the Middle of Titus's Body; and cutting-off the Communication betwixt the Two divided Parts, they could not relieve one another. In This Confuſion the Jews ſingled out Titus, with a very ſmall Number of his People about him; in a Place, where there was no going forward for the Encloſures, Gardens, and Ditches betwixt Him and the Wall: and his Retreat was Intercepted, on the Other Hand, by a Strong Body of the Enemy that was gotten betwixt Him and his Own People. But Titus's Men not knowing the Danger their General was in, and believing him to be yet Safe and in the Croud, ſhifting for Himſelf; they had Nothing more to do, they thought, but Every Man to look to One, and ſo to follow their Captain. Titus finding, in This Extremity, that he had nothing but his Sword and his Courage left him to truſt to, call'd out to his Fellow-Soldiers to follow him, and in the ſame Inſtant ſpurr'd deſperately into the Enemies Body to force his way thorough to the reſt of his Men. Now This was a Time and Action to give all People to Underſtand how far the Providence of God interpoſes in the Event of Wars, and in the Perſonal Preſervation of Emperours and Princes. For Titus, that came not out (as I ſaid) to fight a Battle, but to make a Diſcovery, had not provided himſelf of Arms, either for his Head or his Body; and yet not One Dart or Arrow, of all thoſe Showers that were thrown againſt him, once touch'd him; but were cary'd-off from the Mark, as if they had been deſign'd to Miſs it. Titus in the mean time clearing his Paſſage on Both ſides with his Sword in his Hand, Overbearing all before him, and Trampling his Enemies under his Horſe's Feet. This Fearleſs Reſolution of Cæſar's drew the Rage of the whole Party upon him with Fury and Clamour: crying out One to Another to fall upon him, as the Only Check to their Succeſſes. But which way ſoever Titus turn'd, the Jews fled before him: and yet at the ſame time, Others preſſing him Flank and Rear; and his Companions all the while ſticking cloſe and bravely to him. They found by This time that there was no way to come-off but by One Seaſonable Generous Charge, quite thorough and thorough. They made the Puſh immediately; wherein One of Titus's Friends was kill'd, Horſe and Man; Another Overthrown and Slain, and his Horſe taken and carry'd-off: while Titus, with the Remainder of his People, got back again to his Camp; without ſo much as One Wound. The Jews took ſuch Heart upon This Temporary Advantage, that they look'd upon it as an Earneſt of Greater Things to follow, but their Hopes Deceiv'd them.

Domeſtique Factions are United by a Forreign War. The Roman Soldiers being Surpriz'd without their Arms, are Beaten from their Camp. A Skirmiſh betwixt the Jews and the Romans. Titus Miſſing; and the Romans at their Wits End to know what was become of him. The Jews make a Running Fight of it.

UPON the Coming up of a Legion That Night from Ammaus to joyn Cæſar, he Marched away Next Morning Early to Scopos: a Place Seven Stadia, to the Northward, from the City. It ſtands low, and in a Fair Proſpect both of the Town and of the Temple. (And ſo properly enough called Scopos.) He order'd Two Legions to Encamp upon the Place, and the Fifth Legion to withdraw Three Stadia further off; where they might Intrench without any Danger from the Enemy, being already weary'd off their Legs with a Tedious Nights-March. Theſe Legions were no ſooner at Work upon the Orders, but up comes the Tenth Legion from Jericho; a Place lately Taken and Garriſon'd by Veſpaſian. This Legion was appointed to Encamp Six Stadia to the Eaſt of Jeruſalem, and the Mount of Olives; which is over againſt the City, and the Valley of Cedron betwixt them.

The Factions in the Town went-on Tearing one another to pieces, as the Bittereſt Adverſaries in the World; till the Dread of a Forreign War and a Common Enemy made them Friends again. For, upon the very Sight of the Roman Camp, and the Order of it, the Three Seditious Parties agreed the Matter, and piec'd again; Reaſoning with themſelves upon the Equity and Neceſſity of ſuch a Compoſition; and Expoſtulating One with Another, after This Manner. What will be the End of This Buſineſs do ye think, if we ſtand ſtill to ſee our ſelves Surrounded with Forts and Troups; our Lives and Liberties at Mercy; and we all this while Coop'd-up within Walls, and our Arms a-croſs, the Tame Spectators of a Licentious War, to the Advantage of our Enemies, and our Own Ruine. Nay, (ſays Another) we are only Valiant againſt Our ſelves, and in cutting one another's Throats to make way for the Romans to a Conqueſt without Bloud. Upon This, they gather'd into Parties and Cabals; and in That very Inſtant betaking themſelves to their Arms, made a Furious Excurſion croſs the Valley upon the Tenth Legion, with horrid Clamours and Outcries, as they were Intrenching their Camp. This Sally was ſuch a Surprize to the Romans, that they were half diſtracted at it: and it was ſo much the Greater, upon an Opinion, both that the Jews durſt not offer at it, and that their Diviſions had made them Incapable of ſuch an Agreement. But the Soldiers, in fine, being at Work without their Arms, the Jews fell upon them at Unawares; whereupon Every Man quitted his Poſt: ſome ran quite away; others fled to their Arms, but were cut-off before they could make uſe of them. Upon the Credit of This Victory ready to their Hand, the Jews came flowing-in ſtill more and more; and though they were not in truth very Numerous, their Good Fortune made them appear ſo, both to the Romans and to Themſelves. Of all Nations under the Heavens, the Romans are certainly the People that beſt underſtand the Art and Diſcipline of War, and diſcharge their Military Exerciſes and Duties with the Beſt Conduct and Grace: and yet upon the Aſtoniſhment of This Unaccountable Surprize, they trembled; and turning their Backs, the Jews follow'd them upon the Purſuit: and upon turning their Heads as any of the Enemy came up with them, ſome they Stopp'd or Repuls'd; others they Kill'd, or Wounded; for in the Heat of their Rage they kept themſelves upon no manner of Guard. But as the Numbers encreas'd on the One Hand; ſo of Neceſſity muſt the Confuſion on the Other; till in the End the Romans were forc'd totally to Abandon their Camp: and the whole Legion had been entirely cut-off, if Titus had not come in the Preciſe Minute to their Succour; and betwixt Reproaches of Cowardiſe on the One ſide, and Exemplary Bravery on the Other, put a Stop to their Flight. Titus took This Opportunity of Joyning the Fugitives, with a Party of Choice Men he had about him of his Own; and Charging the Jews in Flank, he kill'd ſeveral of them upon the Spot; wounded more, and drove the whole Body down into the Valley in Great Diſorder: and not without a Conſiderable Loſs of Men, before they could gain the Other ſide of the Bottom. Upon their paſſing the Valley they made a Stand, and maintain'd a Fight with the Romans a-croſs it till Mid-day. In the Afternoon, Titus enforced the Legion with the Troups he brought to Succour it; and poſting Parties up and down to ſecure the Romans againſt Excurſions, he Order'd the Remainder of his Forces up the Mountain, to Encamp and Fortify upon the Top of it.

The

The Jews that were within diſtance of Obſerving This Motion from the Walls, took it for a Direct Flight: and one of their Intelligencers gave to Underſtand as much by a Signal from the Town, by ſhaking a Garment in the Air, as a Way of Intelligence Concerted among Themſelves. Upon This Intimation, the Jews ruſh'd out in ſuch an Outrageous Fury, that they look'd liker a Herd of Wild-Beaſts then a Multitude of Men. The Violence was ſo Impetuous that not ſo much as One Man in the Contrary Party durſt ſtand the Shock: but they were all driven, as if it had been by a Blow from an Engine; ſome One way; ſome, Another: but preſſing up the Mountain all that was poſſible for Refuge. About half way up the Hill, Titus made a Stand, with a few of his Generous Reſolute Friends about him: who, out of the Veneration they had for the Perſon and Dignity of the Emperour, beſought him not to Expoſe any longer his Own Sacred Life againſt the Worthleſs Lives of a Deſperate Rabble of Jews; whoſe Condition was ſuch, that Death was the Beſt Thing could befall them; but rather to Conſult his Own Quality and Safety, minding him that he was not There in the Circumſtances of a Soldier, but in the Character of the Sovereign Maſter of the World; and that it was not for Him to think of Standing alone, when the Foundations of the Earth ſunk under him. Titus took no more Notice of what they ſaid then if he had not heard it; but ſtood upon his Guard againſt all Oppoſers, and Encounter'd all Aſſaults: Cutting ſome over the Face; Killing others that preſs'd upon him, and forcing ſome again down the Mountain into the Valley. The Vigour and the Reſolution of This Prince kept them in ſome ſort of Awe; though not enough to fright them into the City again: but Opening to the Right and Left, they attacqu'd his People on Each Hand of him; while Titus galling Them in the Flank, gave ſome Obſtruction to the Purſuit.

When the Romans from their Camp above took Notice what Havock was made of their Companions below, it ſtruck them with ſuch a Horrour and Amazement, that the whole Legion diſpers'd upon it; taking for granted that the Romans were not able to ſtand before the Jews, and that Titus Himſelf had quitted the Field; or his Soldiers (they thought) would never have forſaken him. While they were in the Diſtraction of This Panick Terrour, running up and down like Madmen, they knew not Why, nor Whither, there was an Alarum given to the Whole Legion, by ſome that had ſeen Titus labouring for Life in the Middle of his Enemies; calling upon them with Outcrys to haſten away to the Reſcue of their General. This Reproach, betwixt the Shame and the Conſcience of having abandon'd their Commander, tranſported them to ſo revengeful a Rage that, without any further Thought of ſhifting for Themſelves, they fell with all their Might upon the Jews, and drove them away before them down the Brow of the Mountain. Not but that they made their Retreat Fighting too: and for a while diſputed Every Foot of Ground they loſt; till the Romans, by the Advantage of the Higher Station, forced them all down into the Valley. Titus preſs'd hard upon Thoſe he had to do withall, and ſo ſent the Legion back to make an End of their Trenches; He Himſelf ſtaying with his Own People about him, to keep the Enemy at a diſtance. Now if I may be allow'd to ſpeak the Juſt Truth of the Matter, without Flattery, Envy, or Detraction, This was the Second Time that Titus ſav'd This Legion in the ſame Day. And the Soldiers were now at liberty to Fortify and Settle their Camp.

CHAP. IV.

The Paſchal-Feaſt at Hand. A Curſed Deſign under the Cover of Religion. The Three Factions Contracted into Two. Titus moves towards Jeruſalem, and Orders the Levelling of the Paſſes.

THE Jews had no ſooner a little breathing-while from the Hoſtilities of the Romans, but they fell preſently all to pieces again among Themſelves. The Paſchal-Feaſt, or the Feaſt of Unleavened-Bread being now at hand: That is to ſay, the Fourteenth of the Month Xanthicus; which is the Day, from whence the Jews date their Deliverence out of Ægypt: Eleazar cauſed the Temple-Gate to be ſet Open for a Free Entrance to all People that come up to Worſhip. John made uſe of This Religious Occaſion, and Pretext, for a Cover to a moſt Execrable Wickedneſs that he had in his Heart. He pick'd out a Select Number of his Own People that were the leaſt known, and moſt of them Licentious and Prophane: and Theſe he ſecretly intermingled with the Worſhippers; giving them Daggers, and Private Arms under their Coats, with Inſtructions how to behave themſelves. The Temple was immediately diately all in a Tumult both within and without; and this Uproar look'd upon as a General Deſign upon the Whole Multitude, by thoſe that were not of the Plot. But Eleazar and the Zelotes knew better; and that the Malice of this Exploit was principally levell'd at them: and thereupon the Guards drew-off from the Gates; others leapt down from the Towers without ſtriking a Blow, and crept into the Temple-Vaults to hide themſelves. The Common People that betook themſelves to the Altar, were miſerably deſtroy'd; ſome of them ſqueez'd and trampled to death in the Croud; others lay weltering in their Bloud up and down, or their Brains beaten out with Swords and Cudgels. Where any Man had a Pique at another, it was but making him one of the Contrary Faction to cover his Revenge; and a Particular Grudge was Pretence enough to take away any Man's Life, or to call him a Zelote. But after all theſe Barbarous Inhumanities upon the Innocent, the Guilty found ſome ſort of Quarter yet; in a Connivance at their Eſcapes out of thoſe Vaults and Holes, where they had abſconded. The Zelotes being now abſolute Maſters of the Inner-Temple, preſs'd harder and harder ſtill upon Simon: the Factions being now reduc'd to Two Diviſions that were in Three before.

The Three Factions Reduced to Two.

Titus was at this time thinking to Decamp from Scopos, and to Advance nearer Jeruſalem. So that in order to his Removal, he Poſted a Competent Strength of his Beſt Troups to prevent and to Encounter Inroads, and gave it in Charge to another Body of Men, to ſee all the Ways levell'd betwixt That and Jeruſalem. Upon this, the Hedges, the Walls, and the Country-People's Fences about their Gardens were all taken away, and the Trees cut down round about; Fruit-Trees and all, though never ſo choice: the Hollows all fill'd up; the Crags plain'd, and the whole Tract of Ground from Scopos to Herod's Sepulcre, and the Pool of Serpents, [otherwiſe call'd Bethara,] all made ſmooth and even.

Titus moves from Scopos toward Jeruſalem.

And gives Order for the Filling-up and Levelling all the Paſſes.

The Jews lay their Heads together to put a Cheat upon the Romans. Titus has no Faith in the Pretence. The Jews out-wit the Romans. Titus Threatens his Men with Martial Law; but upon the Officers Mediation Titus Grants them their Pardon. The Siege of Jeruſalem.

THE Jews had at this Time a Plot in their Heads how to put a Trick upon the Romans. Some of the Boldeſt of the Party made a Step out of the Town, a little beyond the Place they call the Women's Towers; upon a Pretence, that they were forc'd out of the City, for fear of a Party within it that was for Peace; and that they durſt not Venture any further for fear of the Romans: but there they kept themſelves as cloſe, and as much out of ſight as they could. There was at the ſame time another Party upon the Walls roaring out as loud as they could, and in the Name of the Inhabitants, for a Peace and an Alliance with the Romans: imploring them at the ſame time to come over to them, and they would Open them the Gates. And for the Better Grace of this Impoſture, they Counterfeited a Squabble and a Conteſt among themſelves: ſome pretending to preſs out to the Romans; and others caſting Stones at them to hinder them: and ſtill perſiſting in appearance either by Fair Means or by Foul to make their way. At this rate, after ſeveral Feigned Attempts and Repulſes, they went their way back again like Madmen at the Diſappointment. The Cheat went down well enough with the Common Soldiers, who look'd upon the Town to be as good as their Own already; and preſs'd ſo eagerly to be in Action, as if there had been nothing wanting but the Ceremony of Opening the Gates to put them in Poſſeſſion of it. But Titus had no Faith at all in the Pretext of this Invitation; having made them an Offer by Joſeph, but the Day before, of as much as they ſeem'd now to deſire, and they rejected the Propoſal. So that Titus commanded his Soldiers every Man of them to ſtand to their Arms and to manitain their Poſts. But in the mean while, ſome of thoſe that were employed upon the Trenches, betook themſelves to their Weapons in a Hurry, and ran toward the Gates. The Jews that pretended to be driven out of the Town, let them paſs by without any Interruption; till they were got up within a little of ſome of the Towers near the Port: and then following them cloſe upon the Rear, they hemm'd them-in within Reach of Stones, Darts, and all manner of Shot of that quality from the Walls: where great Numbers of them were Kill'd and Wounded; being ſo pent up by thoſe that preſs'd upon the Backs of them, that there was no getting clear of the Wall: beſide that betwixt Shame and Confuſion, on the one Hand, for their Diſobedience; and the Fear of Puniſhment for it, on the other, they were hard'ned into a Reſolution of Proſecuting what they had begun. But, in fine, after a long Diſpute, and with an equal Loſs on both Sides, the Romans in the Concluſion brake thorough the Body of the Jews; who yet purſu'd them in their Retreat with Lances and other ſuch like Weapons, as far as the Sepulcre of Helena: and not without Inſolent and Contemptuous Reproches upon the Romans for being outwitted, and made ſuch Fools of. This they did, waving their Bucklers over their Heads; leaping and dancing all the way they went, with Shouts of Joy and Triumph.

The Jews Outwit the Romans.

When the Romans were thus come-off, their Officers treated them with Menaces and Scorn; and Titus Himſelf received them with a Speech of Reſentment and Indignation, to This following Purpoſe. How comes it, ſays he, That the Jews, that have nothing but their Diſpairs for their Directors, ſhould yet Menage their Affairs with ſo much Conſideration, Stratagem, and Succeſs? The Queſtion is anſwer'd in one Word: They live in Obedience to their Superiours, and in Good Will and Union one with another: Whereas the Romans, that have been hitherto ſo Famous for their Excellent Order and Diſcipline, and conſequently for their Good Fortune, are now fall n-off, and deſtroy'd by the Head-ſtrong Intemperances of their own Folly, in making War without Officers; and, which is worſt of all, Cæſar Himſelf to be a Spectator of This. What a Scandal will this be to the very Rules and Methods of Arms! Or what will my Father ſay, do ye think, when he ſhall come to hear of it: a General, that in the whole Courſe of a Long, and a Military Life, never met with any thing like it before? Now ſuch is the Severity of Martial Law, that it makes it Capital for any Man to depart from the Strict Rule of Diſcipline, even in a ſmall Matter; but in this Caſe, the Whole Army is a Deſerter. And be it known to you all, that, according to the Strictneſs of the Roman Conduct, Victory it ſelf is a Scandal when it is gain'd by Extravagant Means.

Titus gives his Men a Severe Reproof: and threatens to deliver them up to the Law.

Titus deliver'd theſe Words with ſome ſort of Indignation; which gave the Officers to underſtand, that the Law was to be Executed: and, upon this, the Whole Body of the Offenders gave themſelves for loſt; being ſatisfy'd in their Conſciences that they had deſerv'd the Juſtice they fear'd. But, in this Interval, the Legions did in a manner beſet Titus; with Petitions and Interceſſions on the Behalf of their Unfortunate Companions: imploring his Mercy toward the Failings of a Few Raſh People for the ſake of a Greater Number that ſtood Firm; and upon an Aſſurance that they would attone by their Future Services for their Paſt Faults. Cæſar found his Intereſt, as well as his Inclination, in Complying with This Mediation; for though in the Caſe of a Single Perſon it may be requiſite to Uſe Severity, the ſame Reaſon does not hold yet in a Multitude. Titus, in fine, forgave and forgot all that was paſt; upon Condition, that his People would be Honeſter and Wiſer for the time to come: and from thence forward he ſet his Thoughts at Work how to Revenge himſelf on the Treacherous Jews.

But the Soldiers Interpoſe on their Behalf, and Cæſar Pardons them.

The Siege of Jeruſalem.

His Firſt Bus'neſs was to lay all Level betwixt himſelf and the Town; which was the Work only of Four Days: after which, he Order'd the Beſt of his Troups to advance towards the Ramparts, betwixt North and Weſt: the Foot drawn-up in Seven Battalions, and the Horſe in Three Squadrons, with Archers betwixt them. This being a Force ſufficient to prevent or repel all Excurſions; the Baggage of the Three Legions, and the Train thereunto belonging were all out of Danger.

Titus encamped at the Diſtance of Two Stadia from the City, over-againſt the Tower call'd Pſephinos; upon That Angle of the Wall, where it Winds-off from the North to the Weſtward; intrenching alſo another Part of his Army toward the Tower Hippicos, ſome Two Furlongs likewiſe from the City: keeping the Tenth Legion ſtill where it was, upon Mount Olivet.

The Deſcription of Jeruſalem. Three Walls.

THE City of Jeruſalem was ſurrounded with Three Walls; ſaving only upon the Quarter toward the Inacceſſible Valleys, where there was but One. It was Erected upon Two Hills; the One directly Fronting the Other, and a Deep Vally Vally betwixt them; all Cover'd with Houſes. The Mountain that the Upper-Town ſtands upon is much the Higher and the Steeper of the Two: and for the Strength of the Situation, King David the Father of Solomon that Erected the Temple, gave it the Name formerly of the Fortreſs or Caſtle; and This is it which we call at This Day the Upper-Market.

The Lower-Town.

The Lower-Town is ſeated upon Another Hill that bears the Name of Acra, with a Steep Declivity round about it. There was formerly Another Hill alſo over-againſt This; ſomewhat Lower then the Acra, and divided from it by a Large Vally: but in the Time of the Aſamonæans, their Princes fill'd up This Bottom; and cutting-off from the Hill Acra, they join'd the Town to the Temple: by which means it overlook'd, and commanded all the reſt.

The Vally of Tyropæon, and the Fountain of Siloe.

The Name of the Vally aforeſaid, that ſeparates the Upper-Town from the Lower, is Tyropæon; and it ſtretches as far as to the Fountain of Siloe: that affords an Excellent Water to drink, and Great Plenty of it.

There are likewiſe without the Town Two Other Mountains, next to Inacceſſible, by the Crags and Precipices every where round about them.

The Old Wall Impregnable.

The Oldeſt of the Three Walls was Extremely Strong, by reaſon of the Depth of the Vally below, and the Over-hanging of the Rock from above, whereupon it was Erected. And beſide the Natural Advantage of the Situation, it had all the Helps that David and Solomon, and ſeveral Other Princes, could contribute to the further Strength'ning of it by Art, Induſtry, and Expence. It began on That ſide, at the Tower Hippicos; and ſo (a) to Another Tower call'd the Galleries, running along by the Town-Houſe, to the Weſt Porch of the Temple. It paſs'd on the other ſide, reckoning from the ſame Place, by (b) Bethſo, down to the Eſſene-gate; and ſo Southward, by the Fountain of Siloe; where it ſtrikes-off to the Eaſtward, toward the Pool of Solomon; and thence by Ophlas, to the Eaſt Porch of the Temple.

The Second Wall begins at Genath, a Gate belonging to the Former Wall; and ſo runs-on, upon the North-ſide of the City, to the Fort Antonia.

The (c) Third Wall began at the Tower Hippicos, and ſo ran Northward to That of Pſephinos; over-againſt Helena's Sepulchre, the Queen of Adiabena, and Daughter of King Izates: keeping along by the Royal Caves, from the Tower at the Corner toward That which they call the Fuller's Monument; whence it came-up to the Old Wall in the Vale of Cedron: and This was the Compaſs of it. This Wall was the Work of Agrippa, for the Security of that part of the Town that he had built; which was otherwiſe Naked, and Defenceleſs. The City was by this time grown ſo Populous, that the Place was too narrow for the Inhabitants: ſo that by little and little they crept out into a kind of Suburbs; and on the North-ſide of the Temple next the Hill, their Buildings encreas'd extremely.

There was a Fourth Mountain that fronted Antonia; with Ditches cut-out, of a Prodigious Depth, betwixt them; inſomuch that there was no coming at the Foundation of Antonia, to Undermine it: beſide that the ſinking of the Trench added ſo much to the Height of the Tower. They gave the Fourth Mountain the Name of Bezeth, or the New-Town; being an Enlargement only of the Former. When This Place came to be Inhabited, the People earneſtly deſir'd to have it Fortify'd: and Agrippa the Father of This King of the ſame Name, modell'd his Deſign, and ran-up This Wall about it; as you have heard. But upon a Phancy coming into his Head, that Claudius Cæſar might perhaps take ſome Offence and Jealouſie at the Pomp and Oſtentation of ſo Magnificent a Work; Agrippa went no further then the laying of the Foundations, and ſo dropt the Project: but if he had gone-on, Jeruſalem could never have been taken.

The Stones of This Wall were Twenty Cubits in Length; and Ten, Over: and ſo Hard and Firm withall, that they were Proof either againſt Mining or Battery. The Wall was alſo Ten Cubits Thick, and they would have been anſwerably High in Proportion; if the Fear of Claudius (as I told you) had not put a ſtop to Agrippa's Deſign. The Jews, 'tis true, carry'd-up the Wall afterwards to Twenty Cubits, with Battlements of Two Cubits at the Top; and Parapets, of Three: which in all make Five and Twenty Cubits. The Wall was Fortify'd with Towers of Twenty Cubits Square; every jot as ſubſtantial as the very Wall; and not Inferiour, for Strength and Beauty, to the Stones and Workmanſhip of the Temple it ſelf. Theſe Towers were rais'd Twenty Cubits above the Wall, with Winding Stair-Caſes leading-up to them; Lodgings, and Eating-Rooms on the Top, and Ciſterns for Rain-Water. Upon the Third Wall there were Ninety Towers all of a make, and at the equal diſtance of Two Hundred Cubits one from another. The Middle Wall had only Fourteen Towers; the Old Wall, Sixty; and Thirty Three Furlongs was the Compaſs of the Whole City.

The Third Wall was all over a Wonderful Piece of Workmanſhip from One End to the Other; but yet not Comparable to the Tower call'd Pſephinos: it ſtands upon an Angle of the Wall, North-weſt of the City; upon That Quarter where Titus had Encamp'd. The Height of it was Seventy Cubits; and ſo Advantageous a Proſpect, that in a Clear Day one might ſee Arabia from it; the Sea, and the Uttermoſt Confines of the Hebrews. The Figure of it was with Eight Angles. Juſt againſt This, was the Tower Hippicos, and there were near at hand Two Other Towers of Herod's Erecting upon the Old Wall: which, for Size, Curioſity and Strength, were look'd upon as the moſt Famous Maſter-pieces in the World. For the King, over and above the Natural Greatneſs of his Mind, gratify'd the Impulſe of his Inclination alſo; in doing all he could for the Good and Glory of the City. He dedicated his Three Towers to the Honour and Memory of the Three Perſons he had the Greateſt Eſteem for in the World; his Brother, his Friend and his Wife: the Two former having ſignaliz'd themſelves by dying Glorioufly upon the Field of Battle; the Other being put to Death by Himſelf, in a Freak of Jealouſy.

Three Famous Towers to the Honour of his Brother, his Friend, and his Wife.

The Tower of Hippicos (the Name of One of his Friends) had Four Angles, Five and Twenty Cubits over, and Thirty in Height, and the Whole Body of it ſolid. Above This, was a Platform of Stones accurately jointed; and a Receptacle for Rain-Water, of Twenty Cubits deep. Over This Terraſs, were yet Two Stories of Five and Twenty Cubits each, and divided into ſeveral Chambers or Quarters: and over That Building were Battlements of Two Cubits High, and Parapets of Three Cubits all a-round; amounting in the Whole to the Height of Eighty Five Cubits.

Hippicos, Phaſaelus, and Mariamne.

Herod call'd the Second Tower, Phaſael, by the Name of his Brother. It was Forty Cubits Square; and, in Height, after the Manner of a Pillar: all Maſſive within from Top to Bottom. And above This, was a Porch of Ten Cubits High; ſupported with Arches, and ſet-out with Other Curioſities. Over the Middle of This Porch, was another; with Rich Bathes and Appartments to it, ſuitable to the Magnificence of the Royal Founder. On the Top of it, were Battlements and Fortifications; the Whole Height of the Tower falling little ſhort of Ninety Cubits. It had at a diſtance ſome Reſemblance of the Watch-Tower of Pharos; the Famous Sea-Mark to thoſe that ſail'd toward Alexandria: only much the Larger of the Two; and at this time, the Reſidence of Simon, That Tyrannical Oppreſſour.

Herod gave the Third Tower the Name of the Queen Mariamne his Wife. It was Twenty Cubits Square, Length and Breadth; and Five and Fifty Cubits High. It muſt be allow'd, that the Structure, the Rooms and the Furniture of the Two Other Towers were Rich and Pompous; but they were yet as much below the Curioſity, the Beauty and the Ornament of This, as This fell ſhort of the Strength and Dignity of the Other Two: the King Rightly diſtinguiſhing betwixt the Maſculine Virtues of the Two Heroes, Hippicos, and Phaſael, and the ſoft Tenderneſs of a Fair Lady in the Perſon of Mariamne.
